

✓49180

49180

The Nation

A WEEKLY JOURNAL DEVOTED TO

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE
DRAMA, MUSIC, ART INDUSTRY

FOUNDED 1865

VOLUME CXXXVIII

JANUARY 3, 1934, to JUNE 27, 1934

THE NATION, Inc.
20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK

INDEX TO VOLUME CXXXVIII

JANUARY 3, 1934, to JUNE 27, 1934

(Nos. 3574-3599)

The following letters are used to indicate the type of article:

A Art
Arc Architecture
C Correspondence
Ct Cartoon
D Drama
Dt Driftway
E Editorial Article
EP Editorial Paragraph
M Music
MP Moving Pictures
P Poetry
S Signed Article

Book reviews and reviewers are indexed separately in the Book Review Section.

Pages		Pages
1-28	January 3	371-398	April 4
29-56	January 10	399-426	April 11
57-84	January 17	427-454	April 18
85-112	January 24	455-490	April 25
113-140	January 31	491-518	May 2
141-168	February 7	519-546	May 9
169-202	February 14	547-574	May 16
203-230	February 21	575-602	May 23
231-258	February 28	603-630	May 30
259-286	March 7	631-658	June 6
287-314	March 14	659-686	June 13
315-342	March 21	687-714	June 20
343-370	March 28	715-742	June 27

A

Abel, Lionel
History, snobbery, criticism; S	474
Abbott, Grace, and J. Addams
Lathrop, Julia, biographical material sought; C	620
Abortions. See Birth Control.
Academic freedom
New York City schools; cases of I. Begun and Mrs. W. Burroughs. H. Gans; C	414
Police at high school meeting. B. Schrago; C	620
Upheld by college students; EP	373
Acting, adequate. J. W. Krutch; D	56
Addams, Jane, and G. Abbott
Lathrop, Julia, biographical material sought; C	620
Advertising
"Art" and the ad man. J. Rorty; S	92
Food and drug bill in danger from advertisers; E	89
Aeronautics
Government purchases, charges white-washed; E	431
Military and naval; profiteering. R. Wohlforth; S	299; see also EP
After such pleasures. J. W. Krutch; D	229
Agar, Herbert; book, The people's choice , as Pulitzer prize winner; E	580; see also C
	675
Agricultural adjustment administration. See Consumers Agriculture
Marketing corporation, federal, planned to aid producer and consumer; EP	576
Prices, farm. W. P. Mortenson; S	642
Air mail
Contracts, and ocean mail contracts, investigation. P. Y. Anderson; S	154
Contracts, cancellation; EP	203
Contracts, cancellation. P. Y. Anderson; S	500
Contracts; companies bidding change names; EP	492
Contracts, investigation. P. Y. Anderson; S	154
Control still in old hands. P. Y. Anderson; S	330
Disclosures. P. Y. Anderson; S	219
Graft; army fliers carry mail; E	235
Alcoholic liquors
Drinking and gambling; Dt	507
Drinking, new; Dt	386
Prices and profits; EP	521
State laws being evolved; EP	59
Alice in wonderland. W. Troy; MP	82
Aliens. See Immigration
All the king's horses. P. M.; D	200
Allegheny corporation. See Van Swearingens
Allen, Florence; appointment as judge; EP	317

Allen, Hervey
Celebration of 400,000th copy of Anthony Adverse; EP	577
Reviews of Anthony Adverse; reviewers as critics. K. S. Thompson; S	22; see also C
	277
Aluminum company of America; move against, as trust; EP	141
Amalgamated association of iron, steel, and tin workers. See steel and iron
American, very early. P. M.; D	200
American federation of utility investors. See Public utilities
American legion; Willard Straight post case a test of legion's power; EP	400
American medical association
Against socialization of medicine. P. K. Smith; C	619; see also EP
correction	509
Meeting, EP	717
American newspaper guild. See Newspapers
American-Russian chamber of commerce; on Nation's honor roll for 1933	4
American society of newspaper editors. See Newspapers
And be my love. J. W. Krutch; D	167
Anderson, Paul Y.
Air-mail and ocean mail contracts, investigation; S	154, 219, 275, 330, 383 (correction, 415), 500
American society of newspaper editors; hypocrisy; S	559
Austin, Senator, in air-mail investigation; S	275
Automobile code, violation; S	383
Bailey, Representative Joe; candidacy for senate; S	500
Beck, J. M., and supreme court decisions; S	383
Campbell, Walter G.; attempt to oust him; S	101
Chiselers at work and play; S	154
Darrow, C., calls on H. S. Johnson; S	669
Darrow report; S	611
Farewell to The Nation as regular contributor; S	670
Farley, James A., on Senator La Follette; S	443
Fletcher-Rayburn bill, drive against; S	443
Flynn, John T.; debate with D. R. Richberg; S	219
Food and drug bill; S	154, 330, 500
Freedom of the press; S	559
Government employees, underpaid and overworked; S	275
Hearst, W. R., attack on Black committee; S	275
Hearst newspapers; salaries; S	559
Hours of labor; views of H. S. Johnson; S	101
In hospital; S	275
Johnson, H. S.; and critics; S	330
Journalists and the NRA; S	443
Judges, federal, and impeachment; S	611
"Liberals," views on; S	219
Lindbergh, C. A.; testimony on air-mail carriers; S	383; correction
McGrady, Edward F.; defense of; S	219; see also C
	304
McGugin, Representative Harold; demagogue; S	500
Mellon, A. W., charged with evading taxes; S	330
National industrial recovery act
Attack, underhand, by Machinery and allied products institute; S	17
Attacks by Nye and Borah; S	154
Crisis in administration; S	383; correction
Enforcement; S	415
Government support decided upon; S	443
National labor board; S	17
Newspaper code, approval; S	275
Newspaper code; breaches by publishers; S	383
Nye, Senator, attack on H. S. Anderson; S	669
Power trust offer to cooperate with NRA; S	17
Robinson, Frances; attack by Washington Post ; S	275
Roosevelt; no "swing to right"; S	500
Roosevelt not "softening up"; S	669
Securities act, attacks on; S	17
Stock exchanges, regulation of; S	219, 559
Strikes in prospect; S	669
Supreme court and decision in Minnesota mortgage case; S	101

Troyanovsky, Ambassador, party; S	500
Washington Post ; attack on F. Robinson; S	275
Wirt charges against "brain trust"; S	443
Animals. See Wild life
Another love. J. W. Krutch; D	396
Anthony Adverse. See Allen, H.
Anthracite. See Coal; Coal miners, American Anti-semitism. See Jews
Anti-war demonstrations. See Pacifism
Architecture
At Chicago fair. D. Haskell; Arc	109
"Fortress" homes of Vienna. D. Haskell; Arc	487
Ariane. W. Troy; MP	342
Armament limitation and disarmament
"Bridge of Simons sighs." Low; Ct	666
British and Italian proposals; EP	170
Conference. Low; Ct	694
Geneva conference; failure forecast; E	662
In the European jungle. Low; Ct	266
Notes, French and German, indicate abandonment; E	495
Remote control. Low; Ct	554
Roosevelt's opportunity. O. G. Villard; S	119
Armaments. See Munitions of war; Navies
Armaments, United States
Increased appropriations; EP	399
Army, United States. See Air mail; Contracts, government
Art
Independents' show. A. Brenner; A	514
Machine, at Museum of modern art. A. Brenner; A	368
Municipal art exhibition, New York, opposition to; E	376
Murals. A. Brenner; A	684
Museum of modern art, impurity in. A. Brenner; A	200
"Relief" for artists. R. P. Hecht and Z. Hecht; C	705
Rockefeller and art; E	376
Salon of America exhibit. A. Brenner; A	514
Without Maecenas; E	432
Associated gas and electric company. See Public utilities
Atlantic, Iowa, News Telegraph ; editorial as Pulitzer prize winner; E	580
Atlas tack corporation. See Stocks and bonds
Austin, Senator, in air-mail graft investigation. P. Y. Anderson; S	275
Austria
Alliance with Italy and Hungary; E	347
Cartoon; Mickey mouse seeks protection. Low	350
Constitution, new; democracy abolished; EP	371
Democracy, death of; E	234
Democracy fights for life; EP	203
Elections, new, may be called; EP	260
Fortress homes of Vienna. D. Haskell; Arc	487
Jews. See Jews
Keeping Hitler out. J. Gunther; S	180
Last stand. Gropper; Ct	237
Situation; EP	87
Slaughter of socialists. J. Gunther; S	328
Struggle for power. J. Gunther; S	557
Summer schools. J. Rothschild; S	706
Travel in. J. Rothschild; S	470
Unions, abolition of; EP	316
Workers' protest meeting in New York. M. Fox and others; C	248
See also Europe
Authors
Classified as clerks by Civil works administration; EP	171
German. See Germany
Work and personality; E	608
Automobiles
Code violation. P. Y. Anderson; S	383
Streamlined. D. Haskell; S	157; see also C
	222 Strikes:
Detroit; E	347
Industrial workers of the world and the strike. F. W. Thompson; C	592; see also 379
Labor in Detroit, militant. M. Smith; S	560
Labor in industry. S. Romer; S	379; correction, C
	508; see also C
	592
Manufacturers' victory. P. H. Noyes; S	416

- Muste, A. J., J. Cross and C. H. Mayer arrested for picketing; EP. 688
Settled by governmental intervention; E 374
Settlement; EP 427
Settlement a surrender to big business; E 458
Settlement; labor's opinion on. R. M. Stein; S 463
Settlement not lasting; EP 577
Toledo; Electric auto-lite company. A. J. Muste; S 639; EP 660; EP 688
Aviation. See Aeronautics
- B
- B., A.
German students abroad; C 223
Bachelors and unemployment. P. Schnurmann; C 47
Bailey, Representative Joe; candidacy for Senate. P. Y. Anderson; S 500
Baldwin, Roger
McGrady, Edward F.; C 304; see also 219
Ball, Lee H.
Methodism and war; C 415
Ballet russe. See Dancing
Ballets. See Dancing
Baltimore Sun; on Nation's honor roll for 1933 4
Banks
Deposit insurance; EP 232
Small depositors, discrimination against; EP 30
Banse, Ewald; book, Germany prepares for war; EP 289; see also review... 303
Barrett, Donald
France still a republic; S 532
Bayonne, France, credit municipal scandal. See France
Beal bill. See Food and drug bill
Beall, Jack
Newsstand racket; S 267
Beals, Carleton
American diplomacy in Cuba; S 68
Beard, Miriam
Nazi leaders; S 501
Beck, James Montgomery; and supreme court decisions. P. Y. Anderson; S 383
Becker, Carl
Freedom of speech; S 94
Beet sugar. See Sugar
Begun, Isador. See Academic freedom
Bellamy, Edward; letters sought. A. E. Morgan; C 389
Bennett, Milly
Big news for Russia; S 72
Bent, Silas
On currency inflation; C 103
On "slavocracy"; C 333; see also. 279
Berle, Adolf Augustus, junior; on Nation's honor roll for 1933 4
Bible, the; codex sinaiticus, purchase by British museum; EP 3
Big-hearted Herbert. J. W. Krutch; D 81
Biography, writing of. M. R. Werner; S 251
Birds; Dt 563
Birth control
Abortions and ban on birth control information; EP 233
Bill before senate. E. Clyde; C 535
Conference, national. S. Hanau; S 129
Conference, national, to be held; EP 31
Bisson, T. A.
China forum, appeal for; C 332
Black, Representative Loring. See Food and drug bill
Black cat, the. W. Troy; MP 657
Blackmur, R. P., and G. Hicks. H. Gregory; S 189
Blue eagle. See National industrial recovery act Boardman, Helen, and M. Gruening.
Crawford case; S 730
Bolivia. See Chaco war
Bolshevism and fascism. L. Fischer; S 381
Bonus. See Veterans
Books
Best sellers since 1875, in United States; E 375
People's choice, the, by H. Agar, as Pulitzer prize winner; E 580; see also E 675
Prices; EP 457
See also Novels
Borah, Senator William Edgar
Attacks on National industrial recovery act. P. Y. Anderson; S 154
Denounces munitions profiteers; EP 315
On Nation's honor roll for 1933 4
Borough, Rube
Sinclair, U., for governor of California; C 535; see also 321
Brady, William A.; on Nation's honor roll for 1933 4
"Brain trust." See Roosevelt, Franklin
Delano—Advisers
Brainsweat. J. W. Krutch; D 453
Brenner, Anita
Art, machine, at Museum of modern art; A 368
Independents' show; A 514
Murals; A 684
Museum of modern art, impurity in; A 200
Salons of America exhibit; A 514
Spain as a republic; S 149
Warner, Arthur, death; C 674
Broken shoes. W. Troy; MP 454
Bromberg, Edward J.; on Nation's honor roll for 1933 4
Brookwood college; dramatics. M. Starr; C 304
Buck, Sam R.
Criticizes The Nation; C 649
Buckley, George T.
Negroes, views on; C 74
Budd, Edward G.; and company unionism; EP 316
Budd company
Company union election; EP 343
Budget, British family; Dt 467
Buildings, high. See Skyscrapers
Buildings, office. See Office buildings
Bulgaria; dictatorship established; EP 605
Bullitt, William C.; on Nation's honor roll for 1933 4
Bureau of mines, record; EP 143
Burgess, Louis. See Newspapers
Burke, Kenneth
Four saints in three acts; M 256
Merry mount; M 256
New school for social research concerts; M 422
New York symphony orchestra, and modern music; M 52
Roth quartet; M 422
Burroughs, Mrs. Williana. See Academic freedom Business
Licensing; E 458
Loans to, by Federal reserve banks and Reconstruction finance corporation, in new bill; EP 631
Business depression
Colorado, revolution in. F. C. Cross; S 152
Professional men and women, effect on. See Unemployment Recovery due to government priming? O. G. Villard; S 238
Butler, Nicholas Murray
Commission on economy recovery reports; EP 204
On Nation's honor roll for 1933 4
- C
- California
Fascism in. E. Winter; S 241
Imperial valley, "Kidnap valley" for labor. E. O. Jones; C 468
Imperial valley, labor conditions; E 459
Calkins, Clinch
Snow in evening; P 449
Campaign contributions. See Politics
Campbell, Walter G.; attempt to oust him. P. Y. Anderson; S 101
Campbell soup company, strike hearing; EP 520
Canning industry
Code approved, subject to inclusion of quality-standard clause; EP 659
Labor gets raw deal under NRA; EP 717
Capital punishment
Indiana determination to kill prisoner; EP 289
Innocent, punishment of; EP 3
Capitalism
Failure in coal industry; EP 231
Planned. Low; Ct 462
Capper, Senator Arthur; solicitation for his Weekly. J. W. Farquhar; C 413
Carolina. W. Troy; MP 285
Cartoons. See Low (cartoonist)
Carson, P. L. and others
Medical bureau, organization; C 47
Catherine the great. W. Troy; MP 285
Catholic church. See Germany
Censorship, magazine; certain publications barred in New York; EP 317
Censorship, moving pictures
For grown-ups; E 348
Censorship, radio
Order on the air. J. Rorty; S 529
Schlink, F. J., address barred; EP 87
Century of progress exposition. See World's fair Chabukani, Wachtang, and Vecheslova, dancing. L. Kirstein; S 138
Chaco war
Munitions embargo collapses; EP 689
War between Bolivia and Paraguay to be considered by League of nations; EP 575
Chappell, Winifred
International women's congress against war and fascism; C 675
Chase, Lewis
Seeks Chiversiana; C 389
Chicago world's fair. See World's fair
Chicken raisers' troubles; Dt 359, 445
Child labor
Amendment; E 60
Opposition to amendment; E 551
Opposition to amendment, and Roosevelt support; EP 232
Childbirth
Mortality, report by New York academy of medicine; E 118
China
Politics; confusion. C. Corcoran; S 533
Rebellion, new. C. Corcoran; S 99
See also Chinese-Japanese relations
China forum; appeal for. T. A. Bisson; C 332
Chinese-Japanese relations
Japan's "hands off China" declaration. C. Corcoran; S 645
"Open door." Low; Ct 610
Protectorate, Japanese, over China in sight; Japanese manifesto on loans to China; EP 491
Statement by Ambassador Hirota; EP 519
Stimson doctrine; retreat by United States; E 264
United States, attitude of; EP 519, 520
Chiselers at work and play. P. Y. Anderson; S 154
Chivers, Thomas Holley; biographical material sought; L. Chase; C 389
Churches
Clergymen and the depression. H. Her-ring; S 66
Clergymen oppose war. O. G. Villard; S 581
Clergymen; views of 20,000 on peace and war, and economics; E 524
Congregationalists to use phonograph records in services; EP 345
Churchill, Henry S.
Housing, Public works administration record; S 178
Civil works administration. See Unemployment
Clark, Harry Hayden
Seeks biographical material on T. Paine; C 447
Claus, D. C.
Fight for power; S 18
Clergymen. See Churches
Clerical workers. See Office workers' union
Cleveland free thought college. A. Schuster; C 47
Clyde, Ethel
Birth control bill; C 535
Coal
Anthracite industry; government control essential; EP 521
Failure of capitalist system; report of Russell Sage foundation; EP 231
Coal miners, American
Anthracite miners win fight for union recognition; EP 204
Anthracite strike; EP 115; EP 143
Illinois, union rivalry again active; EP 343
Illinois, unions, rival, recognition of; EP 492
Southern; wage differentials restored; EP 491
Coates, Kenneth D.
Negroes, views on; C 74
Codex sinaiticus. See Bible
Codman, Florence
O'Casey, Sean; S 476
Coffee; destruction in Brazil; EP 289
Coffin, Robert P. Tristram
Wild bee's nest; P 615
Cohen, Elliot E.
Revolution, premature burial; S 527; see also EP 491, 498
Cold. See Weather
Collectivism, argument by M. Van Kleeck at National conference of social work; EP 688
Colleges and universities. See Academic freedom; Education; Military training
Collier, John
On Nation's honor roll for 1933 4
See also Indians, American
Colman, Louis
Herndon, Angelo; case of; C 508
Colorado
Politics in dismissal of relief committee; EP 171
Revolution in. F. C. Cross; S 152
Roche, Josephine, nominated for governor; EP 633
Roche, Josephine, nominated for governor. O. G. Villard; S 665
Come of age. J. W. Krutch; D 140
Committee on the use of leisure time, report; E 663
Communism; international; Third international, failure of. L. Fischer; S 498; see also EP 491, 527
Company unions. See Labor unions
Congregationalist church. See Churches
Congress
Adjournment, and work; EP 715
Opposition to president lacking; EP 85

- Roosevelt and congress. O. G. Villard; S. 722
 Session, quiet, expected; EP. 1
 Connecticut; ownership by Connecticut electric service company. A. Levitt; S. 504
 Conner, Sennett (governor of Missouri) On Nation's honor roll for 1933. 4
 Consumers
 Work of Consumers' advisory board and Consumers' counsel of the Agricultural adjustment administration. J. Rorty; S. 37
 See also National industrial recovery act
 Contracts, government
 Army motorization, improper awards; EP. 203
 See also Air mail; Mail contracts
 Contributions, campaign. See Politics
 Cooper, Colonel Hugh L.; on Nation's honor roll for 1933. 4
 Cooperatives, British. S. R. Elliott; S. 726
 Copeland, Senator Royal S.; abatement suggested. O. G. Villard; S. 433
 Copeland (Tugwell) bill. See Food and drug bill Copyrights; treaty for United States entry into copyright union not yet ratified; EP. 633
 Corcoran, Crispian
 China, confusion in; S. 533
 China, new rebellion in; S. 99
 Japan's "hands off China" declaration; S. 644
 "Man-Mengkuo," Manchu-Mongol federated state; S. 358
 Cotton
 California; correction of December article. G. Creel; C. 222
 Growers. J. C. Waldron; S. 703
 Limitation of production; E. 208
 Cotton-textiles industry; production and wage settlement; EP. 660 Couch, W. T.
 Negroes, views on; C. 76
 Coughlin, Reverend Charles Edward; demagoguery in Radio league of the little flower; E. 522; see also C. 650
 Count, Jerome
 Power industry and national recovery administration; S. 128
 Cowley, Malcolm. See New Republic
 Coyle, C. H.
 Election frauds and harboring radical views; C. 705
 Crawford, George
 Case; is N.A.A.C.P. retreating? H. Boardman and M. Gruening; S. 730
 Found guilty of murder of Mrs. Boeing and another woman; gets life term; EP. 3
 Credit, expansion of; E. 207; see also 218; C. 386
 Credit municipal, Bayonne, France. See France
 Creel, George
 Cotton pickers in California; correction of December article; C. 222
 Crime, perfect; EP. 171
 Criticism; history, snobbery, criticism. L. Abel; S. 474 Criticism, literary Critics, two: R. P. Blackmur and G. Hicks. H. Gregory; S. 189
 Reviewers as critics. K. S. Thompson; S. 22; see also C. 277
 Reviewers on young author; EP. 261
 Cross, Frank Clay
 Colorado, revolution in; S. 152
 Sugar trust, the; S. 15
 Cross, James; with A. J. Muste and C. H. Mayer, arrested for picketing; EP. 688
 Cruikshank, R. J.
 Great Britain not going fascist; C. 446; see also 384
 Cuba
 American diplomacy in. C. Beals; S. 68
 Army, violence by; EP. 548
 Clash expected; EP. 86
 Political and economic troubles. C. Porset; S. 353
 Travel in. J. Rothschild; S. 131
 Treaty, including abrogation of Platt amendment, with United States; EP. 689
 Treaty revision urgently needed; EP. 604
 United States, policy of; E. 116; EP. 170
 Unrest due to United States policy; EP. 29
 Currency
 Devaluation; dollar a political toy. H. Hazlitt; S. 122
 Dies-Thomas bill for use of silver in exchange and as basis for certificates E. 493
 Gold policy, United States. Low; Ct. 172
 Gold, regulations; E. 172
 Inflation, plea for. W. T. Davis; C. 186
 Managed, Roosevelt plan; EP. 85
 Stabilization; EP. 141
 Stern, J. D., views of; C. 21; see also C. 103
 See also Silver
 D
Daily Worker; treatment of death of Coolidge; EP. 522
 Dancing
 Ballet, persistence of. L. Kirstein; S. 138
 In music halls, reviews, and movies. L. Kirstein; S. 310
 Kykunkor. L. Kirstein; S. 684
 Monte Carlo ballet russe. L. Kirstein; S. 138; S. 546
 Monte Carlo ballet russe. M. M.; S. 82
 Monte Carlo ballet russe. L. Nadejena; S. 52
 Daniels, Jonathan
 Negroes, views on; C. 74
 Darrow report. See National industrial recovery act
 Davis, W. T.
 Plea for inflation; C. 186
 Davis, William H., and company unionism; EP. 316
 Days without end. J. W. Krutch; D. 110
 Death takes a holiday. W. Troy; MP. 342
 Debt, public. See United States—Finances
 Debts, war. See War debts
 De Ford, Miriam Allen
 Cotton pickers in California; letter by G. Creel correcting statement; C. 222
 Dell, Robert
 France not fascist; S. 297
 German-French relations; S. 440
 Italy, impressions of; S. 670
 League of nations; 1933 a critical year; S. 211; see also C. 360
 Democratic party; Farley, James A., retirement as chairman; EP. 113
 Department stores; sales, two sets of figures; EP. 401
 Depression. See Business depression
 Detroit. See Automobiles
 Dewhurst, J. Frederic, and M. G. Schneider
 Stock-market control; S. 301; see also EP. 287
 Diabetes; insulin, brief for. H. A. Teitelbaum; C. 388; correction C. 620
 Dictionary of thoughts; Dt. 132
 Dies-Thomas bill. See Silver
 Diplomatic corps. See Government employees
 Disarmament. See Armament limitation and disarmament
 Disney, Walt; should "do" the "Odyssey." J. Thurber; S. 363
 Doctors. See Medical profession
 Dodsworth, J. W. Krutch; D. 311
 Dollar, value of. See Currency
 Dole. See Unemployment
 Dominican republic; dictatorship. E. Gruening; S. 583
 Drama. See names of plays; also K., F.; Krutch, J. W.; M., P.
 Drama league travel bureau. H. Pavitek; C. 389
 Drinking. See Alcoholic liquors
 Drug and food bill. See Food and drug bill
 Drug traffic; Manchukuo and the opium trade. E. N. La Motte; S. 246
 Drugstores; business problems. O. Lerner; S. 590
 Duker, Samuel
 Jewish fascism; C. 563; see also 465
 Durant, Walter; on Nation's honor roll for 1933. 4
 Durling, Dwight
 Death's-head; P. 335
 Dymaxion. See Automobiles—Streamlined
 E
 Eagle, blue. See National industrial recovery act
 Earthquakes. See India
 East, far. See Far east; Japanese-Russian relations
 Eastman, Joseph Bartlett. O. G. Villard; S. 148
 See also Railroads
 Economic conditions; recovery, Butler commission report; EP. 204
 Economic nationalism. See Tariff, United States
 Economics, attitude toward. H. Gregory; S. 134
 Economics of scarcity. Low; Ct. 526
 Economy bill. See New York city—Finances
 Eddy, Sherwood; on Nation's honor roll for 1933. 4
 Edison electric institute. See Power and power industry
 Editorial workers. See Newspapers Education
 College, plight of. O. G. Villard; S. 349
 Public. See Schools
 Without Maecenas; E. 432
 Einstein, Albert; property in Germany seized; EP. 31
 Electric auto-lite company
 See Automobiles—strikes
 Election frauds, and harboring radical views. C. H. Coyle; C. 705
 Elliott, Sydney R.
 Cooperatives, British; S. 726
 Ellsworth, P. T.
 Answer to J. Strachey; S. 218; see also E. 207; C. 386
 El Salvador; recognition by United States; EP. 142
 Employees, government. See Government employees
 Employment. See Unemployment
 Enemies of progress. W. Troy; MP. 112
 England. See Great Britain
 Engle, Jay
 White-collar workers, organizations; C. 47
 English language
 Good usage; E. 720
 In British periodicals; Dt. 331
 Epstein, Gertrude
 News "fit to print"; C. 46
 Ernst, Morris L.; on Nation's honor roll for 1933. 4
 Europe
 Alignment of powers; EP. 142
 At a glance. Low; Ct. 434
 Jungle. Low; Ct. 266
 Situation; articles by J. Steel:
 I. Bloody Danube and beyond. 269
 II. Germany's dream of expansion. S. 324
 III. Franco-Italian rivalries. 354
 IV. Is Britain going fascist? 384; see also C. 446; C. 592;
 C. 675
 V. Mechanics of nationalism. 411
 Tension in; EP. 717
 Triple alliance, new; E. 347
 European war
 Amnesty for those convicted under war laws; EP. 30
 Everyman; connection of Sir E. Wrench; C. 592; see also 384
 Exarch (steamship); suicide of captain after accident; E. 62 Exchanges, stock. See Stocks and bonds
 F
 Far east
 Events, war-like; EP. 169
 See also Chinese-Japanese relations; Japanese-Russian relations
 Farley, James A.
 On Senator La Follette. P. Y. Anderson; S. 443
 Retirement as Democratic chairman; EP. 113
 Farmer-labor party. See Minnesota
 Farming. See Agriculture
 Farquhar, John W.
Copper's Weekly solicitation; C. 413
 Fascism
 And bolshevism. L. Fischer; S. 381
 British. See Great Britain
 "Enthusiasm." Low; Ct. 582
 Italian. See Italy
 Jewish. See Jews
 On west coast. E. Winter; S. 241
 Other side. Low; Ct. 210
 Federal reserve banks, loans to business. See Business Fiction. See Novels
 Field, Sara Bard
 Winter revery; P. 134
 Fierro, Anthony. See Terzani, A.
 Films. See Moving pictures
 Finance, articles on. See Noyes, P. H.
 Finances, United States. See United States
 First apple, the. J. W. Krutch; D. 81
 Fischer, Louis
 Fascism and bolshevism; S. 381
 Russia; and the league; S. 728
 Russia; life grows easier; S. 667
 Russia; recognition by United States; S. 9
 Russia; second five-year plan; S. 182
 Spain, class war in; S. 437
 Trotsky, L., tragedy of; S. 498; see also E. 491
 Fitzgerald, Edward J., and M. L. Rogers
 Indian, American, new ideas on; S. 326
 Fletcher, Henry Prather; elected chairman of Republican national committee; EP. 689
 Fletcher, John Gould; replies to. J. Daniels and others; C. 73
 Fletcher-Rayburn bill. See Stocks and bonds
 Food and drug bill
 Campbell, Walter G., attempt to oust him. P. Y. Anderson; S. 101
 Drug lobby. J. Rorty; S. 213
 Emasculated in senate committee; EP. 344
 Fight for bill needed; EP. 400
 Hearings. J. Rorty; S. 295
 Imperilled by advertisers; E. 89
 Lobby against. P. Y. Anderson; S. 330; 500
 Opposition; E. 5
 President pushes bill. P. Y. Anderson; S. 559

- Publishers, attitude of; EP..... 113
 Tugwell-Copeland bill, substitute for, offered by Representative Black, called Beal bill. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 154
 Western newspaper union suppresses support of Tugwell bill. H. B. Hough; C..... 277
 Foreign and domestic commerce, bureau of; Thorp resignation; EP..... 576
 Foreign service, U. S. See Government employees
 Fosdick, Reverend doctor Harry Emerson; denounces war; O. G. Villard; S..... 581
 Four saints in three acts. See Stein, G.
 Fox, Mary, and others
 Workers' protest meeting on Austria; C. 248
 France
 Cost of living. I. C. Safr; C..... 535
 Italy, rivalry with. J. Steel; S..... 354
 Newspapers and Hitler. E. Lengyel; S. 216
 Politics:
 Fascism, progress of; EP..... 371
 Government, change of, causes; EP. 169
 Nation faces fascism; E..... 206
 Not fascist. R. Dell; S..... 297
 Still a republic. D. Barrett; S..... 532
 Stavisky scandal; Credit municipal, Bayonne, affair; EP..... 142
 Summer schools. J. Rothschild; C..... 333
 Travel in. J. Rothschild; S..... 333
 See also Franco-German relations
 Franco-German relations. R. Dell; S..... 440
 Frank, Jerome N.; on Nation's honor roll for 1933..... 4
 Frankfort, university of; Jews barred; EP.. 31
 Frankfurter, Felix; on Nation's honor roll for 1933..... 4
 Freedom, academic. See Academic freedom
 Freedom of speech. C. Becker; S..... 94
 British anti-sedition bill; EP..... 632;
 see also..... 641
 No exceptions. P. Glaberman; C..... 46
 Upheld by college students; EP..... 373
 Freedom of the press
 American society of newspaper editors' hypocrisy. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 559 British anti-sedition bill; EP..... 632;
 see also..... 641
 Danger to. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 559
 Friends of the soviet union; technical help wanted. S. J. White; C..... 447
 Fritzmeier, Robert, H. Hartzell, and C. Olds
 Oberlin college, "progress" at; C..... 360; see also C..... 414
 Frochard, la, et les deux orphelines. W. Troy; MP..... 228
 Fruits, spray for. See Poison spray
 Fry, Varian
 Youth conference; C..... 132; see also..... 70, 103
 Future generation. Low; Ct..... 378
- G
- Gaddy, Judge J. V.; on Nation's honor roll for 1933..... 4
 Galantière, Lewis
 On translation; C..... 620; see also 193; C..... 507
 Gambling and drinking; Dt..... 507
 Gans, Helene
 Academic freedom in New York city schools; C..... 414
 Garner, S. E.
 Jewish fascism; C..... 563; see also..... 465
 Gentlewoman. J. W. Krutch; D..... 424
 Germans in America
 Anti-Nazi bill in New Jersey; EP..... 521
 Germany
 Airplanes from America and Great Britain; EP..... 519
 Economic conditions worse; EP..... 401; correction, 457; E..... 579
 Expansion; dreams of. J. Steel; S..... 324
 Factory elections show anti-Nazi trend; EP..... 716
 Finances; moratorium on debts payment declared; E..... 718
 France, relations with. See Franco-German relations
 Hitler meeting with Mussolini; EP..... 717
 Hitler's economics; E..... 6
 Hitlerism; the other side. Low; Ct..... 210
 Jews. See Jews
 Labor code, Nazi; EP..... 114
 Militarism; "banning" of book by E. Banse; EP..... 289; see also review of book..... 303
 Nazi leaders. M. Beard; S..... 501
 Newspapers; decline; E..... 579
 Newspapers; effect of Nazi rule; EP..... 371
 Newspapers; mortality under Nazi regime; EP..... 170
 Poland, non-aggression pact with; EP..... 142
 Protestant church co-ordination; EP..... 58
 Refugees, appeal for. S. D. Spero; C..... 223
 Reichstag building fire; acquittals; EP.. 3
 Reichstag building fire; execution of van der Lubbe; EP..... 86
 Roman catholic church; conflicts with Vatican; E..... 459
 Sterilization of the unfit, law passed; EP..... 3
 Students abroad as propagandists. A. B.; C..... 223
 Summer schools. J. Rothschild; C..... 676
 Travel in. J. Rothschild; S..... 333
 Unions, fascist, dissolution. L. Lore; S. 124
 Viereck, G. S., defends suppression of his book; E..... 460
 Writers support Hitlerism. H. Solow; S..... 64; see also C..... 159
 Youth poisoned by Hitler. O. G. Villard; S..... 265
 Gettle, William F.; kidnapping; EP..... 605
 Gilbert and Sullivan. J. W. Krutch; D..... 488
 Gill, Ross. See Murals
 Glaberman, Philip
 Freedom of speech; C..... 46
 Glassberg, Benjamin
 Relief with mind and heart; S..... 11
 Gold; flow to United States; EP..... 232
 See also Currency
 Goldman, Emma; return to America; E..... 320
 Government contracts. See Contracts, government
 Government employees
 Diplomatic corps; members in financial distress; E..... 173; EP..... 605
 Postal employees; "chiseled" by the government; E..... 430
 Postal employees, more liberal treatment; EP..... 455
 Restoration of pay cuts over veto; E..... 403
 Substitute postal clerks, treatment of, C..... 332
 Underpaid and overworked. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 275 Government ownership. See Ownership, government
 Great Britain
 Cooperatives. S. R. Elliott; S..... 726
 Economic conditions; "recovery." J. A. Hobson; S..... 588
 Fascism. Low; Ct..... 638
 Fascism probable. J. Steel; S..... 384;
 see also C..... 446; C..... 592; C..... 675
 Government, opposition to; EP..... 260
 House of lords; no reform now. H. J. Laski; S..... 641
 Labor party gains; EP..... 317
 Quota against Japanese goods. H. J. Laski; S..... 641
 Summer schools. J. Rothschild; S..... 676
 Travel in. J. Rothschild; S..... 333
 Great Lakes-Saint Lawrence waterway. See Saint Lawrence development project Greece. See Insull, Samuel
 Green, Margaret
 Russian revolution in clothes; S..... 44;
 see also C..... 468
 Greenberg, Sophie
 Nation dinner in San Francisco; C..... 223
 Greenspan, Magistrate Benjamin; on Nation's honor roll for 1933..... 4
 Gregory, Horace
 Critics, two: R. P. Blackmur and G. Hicks; S..... 189
 Sex and economics, attitude toward; S.. 134
 Gropper
 Austria's last stand; Ct..... 237
 Group theater; on Nation's honor roll for 1933..... 4
 Gruening, Ernest
 Haiti, withdrawal from; S..... 700
 Resigns from Nation staff; becomes editor of New York Evening Post; EP..... 233
 Santo Domingo; dictatorship; S..... 583
 Gruening, Martha, and H. Boardman
 Crawford case; S..... 730
 Guffey, Joseph E.; wins in primaries; E..... 607
 Gunther, John
 Austria; keeping Hitler out; S..... 180
 Austria, politics; S..... 557
 Austria, slaughter in; S..... 328
- H
- Habits; Dt..... 413
 Haddock, Hoyt S.
 Radio operators on strike; C..... 592
 Haiti
 Control by United States defended by state department; EP..... 2
 United States withdrawal. E. Gruening; S..... 700
 Hallgren, Mauritz A.
 Oil trust, NRA; S..... 271
 Halsall, L. Arthur
 Poets, young; poems wanted; C..... 593
 Hamilton, Andrew; Dt..... 158
 Hanau, Stella
 Birth-control conference; S..... 129
 Hanfstaengl, Ernst Franz Sedgwick; admission to United States; EP..... 716
 Harriman hosiery mills
 Loses blue eagle; EP..... 492
- Merchants uphold company against NRA; EP..... 520
 Harris, Jed; on Nation's honor roll for 1933..... 4
 Harris, Sam H.; on Nation's honor roll for 1933..... 4
 Hartzell, Homer, R. Fritzmeier, and C. Olds
 Oberlin college, "progress" at C..... 360;
 see also C..... 414
 Haskell, Douglass
 Architecture at Chicago fair; Arc..... 109
 Automobiles, streamlined; S..... 157; see also C..... 222
 "Fortress" homes of Vienna; Arc..... 487
 Housing; action needed; S..... 614
 Housing; house on wheels; S..... 586
 Housing, "streamlined"; S..... 555
 Hays, Arthur Garfield
 Argument in injunction case; EP..... 388
 On Nation's honor roll for 1933..... 4
 Hazlitt, Henry
 Dollar, the; S..... 122
 Hearst, William Randolph, attack on Black committee. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 275
 Hearst newspapers. See Newspapers
 Hecht, Rosa Pringle, and Z. Hecht
 Artists, "relief" for; C..... 705
 Hell on earth. W. Troy; MP..... 166
 Henry, Arthur M. See Poison spray
 Henry street settlement; asks books. B. Miller; C..... 734
 Herndon, Angelo
 Case of. L. Colman; C..... 508
 Sentence for having seditious literature upheld; EP..... 633
 Herring, Hubert
 Minister and the depression; S..... 66
 Hertzberg, Sidney
 Socialist party declaration of principles; S..... 702
 Hicks, Granville, and R. P. Blackmur. H. Gregory; S..... 189
 Highlander folk school; appeal for; C..... 21
 Hillman, Samuel
 Finds Nation a necessity; C..... 650
 History, snobbery, criticism. L. Abel; S..... 474
 Hitler, Adolf. See Germany
 Hitler's reign of terror. W. Troy; MP.... 573
 Hobson, John A.
 Great Britain, "recovery" in; S..... 588
 Holmes, John Haynes
 Appeal for Indian earthquake sufferers; C..... 304
 Hoover, Calvin B.; on Nation's honor roll for 1933..... 4
 Horton, Judge James E.; on Nation's honor roll for 1933..... 4
 Hotel strike, New York. H. Solow; S..... 239
 Hough, Henry Beetle
 Newspapers, country, and the Western newspaper union; C..... 277
 Hours of labor. See Labor
 House of lords. See Great Britain
 House of Rothschild, the. W. Troy; MP... 396
 Housing
 Act, profits under; EP..... 715
 Action needed. D. Haskell; S..... 614
 Action needed. O. G. Villard; S..... 609
 Call to action. A. Mayer; S..... 435
 House on wheels. D. Haskell; S..... 586
 Public works administration program, failure of. A. Mayer; S..... 408
 Public works administration record disappointing. H. S. Churchill; S..... 178
 "Streamlined." D. Haskell; S..... 555
 Howe, E. W., retirement; E..... 34
 Huebsch, B. W.
 Defense of German writers; C..... 159;
 see also..... 64
 Hull, Cordell
 Mr. Hull, Pan-America, and the tariffs. O. G. Villard; S..... 36
 See also Latin America
 Hull, Henry; on Nation's honor roll for 1933..... 4
 Humor; learning to laugh; E..... 292
 Hungary
 Alliance with Austria and Italy; E..... 347
 Travel in. J. Rothschild; S..... 415
- I
- I was a spy. E. Troy; MP..... 166
 Ice floe; rescue from; EP..... 457
 Illinois
 Labor unrest in southern section; EP... 717
 See also Coal miners, American Ilsley, Mrs. Agnes Boeing. See Crawford, G.
 Immigration; alien exclusion proposals, new; EP..... 345
 Imperial valley. See California
 Independent offices appropriation bill. See United States—Finances
 Independents' show. A. Brenner; A..... 514
 India
 Earthquake sufferers, appeal for. J. H. Holmes; C..... 304
 Suppression at Midnapore and Chittagong. J. Nehru; S..... 410

- Indians, American
Collier policy a success; E..... 33
Culture; Dt 247
New ideas on. M. L. Rogers and E. J. Fitzgerald; S 326
- Industry. See Business
- Inflation. See Currency
- Injunctions
New legal doctrine under NIRA; EP... 688
Norris-LaGuardia act, misuse; EP..... 577
- Inman, Samuel Guy
Pan-American conference, Montevideo; S 97
- Insulin. See Diabetes
- Insull, Samuel; Greek courts, justice for. S. P. Ladas; C..... 21
- Insurance, unemployment. See Unemployment
- Intellectuals; detachment; E 636
- International relief association; appeal for German refugees; C 223
- International women's congress against war and fascism. W. Chappell; C..... 675
- Investors. See Stocks and bonds
- Irish free state; war, new. Irish observer; S.....39; see also C..... 277
- Irish observer
New Irish war; S.....39; see also C..... 277
- Iron. See Steel and iron
- It happened one night. W. Troy; MP..285, 314
- Italy
Alliance with Austria and Hungary; E.. 347
Fascism; content of. F. Pitigliani; C.. 387
Fascism; the other side. Low; Ct..... 210
France, rivalry with. J. Steel; S..... 354
Impressions of. R. Dell; S..... 670
Summer schools. J. Rothschild; S..... 706
Travel in. J. Rothschild; S..... 333
Unemployment. L. Villari; C, with editorial comment 222
- Itzkowitz, Benjamin
Jewish fascism; C.....563; see also..... 465
- J
- Japan
British quota against Japanese goods. H. J. Laski; S 641
Militarism; EP 114
Relations with United States; EP..169; E 375
- Japanese-Chinese relations. See Chinese-Japanese relations
- Japanese-Russian relations
Russia not unprepared. H. Yoffe; C... 387
War preparations; E..... 145
- Jews
Anti-semitism in Father Coughlin's attacks on bankers; E.....522; see also C 650
Austria; position. J. Gunther; S..... 557
Fascism. W. Zukerman; S.....465; see also letters, 563; letter by Zukerman... 733
German. Liberals' views on Nazi persecution. A. N. Meyer; S..... 243
Zionism; Jewish fascism in. W. Zukerman; S.....465; see also letters, 653; letter by Zukerman 733
- Jezebel. J. W. Krutch; D..... 28
- Jig saw. J. W. Krutch; D..... 572
- John Brown. J. W. Krutch; D..... 167
- Johnson, Alvin S.; on Nation's honor roll for 1933 4
- Johnson, General Hugh S.
Attack by Senator Nye. P. Y. Anderson; S 669
Views on thirty-hour week; S..... 101
See also National industrial recovery act
- Johnson act. See War debts
- Jones, Ellis O.
Kidnap valley, California; C..... 468
- Journalists. See Newspapers
- Joyce, James; Stephen Dedalus and James Joyce. W. Troy; S..... 187
- Joyous season, the. J. W. Krutch; D..200; correction 258
- Jugoslavia; travel in. J. Rothschild; S.... 415
- Juries and jurymen. See Negroes
- K
- K., F.
Richard of Bordeaux; D 311
- Kahn, Otto H.; death; E..... 432
- Kang Teh (Pu-yi). See Manchukuo
- Kansas, governor of, in 1933
On Nation's honor roll for 1933..... 4
- Kansas City, Missouri; election; boss rule wins; EP 400
- Kashin, Bella
Clothing in Russia; C..468; see also... 44
- Kendrick, Alexander
Milk trust; S 155
- Kerney, James, death. O. G. Villard; S.... 461
- Key, the. W. Troy; MP..... 713
- Khaki shirts of America. See Terzani, A.
- "Kidnap valley." See California
- Kidnapping; Gettle case, California, speedy action; EP 605
- Kirschner foundry, picketing; EP..... 261
- Kirstein, Lincoln
Ballet, persistence of; S..... 138
Century of progress; S..... 695
Dancing in music halls, reviews, and movies; S 310
Kykunkor; S 684
Monte Carlo ballet russe; S..... 546
- Knapp Monarch company; A. J. Muste, J. Cross and C. H. Mayer arrested for picketing; EP 688
- Krutch, Joseph Wood
Acting, adequate; D..... 56
After such pleasures; D 229
And be my love; D 167
Another love; D 396
Big hearted Herbert; D..... 81
Brainsweat; D 453
Come of age; D 140
Days without end; D 110
Dodsworth; D 311
First apple, the; S 81
Four saints in three acts; D..... 396
Gentlewoman; D 424
Gilbert and Sullivan; D 488
Jezebel; D 28
Jig saw; D 572
John Brown; D..... 167
Joyous season, the; D..200; correction.. 258
Lady from the sea, the; D..... 572
Lake, the; D 81
Mahogany hall; D 140
Melodrama; D 544
Milky way, the; D 602
Moor born; D 453
New faces; D 370
No more ladies; D 167
No questions asked; D..... 229
Past, usable; S..... 191
Perfumed lady, the; D..... 370
Pure in heart, the; D..... 396
Queer people; D 284
Shattered lamp, the; D 396
Shining hour, the; D 258
Stevodore; D 515, 544
They shall not die; D 284
Wassermann, Jakob; death; S 77
Wednesday's child; D 140
Yellow jack; D 340
- Kykunkor. L. Kirstein; S 684
- L
- Labor
Anti-racketeering bill, threat to labor; EP 688
- Automobiles. See Automobiles
- California. See California
- Detroit. See Automobiles
- Germany. See Germany
- Hours; thirty-hour week; views of H. S. Johnson. P. Y. Anderson; S 101
- Legislation, Congressional failure; EP.. 603
- National labor board;
And shoe workers' strike; EP..... 372
Future of; E..... 291
Inaction; E 174
Reorganization needed. P. Y. Anderson; S 17
Wagner bill for strengthening. H. Rabinowitz; S.....356; see also EP 343
- New deal, opinions on. R. M. Stein; S 463
- Steel workers. See Steel and iron
- Wages:
Loss, 1929-1932; EP 115
No real advance, March, 1933, to March, 1934; E 579
Rise lags behind rise in prices; EP 86
See also Injunctions; Strikes
- Labor board, national. See Labor
- Labor party, British, continues gains; EP... 317
- Labor unions
Budd, E. G., and company unionism; EP.....316; EP 343
Company unions and independents, under Section 7-a of NIRA; E..... 402 Company unions, development of plan. K. Lore; S 406
German. See Germany
Picketing; decision in Kirschner case; EP 261
Under Section 7-a of NIRA; one year of Section 7-a; E..... 663
- Ladas, Stephen P.
Greek courts, justice for; C..... 21
- Lady from the sea. J. W. Krutch; D..... 572
- La Follette, Senator Robert M.
Administration opposition; EP 372
Opposition to, denied by J. A. Farley. P. Y. Anderson; S 443
- La Follette relief bill. See Unemployment
- La Follettes leave Republican party; EP... 603
- LaGuardia, Mayor Fiorello H.; record to date; E 146
- Lake, the. J. W. Krutch; D 81
- La Motte, Ellen N.
Manchukuo and the opium trade; S.... 246
- Landau, Alfred M. (governor of Kansas)
On Nation's honor roll for 1933..... 4
- Larkman, Edward, innocent, pardoned; EP.. 3
- Lash, Joseph P.
On youth meeting in Washington; C.....103; see also 70
- Laski, Harold J.
London letter; S 641
- Lathrop, Julia; biographical material sought. J. Addams and G. Abbott; C..... 620
- Latin America
Monroe doctrine, Roosevelt policy; EP.. 29
Non-intervention pledged by Secretary Hull; EP 2
United States policy changes; EP..... 142
- Latvia; goes fascist; EP..... 605
- Laughing. See Humor
- Laws; Dt 45
- League for industrial democracy, meeting in Washington. S. Rodman; S.....70; see also C 103, 132
- League of nations
1933 a critical year. R. Dell; S.....211; see also C 360
Russia and the league; L. Fischer; S... 728
- Lechlitter, Ruth
Morning in March; P 391
- Lefkowitz, Abraham
New York city economy bill; C 332
- Leibowitz, Samuel S.; on Nation's honor roll for 1933 4
- Leisure; Dt 73
See also Unemployment
- Lengyel, Emil
Hitler and the French press; S..... 216
- Lerner, Oscar
Drug business; S 590
- Lessing, Theodore; murder; fund to be created. F. X. Salda and others; C.... 47
- Levitt, Albert
Connecticut, ownership by Connecticut electric service company; S..... 504
- Liberals
Bewildered. A. N. Meyer; S..... 243
L. Symes objects to being called one; EP 345
Statement to President Roosevelt; S.....617; see also E 606
Views on. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 219
- Lindbergh, Charles Augustus; testimony on air-mail carriers. P. Y. Anderson; S.....383; correction 415
- Lindeman, Eduard C.
Social workers in the depression; S..... 274
- Lindley, Judge W. C.; report on. P. Y. Anderson; S 611
- Linscott, R. N.
Pulitzer prize award to The people's choice; C.....675; see also E..... 580
- Liquors, alcoholic. See Alcoholic liquors
- Literary criticism. See Criticism, literary
- Little man, what now? W. Troy; MP..... 713
- Livright, Lucy
On United anti-war association's resolution for investigation of munitions profits; C 388
- Loans to business. See Business
- Loans to foreign countries. See war debts
- Loch Ness monster; Dt 102
- Loftus, John J.
Defends Father Coughlin; C.....650; see also E 522
- Logan, Senator Marvel Mills; free trader. O. G. Villard; S.....321; see also C.... 693
- Longshoremen. See Marine workers
- Loos, Doctor H. Clifford. See Ross-Loos clinic
- Lords, house of. See Great Britain
- Lore, Karl
Company unions; S 406
Steel unions, unrest in; S.....612; see also EP 603
- Lore, Ludwig
German fascist unions, dissolution; S... 124
- Los Angeles, reactionary but awakening. O. G. Villard; S.....321; see also C.... 535
- Los Angeles county medical association. See Ross-Loos clinic
- Lot in Sodom. W. Troy; MP.....82, 285
- Low (cartoonist)
Armament limitation; Ct..... 694
Armament limitation; bridge of sighs; Ct 666
British fascism; Ct 638
Capitalism, planned; Ct 462
China; "open door"; Ct 610
Culture for the barbarians; Ct 294
Disarmament, remote control; Ct..... 554
Economics of scarcity; Ct..... 526
Europe at a glance; Ct 434
Fascism; the other side; Ct 210
Fascist "enthusiasm"; Ct 582
Future generation; Ct 378
Gold policy, United States; Ct 172
In the European jungle; Ct 266
Micky mouse (Austria) seeks protection; Ct 350
Munition manufacturers' profit; Ct..... 721
"Peace" by radio; Ct 147
- Lubbe, van der, Marinus, execution; EP... 86

Lutz, Caroline S. Seeks biographical material on F. H. Smith; C	675	Milky way, the; D	602	Nadejena, Lydia Monte Carlo ballet russe; S	52
Lynchings Federal bill, pending; EP.....	493	Miller, Benjamin Asks books for Henry street; C	734	Nana. W. Troy; MP	228
EP	633	Mills, Ogden Livingston, and tariff. O. G. Villard; S	175	Nation, The Correspondent finds nothing to appeal to his intelligence. S. R. Buck; C.....	649
Louisiana; lynching of white man averted; EP	493	Milwaukee; relief with mind and heart. B. Glassberg; S	11	Correspondent questions its liberalism. R. V. S.; C	649
M M., M. Monte Carlo ballet russe; S	82	Miners, coal. See Coal miners, American Ministers (religious). See Churches Minnesota Politics; Farmer-labor party and others; EP	456	Dinner, San Francisco. S. Greenberg; C	223
M., P. All the king's horses; D	200	See also Mortgages Missions and missionaries; unemployment relief menace. B. Rawlinson; C.....	20	Exposed "guaranteed mortgages" in May, 1933; EP	115
American, very early; D	200	Missouri, governor of On Nation's honor roll for 1933.....	4	Gruening, E., resigns; EP	233
Ziegfeld follies; D	111	Money. See Currency; Silver Monopoly, tendency toward; E.....	207	Honor roll for 1933.....	4
Maas, Willard Declamation; P	77	also 218; C	386	Necessity to one subscriber. S. Hillman; C	650
Skyfall; P	537	Monroe doctrine. See Latin America Monte Carlo ballet russe. See Dancing Montevideo conference. See Pan-American conference		National association for the advancement of colored people. See Crawford, George, case
Macaulay company; strike; EP.....	661	Montross, Warren C. National unemployed league; C	734	National conference of social work; M. Van Kleeck's argument for collectivism; EP	688
Machine art. See Art Machinery and allied products institute. See National industrial recovery act—Attack		Moon, Henry Lee Negro looks at soviet Russia; S.....	244	National conference of students in politics, meeting in Washington. S. Rodman; S.....	103
Maecenas, without; E	432	Moor born. J. W. Krutch; D.....	453	also C	132
Magazines. See Censorship, magazines Mahogany hall. J. W. Krutch; D.....	140	Morgan, Arthur E. Seeks letters by E. Bellamy; C	389	National industrial recovery act Administration, crisis in. P. Y. Anderson; S.....	383
Mail contracts, air and ocean, investigation. P. Y. Anderson; S	154	Mortensen, W. P. Prices, farm; S	643	correction	415
See also Air mail (for investigation of air-mail contracts) "Man-Mengkuo." See Manchukuo Man of two worlds. W. Troy; MP.....	112	Mortgages "Guaranteed," exposure of companies now and by The Nation in May, 1933; EP	115	Administration support decided upon. P. Y. Anderson; S	443
Manchukuo Coronation of Keng Teh (Pu-yi); EP..	289	Minnesota moratorium law, supreme court decision; EP	57	Aid to big business; detriment to little man; Nye resolution; EP	259
"Man-Mengkuo," Manchu-Mongol federated state suggested. C. Corcoran; S	358	Minnesota case decision. P. Y. Anderson; S	101	Attack, underhand, by Machinery and allied products institute. P. Y. Anderson; S	17
See also Drug traffic Marder, Louis Watterson, Henry, in memory of; C....	132	Mother. W. Troy; MP	713	Attacks by Nye and Borah. P. Y. Anderson; S	154
Marine workers; strike at San Francisco of longshoremen and others. E. Seeley; S	672	Mothers. See Childbirth Mother's day; EP	577	Blue eagle, two wings II. The wing upon the right. J. Strachey; S.....	13
Marionettes. W. Troy; MP	630	Motion pictures. See Moving pictures Motor manufacturers. See Automobiles Moulin rouge. W. Troy; MP	285	III. The wing upon the right (cont.). J. Strachey; S.....	42
Martel, Frank X; reputation. S. Romer; C.....	379	Moving pictures (For reviews of pictures, see names of pictures; also Troy, W.) Censorship. See Censorship, moving pictures Culture for the barbarians; Low. Ct ..	294	Canning industry; labor gets bad deal; EP	717
Marx, Harpo; success in Russia; EP.....	31	Newsreels. W. Troy; MP	630	Code, steel, magna charta of monopoly; E	578
Maryland, Governor of, in 1933 On Nation's honor roll for 1933.....	4	Retrospect: 1933. W. Troy; S.....	27	Committee on use of leisure time, report; E	663
Massachusetts justice in hold-up case; EP...	317	Mower, Edgar Ansel; on Nation's honor roll for 1933.....	4	Consumer versus NRA. J. Rorty; S	295
Masters of the world. O. G. Villard; S....	525	Municipal art exhibition. See Art Municipal ownership. See Ownership, government Munitions of war Embargo on shipments for Chaco dispute collapses; EP	689	S	322
Maternity. See Childbirth Matsura, Seitaro Appeals for English newspapers; C.....	47	Manufacture and sale; world's greatest racket. J. Steel; S	646	Effect; EP	455
May day Foreigner's view of New York demonstration; S	562	Manufacturers' profit; EP	519	Emblem withdrawn from Harriman hosiery mills; EP	492
1934; E	550	Manufacturers' profit. Low; Ct	721	Enforcement. P. Y. Anderson; S.....	500
Mayer, Albert Housing: A call to action; S.....	435	Profiteers: 1934. R. Wohlforth; S.....	288	Johnson, H. S.; outwits critics. P. Y. Anderson; S	330
Housing program, failure of; S.....	408	Profits denounced by Borah; EP.....	315	Journalists and NRA. P. Y. Anderson; S	443
Mayer, C. H., with A. J. Muste and J. Cross, arrested for picketing; EP	688	Profits, investigation of. L. Liveright; C	388	Labor under the act; one year of Section 7-a; E.....	663
McAlister, Hill (governor of Tennessee) On Nation's honor roll for 1933.....	4	Roosevelt message on private manufacture; E	607	National recovery review board (Darrow board) Darrow and another seek "cooperation" with H. S. Jackson. P. Y. Anderson; S	669
McGrady, Edward F.; defense of. P. Y. Anderson; S.....	304	Senate investigation voted; EP.....	455	Report on workings of NIRA; E....	606
McGugin, Representative Harold, demagogue. P. Y. Anderson; S.....	500	Munson, Gorham On Social credit, by C. H. Douglas; C.....	570	Report. P. Y. Anderson; S.....	611
Means, Gardiner C.; on Nation's honor roll for 1933	4	Murals; A. Brenner; A.....	684	Thompson, W. O., letter of resignation; EP	716
Medical bureau, organization. P. L. Carson and others; C	47	Murals, radical, in Seattle church, R. Gill; Reverend F. W. Shorter expelled; EP	493	Newspapers; code; E	263
Medicine, socialization of; EP.....	429	See also Rivera, D. Murder in Trinidad. W. Troy; MP	657	Newspapers; code approved. P. Y. Anderson; S	275
see also	509	Murray, William H. (governor of Oklahoma) On Nation's honor roll for 1933.....	4	Newspapers; code; breaches by publishers. P. Y. Anderson; S	383
Mellon, Andrew William; tax evasion charged. P. Y. Anderson; S.....	330	Museum of modern art Impurity in. A. Brenner; A.....	200	Oil trust, NRA. M. A. Hallgren; S....	271
Melodrama. See Theater, the Men in white, play, wins Pulitzer prize; EP	549	Machine art at; A. Brenner; A.....	368	Power industry and national recovery administration. J. Count; S.....	128
Merry mount. K. Burke; M.....	256	Music Contemporary. K. Burke; M	52	Price-fixing under act; EP	170
Messersmith, George S.; appointed minister to Austria; EP	371	Four saints in three acts. K. Burke; M	256	Purchasing power under codes; EP	287
On Nation's honor roll for 1933.....	4	Merry mount. K. Burke; M	256	Record in 1933; E	144
Methodist church and war. L. H. Ball; C....	415	New school for social research concerts. K. Burke; S	422	Roosevelt appeal for cooperation; EP...	287
Mexico; travel in. J. Rothschild; S.....	131	New York symphony orchestra, and modern music. K. Burke; M.....	52	Section 7-a, one year of; E.....	663
Meyer, Annie Nathan Liberal, bewildered; S	243	Roth quartet. K. Burke; M.....	422	Stalled at the crossroads; E	318
Militarism Reserve officers' training corps, advance and retreat; E	207	Without Maecenas; E	432	See also Labor unions National labor board. See Labor National recovery review board. See National industrial recovery act
See also Japan Military training Methodist ministers opposed. L. H. Ball; C	415	Mussey, Henry Raymond Government taxation and spending; S....	176	National socialists. See Germany National student federation; meeting in Washington. S. Rodman; S.....	70
Opposition in colleges; peace training urged; EP	428	Mussolini, Benito Hitler, A., meeting with; EP.....	717	see also C.....	103
Milk Prices; scandal in control; E....	33	Muste, A. J. Toledo strike; S	639	National student league, meeting in Washington. S. Rodman; S.....	70
see also C, with editorial comment.....	185	With J. Cross and C. H. Mayer, arrested for picketing; EP	688	also C	103
Production control, attempts abandoned; EP	520	Myers, Gustavus; defends Puritans; E.....	404	National unemployed league. W. C. Montross; C	734
Production, lessened, and processing tax; EP	399			Nationalism. J. Steel; S	411
Regulation in New York city and state; E	719			Nationalism, economic. See Tariff, United States
Trust, farmers revolt against trust and government. A. Kendrick; S.....	155			Navies; race caused by United States; EP..	315

- Needham trust company robbery; innocent taxi drivers released; EP 317
- Negroes
- Alabama. See Negroes—Scottsboro case
 - Discrimination in Capitol restaurants; EP 261
 - Juries, right to serve gains; EP 3
 - Russia; negro looks at soviet Russia. H. L. Moon; S 244
 - Scottsboro case:
 - Anniversary, third; resume of case and future; EP 344
 - Play, They shall not die. J. W. Krutch; D 284
 - Voices from the south. J. Daniels and others; C 73
 - Nehru, Jawaharlal
 - India, humiliation of; S 410
 - New deal. See Roosevelt, F. D.—Administration
 - New faces. J. W. Krutch; D 370
 - New Lots high school meeting; police at. B. Schrago; C 620
 - New Masses; salutation to; EP 59
 - New Republic; M. Cowley, literary editor, on Nation's review of Anthony Adverse; C 277; see also 22
 - New school for social research; concerts. K. Burke; M 422
 - New York academy of medicine. See Childbirth
 - New York city
 - Finances:
 - And government reorganization; EP 58
 - Economy bill becomes law; EP 457
 - Economy bill, opposition and support; EP 232
 - Economy bill, protest against. A. Lefkowitz; C 332
 - LaGuardia, Mayor, record to date; E 146
 - Unemployment relief. See Unemployment
 - New York Evening Post
 - Currency policy explained by J. D. Stern; C 21
 - E. Gruening becomes editor; EP 233
 - New York shipbuilding company; strike; EP 520
 - New York symphony orchestra. K. Burke; M 52
 - New York telephone company; Smahl suit for overcharges; E 496
 - New York Times; on Nation's honor roll for 1933 4
 - Newman, Louis I.
 - Jewish fascism; C 563; see also 465
 - News Telegraph, Atlantic, Iowa; editorial as Pulitzer prize winner; E 580
 - News writers. See Newspapers
 - Newspaper guild, American. See Newspapers
 - Newspapers
 - American Newspaper guild:
 - Burgess case; discharge for activity in guild, San Francisco; E 552
 - Code for journalists, move for; EP 373
 - Convention; EP 633
 - First contract signed; EP 428
 - Formed; EP 549
 - Formed. J. Scribner; S 698
 - American society of newspaper editors; hypocrisy on freedom of press. P. Y. Anderson; S 559
 - "Carrying over" of articles; Dt 303, 591
 - Code. See National industrial recovery act
 - Country, and the Western newspaper union; suppression of support of Tugwell bill. H. B. Hough; C 277
 - English, appeal for. S. Matsura; C 47
 - Exploitation of employees. P. Y. Anderson; S 275
 - French. See France
 - German. See Germany
 - Hearst newspapers; salaries. P. Y. Anderson; S 559
 - Journalists and NRA. P. Y. Anderson; S 443
 - News "fit to print." G. Epstein; C 46
 - News of a day; violence in; EP 549
 - Proprietors, illiberal. O. G. Villard; S 461
 - See also Freedom of the press
 - Newsreels. See Moving pictures
 - Newsstand racket. J. Beall; S 267
 - Nicaragua; Sandino, A. C., killing of; EP 260
 - No more ladies. J. W. Krutch; D 167
 - No questions asked. J. W. Krutch; D 229
 - Norris-LaGuardia act. See Injunctions
 - Novels; American fiction, art of. M. Van Doren; S 471
 - Noyes, Peter Helmoop
 - Automobile companies' victory in labor controversy; S 416
 - Fletcher-Rayburn bill; S 249
 - Investors, small, influence wanted; S 594
 - Pools, Wall street; S 133
 - Van Sweringen bondholders, lesson for, in Allegheny corporation case; S 508
 - Nye, Senator Gerald P.
 - Attack on H. S. Johnson. P. Y. Anderson; S 669
 - Attacks on National industrial recovery act. P. Y. Anderson; S 154
 - Nye resolution. See National industrial recovery act

O

- Oberlin college; "progress" at. R. Fritzmeier and others; C 360; see also C 414
- O'Casey, Sean. F. Codman; S 476
- Ocean mail contracts, investigation. P. Y. Anderson; S 154
- O'Dwyer, Brendan
 - Irish treaty, the; C 277; see also 39
- "Odyssey" by W. Disney suggested. J. Thurber; S 363
- Office buildings; overbuilding; EP 87
- Office workers' union; appeal for. J. Engle; C 47
- Ohio. See Unemployment
- Oil; trust, NRA. M. A. Hallgren; S 271
- Oklahoma, governor of, 1933
 - On Nation's honor roll for 1933 4
- Olds, Charles, R. Fritzmeier, and H. Hartzell
 - Oberlin college, "progress" at; C 360; see also C 414
- Operations, illegal. See Birth control
- Opium. See Drug traffic
- Osheroff, L.
 - On "lese majeste"; C 104
- Ownership, government
 - New York state bills for municipalities; E 319
 - Railroads, Eastman plan; EP 113

P

- Pacific gas and electric company; reporter's crusade against. B. L. Williams; S 616
- Pacifism
 - Amnesty for those convicted under war laws; EP 30
 - Clergymen opposed to war. O. G. Villard; S 581
 - College students' demonstrations; EP 456
 - International women's congress against war and fascism, call for; C 675
- Paine, Thomas; biographical material sought. H. H. Clark; C 447
- Palooka. W. Troy; MP 314
- Pan-American conference, Montevideo. S. G. Inman; S 97
- Paraguay. See Chaco war
- Parole bill, New York, passed; EP 576
- Paschal, R. L.
 - Negroes, views on; C 76
- Past, usable. J. W. Krutch; S 191
- Pavitek, Helen
 - On Drama league travel bureau; C 389
- Peace
 - On the radio. Low; Ct 147
 - Roosevelt program; EP 29
 - Training in colleges urged; EP 428
- Pecora, Ferdinand; on Nation's honor roll for 1933 4
- Pemberton, Brock; on Nation's honor roll for 1933 4
- Pennsylvania
 - Pinchot liberal program, results; EP 30
 - Primaries; contest between Pinchot and Reed; EP 548
 - Primaries; Pinchot loses to Reed; E 607
 - Republican developments; EP 689
 - Perfect crime; EP 171
 - Perfumed lady, the. J. W. Krutch; D 370
 - Perkins, Frances; on Nation's honor roll for 1933 4
- Petroleum. See Oil
- Philadelphia Public Ledger
 - Death of; EP 457
 - Death of. O. G. Villard; S 461
- Philadelphia taxicab strike. See Taxicabs
- Philippine islands
 - Independence; EP 57
 - Independence act, a compromise; EP 372
 - Independence legislation; EP 288
- Phillips, Wendell. O. G. Villard; S 209
- Philosophers; detachment; E 636
- Phonograph records, use in churches; EP 345
- Picketing. See Labor unions
- Pinchot, Governor Gifford. See Pennsylvania
- Pitigliani, Fausto
 - Reply to J. Strachey's review of his The Italian corporate state; C 387
- Platt amendment. See Cuba
- Plays. See Theater, the; names of plays; K., F.; Krutch, J. W.; M., P.
- Poems
 - Arbor, the. E. L. Walton 188
 - Bystander. L. Wiggam 251
 - Death piece. T. Roethke 511
 - Death's head. D. Durling 335
 - Declamation. W. Maas 77
 - Ghosts. L. W. Reese 735
 - Isolation. C. Wilder 595
 - It is a moveless movement. M. Van Doren 477
 - Morning in March. R. Lechlitter 391
 - Night in late winter, a. I. Schneider 161

- Poem. L. Reis; P 48
- Return to ritual. M. Van Doren 419
- Sculptured. C. Wilder 105
- Sharp fear. L. Wiggam 623
- She said too little. M. Van Doren 651
- Skyfall. W. Maas 537
- Snow in evening. C. Calkins 449
- Soldier's epitaph, a. L. W. Reese 678
- To a thrush at twilight. L. W. Reese 678
- Warm winter night. I. Schneider 220
- Wild bee's nest. R. P. T. Coffin 615
- Winter revelry. S. B. Field 134

Poetry

- Poems by young writers wanted. L. A. Halsall; C 593
- Popularity; E 664
- Poison gas. W. Steig; Ct 35
- Poison spray; Henry patent upheld; EP 549
- Poland
 - Germany, non-aggression pact with; EP 142
 - Summer schools. J. Rothschild; S 706
- Pollack, Samuel
 - Toledo workers' school, appeal for books and periodicals; C 389
- Politics; state campaign contributions fall off; EP 400
- Pools. See Wall street
- Porset, Clara
 - Cuba, political and economic troubles; S 353
- Postal service. See Air mail; Government employees; Mail contracts
- Power and power industry
 - And the national recovery administration. J. Count; S 128
 - Connecticut; ownership of state by Connecticut electric service company. A. Levitt; S 504
 - Edison electric institute offers cooperation with National recovery administration. P. Y. Anderson; S 17
 - Fight for power. D. C. Claus; S 18
 - Opposition by interests to Saint Lawrence waterway; EP 142
- Press. See Freedom of the press; Newspapers
- Press notices; Dt 674
- Prices
 - Farm. See Agriculture
 - Fixing; decision in New York milk case; EP 287
 - Milk. See Milk
 - Rise faster than wages; EP 86
 - See also National industrial recovery act
- Prisons and prisoners; radical publications banned at Sing Sing; EP 233
- Professional men and women, unemployment. See Unemployment
- Profiteers, armament. See Munitions of war
- Progressive party, Wisconsin; EP 603
- Public debt. See United States—Finances
- Public schools. See Schools
- Public utilities
 - Investors organize in American federation of utility investors; EP 548
 - New York state; laws enacted; EP 492
 - New York state; Senator Thayer's relations with Associated gas and electric company; EP 400
 - Public works; Roosevelt program; EP 260
 - Public works administration. See Housing
 - Public works art project; Dt 534
 - Publishers; strike by Macaulay company employees; EP 661
- Publishers' auxiliary. See Western newspaper union
- Puerto Rico
 - Governorship; EP 86
 - Rehabilitation plans; EP 632
 - Workmen's compensation act vetoed by governor; EP 632
- Pulitzer prize play; EP 549
- Pulitzer prizes; who gives them? E 580; see also C 675
- Pure in heart, the. J. W. Krutch; D 396
- Puritans, defended by G. Myers; E 404
- Pu-yi (Kang Teh). See Manchukuo

Q

- Queen Christina. W. Troy; MP 112
- Queer people. J. W. Krutch; D 284

R

- Rabinowitz, Herbert
 - Wagner bill for strengthening National labor board; S 356; see also EP 343
- Racketeering, bill against; E 551; EP 688
- Radicals; harboring radical views, and stealing elections. C. H. Coyle; C 705
- Radio
 - Censorship. See Censorship, radio
 - Operators on strike. H. S. Haddock; C 592
 - "Peace" on the radio; Ct 147
 - Radio league of the little flower. See Coughlin, Reverend Charles Edward
- Railroads
 - Fares, European. J. Rothschild; S 333

- Government ownership, Eastman plan; EP 113
 Wage cut, proposed; EP 231
 Wage settlement; EP 520
 Raushenbush, Stephen
 Civil works administration; S 444
 Rawlinson, Bill
 Mission relief work; C 20
 Reconstruction finance corporation, loans to business. See Business Recovery, industrial. See National industrial recovery act
 Reed, Senator David Aiken
 Out for "new deal"; EP 171
 See also Pennsylvania
 Reese, Lizette Woodworth
 Ghosts; P 735
 Soldier's epitaph, a; P 678
 To a thrush at twilight; P 678
 Reichstag building fire. See Germany
 Reis, Lincoln
 Poem; P 48
 Relief, unemployment. See Unemployment
 Relief workers. See Unemployment
 Remington, Critchell
 On book by President Roosevelt, On our way; C 675; see also 600
 Republican party
 National and Pennsylvania developments; EP 689
 Plight of. O. G. Villard; S 497
 Savior of the republic. O. G. Villard; S 637
 Reserve officers' training corps, advance and retreat; E 207 Reviewers. See Criticism, literary Revolution, world. L. Fischer; S 498; see also EP 491, 527
 Richard of Bordeaux. F. K.; D 311
 Richberg, Donald R.; debate with J. T. Flynn. P. Y. Anderson; S 219
 Riches, Cromwell A.
 League of nations, unanimity rule; C 360; see also 211
 Riptide. W. Troy; MP 454
 Ritchie, Albert C. (governor of Maryland)
 On Nation's honor roll for 1933 4
 Rivera, Diego; mural of Lenin removed from Rockefeller center; EP 233
 Robinson, Frances; attack by Washington Post. P. Y. Anderson; S 275
 Roche, Josephine
 For governor. O. G. Villard; S 665
 Nominated for governor of Colorado; EP 633
 Rockefeller, John D., junior; on Nation's honor roll for 1933 4
 Rockefeller and art; E 376
 Rockefeller center
 Sued by A. Heckscher; EP 87
 Rodman, Selden
 Youth meets in Washington; S 70; see also C 103, 132
 Roethke, Theodore
 Death piece; P 511
 Rogers, Maria L., and E. J. Fitzgerald
 Indian, American, new ideas on; S 326
 Rogers, Silas W.
 Negroes, views on; C 75
 Rolph, Governor James, junior; death; EP 661
 Roman catholic church. See Germany
 Romer, Samuel
 Labor in automobile industry; S 379; correction, C 508; see also C 592
 Roosevelt, Franklin Delano Administration
 Automobile settlement a surrender to big business; E 458
 Blow to prestige in passing of independent offices appropriation bill over veto; E 403
 Class struggle creeping up; E 374
 Congress and the president. O. G. Villard; S 722
 Congressional support expected; EP 1
 Co-ordination needed. O. G. Villard; S 553
 Crucial months ahead. O. G. Villard; S 91
 First year; E 262
 New deal, effect of; EP 455
 New deal, gifts of. O. G. Villard; S ■
 New deal, labor's opinion on. R. M. Stein; S 463
 Run, successful; Dt 534
 Success through failure; E 32
 Advisers
 "Brain trust" and communism. O. G. Villard; S 377
 "Brain trust," Wirt charges against. P. Y. Anderson; S 443
 "Brain trust," Wirt charges against; E 495
 Amnesty for those convicted under war laws; EP 30
 Book, On our way, written by president alone. C. Remington; C 675; see also 600
 "Brain trust." See Roosevelt, F. D.—
 Advisers 377
 Child labor; support of proposed amendment; EP 232
 Currency, managed; EP 85
 Disarmament, president's opportunity. O. G. Villard; S 119
 Food and drugs act; president pushes bill. P. Y. Anderson; S 559
 Latin-American policy; EP 29
 "Lese majeste?" L. Osheroff; C 104
 Liberals' statement to president; S 617; see also E 606
 Message on social insurance and other matters; EP 687
 Munitions of war; message on private manufacture; E 607
 National industrial recovery act; president appeals for cooperation; EP 287
 Navy, views on; EP 57
 No "swing to right." P. Y. Anderson; S 500
 Not "softening up." P. Y. Anderson; S 669
 On Nation's honor roll for 1933 4
 Peace policy; EP 29
 Popularity. O. G. Villard; S 293
 Popularity, continuing and growing. O. G. Villard; S 238
 Public works program; EP 260
 War debts, message on, and British reply; EP 659
 Rorty, James
 America on the work dole; S 723
 "Art" and the ad man; S 92
 Consumer versus the NRA; S 295, 322, 351
 Consumers; call for Mr. Throttlebottom; S 37
 Drug lobby; S 213
 Food and drug bill, hearings; S 295
 Radio; order on the air; S 529
 Ross, Doctor Donald E. See Ross-Loos clinic
 Ross-Loos clinic; owners disciplined by Los Angeles county medical association; EP 429; correction 509; see also C 619
 Roth quartet. K. Burke; M 633
 Rothschild, John
 Travel; articles on; S 131, 184, 250, 333, 415, 470, 536, 565, 621, 676, 706
 Ruffini, Francesco; death; C 706
 Russell Sage foundation; report on coal industry; EP 231
 Russia
 And the league of nations. L. Fischer; S 723
 Clothes, revolution in. M. Green; S 44; see also C 468
 Debts to United States; EP 547
 Embassy, Washington. See Troyanovsky, A. A.
 Germany, trade with; EP 401; correction 457
 Life grows easier. L. Fischer; S 667
 Luxury, supply. L. Fischer; S 120
 Negro looks at soviet Russia. H. L. Moon; S 244
 Recognition by United States. L. Fischer; S 9
 Recognition by United States. M. Bennett; S 72
 Second five-year plan. L. Fischer; S 182
 Summer schools. J. Rothschild; S 706
 Technical help wanted. S. J. White; C 447
 Travel in. J. Rothschild; S 250, 415, 536, 565
 Russian-Japanese relations. See Japanese-Russian relations
 Russians and machines; Dt 221
 S
 S., R. V.
 Criticizes The Nation; C 649
 Sabin, Mrs. Charles H.; on Nation's honor roll for 1933 4
 Sadie McKee. W. Troy; MP 657
 Safr, Irwin C.
 France, cost of living in; C 535
 Saint Lawrence development project
 Defeat in senate; EP 344
 Opposition; E 89
 Opposition by power interests; EP 142
 Salda, F. X., and others
 Lessing, Theodor; C 46
 Salons of America; exhibit; A. Brenner; A 514
 Salvador, El. See El Salvador
 Sandino, Augusto César. See Nicaragua
 San Francisco; marine workers' strike. E. Seeley; S 672
 Santo Domingo. See Dominican republic
 Schlink, Frederick J., radio address barred; EP 87
 Schneider, Isidor
 Night in late winter, a; P 161
 Warm winter night; P 220
 Schneider, Margaret Grant, and J. F. Dewhurst
 Stock-market control; S 301; see also EP 287
 Schnurmman, Paul
 Single men and unemployment; C 47
 Schools
 Public, closing; E 431
 Summer, European. J. Rothschild; S 676, 706
 Schrago, Ben
 Police at high school meeting; C 620
 Schuster, Adelaide
 Cleveland free thought college; C 47
 Science; colored by country; E 692
 Scottsboro case. See Negroes
 Scribner, John
 News writers form union; S 698
 Sea serpent; Dt 102
 Seattle church murals. See Murals
 Section 7-a. See National industrial recovery act Securities. See Stocks and bonds
 Sedition
 British anti-sedition bill; EP 632; see also Herndon case. See Herndon, A.
 Seeley, Evelyn
 San Francisco, labor war; S 672
 Senate, United States; progressives. O. G. Villard; S 63
 Sex, attitude toward. H. Gregory; S 134
 Shakespeare, William; unity of. M. Van Doren; S 595
 Shanghai; news from, taken from Variety; EP 345
 Shattered lamp, the. J. W. Krutch; D 396
 Shelter. See Housing
 Shining hour, the. J. W. Krutch; D 258
 Ships; suicide of captain after accident; E 62
 Shoe workers; strike, Haverhill, and National labor board; EP 372
 Shorter, Reverend Fred W. See Murals
 Silver
 Coughlin, Father, on purchases and anti-semitic propaganda; E 522; see also C 650
 Dies-Thomas bill for use in exchange and as basis for certificates; E 493
 "Nationalization" proposed; EP 547
 Price, and trade with Japan and China; EP 548
 Purchase, mandatory, in bill; EP 604
 Subsidy; EP 1
 Simonson, Lee
 Theatrical designs at Museum of modern art; C 248; see also 200
 Simple tailor, the. W. Troy; MP 285
 Sinclair, Upton; for governor of California. R. Borough; C 535; see also 321
 Sing Sing. See Prisons and prisoners
 Single men and unemployment. P. Schnurmman; C 47
 Skyscrapers; over-building. O. W. Wilson; S 126
 "Slavocracy." S. Bent; C 33; see also 279
 Smahl, Doctor Alton A. See New York telephone company
 Smith, Alfred E.; on Nation's honor roll for 1933 4
 Smith, Art J. See Terzani, A.
 Smith, F. Hopkinson; biographical material sought. C. S. Lutz; C 675
 Smith, Matthew
 Labor in Detroit; S 560
 Smith, P. K.
 Doctors, and the American medical association; C 619; see also EP 429; correction 509
 Snobbery, history, criticism. L. Abel; S 474
 Social workers and depression. E. C. Lindeman; S 274
 Socialist party
 Convention, Detroit; EP 660
 Declaration of principles. S. Hertzberg; S 702
 Socialized medicine. See Medicine
 Solow, Herbert
 German writers and Hitlerism; S 64; see also C 159
 Hotel strike, New York; S 239
 South Africa. See Union of South Africa
 Southern commission for the study of lynching; on Nation's honor roll for 1933 4
 Soviet Russia. See Russia
 Spain
 Agrarian strike and government measures against it; EP 661
 Class war. L. Fischer; S 437
 Politics; anti-republican cortes elected; E 522
 Republic. A. Brenner; S 149
 Republic, collapse of; EP 316
 Summer schools. J. Rothschild; S 706
 Travel in. J. Rothschild; S 470
 Speech, free. See Freedom of speech
 Spencer, H., junior
 Fascism and England; C 675; see also 384
 Spero, Sterling D.
 Appeal for German refugees; C 223
 Spitfire. W. Troy; MP 342

- Sports; Dt 649
 Sprays, poison. See Poison spray
 Starr, Mark
 Brookwood college dramatics; C..... 304
 Stavisky affair. See France
 Steamship fares. J. Rothschild; S..... 333
 Steel, Johannes
 Articles on Europe; S.....269, 324, 354; 384 (see also C....446; C....592; C.....675); 411
 May day; S 562
 Munitions manufacture and sale; S.... 647
 Steel and iron
 Code; approved; collective bargaining in doubt; EP 661
 Code; magna charta of monopoly; E.... 578
 Code; on prices and wages, improved; EP 659
 Labor, represented by Amalgamated association of iron, steel, and tin workers, presents ultimatum; EP..603; see also 612
 Labor, unrest. K. Lore; S.....612; see also EP 603
 Large producers favored by NRA; EP.. 373
 Production and wages; EP 604
 Strike, blame for, if it comes; EP..... 687
 Strike stalls; E 719
 Steig, William
 Poison gas; Ct 35
 Stein, Gertrude; opera, Four saints in three acts. K. Burke; M..256; EP..261; D 396
 Stein, Rose M.
 Labor opinions of New deal; S 463
 Sterilization of the unfit; German law passed; EP 3
 Stern, A. H.
 Jewish fascism; C....563; see also.... 465
 Stern, J. David
 On currency policy of New York Evening Post; C 21
 Views on currency. S. Bent; C 103
 Stevedore. J. W. Krutch; D.....515, 544
 Stimson doctrine. See Chinese-Japanese relations
 Stocks and bonds
 Fletcher-Rayburn bill
 For control of exchanges; EP..... 204
 For control of exchanges. P. Y. Anderson; S 219
 Introduced. P. H. Noyes; S..... 249
 Lobby against bill. P. Y. Anderson; S 559
 Opposition; EP 287
 Opposition. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 443
 Twentieth century fund recommendations, and provisions of bill. I. F. Dewhurst and M. G. Schneider; S..301; see also EP.. 287
 Wall street hopeful of effects; E.... 691
 Wall street opposition; EP..... 547
 Investors, small, influence wanted. P. H. Noyes 594
 Manipulation in Atlas tack corporation; EP 2
 Regulation of markets; EP 141
 Securities act, attacks on. P. Y. Anderson; S 17
 Stockholders victims of executives; E.... 319
 Wall street pools. P. H. Noyes; S.... 133
 Strachey, John
 Answer to. P. T. Ellsworth; S....218; see also E.....207; C..... 386
 Reply by F. Pittigliani to review of The Italian corporative state; C 387
 Two wings of the blue eagle
 II. The wing upon the right; S... 13
 III. The wing upon the right; S.. 42
 Strikes
 Anti-racketeering bill aimed against strikers; E 551
 Automobiles. See Automobiles
 In prospect. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 669
 Increasing in number; EP...577; E.... 635
 Marine workers. See Marine workers
 Publishers' employees. See Macaulay company
 Radio operators. See Radio
 Shoe workers'. See Shoe workers
 Taxicab. See Taxicabs
 Test of NRA boards; EP 401
 Toledo. See Electric auto-lite company
 Wagner bill for prevention; EP..... 631
 Stroup, Thomas B.
 Negroes, views on; C..... 75
 Substitute post-office clerk
 Substitutes, treatment of; C..... 332
 Sugar
 Beet sugar trust, fight against; EP.... 115
 Industry, control, program for; EP.... 204
 Trust. F. C. Cross; S..... 15
 Sullivan, Mark; on "transformation" of United States government; E..... 61
 Summer schools. See Schools
 Supreme court, United States
 Milk price-fixing case; decision in; EP.. 287
 Minnesota mortgage moratorium case, decision in; EP 57
 Minnesota mortgage case decision in. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 101
 Symes, Lillian; objects to being called a "liberal"; EP 345
 T
 Tariff, United States
 Hull, Secretary, and Pan-America. O. G. Villard; S 36
 Logan, Senator, free trader. O. G. Villard; S 693
 Loss to Americans since 1914; EP..... 716
 Mills, O. L., and tariff. O. G. Villard; S 175
 Nationalism, economic, retreat from; E.. 290
 President, power for, proposed; E..... 117
 Reciprocity bill before senate; E..... 634
 Tarzan and his mate. W. Troy; MP..... 573
 Tattooing; book on; E 90
 Taxation. See United States—Finances
 Taxicabs
 New York strike; settled; EP..... 429
 Philadelphia strike; settled; EP..... 87
 Teachers' salaries cut. O. G. Villard; S.... 238
 Teitelbaum, Harry A.
 Insulin, brief for; C.....388; correction, C 620
 Telephone company. See New York telephone company
 Tennessee, governor of, in 1933
 On Nation's honor roll for 1933..... 4
 Terzani, Athos; trial of A. J. Smith, head of Khaki shirts of America, on charge of perjury in Terzani-Fierro murder case; EP 429
 Textiles. See Cotton-textile industry
 Thayer, State senator W. T. See Public utilities Theater, the Designs at Museum of modern art. L. Simonson; C.....248; see also.... 200
 Melodrama. J. W. Krutch; D 546
 Men in white wins Pulitzer prize; EP.. 549
 Propaganda in plays; E 205
 They shall not die. J. W. Krutch; D..... 284
 Third international. See Communism
 Third-party movement in middle west; EP.. 372
 Thompson, F. W.
 Industrial workers of the world and the automobile strike; C..592; see also.. 379
 Thompson, K. S.
 Reviewers as critics; S.....22; see also C 277
 Thompson, W. O.; letter of resignation from National recovery review board; EP.... 716
 Thorp, Willard L.; resignation; EP..... 576
 Thoughts, dictionary of; Dt.....132
 Thrift; Dt 185
 Thurber, James
 Disney, Walt, and the "Odyssey"; S.. 363
 Toledo strike. See Electric Auto-Lite company
 Toledo workers' school; appeal for books and periodicals. S. Pollack; C..... 389
 Tours. See Travel
 Translations. W. B. Wells; C....507; see also 193; C 620
 Travel; articles on. J. Rothschild; S...131, 184, 250, 333, 415, 470, 536, 565, 621, 676, 706
 Trotzky, Leon; tragedy of. L. Fischer; S.....498; see also E..... 491 Troy, William
 Alice in wonderland; MP..... 82
 Ariane; MP 342
 Black cat, the; MP 657
 Broken shoes; MP 454
 Carolina; MP 285
 Catherine the great; MP 285
 Death takes a holiday; MP 342
 Enemies of progress; MP..... 112
 Frochard, la. et les deux orphelines; MP 228
 Hell on earth; MP 166
 Hitler's reign of terror; MP..... 573
 House of Rothschild, the; MP..... 398
 I was a spy; MP 166
 It happened one night; MP.....285, 314
 Key, the; MP 713
 Little man, what now? MP..... 713
 Lot in Sodom; MP.....82, 285
 Man of two worlds; MP..... 112
 Marionettes; MP 630
 Mother; MP 713
 Moulin rouge; MP 285
 Murder in Trinidad; MP 657
 Nana; MP 228
 Newsreels; MP 630
 Palooka; MP 314
 Queen Christina; MP 112
 Retrospects of 1933; S 21
 Riptide; MP 454
 Sadie KcKee; MP 657
 Simple tailor, the; MP 285
 Spitfire; MP 342
 Stephen Daedalus and James Joyce; S.. 187
 Tarzan and his mate; MP..... 573
 Viva Villa; MP 516
 War propaganda in films; S..... 166
 Where sinners meet; MP 657
 Troyanovsky, Ambassador, A. A.
 Party at embassy, EP..... 456
 Party at embassy. P. Y. Anderson; S.. 500
 Tugwell (Copeland) bill. See Food and drug bill Twentieth century fund. See Stocks and bonds
 U
 Unemployment
 Bachelors and unemployment. P. Schnurmann; C 47
 Civil works administration
 Abandonment, proposed; EP..... 288
 Discontinuance in New York city and elsewhere; EP 632
 Division of works and costs. S. Raushenbush; S 444
 End of work; E..... 346
 Failure; EP 114
 Lay-off after May 1. O. G. Villard; S 238
 March of unemployed on Washington, and demands; EP 399
 Workers' revolt against questionnaire; EP 456
 Dole, American. J. Rorty; S..... 723
 Dole, British; Dt 467
 Insurance; bill, federal, introduced; EP.. 259
 Italian. See Italy
 Leisure time for idle; Dt..... 73
 Leisure time for idle; report of NRA's Committee on the use of leisure time; E 663
 Mission menace. B. Rawlinson; C..... 20
 National unemployed league. W. C. Montross; C 734
 New York city
 Mistreatment of unemployed; EP.. 521
 Relief funds inadequate; E..... 691
 Relief problem; EP 604
 Ohio evictions; EP 428
 Ohio relief, dissatisfaction with; EP.... 575
 Professional men and women; signed articles 66, 274
 Recovery program, Roosevelt's; E..... 7
 Relief, La Follette bill; EP 575
 Relief, with mind and heart. B. Glassberg; S 11
 Relief workers lose jobs for unionization; EP 428
 Union of socialist soviet republics. See Russia
 Union of South Africa; fascism, beginning of; E 403
 Unions, company and others. See Labor unions Unions, labor, German. See Germany
 Unions of relief workers. See Unemployment
 United anti-war association of University of Chicago; resolution for investigation of munitions profits; C 388
 United States
 Cuba, relations with; EP 170
 Economic conditions; statement by liberals to president; S.....617; see also E 606
 Finances
 Budget; E 59
 Independent offices appropriation bill passed over veto; E..... 403
 Public debt due to recovery program; E 88
 Taxation and spending. H. R. Mussey; S 176
 Government, "transformation," according to M. Sullivan; E 61
 Japan, relations with; EP 169
 Japan, relations with; notes exchanged; E 375
 See also Government employees
 Universities and colleges. See Academic freedom; Education; Military training Unnatural history; E 523
 Utilities, public. See Public utilities
 V
 Vacations; Dt 705
 Van der Lubbe. Marinus; execution; EP... 86
 Van Doren, Mark
 Art of American fiction; S..... 471
 It is a moveless movement; P..... 477
 Return to ritual; P..... 419
 Shakespeare, unity of; S 595
 She said too little; P 651
 Van Kleeck, Mary
 For collectivism, at National conference of social work; EP 688
 On Nation's honor roll for 1933..... 4
 Van Sweringen's; lesson for bondholders in Allegheny corporation case. P. H. Noyes; S 508
 Variety, news from; EP 345
 Vatican. See Germany—Roman catholic church

- Vecheslova, and W. Chabukani, dancing. L. Kirsstein; S. 138
- Vegetables, spray for. See Poison spray
- Veterans; compensation, passed over Roosevelt veto; E. 403
- Vienna. See Austria
- Viereck, George Sylvester; defends Nazi suppression of his book; E. 460
- Villard, Oswald Garrison
Heads liberals in presentation of statement to President; S. 617; see also E. 606
- Issues and men:
Copeland, Royal S.; abatement suggested; S. 433
- Crucial months ahead; S. 91
- Disarmament, Roosevelt's opportunity; S. 119
- Eastman, Joseph Bartlett; S. 148
- Education, college, plight of; S. 349
- Hitler and German youth; S. 265
- Housing, action needed; S. 609
- Kerney, James, death; S. 461
- Logan, Senator M. M., free trader; S. 693
- Los Angeles, reactionary but awakening; S. 321; see also C. 535
- Masters of the world; S. 525
- Mills, Ogden Livingston, and tariff; S. 175
- Naval policy, national, needed; S. 553
- New deal, gifts of; S. 8
- Newspaper proprietors, illiberal; S. 461
- Philadelphia Public Ledger, demise; S. 461
- Phillips, Wendell; S. 209
- Prosperity and priming; S. 238
- Republican party, plight of; S. 497
- Republican saviors of the republic; S. 637
- Roche, Josephine; S. 665
- Roosevelt administration; co-ordination needed; S. 553
- Roosevelt and congress; S. 722
- Roosevelt, popularity; S. 293
- Senate progressives; S. 63
- Tariff; Mr. Hull, and Pan-America; S. 36
- War; clergymen opposed; S. 581
- West, conditions in; S. 405
- Wirt, William A., and "brain trust's" communism; S. 377
- Villari, Luigi
Unemployment in Italy; C. 222
- Virgin islands of the United States; rum to be made by government; EP. 345
- Viva Villa. W. Troy; MP. 516
- Vossische zeitung*, end of; EP. 371

W

- Wages. See Labor; Railroads
- Wagner, Senator Robert Ferdinand. See Labor
- Wagner labor disputes bill. See Strikes
- Waldron, J. Clark
Cotton growers; S. 703
- Wall street. See Stocks and bonds
- Walton, Eda Lou
Arbor, the; P. 188
- War
See also Military training; Pacifism; Peace
- Poison gas. W. Steig; Ct. 35
- Propaganda in films. W. Troy; S. 166
- War, European. See European war
- War debts
Default by debtors to United States; EP. 715
- Johnson act, to prohibit loans to nations in default; EP. 427; EP. 547; EP. 576; E. 690
- Roosevelt message on payment and British reply; EP. 659
- War munitions. See Munitions of war
- Warburg library, removal from Hamburg; EP. 31
- Ward, Gordon H.
Milk cooperatives, control of; C. with editorial comment. 185; see also E. 33
- Warner, Arthur
Death; E. 635
- Tribute by A. Brenner; C. 674
- Washington Post; attack on F. Robinson. P. Y. Anderson; S. 275
- Wassermann, Jakob; death. J. W. Krutch; S. 77
- Watterson, Henry, in memory of. L. Marder; C. 132
- Weather; February records; EP. 289
- Wednesday's child. J. W. Krutch; D. 140
- Weirton steel company, defiance of National labor board. P. Y. Anderson; S. 17
- Wells, Warre B.
On translations; C. 507; see also 193; C. 620
- Werner, M. R.
Biography, writing of; S. 251
- West; conditions in. O. G. Villard; S. 405

- West coast; fascism on. E. Winter; S. 241
- West Indies, travel in. J. Rothschild; S. 131
- Western newspaper union; Publishers' auxiliary, organ, suppresses support of Tugwell bill. H. B. Hough; C. 277
- Western union telegraph company; Dt. 619
- Where sinners meet. W. Troy; MP. 657
- White, S. J.
Technical help wanted for Russia; C. 447
- White-collar workers. See Office workers' union
- Wiggam, Lionel
Bystander; P. 251
- Sharp fear; P. 623
- Wild life, report on; Dt. 276
- Wilder, Charlotte
Isolation; P. 595
- Sculptured; P. 105
- Wilhelm, Kaiser, on mastery of the world. O. G. Villard; S. 525
- Wilkerson, Judge J. H., report on. P. Y. Anderson; S. 611
- Wilkins, Ernest H.
Oberlin college and radicals; C. 414; see also C. 360
- Willard Straight post. See American legion
- Williams, Bennett L.
Pacific gas and electric company; crusade against; S. 616
- Wilson, John W.
Negroes, views on; C. 75
- Wilson, Oliver Whitwell
Buildings, tall; S. 126
- Winter, Ella
Fascism on the west coast; S. 241
- Wireless. See Radio
- Wirt, Dr. William A. See Roosevelt, President Franklin Delano—Advisers
- Wohlforth, Robert
Armament profiteers: 1934; S. 299; see also EP. 288
- Women; Dt. 733
- Women, discrimination against; EP. 317
- Woodward, Judge C. E.; report on. P. Y. Anderson; S. 611
- Woolsey, Judge John M.; on Nation's honor roll for 1933 4
- Workers' protest meeting on Austria. M. Fox and others; C. 248
- Workmen's compensation act. See Puerto Rico
- Works, public. See Public works
- World war. See European war
- World's fair, Chicago
Architecture at. D. Haskell; Arc. 109
- Century of progress, 1834-1934. L. Kirsstein; S. 695
- Worry; Dt. 20
- Wrench, Sir Evelyn
Everyman; connection with; C. 592; see also C. 384
- Writers. See Authors
- Writers, German. See Germany

Y

- Yale university; students suffer for strike protests; EP. 30
- Yellow jack. J. W. Kutch; D. 340
- Yoffe, Henry
Russia and Japan; C. 387
- Youth organizations, meetings in Washington. S. Rodman; S. 70; see also C. 103, 132
- Yugoslavia. See Yugoslavia

Z

- Ziegfeld follies. P. M.; D. 110
- Zionism. See Jews
- Zukerman, William
Jewish fascism; S. 465; see also letters. 563; letter by Zukerman. 733

BOOK REVIEWS

Books are indexed under author and title, and in some cases under subject.
The following explanatory letters are used in the index:

B Book review
AN Brief annotation
R Reviewer

A

- Abramowitz, Isidore; R. 364
- Adamic, Louis
Native's return, the; B. 280
- Aesthetics of William Hazlitt, the. E. Schneider; AN. 108
- After strange gods. T. S. Eliot; B. 478
- Agar, Herbert
People's choice, the; Pulitzer prize winner; E. 580
- Ah King. W. S. Maugham; AN. 51

- Aiken, Conrad
Among the lost people; AN. 543
- Aldington, Richard
Poems of Richard Aldington, the; B. 625
- Alice James: Her brothers, her journal. Edited by A. R. Burr; B. 682
- All trivia. L. P. Smith; B. 654
- Allen, Hervey
Anthony Adverse; reviewers as critics. K. S. Thompson; C. 22; see also C. 277
- Altar in the fields, an. L. Lewisohn; B. 450
- American wines and how to make them. P. M. Wagner; B. 193
- Among the lost people. C. Aiken; AN. 543
- Andersen, Hans Christian; biography. S. Toksvig; B. 254
- Anthony Adverse. H. Allen; reviewers as critics. K. S. Thompson; C. 22; see also C. 277
- Antislavery impulse, 1830-1844, the. G. H. Barnes; AN. 656
- Arens, Egmont; R. 197
- Arrian. Volume II. Translated by E. I. Robson; AN. 543
- Art as experience. J. Dewey; B. 710
- Art Young's inferno. A journey through hell six hundred years after Dante. Drawings and text by A. Young; B. 197
- Artists in uniform. A study of literature and bureaucracy. M. Eastman; B. 624
- Aspects of Athenian democracy. R. J. Bonner; B. 739
- At 33. E. Le Gallienne; B. 195
- Athenaeus. Volume V. Translated by C. B. Gulick; AN. 543
- Austin, Mary
One-smoke stories; B. 513
- Austin, Mary; R. 137

B

- Bacchus behave; The lost age of polite drinking. A. Whitaker; B. 193
- Bache, Benjamin Franklin, book on. B. Fay; B. 107
- Backward glance, a. E. Wharton; B. 598
- Bacon. C. Williams; B. 393
- Banse, Ewald
Germany prepares for war. A. Harris, translator; B. 305; see also EP. 289
- Barnes, Gilbert Hobbs
Antislavery impulse, 1830-1844, the; AN. 656
- Bassett. S. Gibbons; AN. 683
- Bauer, Marion
Twentieth century music: How it developed, how to listen to it; AN. 228
- Beals, Carleton
Black river; AN. 452
- Beals, Carleton; R. 50
- Beard, Charles A.
Idea of national interest, the; B. 479
- Beard, Charles A., and G. H. E. Smith.
Future comes, the; B. 51
- Beaton, George
Jack Robinson; AN. 198
- Becker, Carl; R. 624
- Beckhart, Benjamin Haggott; R. 570; see also C. 675
- Becoming a writer. D. Brande; AN. 742
- Beethoven as he lived. R. Specht. Translated by A. Kalisch; AN. 198
- Beginning of a mortal, the. M. Miller; B. 25
- Belloc, Hilaire
Charles the first, king of England; B. 24
- Belly fulla straw. D. C. DeJong; AN. 486
- Ben Jonson. J. Palmer; B. 623
- Benedict, Ruth; R. 513
- Bentley, Phyllis
Modern tragedy, a; B. 198
- Beres, David; R. 162
- Berlin diaries, the. Edited by H. Klotz; foreword by E. A. Mowrer; B. 710
- Bernstein, Hillel
L'affaire Jones; AN. 137
- Beside Galilee. A diary in Palestine. H. Bolitho; B. 227
- Beyond the Mexique bay. A. Huxley; B. 568
- Beyond the street. E. Calmer; AN. 543
- Biography of the Greek people, a. C. F. Lavell; B. 739
- Bishop, John Peale
Now with his love. Poems; B. 162
- Bitter bread. N. Gubsky; B. 626
- Black river. C. Beals; AN. 452
- Blackmur, R. P.; R. 625, 654
- Blodgett, Harold
Walt Whitman in England; AN. 628
- Bloody Mary's. G. Dennis; AN. 486
- Bolitho, Hector
Beside Galilee. A diary in Palestine; B. 227
- Bonner, Robert J.
Aspects of Athenian democracy; B. 739
- Bradford, Roark
Kingdom coming; B. 80
- Brande, Dorothea
Becoming a writer; AN. 742

- Brandeis, Lawyer and judge in the modern state. A. T. Mason; B..... 108
 Breathe upon these slain. E. Scott; B..... 680
 Brenner, Anita; R..... 737
 Brody, Alter; R..... 391
 Bromfield, Louis
 Here today and gone tomorrow; AN.... 486
 Brown, John Mason; R..... 195
 Bruce, William Cabell
 Imaginary conversations with Franklin; B..... 107
 Buck, Pearl S.
 Mother, the; B..... 78
 Budgen, Frank
 James Joyce and the making of Ulysses; B..... 421
 Bunin, Ivan
 Well of days, the. G. Struve and H. Miles, translators; B..... 192
 Burke, Kenneth; R..... 484
 Burnham, David
 Wedding song; AN..... 199
 Burnham, James; R..... 654
 Buschke, Abraham, and F. Jacobsohn
 Sex habits: A vital factor in well-being. E. and C. Paul, translators; AN..... 542
- C
- Cain, James M.
 Postman always rings twice, the; AN.. 395
 Callaghan, Morley
 Such is my beloved; AN..... 421
 Calmer, Edgar
 Beyond the street; AN..... 543
 Calvin, Ross
 Sky determines. An interpretation of the southwest; AN..... 740
 Campbell, G. A.
 Strindberg; B..... 225
 Cannery boat, the, by T. Kobayashi and other Japanese short stories; B..... 25
 Cantwell, Robert
 Land of plenty, the; B..... 679
 Capital, by Karl Marx, in lithographs. H. Gellert; B..... 737
 Carlisle, D. T., and E. Dunn
 Wining and dining with rhyme and reason; B..... 193
 Carroll, Lewis; letters; B..... 394
 Caylor, Rose
 Journey, the; B..... 24
 Céline, Louis-Ferdinand
 Journey to the end of the night. J. H. P. Marks, translator; B..... 511 Chadbourn, J. H.
 Lynching and the law; AN..... 228
 Chapin, Christina
 Sanctuary. The struggle of the Britons against the Roman invaders told in narrative verse; AN..... 572
 Charles Dickens. His life and work. S. Leacock; B..... 161
 Charles the first, king of England. H. Belloc; B..... 24
 Chase, Stuart
 Economy of abundance, the; B..... 537
 Chase, Stuart; R..... 567
 Chaucer, Geoffrey; biography. J. L. Lowes; B..... 335
 Chevalier, Haakon M.; R..... 511
 Chronicle of an infamous woman. D. Liebovitz; AN..... 26
 Chesterton, Gilbert K.
 Saint Thomas Aquinas; B..... 192
 Churchill, Charles, poems of. Edited by J. Laver; B..... 135
 Clapper, Raymond
 Racketeering in Washington; AN..... 452
 Claudius, biography. R. Graves; B..... 679
 Clemens, Samuel Langhorne; biography. M. M. Brashear; AN..... 395
 Clement, Travers, and L. Symes
 Rebel America; B..... 336
 Cleveland, Grover, letters, 1850-1908. Selected and edited by A. Nevins; B.... 78
 Coates, Robert M.
 Yesterday's burdens; AN..... 164
 Codman, Florence; R..... 24, 134, 366, 392, 476, 540, 571
 Cohen, Morris R., and E. Nagel
 Introduction to logic and scientific method, an; B..... 513
 Cole, G. D. H.
 What Marx really meant; B..... 599
 Colette
 Innocent wife, the; AN..... 284
 Collected poems (1921-1931). W. C. Williams; B..... 365
 Colonel Lawrence. The man behind the legend. L. Hart; AN..... 600
 Come in at the door. W. March; AN..... 340
 Comedy American style. J. Fauset; AN.... 26
 Conner, Rearden
 Shake hands with the devil; B..... 226
 Conquest of a continent, the, or the expansion of races in America. M. Grant; B..... 49
 Conroy, Jack
 Disinherited, the; C..... 104
- Corday, Michel
 Paris front, the. An unpublished diary: 1914-1918; B..... 106
 Covering two years. I. V. Mooris; AN.... 602
 Crane, R. S.; R..... 481
 Crapsey, Adelaide
 Verse; AN..... 712
 Craven, Thomas
 Modern art; B..... 651
 Crichton-Miller, H.
 Psychoanalysis and its derivatives; AN. 26
 Crockett, Davy, biography. C. Rourke; B.. 252
 Cronyn, George W.
 Fool of Venus, the: The story of Peire Vidal; B..... 391
 Crows, the. D. McCord; AN..... 713
 Crucifixion of liberty, the. A. Kerensky; B..... 394
 Culinary herbs and condiments. M. Grieve; B..... 196 Current monetary issues. L. Pasvolsky; B.. 338
- D
- Davis, Horace B.
 Labor and steel; B..... 282
 Davy Crockett. C. Rourke; B..... 252
 Death ship, the. The story of an American sailor. B. Traven; B..... 569 de Ford, Miriam Allen; R..... 336
 DeJong, David Cornel
 Belly fulla straw; AN..... 486
 Dennen, Leon; R..... 308
 Dennis, Geoffrey
 Bloody Mary's; AN..... 486
 Deutsch, Babette; R..... 309
 Development of social insurance and minimum-wage legislation in Great Britain, the. H. F. Hohman; B..... 163
 De Vriendt goes home. A. Zweig; B..... 49
 Dewey, John
 Art as experience; B..... 710
 Dewey, John; R..... 513
 Diamant, Gertrude; R..... 49, 681
 Dickens, Charles, biography. S. Leacock; B. 161
 Dinesen, Isak
 Seven gothic tales; introduction by D. Canfield; B..... 449
 Diodorus of Sicily. Volume I. Translated by C. H. Oldfather; AN..... 543
 Disinherited, the. J. Conroy; C..... 104
 Doctor Martino and other stories. W. Faulkner; B..... 479 Dollar, the franc, and inflation, the. E. L. Dulles; B..... 338
 Dollars. L. D. Edie; AN..... 452
 Dos Passos, John
 In all countries; B..... 540
 Three plays; B..... 735
 Douglas, C. H.
 Social credit; B....570; see also C.... 675
 Douglas, Paul H.
 Theory of wages, the; B..... 708
 Douglas, Paul H.; R..... 163
 Dreamer, the. J. Green; AN..... 602
 Duffield, Marcus; R..... 366
 Dulles, Eleanor Lansing
 Dollar, the franc, and inflation, the; B.. 338
 Dunn, Elizabeth, and D. T. Carlisle
 Wining and dining with rhyme and reason; B..... 193
- E
- Eastman, Max
 Artists in uniform. A study of literature and bureaucratism; B..... 624
 Eastman, Max; R..... 599
 Easton, Emily
 Youth immortal. A life of Robert Herrick; AN..... 684
 Economy of abundance, the. S. Chase; B.. 537
 Eddy, Sherwood
 Russia today. What can we learn from it? B..... 308
 Edie, Lionel D.
 Dollars; AN..... 452
 Edmonds, Walter D.
 Mostly canallers; AN..... 340
 Ehrenbourg, Ilya
 Out of chaos. A. Bakshy, translator; B. 681
 Einzig, Paul
 Sterling-dollar-franc tangle, the; B.... 338
 Elder Henry James, the. A. Warren; B.... 682
 Eldridge, Paul, and G. S. Viereck
 My first two thousand years; E..... 460
 Eliot, George, and George Lewes; biography. A. T. Kitchel; B..... 164
 Eliot, T. S.
 After strange gods; B..... 478
 Ellis, G. V.
 Thackeray; AN..... 27
 Engelbrecht, H. C., and F. C. Hanighen; B. 596
 Eugenik predicament, the. S. J. Holmes; AN..... 51
- F
- Farewell Victoria. T. H. White; AN..... 368
 Farrell, J.; reviewer. See C..... 104
- Farrell, James T.
 Young manhood of Studs Lonigan, the; B..... 252
 Faulkner, William
 Doctor Martino and other stories; B... 479
 Fauset, Jessie
 Comedy American style; AN..... 26
 Fay, Bernard
 Roosevelt and his America; B..... 51
 Two Franklins, the: Fathers of American democracy; B..... 107
 Feuchtwanger, Lion
 Oppermanns, the; B..... 364
 Fifty years of Europe. J. A. Spender; B.. 136
 Finished scoundrel, the. R. O. Shreve; AN. 26
 Finnley Wren. P. Wylie; B..... 655
 Fireweed. M. Walker; B..... 283
 Fischer, Louis; R..... 79; reply by M. T. Florinsky..... 221
 Fisher, Vardis
 Passions spin the plot; B..... 107
 Fitzgerald, F. Scott
 Tender is the night; B..... 539
 Flandrau, Grace
 Indeed this flesh; AN..... 742
 Florinsky, Michael T.
 World revolution and the U. S. S. R.; B..... 79; reply to review, by Florinsky..... 221
 Fool of Venus, the: The story of Peire Vidal. G. W. Cronyn; B..... 391
 Foreign bonds: An autopsy. M. Winkler; AN..... 165
 Foster, Stephen, biography. J. T. Howard; B..... 484
 Foundations for the world's new age of plenty. F. Henderson; AN..... 628
 Fox, Ralph
 Lenin; B..... 224
 Franklin, Benjamin, two books on; B..... 107
 Frost in May. A. White; AN..... 572
 Fuller, Buckminster; R..... 652
 Future comes, the. C. A. Beard and G. H. E. Smith; B..... 51
- G
- Galantière, Lewis; R..... 106, 193 (see also C..... 507, 620)
 Gary, Franklin; R..... 164
 Gellert, Hugo
 Capital, by Karl Marx, in lithographs; B. 737
 Genzmer, George; R..... 484
 Geoffrey Chaucer. J. L. Lowes; B..... 335
 George Lewes and George Eliot. A review of records. A. T. Kitchel; B..... 164
 Germany prepares for war. E. Banse. Translated by A. Harris; B..... 305; see also EP..... 289
 Gessner, Robert
 Upsurge; AN..... 108
 Gibbons, Stella
 Bassett; AN..... 683
 Gilfillan, Lauren
 I went to pit college; B..... 366
 Gladstone, William Ewart; The queen and Mr. Gladstone. P. Guedalla; B..... 541
 Glass. H. Stephenson; AN..... 284
 Goldwater, Robert J.; R..... 710
 Gooch, G. P.; R..... 136
 Gordon, Caroline; R..... 80
 Graham, Frank D.; R..... 338
 Grant, Madison
 Conquest of a continent, the, or the expansion of races in America; B..... 49
 Graves, Robert
 I, Claudius; B..... 679
 Gray, John H., and J. Levin
 Valuation and regulation of public utilities, the; B..... 655
 Great Lakes-St. Lawrence deep waterway to the sea, the. T. Ireland; AN..... 712
 Green, Julian
 Dreamer, the; AN..... 602
 Grieve, Mrs. M.
 Culinary herbs and condiments; B..... 196
 Modern herbal, a; B..... 196
 Gubsky, Nicolai
 Bitter bread; B..... 626
 Guedalla, Philip
 Queen, the, and Mr. Gladstone; B.... 541
- H
- Hacker, Louis M.; R..... 78, 279 (see also C..... 333)
 Hall, James Norman, and C. Nordhoff
 Men against the sea; AN..... 199
 Hall, Leland
 Salan and his American; AN..... 602
 Hallgren, Mauritz A.; R..... 51, 282, 653
 Halper, Albert
 On the shore; AN..... 367
 Hamilton, Edith; R..... 739
 Hammett, Dashiell
 Thin man, the; AN..... 395
 Hamsun, Knut
 Road leads on, the. E. Gay-Tift, translator; AN..... 712

- Hanighen, F. C., and H. C. Engelbrecht
Merchants of death; B..... 596
- Hapgood, Powers; R..... 738
- Harding, T. Swann
TNT. These national tax eaters; B.... 627
- Hart, Liddell
Colonel Lawrence. The man behind the legend; AN..... 600
- Hazlitt, Henry; R..... 253, 708
- Hazlitt, William, aesthetics of. E. Schneider; AN..... 108
- Henderson, Fred
Foundations for the world's new age of plenty; AN..... 628
- Here today and gone tomorrow. L. Bromfield; AN..... 486
- Heredity and environment; Studies in the genesis of psychological characteristics. G. C. Schwesinger; B..... 162
- Herm, Heinrich
Voyage, the; AN..... 453
- Herrick, Robert; biography. E. Easton; AN..... 684
- Herskovits, Melville J.; R..... 49
- History of American graphic humor, a. W. Murrell; with an introduction by C. Morley; AN..... 628
- History of modern culture, a. P. Smith. Volume II: The enlightenment, 1687-1776; B..... 481
- Hogben, Lancelot
Nature and nurture; AN..... 137
- Hohman, Helen F.
Development of social insurance and minimum-wage legislation in Great Britain; B..... 163
- Holcombe, A. N.
New party politics, the; AN..... 109
- Holmes, S. J.
Eugenic predicament, the; AN..... 51
- Hone, Joseph M., and M. M. Rossi
Swift; or the egotist; B..... 736
- Hopkins, Gerard Manley, poetry of. E. E. Phare; AN..... 109
- Hour of decision, the. O. Spengler. Translated by C. F. Atkinson; B..... 253
- Howard, John Tasker
Stephen Foster, America's troubadour; B..... 484
- Hurston, Zora Neale
Jonah's gourd vine; AN..... 683
- Hutchinson, R. C.
Unforgotten prisoner, the; B..... 225
- Huxley, Aldous
Beyond the Mexique bay; B..... 568
- Hyder, Clyde K.
Swinburne's literary career and fame; AN..... 199
- I
- I, Claudius. R. Graves; B..... 679
- I, governor of California, and how I ended poverty. U. Sinclair; B..... 226
- I was a German. The autobiography of Ernst Toller; B..... 391
- I went to pit college. L. Gilfillan; B..... 365
- Ickes, Anna Wilmarth
Mesa land; B..... 137
- Idea of national interest, the. C. A. Beard; B..... 479
- Imaginary conversations with Franklin. W. C. Bruce; B..... 107
- In all countries. J. Dos Passos; B..... 540
- Indeed this flesh. G. Flandrau; AN..... 742
- Innocent wife, the. Colette; AN..... 284
- Introduction to logic and scientific method, a. M. R. Cohen and E. Nagel; B..... 513
- Ireland, Tom
Great Lakes-St. Lawrence deep waterway to the sea, the; AN..... 712
- Iron, blood and profits. G. Seldes; B..... 596
- Italian corporative state, the. F. Pitigliani; author replies to review by J. Strachey; C..... 387
- J
- Jack Robinson. G. Beaton; AN..... 197
- Jacobsohn, Friedrich, and A. Buschke
Sex habits: A vital factor in well-being. E. and C. Paul, translators; AN..... 542
- James, Alice: Her brothers, her journal. Edited by A. R. Burr; B..... 682
- James, Henry, the elder; biography. A. Warren; B..... 682
- James Joyce and the making of Ulysses. F. Budgen; B..... 421
- Jerome, Saint, select letters of. Translated by F. A. Wright; AN..... 543
- Jerusalem the golden. C. Reznikoff; B..... 339
- Johnson, Samuel; biography. H. Kingsmill; B..... 306
- Johnson's England. Edited by A. S. Turberville; B..... 135
- Jonah's gourd vine. Z. N. Hurston; AN..... 683
- Jonson, B., biography. J. Palmer; B..... 623
- Joseph and his brothers. T. Mann. Translated by H. T. Lowe-Porter; B..... 678
- Josephson, Matthew
Robber barons, the: The great American capitalists. 1861-1901; B.... 279; see also C..... 333
- Journal of these days, a. June, 1932-December, 1933. A. J. Nock; B..... 363
- Journey, the. R. Caylor; B..... 24
- Journey to the end of the night. L.-F. Céline. Translated by J. H. P. Marks; B..... 511
- Joyce, James
Ulysses; B..... 187
- Joyce, James, and the making of Ulysses. F. Budgen; B..... 421
- Jung, C. G.
Modern man in search of a soul; AN... 27
- Jusserand, J. J.
What me befell; B..... 23
- K
- Kaleidoscope. S. Zweig; B..... 571
- Kantor, MacKinlay
Long remember; B..... 420
- Kaun, Alexander; R..... 652
- Keats' craftsmanship. A study in poetic development. M. R. Ridley; B..... 452
- Kemmerer on money. E. W. Kemmerer; B..... 253
- Kemmerer, Edwin Walter
Kemmerer on money; B..... 253
- Kenton, Edna; R..... 280
- Kerensky, Alexander
Crucifixion of liberty, the; B..... 394
- King, Judson; R..... 655
- Kingdom coming. R. Bradford; B..... 80
- Kingsmill, Hugh
Life of Samuel Johnson, the; B..... 306
- Kirstein, Lincoln; R..... 420
- Kitchel, Ann T.
George Lewes and George Eliot. A review of records; B..... 164
- Kobayashi, Takiji
Cannery boat, the, and other Japanese short stories; B..... 25
- Krapp, George P.; R..... 355
- Kroetch, Victor John; R..... 394
- Kronenberger, Louis; R..... 679
- Krutch, Joseph Wood; R..... 135, 306, 363, 419, 477, 623, 678, 735
- L
- Labor and steel. H. B. Davis; B..... 282
- L'affaire Jones. H. Bernstein; AN..... 137
- Lagerlöf, Selma
Memories of my childhood; B..... 625
- Land of plenty, the. R. Cantwell; B..... 679
- Larsson, Gösta
Our daily bread; AN..... 683
- Laski, Harold J.; R..... 479
- Lavell, Cecil Fairfield
Biography of the Greek people, a; B... 739
- Lawrence, T. E., biography. L. Hart; AN... 600
- Leacock, Stephen
Charles Dickens. His life and work; B..... 161
- Lee, Robert E., biography. R. W. Winston; B..... 512
- Le Gallienne, Eva
At 33; B..... 195
- Lengyel, Emil
New deal in Europe, the; B..... 393
- Lenin, R. Fox; B..... 224
- Letters of Grover Cleveland, 1850-1908. Selected and edited by A. Nevins; B... 78
- Letters of Romain Rolland and Malwida von Meysenbug, the. AN..... 656
- Letters to the new island. W. B. Yeats. Edited by H. Reynolds; B..... 309
- Levin, Jack, and J. H. Gray
Valuation and regulation of public utilities, the; B..... 655
- Levy, Beryl Harold; R..... 108
- Lewes, George, and George Eliot; biography. A. T. Kitchel; B..... 164
- Lewis, Meriwether, biography. C. M. Wilson; AN..... 602
- Lewis, Sinclair
Work of art; B..... 134
- Lewisohn, Ludwig
Altar in the fields, an; B..... 450
- Lewisohn, Ludwig; R..... 738
- Liebling, Abbott J.
They all sang: From Tony Pastor to Rudy Vallée. As told to A. J. Liebling to E. B. Marks; B..... 484
- Liebovitz, David
Chronicle of an infamous woman; AN... 26
- Life of Hans Christian Andersen. S. Toksvig; B..... 254
- Life of Samuel Johnson, the. H. Kingsmill; B..... 306
- Lindley, Ernest K.
Roosevelt revolution, the; B..... 51
- Lindsay, Philip
Tragic king, the: Richard III; AN..... 712
- Linklater, Eric
Magnus Merriman; B..... 655
- Livingston, Arthur; R..... 480
- Long remember. M. Kantor; B..... 420
- Lord Riddell's intimate diary of the peace conference and after. 1918-1923; B... 482
- Low, D. M.
Twice shy; AN..... 340
- Lowenthal, Arthur; R..... 227
- Lowes, John Livingston
Geoffrey Chaucer; B..... 335
- Lynching and the law. J. H. Chadbourn; AN..... 228
- M
- MacDonald, William
Menace of recovery, the; B..... 449
- MacDonald, William; R..... 107
- MacLeish, Archibald
Poems, 1924-1933; B..... 48
- MacLeish, Archibald; R..... 596
- Magnus Merriman. E. Linklater; B..... 655
- Making of Americans, the. G. Stein; AN... 421
- Malraux, André
Man's fate. H. M. Chevalier, translator; B..... 735
- Man and nature. A. N. Whitehead; B.... 419
- Mann, Thomas
Joseph and his brothers. H. T. Lowe-Porter, translator; B..... 678
- Man's fate. A. Malraux. Translated by H. M. Chevalier; B..... 735
- March, William
Come in at the door; AN..... 340
- Mariéjol, Jean H.
Philip II: The first modern king. W. B. Wells, translator; B..... 79
- Mark Twain, son of Missouri. M. M. Brashear; AN..... 395
- Marks, Edward B.
They all sang: From Tony Pastor to Rudy Vallée. As told to A. J. Liebling to E. B. Marks; B..... 484
- Marx, Karl
Capital, in lithographs. H. Gellert; B... 737
- Mason, Apheus Thomas
Brandeis: Lawyer and judge in the modern state; B..... 108
- Maugham, W. Somerset
Ah King; AN..... 51
- Mayo, Katherine
Soldiers what next! B..... 366
- McCarthy, Mary; R..... 24, 226, 625, 655, 679
- McCord, David
Crows, the; AN..... 713
- McGill, V. J.; R..... 225
- McKeon, Richard; R..... 192, 391
- Memories of my childhood. S. Lagerlöf; B..... 625
- Men against the sea. C. Nordhoff and J. N. Hall; AN..... 199
- Menace of Japan, the. T. O'Connor; B... 653
- Menace of recovery, the. W. MacDonald; B..... 449
- Mencken, H. L.
Treatise on right and wrong; B..... 484
- Mencken, H. L.; R..... 193
- Merchants of death. H. C. Engelbrecht and F. C. Hanighen; B..... 596
- Meriwether Lewis of Lewis and Clark. C. M. Wilson; AN..... 602
- Mesa land. A. W. Ickes; B..... 137
- Meysenbug, Malwida von
Letters, and those of R. Rolland; AN... 656
- Miller, Max
Beginning of a mortal, the; B..... 25
- Miners and management. M. Van Kleeck; B..... 738
- Mitchell, Broadus; R..... 449
- Modern art. T. Craven; B..... 651
- Modern herbal, a. Mrs. M. Grieve; B..... 196
- Modern man in search of a soul. C. G. Jung; AN..... 27
- Modern Palestine. A symposium. Edited by J. Sampter; B..... 227
- Modern tragedy, a. P. Bentley; B..... 198
- Money, four books on; B..... 338
- Monkhouse, Allan
Moscow, 1911-1933; B..... 308
- Morris, Homer L.
Plight of the bituminous coal miner, the; B..... 738
- Morris, I. V.
Covering two years; AN..... 602
- Moscow, 1911-1933. A Monkhouse; B..... 308
- Mostly canallers. W. D. Edmonds; AN... 340
- Mother, the. P. S. Buck; B..... 78
- Mullin, Glen; R..... 651
- Mumford, Lewis
Technics and civilization; B..... 652
- Murrell, William
History of American graphic humor, a. With an introduction by C. Morley; AN..... 628
- Murry, John Middleton
Necessity of communism, the; B..... 654
- My first two thousand years. G. S. Viereck and P. Eldridge; E..... 460
- N
- Nagel, Ernest, and M. R. Cohen
Introduction to logic and scientific method, an; B..... 513

- Native's return, the. L. Adamic; B..... 280
 Nature and nurture. L. Hogben; AN..... 137
 Necessity of communism, the. J. M. Murry; B..... 654
 Neff, Emery; R..... 541
 Nest of simple folk, a. S. O'Faolain; B..... 105
 New deal in Europe, the. E. Lengyel; B..... 393
 New governments in Europe. By the research staff of the Foreign policy association. Edited by R. L. Buell; B..... 626
 New party politics, the. A. N. Holcombe; AN..... 109
 Nicolson, Harold
 Some people; B..... 477
 Nijinsky. R. Nijinsky; B..... 420
 Nock, Albert Jay
 Journal of these days, a. June, 1932-December, 1933; B..... 363
 Nordhoff, Charles, and J. N. Hall
 Men against the sea; AN..... 199
 Notes on a cellar-book. G. Saintsbury; B..... 193
 Now with his love. Poems. J. P. Bishop; B..... 162
- O
- O'Casey, Sean
 Within the gates; article by F. Codman; S..... 476
 O'Conroy, T.
 Menace of Japan, the; B..... 653
 O'Faolain, Sean
 Nest of simple folk, a; B..... 105
 On our way. F. D. Roosevelt; AN..... 600; see also C..... 675
 On the shore. A. Halper; AN..... 367
 One-smoke stories. M. Austin; B..... 513
 Oppermanns, the. L. Feuchtwanger; B..... 364
 Our daily bread. G. Larsson; AN..... 683
 Our master's voice: Advertising. J. Rorty; B..... 567
 Our times: The United States, 1900-1925. Volume V: Over here, 1914-1918. M. Sullivan; AN..... 26
 Out of chaos. I. Ehrenbourg. Translated by A. Bakshy; B..... 681
- P
- Palmer, Frederick
 With my own eyes; B..... 163
 Palmer, John
 Ben Jonson; B..... 623
 Paris front, the. An unpublished diary: 1914-1918. M. Corday; B..... 106
 Parry, Albert
 Tattoo; E..... 90
 Passion's pilgrims. J. Romans. Translated by W. B. Wells; B..... 193; see also C..... 507; C..... 620
 Passions spin the plot. V. Fisher; B..... 107
 Pasvolsky, L.
 Current monetary issues; B..... 338
 Peace by revolution. F. Tannenbaum; B..... 50
 People at work. F. Perkins; AN..... 712
 People's choice, the. H. Agar; Pulitzer prize winner; E..... 580; see also C..... 675
 Perkins, Frances
 People at work; AN..... 712
 Peterkin, Julia
 Roll, Jordan, roll. Photographic studies by D. Ulmann; B..... 106
 Phare, E. E.
 Poetry of Gerard Manley Hopkins, the; AN..... 109
 Philip II: The first modern king. J. H. Mariéjol. Translated by W. B. Wells; B..... 79
 Pitigliani, Fausto
 Italian corporative state, the; reply to review by J. Strachey; C..... 387
 Plight of the bituminous coal miner, the. H. L. Morris; B..... 738
 Poems, 1924-1933. A. MacLeish; B..... 48
 Poems by Charles Churchill, the. Edited by J. Laver; B..... 135
 Poetry of Gerard Manley Hopkins, the. E. E. Phare; AN..... 109
 Ponsonby, Arthur
 Victoria; AN..... 52
 Portrait of America. D. Rivera. Explanatory text by B. D. Wolfe; B..... 737
 Postman always rings twice, the. J. M. Cain; AN..... 395
 Powys, John Cowper
 Weymouth sands; B..... 280
 Private police. J. P. Shaloo; B..... 282
 Prolegomena. A. T. Rosne; AN..... 228
 Psychoanalysis and its derivatives. H. Crichton-Miller; AN..... 26
- Q
- Queen, the, and Mr. Gladstone. P. Guedalla; B..... 541
- R
- Rabble in arms. K. Roberts; AN..... 52
 Racketeering in Washington. R. Clapper; AN..... 452
 Rascoe, Burton; R..... 450
 Rebel America. L. Symes and T. Clement; B..... 336
 Rediscovering America. H. E. Stearns; B..... 512
 Reid, Edith Gittings
 Woodrow Wilson. The caricature, the myth, and the man; B..... 540
 Reis, Lincoln; R..... 253
 Reznikoff, Charles
 Testimony; AN..... 572
 Rice, Philip Blair; R..... 365, 479
 Richard III, biography. P. Lindsay; AN..... 712
 Riddell, Lord
 Intimate diary of the peace conference and after, 1918-1923; B..... 482
 Ridley, M. R.
 Keats' craftsmanship. A study in poetic development; B..... 452
 Rivera, Diego
 Portrait of America. Explanatory text by B. D. Wolfe; B..... 737
 Road leads on, the. K. Hamsun. Translated by E. Gay-Tift; AN..... 712
 Robber barons, the: The great American capitalists, 1861-1901. M. Josephson; B..... 279; see also C..... 333
 Robert E. Lee. A biography. R. W. Winston; B..... 512
 Roberts, Kenneth
 Rabble in arms; AN..... 52
 Roll, Jordan, roll. Text by J. Peterkin. Photographic studies by D. Ulmann; B..... 106
 Rolland, Romain
 Letters, and those of Malwida von Meysenbug; AN..... 656
 Rollins, William, junior Shadow before, the; B..... 392
 Romains, Jules
 Passion's pilgrims. W. B. Wells, translator; B..... 193; see also C..... 507; C..... 620
 Roosevelt, Franklin D.
 On our way; AN..... 600; see also C..... 675
 Roosevelt and his America. B. Fay; B..... 51
 Roosevelt revolution, the. E. K. Lindley; B..... 51
 Rorty, James
 Our master's voice: Advertising; B..... 567
 Rorty, James; R..... 627
 Rosen, Aaron Tani
 Prolegomena; AN..... 228
 Rossi, Mario M., and J. M. Hone
 Swift; or the egotist; B..... 736
 Rourke, Constance
 Davy Crockett; B..... 252
 Russia, two books on; B..... 308
 Russia today. What can we learn from it? S. Eddy; B..... 308
- S
- Saint Jerome, select letters of. Translated by F. A. Wright; AN..... 543
 Saint Thomas Aquinas. G. K. Chesterton; B..... 192
 Saintsbury, George
 Notes on a cellar-book; B..... 193
 Salah and his American. L. Hall; AN..... 602
 Sanctuary. The struggle of the Britons against the Roman invaders told in narrative verse. C. Chapin; AN..... 572
 Schneider, Elisabeth
 Aesthetics of William Hazlitt, the; AN..... 108
 Schneider, Isidor; R..... 25
 Schwesinger, Gladys C.
 Heredity and environment: Studies in the genesis of psychological characteristics; B..... 162
 Scott, Evelyn
 Breathe upon these slain; B..... 680
 Scott, Evelyn; R..... 225
 Seldes, George
 Iron, blood and profits; B..... 596
 Vatican, the: Yesterday, today, tomorrow; B..... 480
 Select letters of Saint Jerome. Translated by F. A. Wright; AN..... 543
 Selection from the letters of Lewis Carroll to his child-friends. Edited by E. M. Hatch; B..... 394
 Seven gothic tales. I. Dinesen; introduction by D. Canfield; B..... 449
 Sex habits: A vital factor in well-being. A. Buschke and F. Jacobsohn. Translated by E. and C. Paul; AN..... 542
 Sextus Empiricus. Volume I. Translated by R. G. Bury; AN..... 543
 Shadow before, the. W. Rollins, junior; B..... 392
 Shaloo, J. P.
 Private police; B..... 282
 Shake hands with the devil. R. Conner; B..... 226
 Shreve, Royal Ornan
 Finished scoundrel, the; AN..... 26
 Simonds, Frank H.; R..... 305; (see also EP..... 289)
 Sinclair, Upton
 I, governor of California, and how I ended poverty; B..... 226
 Sky determines. An interpretation of the southwest. R. Calvin; AN..... 740
 Slesinger, Tess
 Unpossessed, the; B..... 597
 Smith, George H. E., and C. A. Beard
 Future comes, the; B..... 51
 Smith, Logan Pearsall
 All trivia; B..... 654
 Smith, Preserved
 History of modern culture, a. Volume II: The enlightenment, 1687-1776; B..... 481
 Soldiers what next! K. Mayo; B..... 366
 Social credit. C. H. Douglas; B..... 570; see also C..... 675
 Some people. H. Nicolson; B..... 477
 Soviet literature: An anthology. Edited and translated by G. Reavey and M. Slonim; B..... 652
 Specht, Richard
 Beethoven as he lived. A. Kalisch, translator; AN..... 198
 Spender, J. A.
 Fifty years of Europe; B..... 136
 Spengler, Oswald
 Hour of decision, the. C. F. Atkinson, translator; B..... 253
 Stearns, Harold E.
 Rediscovering America; B..... 512
 Steel, Johannes; R..... 393, 626, 710
 Stein, Gertrude
 Making of Americans, the; AN..... 421
 Stephen Foster, America's troubadour. J. T. Howard; B..... 484
 Sterling-dollar-franc tangle, the. P. Einzig; B..... 338
 Stillman, Clara Gruening; R..... 195; 254
 Stephenson, Howard
 Glass; AN..... 284
 Stock market control. Edited by E. Clark and others; article by J. F. Dewhurst and M. G. Schneider; S..... 301; see also EP..... 287
 Stong, Philip
 Village tale; B..... 306
 Strachey, John; R..... 224, 537
 Strachey, John; reply by F. Pitigliani to review of his The Italian corporative state; C..... 387
 Street, Julian
 Wines: Their selection, care and service; B..... 193
 Stribling, T. S.
 Unfinished cathedral; B..... 709
 Strindberg. G. A. Campbell; B..... 225
 Such is my beloved. M. Callaghan; AN..... 421
 Sullivan, Mark
 Our times: The United States, 1900-1925. Volume V: Over here, 1914-1918; AN..... 26
 Swift; or the egotist. M. M. Rossi and J. M. Hone; B..... 736
 Swinburne's literary career and fame. C. K. Hyder; AN..... 199
 Symes, Lillian, and T. Clement
 Rebel America; B..... 336
- T
- TNT. These national tax eaters. T. S. Harding; B..... 627
 Tannenbaum, Frank
 Peace by revolution; B..... 50
 Tapley, Roberts; R..... 283
 Tate, Allen; R..... 420, 512, 709
 Tattoo. A. Parry; E..... 90
 Technics and civilization. L. Mumford; B..... 652
 Tender is the night. F. S. Fitzgerald; B..... 539
 Testimony. C. Reznikoff; AN..... 572
 Thackeray. G. V. Ellis; AN..... 27
 They all sang: From Tony Pastor to Rudy Vallée. As told to A. J. Liebling by E. B. Marks; B..... 484
 Theory of wages, the. P. H. Douglas; B..... 708
 Thin man, the. D. Hammett; AN..... 395
 Three plays. J. Dos Passos; B..... 735
 To the vanquished. I. A. R. Wylie; B..... 738
 Toller, Ernst
 I was a German; B..... 391
 Tragic king, the: Richard III. P. Lindsay; AN..... 712
 Traven, B.
 Death ship, the. The story of an American sailor; B..... 569
 Treatise on right and wrong. H. L. Mencken; B..... 484
 Trilling, Lionel; R..... 161
 Troy, William; R..... 105, 187, 252, 421, 478, 539, 682, 735
 Twain, Mark; biography. M. M. Brashear; AN..... 395
 Twentieth century music: How it developed, how to listen to it. M. Bauer; AN..... 228
 Twice shy. D. M. Low; AN..... 340
 Two Franklins, the: Fathers of American democracy. B. Fay; B..... 107
- U
- Ulysses, J. Joyce; B..... 187
 Unfinished cathedral. T. S. Stribling; B..... 709

- Unforgotten prisoner, the. R. C. Hutchinson; B 225
Unpossessed, the. T. Slesinger; B..... 597
Upsurge. R. Gessner; AN..... 108

V

- Valuation and regulation of public utilities,
the. J. H. Gray and J. Levin; B.... 655
Van Doren, Carl; R.....306, 512, 568, 736
Van Doren, Dorothy; R.....106, 196, 394, 680
Van Doren, Mark; R.....78, 192, 252, 280, 569
Van Kleeck, Mary
Miners and management; B..... 738
Vatican, the: Yesterday, today, tomorrow.
G. Seldes; B..... 480
Verse. A. Crapsey; AN..... 712
Victoria. A. Ponsonby; AN..... 52
Victoria, Queen; The queen and Mr. Gladstone. P. Guedalla; B..... 541
Victorian aftermath, the. E. Wingfield-Stratford; B 195
Viereck, George Sylvester, and P. Eldridge
My first two thousand years; E..... 460
Village tale. P. Stong; B..... 306
Villard, Oswald Garrison; R...23, 163, 482, 540
Vivas, Eliseo; R..... 393
Voyage, the. H. Herm. Translated by
M. Goldsmith; AN..... 453

W

- Wagner, Philip M.
American wines and how to make them;
B 193
Wald, Lillian D.
Windows on Henry street; B..... 451
Walker, Mildred
Fireweed; B 283
Walt Whitman in England. H. Blodgett;
AN 628
Walton, Eda Lou; R.....48, 107, 162, 339, 452, 625
Warner, Arthur; R..... 226

- Warren, Austin
Elder Henry James, the; B..... 682
Wedding song. D. Burnham; AN..... 199
Well of days, the. I. Bunin. Translated by
G. Struve and H. Miles; B..... 192
Wembridge, E. R.; R.....25, 451
Weymouth sands. J. C. Powys; B..... 280
Wharton, Edith
Backward glance, a; B..... 598
What everybody wants to know about money.
Nine Oxford Economists; edited by
G. D. H. Cole; B..... 338
What Marx really meant. G. D. H. Cole;
B 599
What me befell. J. J. Jusserand; B..... 23
Whitaker, Alma
Bacchus behave; The lost age of polite drinking; B 193
Whitaker, Arthur P.; R..... 79
White, Antonia
Frost in May; AN..... 572
White, T. H.
Farewell Victoris; AN..... 368
Whitehead, Alfred North
Man and nature; B 419
Whitman, Walt, in England. H. Blodgett;
AN 628
Wilkinson, James; biography. R. O. Shreve;
AN 26
Williams, Charles
Bacon; B 393
Williams, William Carlos
Collected poems (1921-1931); B..... 365
Wilson, Charles Morrow
Meriwether Lewis of Lewis and Clark;
AN 602
Wilson, Woodrow, biography. E. G. Reid;
B 540
Windows on Henry street. L. D. Wald; B.. 451
Wines; five books on; B..... 193
Wines: Their selection, care and service. J.
Street; B 193
Wingfield-Stratford, Esmé
Victorian aftermath, the; B..... 195

- Wining and dining with rhyme and reason.
D. T. Carlisle and E. Dunn; B..... 193
Winkler, Max
Foreign bonds: An autopsy; AN..... 165
Winston, Robert W.
Robert E. Lee. A biography; B..... 512
With my own eyes. F. Palmer; B..... 163
Within the gates. S. O'Casey; article by
F. Codman; S..... 476
Wolfe, Bertram D.
Explanatory text of Portrait of America,
by D. Rivera; B..... 737
Woodrow Wilson. The caricature, the myth, and the man. E. G. Reid; B.. 540
Work of art. S. Lewis; B..... 134
World revolution and the U. S. S. R. By M. T. Florinsky; B.....79; reply to review, by Florinsky..... 221
Wylie, I. A. R.
To the vanquished; B..... 739
Wylie, Philip
Finnley Wren; B..... 655

Y

- Yeats, William Butler
Letters to the new island. Edited by
H. Reynolds; B 309
Yesterday's burdens. R. M. Coates; AN... 164
Young, Art
Art Young's inferno. A journey through hell six hundred years after Dante. Drawings and text by A.
Young; B 197
Young manhood of Studs Lonigan, the. J. T.
Farrell; B 252
Youth immortal. A life of Robert Herrick.
E. Easton; AN..... 684

Z

- Zweig, Arnold
De Vriendt goes home; B..... 49
Zweig, Stefan
Kaleidoscope; B 571

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXVIII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 3, 1934

No. 3574

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	1
THE NATION'S HONOR ROLL	4
EDITORIALS:
Poison Versus Honesty	6
Hitler's Economics	6
More Jobs Wanted	7
ISSUES AND MEN. THE GIFTS OF THE NEW DEAL. By
Oswald Garrison Villard	8
BEHIND RUSSIAN RECOGNITION. By Louis Fischer	9
RELIEF WITH BOTH MIND AND HEART. By Benjamin Glassberg	11
THE TWO WINGS OF THE BLUE EAGLE. II. THE WING
UPON THE RIGHT. By John Strachey	13
PITY THE POOR SUGAR TRUST. By Frank Clay Cross	15
NEW YEAR'S GIFTS FOR THE NRA. By Paul Y. Anderson	17
THE FIGHT FOR POWER. By D. C. Claus	18
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter	20
CORRESPONDENCE	20
BOOKS, FILMS, DRAMA:
Are Reviewers Critics? By K. S. Thompson	22
Memoirs of a Diplomat. By Oswald Garrison Villard	23
Grand Tour. By Florence Codman	24
Mr. Belloc's Theory of History. By Mary McCarthy	24
Study of a Child. By E. R. Wembridge	25
Japanese Proletarian Writers. By Isidor Schneider	25
Shorter Notices	26
Films: Retrospect: 1933. By William Troy	27
Drama: Tempest and Sunshine. By Joseph Wood Krutch	28
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE	28

BOARD OF EDITORS

ERNEST GRUENING FRED A. KIRCHWEY
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
MAURITZ A. HALLGREN MARGARET MARSHALL
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $5.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. British Agent, Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England.

SOME WEEKS AGO Washington was looking forward to a hectic session of Congress, replete with fireworks, though not necessarily anti-Roosevelt in character. Rather it was to be a session in which the supporters of the President who thought he was not going far enough would do battle with those who felt he was going too far. Now that the new session is at hand there is a general belief that Congress may prove as quiet and tractable as it was last spring. It is not easy to determine the reasons for this shift in sentiment. It took place while very few Senators and Congressmen were in Washington. Of the returning members from whom trouble might have been expected only one, Senator Johnson of California, stated frankly that he would refrain from embarrassing the Administration and would, indeed, go so far as to continue his support of the President's program in the firm belief that the country has come to the point where it must accept "Roosevelt or economic hell." A number of the other independent spirits in Congress have, however, remained ominously silent, while a few have broadly intimated that they will seek to modify the Roosevelt recovery program and restrain the President. Senators Borah and Nye, for example, have been agitating for a restoration of the anti-trust laws to their former standing, and they apparently mean to carry their agitation to the floor of the Senate. Senator Glass, too, is firmly opposed to the recovery program, though for different reasons. On the other side of the Capitol Chairman Connery of the important House Labor Committee has declared war on General Hugh S. Johnson and is said to be busy preparing legislation to curb the Administrator's authority as well as to strengthen labor's position in the NRA through further shortening of the working week and other means.

NOTWITHSTANDING these rumblings and the widespread belief that the inflationists in House and Senate will play hob with any monetary or fiscal program that does not start the printing-presses running, the consensus of opinion among political observers is that Congress will again be found tamely eating out of the President's hand. Since this forecast seems to have originated, as the newspaper dispatches put it, "in quarters close to the Administration," one might look upon it with some suspicion. Yet there is evidence that the popular tide which was running against Mr. Roosevelt a few weeks ago has turned once more in his favor. If this be true, it will doubtless be reflected in Congress. Those who believe that this change has occurred attribute it not to any fundamental improvement in the economic situation but to the fact that government funds to the extent of hundreds of millions of dollars have in the last month been poured out upon the farmers and unemployed. The former have been getting bounties for acreage reduction as well as cash loans, while many of the latter have been getting C. W. A. jobs paying from $12 to $15 a week. This has also helped the small merchants and bankers. It may turn out that this sudden flood of financial assistance has saved Mr. Roosevelt from a hostile Congress.

JUST as the government's gold-buying program is in effect merely a gratuitous subsidy to the owners of American gold mines, so the new silver policy is a gratuitous subsidy to the owners of American silver and copper mines. The government will buy practically the entire silver production of the country at 64½ cents an ounce, a price 21½ cents higher than the open-market price of the metal on the day before the announcement was made. The government, of course, has no need for the silver at all. There is no shortage of currency as such; and this move will probably do nothing to increase the net quantity of currency. As soon as the new silver certificates go into circulation, an equivalent amount of Federal Reserve notes will almost automatically be retired from circulation. Nor will the purchase of silver and the issuance of silver money or certificates do anything whatever to raise the American price level. The only way in which that could be accomplished with the use of silver would be through the inauguration of a silver or a bimetallic standard in place of the gold standard.

IN PAYING 50 per cent more than it needs to pay for silver that it does not need, the government is not even doing anything to stabilize the world silver market. The annual American production of silver is about one-sixth of the total world production; by taking that amount off the world silver market the government will doubtless incidentally encourage a slight rise in the world price of silver, but it will do nothing to control the future fluctuations in that price. And what good will the slight rise in the world price do the United States? The common contention of the silver propagandists is that it will increase the purchasing power of the Orient, thus enabling it to buy more American goods. This contention is without substance. The only important country on a silver standard is China. China's purchases in the American market constitute at best a minute part of total American exports—less than 4 per cent. Moreover, our exports to China actually show a smaller percentage of decline since 1929 than our total exports do. Total exports show a drop of 71 per cent from the 1929 level; exports to China show a drop of only 65 per cent. The decline in China's purchasing power as a result of the fall in silver is almost entirely mythical. Such a decline affects China's trade merely in the same way as a depreciation in the value of any other country's currency affects its trade. The new silver policy is likely to prove as unsound politically as it will economically. This sop to the silver interests, instead of keeping them quiet, will probably encourage them to make even more extravagant demands.

DON'T stifle legitimate stock trading by imposing government control on the Stock Exchange," the defenders of Wall Street have been proclaiming. "Let the New York Stock Exchange establish its own regulations to stamp out malpractices." With this refrain in their ears, observers have been treated recently to a first-rate exhibition of the tricks responsible for much of the prevailing pressure for strict regulation of stock-trading practices. The Atlas Tack Corporation is a small concern which recently expanded its products to include bottle caps, thereby gaining a share of the speculative interest attached to every company having the remotest connection with liquor. With this as the principal excuse, Atlas Tack stock was lifted from a low price of $1\frac{1}{2}$ early in 1933 to a high of about 30 last fall, more than double the balance-sheet value given the shares. On December 4 the stock suddenly burst into activity, 5,200 shares changing hands. On December 13, 14, and 15 transactions averaged almost 9,000 shares a day. In the meantime, a so-called stock-market "advisory service" in Boston was deluging potential suckers throughout the country with urgent telephone calls and telegrams recommending immediate purchase of Atlas Tack common. By these devices the price of the stock was raised to $34\frac{3}{4}$ by December 15. The next day, to the accompaniment of rumors that "something was wrong," the bottom dropped out of the market for the stock, and it closed at $21\frac{5}{8}$. On the next trading day it closed at $14\frac{1}{2}$. In all a total market value of \$1,871,000 was erased in little more than two days. After the State Attorney-General's office had announced that it was conducting an investigation, the New York Stock Exchange admitted to the press that it had been "watching closely all transactions in Atlas Tack Corporation shares for the past six weeks." With all its "watching," the Exchange could apparently see no reason why it should intervene in the public interest. How far, then, would it be likely to go to curb a large-scale pool meaning much more to its members?

SECRETARY HULL'S PLEDGE at Montevideo that no government need fear intervention by the United States during the Roosevelt Administration is at least a hopeful sign. We cannot undo the misery we have caused by our blundering in Latin America, but we can make partial amends. The growing importance of markets for our products in the countries to the south also makes it good business for the United States to give unequivocal guaranties that we shall stop meddling in affairs which concern only those who have invested money abroad, fully aware of the risks, and who seek to have the United States government protect those loans. Little comfort will be found by these interests in the Secretary's declaration that no nation has the right to intervene in the foreign or domestic affairs of another. Mr. Hull's pledge will mean little, however, unless the United States promises not only to intervene no more abroad but also to relinquish altogether its control in Haiti. In a recent letter to Dr. Harry F. Ward, Acting Secretary of State William Phillips showed a reactionary point of view when he attempted to defend continuance of financial control of Haiti throughout the life of the outstanding bonds. It was not encouraging to read Mr. Phillips's effort to justify the executive accord of last August which is almost identical with the treaty the Haitian senate rejected unanimously and which imposes obligations on Haiti in excess of those required in the loan agreement of 1922. Shortly before he sailed for South America Mr. Hull received a telegram urging him to arrange to end financial as well as military control in Haiti prior to the Montevideo conference. Such a step, instead of the policy represented in the Phillips letter, would pay huge dividends in good-will and trade.

THE GOOD EFFECT of Secretary Hull's commitment against interference in other countries will, of course, be more than undone if the convention on "the rights and duties of states" is ultimately thrown out in the United States Senate. And it is all too likely that this will happen. There will, at least, be strong Senatorial opposition to any agreement which involves abandoning our ancient prerogative of telling other people how to mind their own business. One promise made in the last week of the conference, however, will almost certainly be sustained: the American delegation, on instructions from Washington, thought better of its refusal to adhere to the convention granting equal nationality rights to women and signed with the rest of the nations—making the vote unanimous. This act we may accept as a fairly substantial crumb of comfort.

ACQUITTAL of four of the five defendants in the Reichstag-fire trial is good news as far as it goes. It indicates that there is still reason and moderation in the German courts and—as witness the urgent defense of Ernst Torgler by his counsel, Dr. Alfons Sack, a Nazi—courage in the German bar. Torgler and the three Bulgarians, although found innocent of arson, have not yet been set free. They have been placed under "protective arrest," and the furious wave of protest from the Nazis which greeted their acquittal would seem to point to the wisdom of such protection for them. The three Bulgarian Communists are to be exiled; there are rumors that Torgler will be held and tried for high treason—in which case one can only be apprehensive of the outcome. The judges, in handing down their verdict, took occasion to declare the attempts to connect the Nazis with the fire, chiefly through the "Brown Book of the Hitler Terror" and the efforts of the International Jurists' Commission, to be "baseless slanders," utterly without foundation. It was evident, they declared, that Van der Lubbe had had accomplices and that they were Communists, although the prosecution had been unable to connect the other Communist defendants with the arson. Van der Lubbe himself received the verdict in the blank silence which has characterized his attitude at the trial as a whole. He is past help. The others still need the watchfulness of the rest of the world if they are safely to regain their freedom.

FROM TIME TO TIME The Nation has been taken to task by its readers because of what they consider its intemperate condemnation of the Nazi government in Germany. Nevertheless, it cannot help viewing with the utmost concern the new German law for the sterilization of the unfit. If one could imagine a committee of entirely unbiased and equally competent scientists who were, because of their justice and skill, to decide which of their fellow human beings should be deprived of the ability to propagate their kind, one might conceivably indorse the proposition. Nothing that the Nazis have done so far inspires the hope that they are either competent or unprejudiced. The law calls for the sterilization of some 400,000 men and women, the congenital idiots being the largest class affected, although the regulations will include also hereditary deafness and blindness, schizophrenia, chorea, physical deformity, and chronic alcoholism. Questions to test feeble-mindedness include: "What is the boiling-point of water?" "What are the capitals of Germany and France?" and "Who discovered America?" Do incorrect answers to these questions necessarily imply idiocy and inability to propagate children that will not be a charge upon the state? The Nazis say, Yes.

AFTER A TRIAL that was marked by moderation and restraint on the part of the community, impartiality on the part of the presiding judge, and extremely able pleading by defense counsel, the Negro, George Crawford, was found guilty of the murder of two white women in Leesburg, Virginia, and sentenced on December 16 to life imprisonment. The Crawford case had attracted a good deal of attention because of the refusal of Federal Judge James A. Lowell of Boston to issue extradition papers on the ground that no Negroes had been on the grand jury that brought the indictment. Crawford, generally believed innocent until the trial, confessed to participation with another man in a robbery which resulted in the death of the two women, and was held by law equally guilty of murder, although he denied the actual killing. His accomplice is still at large and Crawford doubtless escaped the death penalty as a possible material witness against him if he is ever apprehended. The question of the right of Negroes to serve on juries in the South gains added impetus as a result of the Crawford case. Judge McLemore, who presided, did in fact refuse to permit Negroes on the panel from which the Crawford jury was chosen, and Charles H. Houston, Negro attorney, who conducted the defense, took exception to his ruling. But in other parts of Virginia Negroes are actually serving on juries. In Hanover County Circuit Court, in that State, Judge Frederick W. Coleman lately imposed a $10 fine for contempt on a white farmer who refused to sit on a grand jury with a Negro. In Norfolk recently a jury of eleven white men served with a Negro foreman, and in Tennessee, North Carolina, and Kentucky Negroes are being included on jury panels, both for grand and petit juries.

ON DECEMBER 19 Edward Larkman, an innocent man, who for eight years had been in a New York State prison under a life sentence for murder was pardoned and released. That he is alive at all is due to the fact that Alfred E. Smith, when Governor, commuted his sentence from death to life imprisonment. Could there be a better argument against capital punishment? Only one of eight witnesses at his trial identified him—a school teacher who declared that she saw his profile for two seconds and his full face for three. On this slender testimony Larkman was sentenced to the electric chair. Let no one tell us that this is an excusable accident, that there must be an occasional miscarriage of justice. In Professor Edwin M. Borchard's overwhelming volume, "Convicting the Innocent," case after case is listed. We would cite also the instance of the two Negroes lately arrested and "grilled" for a week at Belair, Maryland, because a white girl declared she had been kidnapped by two men of color. It was lucky for them that they were not lynched during their confinement, at the end of which the girl admitted that she had not been kidnapped at all but had merely invented the story to hide her movements. Larkman is going to demand compensation—and friends are rightly going to try to get the legislature to make amends for his years of wrongful imprisonment. He declares that his mother and one of his children died as the result of his conviction. Larkman languished in jail for four years after the guilty man confessed his crime because Governor Roosevelt thought he should be retried, for which special legislation was necessary but not forthcoming. Apparently he would have stayed in jail permanently if the Buffalo Times, a Scripps-Howard newspaper, had not demanded his release.

NO RECENT EVENT carries so many kinds of satisfaction to so many different kinds of people as the sale by the Soviet Government to the British Museum of the Codex Sinaiticus, a fourth-century manuscript of the Bible, for $510,000, half of this to be contributed by the British government. The Vatican, no doubt, will be glad that so precious and holy a manuscript has passed out of heathen hands. The Kremlin, we may take it, is pleased at having exchanged a relic of "the opiate of the people" for 510,000 pieces of good Christian money—a tidy sum which will aid in the industrialization of Russia, which is in turn designed to wipe out the need for either money or a future heaven. In England the Tories, as the vessels of culture, will rejoice in the possession of this priceless book; Ramsay MacDonald will be gratified at having proved to his conservative friends that even a Labor Prime Minister is no barbarian; and the Communists will find effective ammunition in the spectacle of a Labor Premier buying a fourth-century Bible manuscript with one hand and cutting down the twentieth-century dole with the other. The only person we can think of who is presumably unhappy about the deal is Dr. A. S. W. Rosenbach, the noted book collector, to whom the manuscript was offered only a year ago for $1,250,000. He must feel that he has missed the mark-down of his life.

The Nation's Honor Roll for 1933

FOR six years The Nation has printed at the beginning of January a list of Americans who seemed to have deserved well of their countrymen in public affairs and in the arts in the preceding year. This year it seemed desirable also to include mention of outstanding accomplishments, together with the persons and organizations who helped bring them about.

National Recovery

For their bold attempt to organize the chaotic forces of industry and finance to the end of conquering the worst depression in American history, we cite the PRESIDENT and his ADMINISTRATION with particular reference to the following persons:

FELIX FRANKFURTER, for his share in writing the Securities Act, but more especially for his help in drawing into the various government services men of broad social vision and disinterested enthusiasm; FRANCES PERKINS, Secretary of Labor, the first woman to become a member of the Cabinet, who made an impressive though unsuccessful attempt to force upon the leaders of the steel industry a code which would protect labor and the public; JEROME N. FRANK, general counsel of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, for shrewd and creative work in behalf of social control and long-range planning; A. A. BERLE, JR., for writing in collaboration with GARDINER C. MEANS one of the most revealing studies of industrial organization and control, "The Modern Corporation and Private Property," and for his services to the Administration as consultant and adviser in various important fields; FERDINAND PECORA, for exposing, in his capacity as counsel of the Senate Banking and Currency subcommittee, the disastrous and scandalous malpractices current in the world of finance; JOHN COLLIER, who was appointed Commissioner of Indian Affairs after a lifetime of devotion to the welfare of the American Indian, and who has taken the first steps toward restoring the Indian lands to tribal rather than individual ownership and toward abolishing the hated government boarding-schools; MARY VAN KLEECK, for an effective public statement of the shortcomings, especially in its treatment of the labor problem, of the National Recovery Administration.

The Recognition of Russia

Fifteen years of hostility toward one of the most energetic, powerful, and aspiring nations of the world have at last been happily followed by diplomatic recognition of the Soviet Government by the United States. During the period from 1918, when the Lenin Government took office, to the beginnings of the negotiations between President Roosevelt and President Kalinin, so ably conducted by Maxim Litvinov, many persons, in the face of bitter opposition from every section of the country, persisted in urging recognition of the Russian government. Among them The Nation selects the following:

SENATOR WILLIAM E. BORAH, who has jeopardized his high political office by an unceasing campaign on behalf of the Soviet Government; the NEW YORK TIMES for printing and WALTER DURANTY for writing, during the decade and a half of Soviet rule which has now passed, the most enlightening, dispassionate, and readable dispatches from a great nation in the making which appeared in any newspaper in the world; COLONEL HUGH L. COOPER and the AMERICAN-RUSSIAN CHAMBER OF COMMERCE, for patiently acquiring the facts about Russia and for making them available to American business men and the public; WILLIAM C. BULLITT, first American Ambassador to the Soviet Government, who as early as 1919 urged the recognition of Russia in a report to President Wilson, and who has maintained since then his contact with and regard for the Russian people.

The Repeal of Prohibition

Whatever the theoretical advantages of the prohibition of liquor as originally conceived, such degrading evils had grown up in connection with the "noble experiment" that the repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment had become imperative. We cite the following for especially effective work toward that end:

ALFRED E. SMITH, as the outstanding long-time fighter for repeal in the Democratic Party; NICHOLAS MURRAY BUTLER, as an equally valiant champion in the Republican ranks; JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER, JR., for his courage in publicly abandoning the position originally taken by him and his family in favor of prohibition when he realized that the scheme was not working; MRS. CHARLES H. SABIN, head of the Women's Organization for National Prohibition Reform, for persevering and intelligent effort.

Hitlerism Combated

The most disgraceful page in the history of 1933 is the cruel and irrational fury which the Nazis have vented upon Jews and radicals in Germany. Among the protestants against this newest national outrage we cite the following:

EDGAR ANSEL MOWRER, of the Chicago Daily News, formerly head of the foreign correspondents' association of Berlin, for his admirable book "Germany Sets the Clock Back" and for his forthright insistence upon the right of the press to gather and send the news of Fascist outrages; ARTHUR GARFIELD HAYS, New York attorney, for his attempt to get justice for the defendants in the Reichstag fire trial; GEORGE S. MESSERSMITH, United States Consul-General in Berlin, for upholding the rights of American citizens in Germany; ALVIN S. JOHNSON, director of the New School for Social Research in New York City, for bringing a group of ousted German professors to this country and establishing them as the staff of the University in Exile; SHERWOOD EDDY, who as leader of a group of American educators visiting Germany seized the occasion of a reception by the Carl Schurz Society to denounce Nazi policy and state what a bad effect it was having on world affairs; CALVIN B. HOOVER, for his revealing book, "Germany Enters the Third Reich."

Lynching

Although this particular form of murder which takes place only in the United States remains a dark stain upon our national honor, and although more than twice as many lynchings have taken place in 1933 as in the previous year, the fight against lynching and against "legal lynching" in the courts goes on strongly and with unrelenting courage. Among the many persons and organizations that might be singled out for their stern opposition to mob murder, The Nation selects the following:

THE SOUTHERN COMMISSION FOR THE STUDY OF LYNCHING, which continues its admirable work of impartial and illuminating investigation of a question which has all too often been discussed with more passion than fact; the BALTIMORE SUN papers, for persistent, biting, and judicious editorial criticism of lynching; the GOVERNORS OF MISSOURI, TENNESSEE, MARYLAND, OKLAHOMA, AND KANSAS, of whom the last two, by prompt and forthright action, succeeded in preventing lynchings, and all of whom condemned the menace of the mob in unequivocal terms; JUDGE JAMES E. HORTON, of Alabama, for setting aside the verdict of guilty in the case of Heywood Patterson, of Scottsboro, in his second trial; JUDGE J. V. GADDY, of Missouri, who charged a grand jury that lynching was "murder, nothing but cowardly, despicable murder"; and SAMUEL S. LEIBOWITZ, of New York, who under threat of bodily harm has twice conducted the Scottsboro defendants through their trial, and who declares himself willing to do so until the last possible tribunal has been appealed to.

Censorship

A few years ago the progress of literature in the United States was seriously threatened by the legal suppression of such books as Dreiser's "Sister Carrie" and Cabell's "Jurgen." For a time it looked as though the Society for the Prevention of Vice would successfully impose upon the American people its own prurient standards. By now the tide is definitely turned and it seems probable that no serious work of art is likely to be condemned by the courts. During 1933 three persons earned the right to special praise for the part they played in preserving the freedom of literature. They are:

MORRIS L. ERNST, of New York, who has for years led the legal fight against censorship, who has just successfully defended Joyce's "Ulysses," and who, more than any other one person, is responsible for the changed attitude of the courts; UNITED STATES JUDGE JOHN M. WOOLSEY, who ruled that "Ulysses" was not obscene and who wrote an admirable decision laying down various general principles likely to be of great importance in deciding future cases of this kind; MAGISTRATE BENJAMIN GREENSPAN, of New York City, who dismissed the case brought by the Society for the Prevention of Vice against Erskine Caldwell's "God's Little Acre," and who ruled that the opinion of recognized literary critics was more relevant than that of the professional smut specialist.

The Theater

During the season of 1932-33 the American theater seemed threatened with financial collapse. On the other hand, this fall saw a revival of prosperity and the production of an unusually large number of interesting plays. Special credit should be given to the following persons:

WILLIAM A. BRADY, BROCK PEMBERTON, and SAM H. HARRIS for their largely successful efforts to control under the NRA the evils of ticket speculation; the members of the GROUP THEATER for the production of "Men in White"; JED HARRIS for producing the remarkable English play "The Green Bay Tree"; EDWARD J. BROMBERG for his interpretation of the role of the old doctor in "Men in White"; HENRY HULL, who as Jeeter Lester in "Tobacco Road" gives one of the finest performances of recent years.

Poison Versus Honesty

REXFORD G. TUGWELL, Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, has prepared a bill which, if it is enacted at the coming session of Congress and then effectively enforced, will drive the poison-drug and fake-medicine industry out of business. Under existing law manufacturers and sellers of bottled, canned, and packaged medicines must not allow false or unsubstantiated statements to appear on the labels of the goods they have for sale. They are under such restriction, however, in advertising these goods elsewhere. In promoting sales through the newspapers and magazines, by mail, and over the radio they may make all sorts of fraudulent claims for their products. Not only may they do so, but hundreds of these manufacturers have been doing so. The Tugwell legislation, which has come to be known as the Copeland bill because Senator Copeland of New York is sponsoring it in Congress, would broaden the scope of the Pure Food and Drugs Act to make unlawful all fraudulent advertising of proprietary medicines and other drugs through whatever medium such advertising or publicity may be addressed to the buying public. While the Copeland bill would also make other changes in the law, primarily with a view to strengthening its administrative features, the section which would drive cheating and misrepresentation out of the advertising of drugs and medicines is by far the most important.

The proposed legislation has brought to Washington one of the most vociferous and determined lobbies the national capital has known in recent years. Not even the bankers, who have been working night and day for months to suppress the Senate banking inquiry and to emasculate the Securities Act, have been as industrious as the patent-medicine lobbyists. Of course, the drug lobbyists and their editorial spokesmen in the trade journals are wise enough to pretend that they sympathize with the purpose of the Tugwell-Copeland bill. They disagree only with its language. For them it is too frank, too blunt. Under the projected amendment any drug product that is actually a specific cure—and there are only two or three specific cures known to medical science—may be labeled and advertised as such. If it is only a palliative, the label and advertising must state so in plain language. And if it is neither cure nor palliative, but merely a mixture of weed juice and water with no therapeutic value whatever, this fact also must be set forth in unmistakable terms. But the drug lobby does not like such plain speaking. It believes that unless a palliative can also be labeled and advertised as "an aid in the treatment" of a given disease, the package-medicine industry will be "unjustly wrecked."

The opposition to the Tugwell-Copeland bill does not stop there. It contends that the measure would endow the Secretary of Agriculture with "czaristic" powers and give his agents authority to go snooping into the most confidential affairs of pharmacists and manufacturers of medicines and cosmetics. Some critics have gone so far as to assert that the bill would deprive violators of the right of trial by jury. Section 23 does state that "the findings of fact by the Secretary of Agriculture shall be conclusive." If the law is to be effectively administered, the facts as to the ingredients and scientific value of drug products offered for sale must be de-terminated by someone, and it is only logical that the responsibility for the determination of these facts should rest with the Secretary of Agriculture. This does not mean, however, that he need or will hire an army of snoopers to ferret out the secrets of the patent-medicine men. It would be simpler, safer, and less costly to have their goods analyzed in a government laboratory. Nor would the findings of fact be final. The bill declares that they must be arrived at "in accordance with the law," which, of course, far from giving the Secretary "czaristic" authority, makes his every act in this connection subject to review by the courts. The courts could declare invalid any decisions or findings which they believed unreasonable or arbitrary.

It is a curious fact that while the pending measure has aroused such intense opposition, the Pure Food and Drugs Act, which it merely seeks to amplify and extend in order to drive out dishonest advertising, has been more or less effectively enforced for twenty-seven years. Most of the provisions of the Copeland bill which are now under attack are also to be found in the present law. The operation of these provisions has not brought the dire consequences to mankind or the drug trade which the lobbyists have been predicting in connection with the Copeland bill. "However," to quote Assistant Secretary Tugwell, "the 1906 law does not cover advertising, except that appearing on the label. As a result, false and misleading statements have merely moved from one place to another." It is because the Copeland bill would make misrepresentation of drug products unlawful under any circumstances that the trade has now suddenly discovered that we are faced with calamity and economic ruin if this bill becomes law.

It is not only in Washington that the opposition is active. Pressure is being brought to bear on the various publications and other media that carry patent-medicine advertising. They are being bluntly told that passage of the Copeland bill would deprive them of millions in revenue, and since hundreds of publications depend largely upon advertising of this sort, it is only natural that the pressure of the opposition should be having a decided effect. In addition, men of local and even wider prominence are being called upon to speak against the bill. The opposition has important political contacts as well. The Drug Institute, for example, an outspoken opponent of the measure, has as chief counsel J. Bruce Kremer, former Democratic national committeeman from Montana, who has many important friends in the conservative wing of the Democratic Party.

There can be no doubt that there are some defects in the bill as it stands. We hope that they will be corrected in committee or during the debate in Congress. However, not one of its many critics has yet brought forward a convincing answer to the major challenge of the proposed legislation. The bill is aimed solely at those quacks who prey upon a public ignorant of the complexities and phraseology of medical science. It will not hurt honest and truthful manufacturers of medicines and cosmetics. In the words of Editor and Publisher, which is supporting the Copeland bill: "It is not easy to see how any producer of a legitimate product can be hurt by honest claims." By joining forces with the quacks these legitimate producers are not only endangering the lives of thousands of people who are annually tricked into buying poisonous drugs and cosmetics but are casting suspicion upon their own integrity.

Hitler's Economics

IF doubt remains in anyone's mind as to the surrender of Hitler's National Socialism to big business it must have been dispelled by the speech of Gottfried Feder, the creator of the National Socialist economic program, at Hamburg on December 15. Addressing a group of business men, he won their applause by his declaration that the "state must not engage in business itself as a competitor," and that there must be no further government ownership of the means of production. He denounced the policy of the republic under which, he said, governmental bodies had invested no less than 30,000,000 marks in 1,235 different enterprises, and proclaimed the utter subservience of German labor to the capitalists when he added: "The Labor Front has nothing to say in respect to business leadership." "Don't be afraid your commerce will be nationalized," he continued.

This is a remarkable statement indeed for the man who wrote into the original Hitler platform the planks which called for the nationalization of the entire import trade, of all trusts and monopolies, and of all banks, the abolishment of the "slavery of interest" (Zinsknechtschaft), and the remodeling of every large industrial enterprise into a profit-sharing undertaking. When Hitler announced, after a six-hour session of his Supreme Economic Council, that private business would not be interfered with, and loudly voiced his opposition to any second, or anti-capitalist, revolution, his surrender was obvious. Now it is confirmed by the man who gave him such limited economic ideas as he possesses.

"For the time being the capitalist supporters of Nazism are in control," points out an anonymous writer in the London New Statesman and Nation, who, that journal says, is an economic authority of international reputation. How long will they remain in control? How long can Hitler hold in check those millions of his deluded followers who joined his banner in the belief that he would give them something closely approximating communism, and would live up to his promise to expropriate all the estates of the great landowners and break them up for the benefit of the peasants and workers? This commentator, whose article is unquestionably the most comprehensive and detached survey of the German economic situation that has yet appeared, believes that Hitler can hold on if he and his associates can bring about some sort of "widespread economic contentment." To us it appears that he can hold on a long time if he can control his Brown Shirts (for whom, as the government admits, a special concentration camp has now been established) by means of his Pretorian Guard (his Black Shirts) and the Reichswehr. We hear interesting stories which go to show that many of the Brown Shirts are getting restless, but the mass of the people are too deeply drugged by the lies and glamor of the Hitler regime to make any important protests at the present time. Even if numbers of his followers find out that Mr. Facing-all-ways Hitler does not mean to give them a genuinely socialistic regime in the interest of the masses, they will still have to wear their chains indefinitely. The writer in the New Statesman and Nation shows that the most important bit of Nazi legislation yet passed is that for the "arbitrary sectional confiscation" of Jewish property. Against this decree there can be no appeal to the courts, for the latter have been informed that their business is no longer to protect the rights of individuals but to safeguard Nazi policies.

How is Germany progressing economically? Here this writer has some interesting opinions. The monetary policy of Herr Schacht he finds sound, conservative, and clever; it has been greatly helped by two things—America's repudiation of the gold standard, which "eased the burden" of indebted landowners and industrialists by 40 per cent, and the shrewd device of "blocked marks," with one value at home and another abroad, which has helped to bolster up the collapsing export trade. Conditions in Germany have, of course, been aided by the general improvement in world trade; also the index of production has been rising and the home market expanding as the result of government expenditure and the beginning of a public-works program. But no large-scale revival of trade is in sight, and no increase in the demand for consumers' goods. The turn-over of department stores in October of this year was 20 per cent below that in the same month of last year.

This authority believes that Nazism has not yet converted Socialists and Communists into upholders of the capitalist system. Foreign trade, he feels, is likely to continue to shrink. He believes that the Nazi state, in pursuit of its "tribal autarchy," that is, self-sufficiency, may be able to do without a good many commodities now considered essential. As he puts it: "A movement looking backward for its social ideas and expecting their fulfilment from a stationary 'vocational' social order can easily reduce standards of living by an appeal to ancient virtues." In this process, he thinks, private fortunes will diminish and there will be standardization on a much larger scale than "the loathed standardization in the U. S. A." There will be order and efficiency, but life will be on a comparatively low plane. It is not impossible, he thinks, for economic isolation to succeed, but at a terrific price. For it will mean the death of all progress.

More Jobs Wanted

FRANCES PERKINS, the Secretary of Labor, notes in her report for November, lately published, that approximately 2,500,000 persons have found employment in manufacturing since March. How many workers have been added in other fields it is impossible to say. There are indications, however, that relatively few new jobs have been created or old jobs refilled in farming, transportation, construction, the service industries, clerical work, or the professions. Perhaps another 2,000,000 men and women have found employment in these lines, though this is only a rough guess. Moreover, the index of the American Federation of Labor, which, though far from perfect, remains the most reliable in the country, suggests that something more than 10,000,000 workers, not including farm hands, are still jobless. The soundness of this estimate is indicated by the fact that there has been no marked decrease in demands for unemployment relief, according to reports received by the Federal Emergency Relief Administration. There is always an increase in demands for assistance as winter approaches, and while the rate of increase this year is somewhat smaller than it has been in the past three years, it is still not small enough to suggest any substantial reduction of unemployment.

It is worth pointing out that the estimate of the Department of Labor is based on the month of March, when unemployment was abnormally great even when measured in terms of economic depression. To the unemployment resulting from the industrial slump was added temporary unemployment for some hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of workers who were idle because the banks were closed and not because of any inherent difficulties in the industries. Most of these men and women were immediately restored to their jobs when the banks were opened again. It would be more accurate to take the month of January as the base for measuring the change in the employment situation. In that month the A. F. of L. index showed more than 13,000,000 jobless, while the Alexander Hamilton Institute, whose survey included farmhands and other workers not covered by the Federation of Labor, estimated that the unemployed totaled more than 17,000,000. Each of these totals was subsequently swollen by the temporary industrial suspension resulting from the bank crisis in March. But if we disregard the fact that the Labor Department's estimate is dated from the panic month, and instead figure its reported increase in employment from January, we find that the total number of jobless still runs somewhere between 10,500,000 and 12,500,000.

Any way we look at it, and though we concede that even the most reliable estimates are largely based on guesswork, we see that there has been no important decrease in the ranks of the unemployed. Some time ago General Hugh S. Johnson and his associates in the National Recovery Administration were asserting that the operation of the NRA would put 6,000,000 men back to work "by September." The law has now been in effect for more than six months, twice as long as the period set by General Johnson, and yet the goal has not been reached. This we point out in no hypercritical way, but merely to suggest that ballyhoo, no matter how patriotic or sincere it may be, solves no economic problems.

The patriotic thing for the Roosevelt Administration to do is to admit that in so far as its recovery program was designed to take up the slack in employment it has been far from successful. This defect surely cannot be corrected by more ballyhoo. Yet that seems to be the course that has been adopted. While General Johnson is making no more extravagant claims, Secretary Ickes, the Public Works Administrator, and Harry L. Hopkins, the Civil Works Administrator, are talking bravely of the millions of men their efforts have succeeded in putting into "real jobs at real wages." However worthy such employment may be from the standpoint of the moral and physical well-being of the workers, it is at best no more than a civilized form of unemployment relief. An industrial society founded upon productive capitalism cannot live on public works alone. So long as we have to deal with the realities of such a society we must admit that until we can find productive jobs for the millions now idle and for the additional millions engaged in non-productive activities there can be no sound economic recovery.

From the point of view of its own philosophy it would be well for the Roosevelt Administration to reconsider and overhaul its recovery program to the end that more real jobs might be created. The demand of organized labor and the Socialists that the working week be reduced to thirty hours should have first place in any such reconsideration.

Issues and Men

The Gifts of the New Deal

WE are entering a new year fraught with enormous possibilities of good and evil for the people of the United States. It is no exaggeration to say that the very fate of our democratic institutions still hangs in the balance. Today let us run over some of the great things that have been accomplished by the NRA under the New Deal, so that we may hearten ourselves thereby. There is no necessity of being under any delusion about these achievements. Some of them may not be permanent; many of them may be wiped out if the liberal Administration of Franklin D. Roosevelt is succeeded by a reactionary one. That may come to pass, and yet somehow or other I feel that certain things have been accomplished that will be of lasting value, that ideas have been set afloat in the land that can never be returned to the source from which they came, or be wholly forgotten. Lenin showed us what it means to let loose an idea in the world and to back it up by some practical applications. But whether the NRA fails or succeeds, I am submitting herewith some of the achievements which I think all liberals can unite to applaud and give thanks for. In this desperately foolish old world we have come to that pass when we can only face the future by counting up each day just what we have gained, however little that may be, and by fastening our minds upon that rather than upon the battles before us, the odds to be overcome, the losses and defeats sustained. Of course we do not know whether in 1934 we shall find our way back to normal prosperity and reduce our unemployment to bearable figures. The experiments undertaken are so vast in their scope that I do not believe that even President Roosevelt himself can have a clear picture of all that is happening; I should be willing to wager that the Cabinet cannot. Certainly no editor can claim to be familiar with every phase of what we so readily call the New Deal, least of all myself. But here are the things worth reciting, things that spell a great human advance for which we cannot be too grateful:

1. First and foremost the change in the spirit of the Washington government from a government by, for, and with Business to an Administration which, whatever its errors, is obviously laying its emphasis upon the welfare and the progress of the plain people of the United States.

2. The establishment of the principle in our national legislation of the right of American labor to bargain collectively and to be represented by its own chosen delegates—a principle that will still have to be fought for in the years to come.

3. The establishment of the right of the federal government, as the leading partner in the enterprise, to take part in any controversy between labor and capital.

4. The revitalization of the American labor movement; the rescuing of the members of the American Federation of Labor from the follies and stupidities and narrowness of purpose of their own leaders; the spreading of the idea of unions to the automobile and steel industries, to journalists, even to chorus girls.

5. The practical abolition of child labor, with certain important reservations, and the consequent resurrection of the movement to ratify the proposed Child Labor Amendment to the Constitution, with the result that fourteen States have ratified it since January 1, 1933, twenty in all to date.

6. The practical abolition of sweatshop labor in our American cities.

7. The establishment in law by the federal government of the minimum-wage principle (this despite the fact that owing to looseness in the code many unscrupulous employers have made the minimum wage their maximum).

8. The establishment of codes of sound ethical practice in American industry, with the resultant elimination to date of no less than one thousand improper or unethical methods of conducting business.

9. The acceptance of the elimination of cutthroat competition in industry as a new objective of American economic and political policy.

10. The appointment of a coordinator of railroads, Joseph B. Eastman, and the undertaking by him of the only complete survey of our railroads, their needs, and the wants of their passengers, ever made in our history.

11. The beginning of national planning of industry in the United States by the federal government, and the control by it of the exploitation of the individual by predatory interests and human greed; the supervising of competition; and the management of great combinations of capital in the interest of the consumer and of the general public.

12. The establishment—at Muscle Shoals—for the first time of the right of the United States government to engage in the business of manufacturing, distributing, and selling electrical power, after years of hopeless battling for this policy.

13. The enormous awakening of the American people under the stimulus of the NRA to new ideas and to the necessity for new economic readjustments and beliefs.

14. Direct government aid to the starving unemployed in complete contravention of the position taken by Herbert Hoover and by Governor Franklin D. Roosevelt in New York; the practical establishment of a dole, and the complete enunciation of the principle that it is the federal government's duty to see that no American starves.

15. The reestablishment of the credit of the government, and the reopening and, to a limited extent, the rehabilitation of our banks.

16. The restoration to a marked degree of the confidence and courage of the American people; the courage and resolution shown by the President from the moment that he took office. "For," to quote Dean William F. Russell of Teachers College, "we thought we were lost, but we have been saved. Hope had vanished, and confidence has been restored."

Samuel Garrison Villard

Behind Russian Recognition

By LOUIS FISCHER

Moscow, December 3

STATE DEPARTMENT officials showed Litvinov a number of documents proving that Woodrow Wilson sent General Graves with troops to Siberia in 1918 not to fight the Bolsheviks but to check the imperialistic plans of Japan on the Asiatic continent. Litvinov had known this all the time. General Graves had said it in his "America's Siberian Adventure." Others had said it too. The State Department archives revealed nothing new to Litvinov, but the fact that this dossier was unsealed for his benefit and the fact that in consideration of America's anti-Japanese intentions in 1918 he renounced a Soviet counter-claim are of tremendous significance. For Litvinov, the dropping of a counter-claim was a gesture toward Soviet-American friendship; to the State Department it must have been clear that the Commissar would put only one interpretation on the opening of its files: that Washington was still anti-Japanese and wanted Moscow to know it.

When the President and the Commissar discussed Siberia in 1918 they naturally had to discuss Japan in 1933. I have no definite information that they did. But I have reason to believe they did. Unlike a number of capitalist states, the Soviet Union is not interfering in Chinese domestic affairs. Moscow wants to see a strong united China, and although the prospects of such a development are slim indeed, its policy in this regard corresponds with that of the United States. President Roosevelt knows that in most other respects, too, Russia's attitude toward Far Eastern affairs is very much like his own. The State Department, accordingly, may take it for granted that in any future test of diplomatic strength with Japan the Kremlin will be disposed to manifest greater sympathy for America's position than for Japan's.

There is evidence that the Roosevelt-Litvinov understanding and recognition have had the desired effect in Japan. "The vernacular newspapers," the London Times correspondent wired from Tokio on November 19, "allege that some business men, who remain anonymous, welcome recognition as checking the aggressive dreams of certain Japanese." Premier Saito and the clique around the Mikado have been encouraged by the assumption of diplomatic relations between America and Russia. Their struggle against War Minister Araki and the military fascists is far from won, but they mustered enough courage a few weeks ago to start a campaign among the industrialists and merchants of Japan for support for their moderate "Shidehara policy" in foreign affairs. To the extent that the civilian elements in Tokio gain in the tug against war with the mad militarists, Soviet and American security grows.

Two considerations can strengthen the advocates of peace in Japan and reduce the threat of war in the Pacific. They are Soviet-American cooperation and the reinforcement of Russia's defenses. Recognition by the United States has increased Soviet prestige and has indicated to the Japanese that in the event of their attack on Siberia there would be at least a chance that Russian-American trade might expand. Immediately after recognition was announced, Yureniev, the Soviet Ambassador to Japan, issued a statement emphasizing the significance in consolidating world peace of a rapprochement between two nations with 290,000,000 inhabitants. "The Japanese," writes the London Times Tokio correspondent, "who lie geographically between the two nations, are not likely to miss the point." The question of war or peace in the Far East during the next year or two will be determined by the result of the inner political conflict in Japan, and the more Japanese who see Yureniev's point the weaker Araki's case becomes. For in the final analysis the military fascists must be able to say to the nation: if we attack the Russians we can beat them; if we attack the Americans we can beat them. But as Russians and Americans draw closer together, this assertion carries less conviction. If Japan were in a situation like Germany's, a foreign union might be wind in the sails of the reactionaries. Japan, however, is not a defeated nation surrounded on all sides by enemies. She is rather an aggressive nation making new enemies by reason of her aggression, and here the popular consciousness of serious outside opposition to those aggressive intentions can react to the detriment of the jingo elements and deter them from further aggression in much the same way, perhaps, as the Kaiser might have been deterred in July, 1914, had he known for certain that England would fight on the side of France. Mr. Roosevelt made an extremely clever move on the eve of recognition: he ordered part of the United States fleet withdrawn from the Pacific Ocean. Had he kept the fleet there and recognized Russia, the Japanese might have been alarmed, and alarm is the stuff on which militarists flourish. But the transfer of some naval strength to the Atlantic reassured Tokio diplomats as to America's peaceful mood and helped the Japanese civilians somewhat to resist the big-army and big-navy men's raid on the exchequer. Then Soviet recognition, a cheaper and more effective form of pressure on Japan than battleships, brought home to a large number of Japanese that it was impossible to crush both America and Russia and that it would therefore be wiser to put some trust in the machinery of peace.

Today Japanese diplomacy is in retreat before the Soviet Union. The retreat commenced late in September when Gregory Sokolnikov, Soviet Assistant Foreign Commissar for Far Eastern affairs, told Ota, the Japanese Ambassador in Moscow, that Japan would be held responsible for all anti-Soviet acts in Manchuria and that Manchukuo was a Nipponese puppet. The Moscow press thereupon broke out into violent attacks on Japanese imperialism and explained that the Kremlin had no intention of making any further reductions in the selling price of the Chinese Eastern Railway. On October 9 the Soviet newspapers broke all precedents by publishing a series of secret Japanese documents revealing Japanese anti-Soviet plans. Japan did not reply. During the period of the anniversary celebrations in November Bolshevik placards, spokesmen, and dailies, which are now usually very guarded in their references to foreign policy, frankly branded Japan as an aggressive and militaristic nation. Finally, when a squadron of Japanese bombers and scout planes flew over Siberian territory on November 3, Moscow warned Tokio that the next time this happened the aeroplanes would be fired at. The Japanese have been taken aback by this sudden reversal from Moscow's mild and insult-swallowing policy of the last two years. When Ota asked what it all meant, a Soviet publicist said it meant just one word: "Stop." The Bolsheviks have called Japan to a halt.

The next Soviet firmness vis-a-vis Japan is easily accounted for. The country is now in a confident mood. The harvest was good. Collectivization is definitely established. Industrialization makes steady progress. The Bolsheviks have not the slightest doubt that their army is better than Japan's in fighting spirit and mechanical equipment; that the Japanese army has never encountered a major Western force and that it exhibited its poor offensive qualities at Shanghai, while the Red Army has been tested in the fire of battle and proved its worth; that the Red air fleet is stronger than Japan's and could bombard Japanese cities while Japanese planes could never reach important Soviet population centers; that Russia's war industries for the manufacture of tanks, automobiles, aeroplane motors, guns, and so forth are superior to Japan's; that the U. S. S. R. stands far ahead of Japan as a heavy-industrial nation; that despite the weakness of the Soviet fleet, infantry and aeroplanes could repulse any Japanese attack on Vladivostok; and, to sum up, that Japan could not win a war against the Soviet Union. The Trans-Siberian Railway is a weak link, but the Soviet government is constructing another line from Orenburg to Orsk to Stalinsk to Minusinsk, crossing the Trans-Siberian at Taischet-Kirensk, and is probably building other railroads as well as motor highways on which information is not available. Moreover, Moscow has practically completed its program of creating a Far Eastern military autarchy which makes the Khabarovsk region largely independent of European Russia as far as ammunition, clothing, food, and soldiers are concerned.

The Japanese know all about these developments and are trimming their diplomatic sails accordingly. For two years, from September, 1931, when Japan suddenly descended upon sleeping Mukden, to September, 1933, the Bolsheviks persisted in a painful policy of patient tolerance. Several times they offered Tokio a non-aggression pact. Tokio refused. "We need a free hand," Hoki Hirota, now Japanese Foreign Minister, said to me. The Bolsheviks offered Japan a commercial treaty. Japan refused. The Bolsheviks suggested the exchange of trade and good-will delegations. Japan did not react seriously. The Bolsheviks proposed the sale of the Chinese Eastern. Japan assumed that Moscow had decided to cede the railway and was only asking for a nominal selling price in order to "save face." Finally, when the Japanese began to arrest Soviet officials of the C. E. R. and prepared to seize the railroad, Moscow banged down its mailed fist—mailed during two years of intensive activity in Siberia—and declared: "We have had enough." The Japanese understood this kind of language where they had not understood the language of peace and conciliation.

The resulting Japanese diplomatic retreat commenced before President Roosevelt took the first steps toward Soviet recognition. But that retreat has now been hastened by recognition. The retreat and Litvinov's stay in America have helped the Russians to give more definite shape to their Far Eastern policy. This may now be roughly outlined.

Moscow will sell the Chinese Eastern for what it is worth, say, $100,000,000 in gold. Moscow, however, will not recognize Manchukuo de jure except under exceptional circumstances. Recognition of Manchukuo would prejudice the territorial integrity of China, a principle to which the U. S. S. R. and the United States are both equally committed. The non-recognition of Manchukuo, however, must not be taken to mean that Russia is interested in a sphere of influence in Northern Manchuria. The Soviet Union has definitely renounced that sphere of influence. In 1926 Japan proposed to Moscow the division of Manchuria into Japanese and Soviet spheres. Moscow rejected this imperialistic suggestion seven years ago, and still abhors anything that smacks of it. Moscow is out of Manchuria and is reconciled to having Japan as a land neighbor intrenched in Manchukuo. When I asked a maker of Soviet foreign policy why, if that is the case, they should not recognize Manchukuo, he said: "Why should we? We are thinking of China." I suspect they are also thinking of America, which is violently opposed to Manchukuoan recognition. Some time ago the Kremlin might have recognized Manchukuo as part of the aftermath of a Soviet-Japanese non-aggression pact, but the new ratio of military power in the Far East and the establishment of Russian-American diplomatic relations have somewhat modified that attitude. Perhaps Moscow will now sign such a pact if Tokio strongly urges it. The Soviet government wants peace with Japan. Russia has absolutely nothing to gain and everything to lose from war. But the past has convinced the Soviet government that a mild, moderate, and humble attitude is not conducive to peace. The United States government probably takes the same view of the non-aggression pact which Japan has offered it.

Russia's new military strength in Siberia coupled with the incipient Soviet-American rapprochement is a guaranty of Far Eastern peace. The worst threat to that peace is the Japanese fascist movement which seeks to make capital out of a most difficult economic situation. The Japanese army and navy will spend 875,000,000 yen in 1934 out of a total federal budget of 2,017,000,000 yen—43.3 per cent. Instead of allocating more money for the relief of peasants and industries, the reactionaries are asking for additional military expenditures. Politicians who do not comply help their assassins to become national heroes. The atmosphere in Japan is electric with possibilities of violent change. Recognition of Russia by the United States has served notice on the military hotheads that no matter what they do at home, they must be more circumspect abroad. France, Russia's new friend, is likewise interested in diminishing the war danger in the Pacific, and should take steps to remind Japan in very concrete fashion of that interest. Ultimately, the Powers may have to get together to save Japan from her social-economic-territorial dilemma and from herself. For if she attacks Russia she may break her neck; and that would have disastrous world consequences. But it is probably too much to hope that the bourgeois nations, who today watch the Franco-German problem, which has already provoked two wars, prepare the field for a third, will have enough sense to safeguard the capitalist system from a serious body blow in Eastern Asia. Communist Russia must do it, and capitalist America will assist her in doing it. Moscow's new firm policy vis-a-vis Japan is the best thing for Japan and the best means of improving Soviet-Japanese relations.

Relief with Both Mind and Heart

By BENJAMIN GLASSBERG

Milwaukee, December 20

AN examination of the methods and policies of the public relief agencies in most of the larger cities reveals that one of the few cities where relief has not been grossly inadequate is Milwaukee. During the entire depression Milwaukee County has given assistance to every family in need. At no time has it been faced with the prospect of having to discontinue relief on a certain date, as was actually the case in Philadelphia in 1932. At no time has it been obliged arbitrarily to remove thousands of families from the lists because of lack of funds, as was the case in Detroit in 1931. And Milwaukee approached its task without creating any new or emergency organization for the purpose, as so many cities have done, especially since the establishment of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration in June, 1933.

Milwaukee was fortunate in having at hand a department which could function in this emergency, namely, the Department of Outdoor Relief, which is one unit of a closely knit group of county institutions designed to meet the needs of the community with respect to physical and mental health and dependency. Until 1929 it was an obscure county department aiding several hundred families a month with provisions. In 1930, as the need for relief increased month by month, the department expanded its personnel and facilities. The County Board assumed as a matter of course, on the basis of the "poor relief" section of statutes over half a century old, that it was its duty to take care of all those in need and that no private welfare agency or Community Chest could be expected to assume this constantly increasing burden. By 1933 the department had a staff of nearly 600, many of them college graduates and some with experience in private social work. It was giving relief to 32,000 families and 6,000 single men. To this group of more than 150,000 citizens of Milwaukee it was supplying not only groceries and milk, but all the other necessities of life, including coal, shoes, and some clothing, and was regularly paying rent and gas and electric-light bills, wherever necessary. Recently it has supplied stoves, stove repairs, mattresses, and other household necessities as well.

In spite of the adequacy of its general relief policy, Milwaukee has been subjected to some criticism for its reliance on the commissary system. Milwaukee does not use the grocery-order plan in supplying food. Nor has it been able to furnish its families with cash, with the exception of some 5,500 families who since the beginning of 1933 have been employed on the work-relief program and paid entirely in cash. Supplies for relief families in Milwaukee are purchased through a central commissary in carload lots on specifications and bids. Only foods of the highest grade are bought. After being packaged at the central commissary, the food is sent by truck once or twice a day to the twelve branch stations located in various parts of the county. These branch stations are generally housed in large buildings formerly used as garages and resemble a grocery store in their arrangement.

Families on relief are visited in their homes by an investigator who is able to determine what food the family has on hand and what sorts of food, if any, it does not use. An order is then listed on a printed card and sent to the branch station, generally a week in advance of the family's visit to the station. When the client, so-called, calls for his groceries, his card is found and the order filled. The time of the client's visit is fixed in advance and no more than twenty or so are scheduled to come at the same time. There are no crowds in the station. The whole transaction is as orderly and expeditious as being waited on in a chain grocery store.

The amount and variety of food has been carefully worked out over a period of years by the county dietitian, in cooperation with the medical association and the leading pediatricians. The variety of food items supplied has been constantly increased, so as to prevent too great monotony. A cookbook has been published and widely distributed to enable families to plan their meals wisely. Through the cooperation of the public schools and the Milwaukee Vocational School, all the students in the home-economics courses have been taught to make efficient use of the foods issued by the relief department. As a result of this policy, the health of the children of Milwaukee has been maintained on a rather high plane, as is indicated by a report submitted by Dr. Stanley G. Seeger, president of the Wisconsin State Medical Society, to Secretary of Labor Frances Perkins on October 5 last. Medical leaders from all parts of the country were called to Washington by Miss Perkins to discuss the dangers of malnutrition among the people. After a careful study of the records of the County Dispensary, the County General Hospital, and the Milwaukee Children's Hospital, Dr. Seeger reported as follows:

Malnutrition among children of poor families in Milwaukee County is practically negligible. From a nutritional standpoint, the health of children in families getting county-relief supplies is on a higher level now than it was before the depression.

There is no evidence of pellagra, a disease which develops chiefly among undernourished children.

Most of the State, basing diets for poor-relief families on balanced food standards set by the Milwaukee relief department, shows little evidence of malnutrition.

This is not an argument for bigger and better depressions. It is merely proof that through the operation of a well-managed commissary and a carefully planned diet, malnutrition may be averted.

Largely owing to the great saving resulting from this somewhat communistic method of feeding people, Milwaukee has been able to do what practically no other city can boast of, namely, continue the regular payment of rent for all unemployed persons unable to pay it themselves. During the greater part of 1932 and 1933 this service averaged approximately $250,000 a month. To those social workers who condemn the commissary because it robs the individual family of the right to choose its own food and to buy where and what it pleases, our answer is that if it saves enough money to prevent families and children from going through the harrowing experience of eviction every two or three months it is highly desirable—even though it means that persons must forgo choosing their own food at their favorite grocer's.

The department has not been unmindful of the importance of preserving the morale of its clients and of saving them from all possible embarrassment. For this reason, although at considerable added expense, every family is visited in its own home once every two weeks, instead of being obliged to come to the relief offices. Each worker has a case load of approximately 140 families a month, calling for an average of 14 visits a day. This number will now be materially reduced. Incidentally, the home-visiting system makes possible a closer check on the earnings and conditions of each family. In fact, about 3,000 families voluntarily withdrew from the relief lists at the time of the inauguration of the home visits. It is now possible, as a result of this plan, to provide for the special diet needs of diabetic, tubercular, and other ill persons requiring special treatment. In many cases expensive and elaborate diets are supplied.

One of the most interesting activities of the department until the Civil Works Administration program was established on November 15 was the work-relief program, developed in the fall of 1932. We were impressed with the fact that a great many persons took relief unwillingly and infinitely preferred to work for it if given the opportunity. Also many were losing the habit of work and some form of regular employment would help to reestablish this habit. At the same time there were many necessary public-works projects which could not be completed for lack of funds. It was therefore agreed that the Department of Outdoor Relief would undertake to help the various cities and towns in the county to develop such public-works projects as were socially necessary and desirable. The municipalities were to provide skilled supervision, necessary materials, tools, and workmen's compensation, and the department would supply as many men as were needed and pay them at the rate of fifty cents an hour for unskilled labor and the union rate for skilled, the number of hours being dependent upon the amount of relief which the family was getting. The Relief Department was to make no attempt to supervise workers after they were referred for work.

No client was required to work. The plan was voluntary in every respect. Since there were at no time jobs enough to go around, it would have been absurd to make work compulsory. After a man went to work, if at any time he desired to quit he was free to do so and he could automatically return to the ranks of those receiving direct relief. There was, of course, an inducement to work, for these families were paid in cash—an amount sufficient to meet the cost of their provisions, milk, rent, fuel, shoes, and gas and electric bills. In addition, a small sum ranging from $2 to $3 a month was added to the budget to cover various incidentals. As the price of food went up, beginning with June, the families' budgets were increased accordingly and more hours of work added to the schedule. During the first month or six weeks the department continued to grant provisions and other forms of aid, and for a few weeks there was some duplication in relief. Still further to help the men who chose work, arrangements were made with shoe dealers and coal companies to provide families with these necessities at the same prices paid by the department, and a working agreement was made with the local grocers that they should give some discount on the presentation of a card identifying the customer as a worker on the relief program. Arrangements were also made with the gas and electric companies to grant the men certain discount privileges not permitted to their regular customers. If the worker lived two miles or more from the job, the department supplied carfare.

During the summer months the pay roll for the 5,500-odd men at work amounted to approximately $200,000 a month. The system seemed to be regarded with satisfaction by practically all the workers. There was a definite feeling on the part of the men, who received their checks twice a month, just as all other county employees did, that they were supporting themselves through their own efforts. They worked efficiently and well, according to the testimony of their foremen and supervisors. Some men with large families found that it paid them much better to continue at work for the county than to accept a position in one of the large factories which began to open during the summer. In addition to the material improvement made possible by the pay check, many a difficult family situation was ironed out when the man went to work instead of brooding idly at home.

A novel activity for a relief department is the work of the securities division, organized a year ago. We found that there were many families with some assets—stocks or bonds, a mortgage on some property, savings tied up in a closed bank, or building-and-loan stock. These were potential assets, but their owners were unable to turn them into cash to enable them to purchase their immediate necessities, except at a great sacrifice. Under the law a family must be entirely devoid of means to be eligible for relief. However, since it seemed unjust to insist that the family sell its assets at a time when there was no market, a plan was developed whereby if a family assigned such assets to the department, they would be held in trust until such time as the owner might choose to sell. In the meantime the necessary aid was extended. If the owner could sell his assets profitably, they would be released and he would then repay the department the amount of aid granted. To date approximately $385,000 in frozen assets has been assigned to the department.

Another service has been in the field of insurance. This was begun on April 1, 1933. By arrangement with some of the larger insurance companies, mainly those which sell industrial-insurance policies, it is now possible to readjust insurance policies of families receiving relief when they cannot continue to pay the premiums or are carrying too much insurance. Under the guidance of an expert in this field, the insurance policies of hundreds of our families have been subjected to careful scrutiny, and with the advice and cooperation of the Life Insurance Adjustment Bureau of New York City have been readjusted to fit their needs. At the same time cash reimbursements have been made available to the families concerned to pay premiums for a year in advance, and to net them $150,000 in addition.

Milwaukee has recognized from the beginning that single men, whether they are homeless residents or transients, are as much entitled to consideration as men with families. Early in the depression, through the Central Council of Social Agencies, the Travelers' Aid Society was supplied with a larger staff to enable it to function more effectively, and all single persons applying for aid were referred to this agency.

rechristened the Transient Service Bureau. If applicants were residents of the county, they were then referred to the Outdoor Relief Department, from which they received approximately the same aid that families received, namely, provisions, rent, heat, and so forth. Men not able to prepare their meals are cared for on the so-called meal-ticket plan, that is, they are supplied with a weekly meal ticket good at one of the restaurants on the approved list. Shelter at one of the downtown lodging-houses is also furnished, and such clothing as is needed. All transients are cared for by the Transient Service Bureau through its own funds. Wherever possible, transients are returned to their homes after proper social investigation. There is no passing on of cases, no limiting of care to two or three days, no use of the jails or police stations for lodging purposes. Through the foresight and imaginative planning of the Central Council of Social Agencies, the Municipal Center for the Unemployed was established two years ago in a vacant loft building. The Board of Education accepted this center as a unit of the public-school centers, and supplied trained recreation workers. The building was furnished with the usual games, billiard and pool tables, a space for basket ball, volley ball, and the like. Musical instruments and work benches with tools for shoe mending and repair of clothing were supplied by interested citizens. Visitors to the center do not have to go through any form of registration or answer any questions. There is no burdensome discipline. Night after night it is filled to capacity with happy-looking, homeless men, busily engaged in whatever pursuits they fancy at the moment.

The relief program developed by Milwaukee was, to be sure, expensive. It would have been cheaper to adopt the "eviction-evasion" rent policy, which has been used on so large a scale during the depression; it would have saved many million dollars a year. It is costly to maintain a corps of capable workers and administrators of a high type. The county and the State have made every effort possible to raise by taxation the necessary sums for unemployment-relief purposes; the already high State income tax has been doubled. The county has also issued several million dollars' worth of relief bonds. Not until September 1, 1932, was it necessary to apply to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for assistance. From that time until September 1, 1933, 80 per cent of Milwaukee's expenditures was reimbursed by the federal government. Since September 1 reimbursement has been at the rate of 70 per cent.

Relief, however, even if it is adequate, can never be a substitute for a properly planned public-works program to provide the unemployed with jobs. Men and women must be supplied with work. That is what they demand. No system of government or social order will long survive which does not fill this need, and at wages which will provide for necessities and comforts.

The Two Wings of the Blue Eagle

II. The Wing upon the Right

By JOHN STRACHEY

IN the previous article some account was attempted of the inflationary aspects of the New Deal. It is now time to attempt the more difficult but much more important task of predicting the effect which the varieties of government regulation implied by the codes of the NRA and the processing taxes of the AAA will have upon the permanent structure of American capitalism. We transfer our attention, that is, from the "left" or inflationary wing of the Blue Eagle to the "right" or organization wing.

Many people undoubtedly suppose that this program represents a step toward socialism. Others regard it rather as the inauguration of a system of "organized capitalism," of the reform of capitalism in such a manner as to make it a stable, coherent system, free from the risk of such catastrophes as the crash of 1929. In order to form any opinion of the validity of these views it is necessary to arrive at some conception of what it was in the existing capitalist system which produced the crash. For until we have discovered this we cannot begin to say whether the provisions of the New Deal check or accentuate those features of capitalism which are at the root of the trouble.

Stated in its very broadest possible terms, it seems to me incontrovertible that there are three main characteristics or tendencies in capitalism which, taken together, produced the last crash—and for that matter all those crashes which preceded it.

The first of these fatal characteristics is the most obvious and at the same time the most superficial. This is the tendency, exhibited by all capitalist systems, to the over-expansion of credit. (This may be called the tendency to inflation, but to inflation in its most subtle, least recognizable form.) We can all now see, with that prescient hindsight which characterizes business men and economists, conservatives and radicals alike, that the years 1924-29 were marked, especially in America, by a grandiose and indiscriminate expansion of credit. Every kind of entrepreneur was able to borrow vast sums of capital, from every kind of banker, financier, or insurance house. With this credit he could and did create vast new productive resources.

The tremendous energies and skill of the American people were devoted to creating new factories for the production of almost everything under the sun, to bringing new land into cultivation, or to raising the productivity of old land to an unparalleled degree. And all this was done in the perfect faith that the products which these new factories and farms would soon be pouring out upon the world would all be sold at a profit.

These new means of production came into being without the least attempt to correlate them one to another, without the faintest hint of planned or coordinated purpose. So long, however, as an extremely high proportion of the workers of the United States were engaged, not in producing things for use, but in producing these new means of production, these new factories, mines, and farms, everything went well. But sooner or later the new shafts were sunk, the new lathes were installed in the new machine shops, the new land was drained, dinged, and tractor-plowed. And then the trouble began. Consumer commodities from these new instruments of production poured forth upon the world; and at the same moment there poured back upon the labor market the workers who were no longer needed because their job of factory building and farm improvement was completed. Just at the moment when the capacity for production was multiplying itself a hundred fold, hundreds and thousands, and finally millions, of workers lost their jobs and ceased therefore to be able to consume. Moreover, it was discovered that ludicrous disproportions had arisen in the creation of the means of production. For example, I see that it is estimated that three times as much boot-and-shoe-producing plant was created as the American people genuinely need for the production of their boots and shoes, even if they were all able to buy them.

What is the capitalist remedy for this situation? Obviously there is only one. It is to prevent such an orgy of indiscriminate credit expansion from ever happening again. It is to restore capitalism to what Lawrence Dennis has so neatly called a "pay-as-you-go basis." What you have got to do, even some of the capitalists can now see, in order to prevent another slump is to prevent another boom. You have got to see to it that the capitalists only build new instruments of production for a given tangible market which is already there; that they carry on production only with such capital or credit resources as they have got—paying as they go. Thus production and the market would not get so outrageously out of touch with each other.

Now what does the New Deal do about all this? As everybody knows, it does the exact opposite of what Mr. Dennis and every sane capitalist expert advises. Called in to prescribe for a patient who has succumbed to an orgy of credit expansion, the doctors of the New Deal prescribe—a new orgy of credit expansion! Capitalism is, without any encouragement, an inveterate inebriate. Even left to itself, it would in any case take to the bottle again. Just for the moment, however, it has an appalling headache and is strictly "on the wagon." But the doctors of the New Deal, far from trying to sustain its all too fragile temperance, rush forward with cases of Scotch.

I read in the pronouncements of the government the continual implication that it is definitely unpatriotic of business men to refuse to borrow or bankers to refuse to lend, even though the business men cannot think of anything useful or profitable to do with the money when they have borrowed it, or the bankers see any security for what they lend. The London Times, as long ago as September 13 last, summed up the government's policy not, I should have thought, unfairly in these words: "A good deal is being done by the Administration to browbeat the banks into lending more money to business men, and the Administration itself is ordering the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to lend money to members of the NRA."

Since then, of course, the inflationary methods of the government have become much more direct. It proved impossible to engineer a new boom by exhorting business men to borrow and bankers to lend. The government has had to resort to pumping out the money itself by the billion. It even gives it to the unemployed and the farmers, as well as to the capitalists. As we attempted to show in the previous article, the present policy is leading to an inflation which, in contrast to that of 1924-29, is neither subtle nor difficult to recognize. If the government is able by these means to create a new boom, then quite obviously it will be a boom ten times more unsound—that is, more out of relation either to real needs or to effective demand—even than the last boom. Hence it must lead to a crash proportionately worse than this crash.

The second fatal characteristic of capitalism is its tendency to form monopolies. No one doubts that in the normal course of events, and in all fields of production, big firms tend to replace small ones. Capital concentrates; the scale of production increases. Slowly but surely whole branches of production—such as the automotive industry, for example—become dominated by one or two giant trusts. Competition begins to atrophy within each industry. It becomes a violent but spasmodic struggle between the few remaining great corporations. In some cases, as perhaps in the steel industry in America today, it may for a time die out altogether within whole branches of production.

The effect upon the market of this process is also well known. The hundreds, and indeed thousands, of small capitalists and their better-paid retainers who used to conduct the industries of the country were all consumers, and very substantial consumers. They constituted the heart of the great middle-class market. Their defeat and bankruptcy by the great trusts destroys this vitally important section of the market. For even Mr. Ford, when he has killed off a thousand competing firms, can still only sleep in one bed and eat at one table.

This—the necessity for maintaining the great middle-class market, for maintaining, that is, a fairly wide distribution of wealth—was the great economic justification of the Sherman anti-trust laws, and all the other anti-combination provisions of American statute law. These provisions were not, of course, enacted out of an academic interest in maintaining the market. They were enacted by the smaller capitalists as vital and desperate measures of self-preservation. But in so far as they were effective—and they were to some extent effective—they may be regarded as a check or brake upon an inevitable process. They did, by restraining the operations of the great law of the concentration of capital, keep the whole mighty mechanism of American capitalism going.

For just in so far as monopolies are formed and hundreds of smaller capitalists destroyed by one or two great corporations, the market is narrowed; the distribution of wealth becomes more and more grotesquely unequal. Society tends more and more to split up into a vast propertyless mass unable to consume more than the bare necessities of life (if that) and a tiny minority of super-capitalists who must somehow, somewhere find a place to reinvest at a profit their gigantic surpluses.

This picture is of course familiar, and surely, by this time, in broad outline undisputed. What effect, then, has the NRA upon this second fatal tendency of capitalism? Does it wisely attempt to check or even to reverse the drive toward concentration and monopoly? Does it reinforce the anti-trust provisions of American law? Does it foster the interests of the small man against the big? Is it preserving that vital consuming area—the middle class? Well, of course, these questions answer themselves. Everybody knows that in the very first paragraph of the National Industrial Recovery Act the Sherman anti-trust laws are suspended. But the NRA goes much farther than that. Before its passage the American capitalists were, to some extent, forbidden to combine. Not only are they now permitted to combine, they are in many respects legally compelled to do so. The codes of the industries actually compel the capitalists concerned to abrogate many of the most important forms of their competition, to stop competing with one another by wage-cutting, price-cutting, or by lengthening the hours of work of their workers. These are deadly blows at the whole principle of competitive business. And they are blows at precisely those forms of competition, those forms of struggle, which are principally used by the small capitalist against his bigger rivals. Notoriously, the small man can continue to exist for a time by paying lower wages, working both himself and his employees longer hours, and by cut-rate prices.

Now—if the law is enforced, at any rate—he can do none of these things. His fate is sealed. And, in fact, the one universal impression which remains in my mind after questioning, during a recent lecture tour of this country, all sorts of people in all sorts of towns of the South, of the Middle West, and of the East as to the effect of the NRA, is the answer, echoed by friend and foe of that measure alike, “Well, it is very hard on the small man.”

[This is the second of a series of three articles by Mr. Strachey. The third will appear next week.]

Pity the Poor Sugar Trust

By FRANK CLAY CROSS

THE refusal of the Secretary of Agriculture early in October to approve the agreement on sugar quotas, which was promulgated after almost three months of bickering and arbitrating by the Washington conferences conducted by Tariff Commissioner John Lee Coulter, threw the beet-sugar trust into another cold sweat and sent market futures tumbling from six to eleven points. With a bumper crop of sugar beets ready for the refineries in the West, the biggest crop since 1930, the crash approached the magnitude of a minor cataclysm.

On September 25 the Coulter conferences had adjourned with the proclamation that they had reached a complete agreement which required only the signature of the Secretary of Agriculture to become effective October 1. Nobody seemed to doubt that his signature would be promptly forthcoming. As the date passed, however, without any word from Secretary Wallace, consternation began to arise, culminating in near panic when he definitely declared his intention not to sign it. The agreement, he said, was not his “baby.”

This action, tardy though it may be, is agreeable evidence that Washington does not intend to let the American sugar trust augment the unrest in Cuba. Incidentally, it may also indicate that President Roosevelt has found time to ponder on a vigorous petition, delivered to him in September, signed by more than 3,000 oppressed workers in the beet fields of Colorado, Nebraska, and Wyoming. At any rate it has put an end to the vociferous demands of the sugar-beet crowd, which had gained considerable ground in the Coulter hearings. At first the beet men had refused to consider any quota at all. But after their quota had been jockeyed up from 1,525,000 to 1,750,000 short tons raw value annually, and the foreign quota—that is, the quota for Cuba and Puerto Rico—had been cut down from one-half to one-quarter million tons, they finally decided the time had come to cooperate.

The statement of Secretary Wallace invalidating the quota agreement placed sugar, along with other farm products, under the supervision of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration. The object of the AAA, he said, would be to work out some plan to obtain price parity for the beet growers, as for any other group of farm producers. Parity for the growers, he intimated, would mean a price of around $5.50 or $6.50 a ton for beets. What a yell went up! Beset by the NRA and higher costs of production, the sugar-beet industry, its spokesmen groaned, would fold up and die if it had to accept that price.

The complaint of the sugar-beet men might win more sympathy if they could find some more effective way to control the thoroughly unhealthy conditions in the industry—conditions for which they are responsible. No industry in America today is displaying more brazen contempt for human welfare. The Great Western Sugar Company, which makes 45 per cent of all the beet sugar produced in the United States and completely dominates the industry, has thus far thumbed its nose at the NRA. On October 2 it paid a dividend of $1,342,500 to its stockholders, while it reduced the starvation wages of workers in the beet fields—by indirect action, of course—to a new minimum, cruel almost beyond belief.

In order to appreciate fully the merciless avarice of the Great Western Sugar Company, one must know a little of its history. It was organized in 1905 with a capitalization of $30,000,000, half in preferred stock and half in common. The common stock was never sold. Instead, it was given away as a bonus to the purchasers of the preferred issue, share for share. The total investment of the stockholders was $13,600,000, and they have never put up one dollar more. In the twenty-eight years since 1905 the cash dividends paid by the company have totaled more than $94,000,000—7 per cent on the preferred stock and for several years as high as 47 per cent on the par value of the common stock which the stockholders got as a present. Not bad at all!

On November 15 the Great Western Sugar Company announced the purchase of $9,000,000 worth of stock in subsidiary companies, a purchase made out of surplus. The new stock was to be distributed to holders of common stock in the Great Western, a stock dividend amounting to $5 per share. The company officials insisted, however, that it was not a dividend but merely a move in a broad reorganization program. It was also announced that the Cache La Poudre Company, a subsidiary of the Great Western, with a capital of $7,200,000, had turned over 1,800,000 shares, $20 par value, to be distributed in the ratio of one share Cache La Poudre to five shares Great Western. The distribution was to be made on or before December 15. A nice Christmas present! Moreover, the Great Western declared its regular quarterly dividend ($1.75 per share on preferred; 60 cents per share on common) to be paid January 2, 1934.

The spokesmen of the trust do not deny that they have operated a profitable business, but they vehemently disclaim all responsibility for the peonage and child labor which have helped to enrich them. They declare that they are under contract solely with the beet growers, and have nothing to do with the workers. This claim is an insolent evasion of fact. The form contract which every grower must accept if he hopes to sell his beets specifies that every detail of production from start to finish must be under the direct control and supervision of the company. He "agrees to plant, block, thin, cultivate, irrigate, harvest, and deliver" the crop from a certain definite acreage, "in compliance with the directions of the company." The price which he will get per ton has also been definitely specified up to the present year.

This agreement sets the wages of the beet workers as clearly as if they were directly employed by the company. The grower is virtually a helpless middleman. In fully 70 per cent of the cases he is not the owner of the land which he cultivates but a tenant; he contracts to furnish all equipment, to be responsible for all the farm work, and to pay the field help and other expenses, in return for which he gets three-fourths of the beet crop. This division keeps him on the verge of bankruptcy, for his margin of profit is almost nil. The landlord, however, who gets one-fourth of the crop come what may, quite naturally demands the cultivation of every available acre, regardless of the cutthroat prices paid by the sugar company. Even at $5.50 per ton, the minimum price suggested by Secretary Wallace, he would make approximately $18 per acre.

Under such pressure the tenant grower has no choice but to pay his workers the lowest wages for which they can be hired. At present they can be hired for almost any wage, for the West is full of destitute and hungry families; but the grower is powerless to reap the benefit of the circumstances, even though he might wish to do so. The sugar company has got there first, slashing prices on beets to fill its own coffers at the expense of human misery.

The responsibility of the Great Western Sugar Company for the abject poverty of the beet workers does not end with the contract which it forces on the growers. It directly recruits cheap labor for the beet fields. During the late winter and early spring the agents of the company invade the cities and rural communities of the Southwest to round up ignorant Mexican workers by the train load. Every worker receives a contract to block, thin, and top a certain acreage of beets for a certain price. The number of acres allotted to him depends largely on how many children he can put to work, besides himself and his wife. There is no guaranty, however, that he will actually get his pay when the work is done. Often he is cheated out of his entire earnings on some slim excuse. The law offers him no recourse.

These greedy practices in the sugar-beet industry have given rise to conditions which are almost incredible outside the "cesspool of poverty" in Puerto Rico, using the words of ex-President Hoover. Men—able workers—are reduced to incomes of from $80 to $120 a year. Even when whole families work from sun-up till dark they still must beg for charity or starve. In August of the present year the secretary of the Colorado Relief Committee issued a report stating that 48 per cent of all federal relief money sent to the State in April, May, and June had gone to the counties in the sugar-beet districts. Thirty per cent or more of the applications for admission to the Catholic orphanages, to which the Mexicans naturally turn in an emergency, are from the families of destitute beet workers. In the beet fields one frequently sees children as young as six years of age subjected to long hours of back-breaking labor. Indeed, children ten years of age or younger make up approximately one-fifth of all the child workers. Schools are closed during the harvest season, thus cooperating with the slave drivers. Victims of drudgery, these poor children suffer further from undernourishment, and are housed in unsanitary, overcrowded hovels where sickness and death are common visitors. Child mortality among the beet workers has been shown in several investigations to average 1.5 or more per family. In the winter the workers seek the larger towns and cities, throwing themselves upon the charities for support until the growers need them again. In such manner the charities are made to subsidize the sugar trust, so that fat dividends need not be cut.

There is reason to hope that President Roosevelt has penetrated the bluff and pretense of the beet-sugar industry and seen the rottenness beneath. To satisfy its avarice, it has reduced the workers to worse than slavery, pauperized the tenant growers, mulcted the charities. Yet more, it has extorted millions upon millions of dollars from the American public by the tariffs which it has lobbied through Congress. In 1932, according to a report to the United States Tariff Commission, the value of the sugar tariff to our domestic companies was more than $7,000,000 in excess of what they paid the beet growers, including the cost of Mexican labor.

The alternate wails and threats of the sugar lobby, which have continued almost without interruption since the proposal was first made to place the industry under some form of government control, were intensified on October 14, when Secretary Wallace announced his intention of adding a sugar section to the AAA, and of putting General William I. Westervelt in charge of it. General Westervelt, now director of processing and marketing in the AAA, was formerly research director for Sears, Roebuck and Company in Chicago. What did he know about sugar beets? The section should be supervised, the beet men argued, by some man in intimate contact with the industry, such as Charles M. Kearney, president of the National Beet Growers' Association. It seems likely that Secretary Wallace and the President both realize that the beet growers are necessarily puppets of the sugar trust. These men dare not oppose the will of the Great Western Sugar Company, which holds virtually an absolute monopoly of the market to which they must sell. To appoint Kearney, or any other representative of the growers, to an important post in the sugar section of the AAA would be little different from appointing W. D. Lippitt, president of the Great Western, to such a post.

Congressman Fred Cummings of the sugar-beet district came back to Denver from Washington on October 26 with fire in his eyes, promising to organize the West in a revolt against the AAA for its attitude toward the sugar-beet industry. Almost every day the papers carried reports of his rantings. Said Cummings: "The beet growers resent slaps in the face from the AAA. No one has given a good reason why the stabilization agreement should be refused." All the West wants, said he, is a fair deal. After the meetings that he addressed in Utah more than 1,000 telegrams were sent to President Roosevelt. In Scotts Bluff, Nebraska, he launched a petition of protest which was signed by 46,000 citizens in the North Platte Valley.

But there is something less than complete unanimity in the industry. Nearly 1,000 beet growers, in a meeting at Sterling, Colorado, on December 4, voted unanimously not to grow any sugar beets during the 1934 season unless a new contract was obtained from the Great Western. The producers agreed that the only contract which would be acceptable to them would be one assuring them that the price per ton paid them would be one-half of the average net proceeds realized from the sale of sugar, molasses, and pulp from an average ton of beets delivered at the factory. The worm is turning! Mr. Cummings should look into this.

The Great Western finally joined the NRA in November. I have not had an opportunity to discover what difference that has made in its treatment of its own workers. Of course the field workers are not affected. Nor will they be, probably, until the American public demands that something be done to alleviate the misery of the thirty-odd thousand destitute men and women and little children who slave in the beet fields.

New Year's Gifts for the NRA

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, December 23

NOW that the holidays are upon us, banishing dissension and firing one and all with the spirit of human brotherhood, I wish to add my voice to the general chorus of peace and good-will by remarking that of all the low, slippery, underhanded, chiseling schemes ever hatched to get around the Industrial Recovery Act, none can compare with that of the self-styled and high-sounding Machinery and Allied Products Institute—hereinafter known as the M. A. P. I., and perhaps by other and more definitive titles. The fact that its stratagems have already been recognized and thwarted by the ever-watchful Donald Richberg should not prevent either them or their authors from being known and remembered. The essence of the plan was to set up a sort of holding company of trade associations representing about fifty metal industries, this holding company to dictate the labor policies and administer the codes of the industries under it without itself being responsible for any of them. It sounds like something Sam Insull might have thought up while musing among the ruins of the Acropolis, but actually the idea appears to have germinated in the brain of another Chicagoan, to wit, John W. O'Leary, former president of the United States Chamber of Commerce, and—by strange coincidence—a manufacturer of metal products. The name of the M. A. P. I. recently burst upon a startled NRA when approximately forty trade associations, embracing manufacturers of such variegated metal products as locomotives, bakery equipment, concrete mixers, refrigerating machinery, power-transmission equipment, and jacks, submitted codes containing uniform—and uniformly bad—labor provisions. Each stated that it was a member of the Machinery and Allied Products Institute. The name of the "Institute" was new to Washington, but scrutiny of its constitution and by-laws soon revealed the nature of its purposes. They bound member trade associations to submit no codes not previously approved by the M. A. P. I., and provided that the labor sections should be identical. The President—and I mean the President of the United States—would not be permitted to change a code by executive order except by permission of M. A. P. I. members. The modesty of this provision may be measured by the fact that it was simply an attempt to amend the recovery act through a private resolution adopted by private citizens! I hear that Richberg relapsed into indecorous laughter when he came upon these documents. At any rate, he pointed out that since the M. A. P. I. itself was assuming no responsibility for any code, it was subject to the full penalties of the old anti-trust laws, and apparently was conniving at wholesale violations. O'Leary thereupon made a hasty appearance to ask that all mention of the M. A. P. I. be deleted from the codes. He and his associates are reported to believe that they can still work out some kind of a "super code authority," preserving important features of the original scheme. I suppose that eventually the obituaries will read: "They didn't know it was loaded."

.

A SIMILAR epitaph will come in handy in another quarter if the investment bankers and their satellites persist with their propaganda to have the Securities Act emasculated during the approaching session of Congress. That they could actually hope to succeed with such an enterprise at a time like this is but another proof that all the dumbness in this world is not concentrated in professional wrestlers and colored stable boys. The arguments they offer against the act are incredibly puerile. They contend, for example, that the registration statement required of them is "too complicated." The answer is that those who have handled other people's money in the past should be willing to render an accounting of their stewardship if they wish to do so in the future. (The real objection is that they are unwilling to disclose their bonuses and profits.) They complain that the civil-liability provision will prevent them from getting "good directors." The answer is that it will compel them to have directors who know something about the operations of the companies. It will prevent such men as Percy Rockefeller from sitting on sixty boards. Indeed, the section was placed in the measure for the express purpose of ending corporate structures of the character that Kreuger and Insull erected. But such arguments are hardly worth answering. To me, the revealing fact is that the question of amending the act is raised at all, in view of the disclosures made by Pecora and the Senate Banking Committee. If the bankers read the newspapers and have any conception of the present state of public opinion, they should know that any change in the law will be for the purpose of stiffening it. They should, in short, let all dogs lie, and pray fervently to God that they are asleep. But what can you expect of bankers? Incidentally, it is of the utmost pertinence to ask just when Pecora expects to call Frederick Ecker, of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, to the witness stand. His name has appeared in some of the most important phases of the Senate inquiry, and always in a connection to provoke legitimate curiosity. It is high time to place him under oath and inquire: "How come?"

* * * *

THE Weirton Steel Company defied the National Labor Board and proceeded to compel an election of company-union representatives on its premises. All day long, according to reporters who were present, it was a common sight to see an employee being marched to the "polls" with a burly company guard on each arm, while the State police of the God-forsaken commonwealth of West Virginia harried and harassed loyal workers of the steel workers' union. Roosevelt has responded by ratifying all previous actions and decisions of the Labor Board, and formally investing it with all the powers possessed by himself. But that is not enough—before many days have passed, the President will face the necessity of making certain important decisions concerning the board. The fact is that the board's record has not been satisfactory, and much as it pains me to say so, the fault appears to lie chiefly with the chairman. Senator Wagner's sincerity and devotion are above question, and in his proper sphere he functions magnificently. But he is indulgent and conciliatory, and he possesses the "judicial" mind. In consequence, the board not only is far behind in its work, but its authority has been questioned more than once. Among dishonest employers there is a growing impression that the board is "easy," and among honest employees there is a mounting conviction that it cannot be trusted. There has been entirely too much talk about "cracking down," and too little of the reality. General Johnson has been held almost entirely to blame for this, but the truth is that he has no earthly control over the board—whose members are appointed by the President—and precious little influence with its chairman. However, Congress will be meeting in a few days, and it is inconceivable that Senator Wagner will endeavor to remain as chairman while performing his duties in the Senate. He must resign one of these tasks. For labor's sake, as well as his own, it is to be hoped that he will elect to remain in the Senate, the sphere of his greatest usefulness. When that happens—as I believe it surely will—the President will be presented with an opportunity to name a chairman who will insist on action, and who will waste no time listening to gentlemen who only wish to oppress their help. He could do worse than choose Leo Wolman.

* * * *

IT is a familiar device of some men, once they have been taken in crime, to change their names. Others move far away, grow whiskers, and join the church. When the Federal Trade Commission showed that the National Electric Light Association had been guilty of poisoning the textbooks of school children, bribing college professors to speak against public ownership, and corrupting the morals of country newspaper editors, the association disappeared, and presently there appeared the Edison Electric Institute. They might have called it the George Washington and Abraham Lincoln Society, or the Association for the Advancement of God, Home and Mother, but Edison did have some connection with electricity. Moreover, he is dead, and unable to protest. So the Edison Electric Institute—the same being the current name for the power trust—recently came to Washington in the person of Floyd Carlisle, and proffered what it was pleased to call a code of fair competition for the power business. Mr. Carlisle was meek and mild. The power people, he said, had made mistakes in the past but were now prepared to "cooperate." Examination of the proposed code revealed that it would bring publicly owned power plants under an authority set up by the private companies. It was pointed out to Mr. Carlisle that this would violate the Constitution, upon which he and his associates had so often taken their stand when accused of charging extortionate rates, and that even if this difficulty could be circumvented, the power trust—the Edison Institute, that is—would seem to be in the position of hamstringing the public-works program, one of whose aims is to create employment by lending money for the construction of municipally owned utilities. Distressing scenes ensued at the NRA, and shortly afterward Carlisle and Richberg appeared together at the White House, each manifesting by his demeanor that he was ready and eager for a showdown. When they emerged Richberg was grinning slyly. Carlisle wore a martyr's air. On top of that, it seems, the people in the Tennessee River Valley are to be loaned money with which to buy electric washing machines and electric irons, and Dave Lilienthal is to see that they are not cheated on the price. The walls of the Edison Electric Institute are sturdy and strong, and the pigs inside would dearly like to believe that the big bad wolf of the White House will never succeed in blowing their house in. But they are frightened.

The Fight for Power

By D. C. CLAUS

THE power trust has gone through all the motions of tolling its own death knell and attending its own funeral. At least the public press has recorded that on February 15, 1933, a small group of presumably reformed and penitent pilots of the National Electric Light Association met in the offices of the late lamented and held a wake. At the burial service all the most dignified and absolutely indispensable formalities were observed, suitable resolutions were read and adopted, and the public press was duly informed because it seemed desirable that the dear public and Congress and the respective governments of the forty-eight States of the Union should be properly impressed with the fact that the N. E. L. A. had committed hara-kiri.

After those in attendance had paid glowing tribute to the deceased, the master of ceremonies, George B. Cortelyou, president of the late N. E. L. A., president also of the Consolidated Gas Company of New York, director also in twenty-odd other utility or affiliated companies, appeared in an entirely new role. With the nonchalance of an experienced magician he drew out of the dark and secret recesses of the N. E. L. A.'s burial vault a most innocent-looking, lily-white live rabbit bearing a label on which appeared in neat lettering the name Edison Electric Institute. So the Institute was born, and the magician Cortelyou was installed as its president. In an address delivered on that occasion Mr. Cortelyou said: "I can assure you that under the Edison Electric Institute the best work that has been done by the N. E. L. A. will be carried forward." There need be no doubt that self-preservation and self-perpetuation will be a part of "the best work."

The many just grievances of the public against the tactics of the power trust have been recited too often to need reviewing here. It is sufficient to recall that the utility companies have consistently and persistently used every means, fair and sometimes foul, to build up monopolies and impose upon the already heavily burdened public rate schedules that provide scandalously high margins of profit. They have succeeded in establishing and maintaining rates for power to municipalities and industrial users that were and are excessive in view of the cost of producing current.

It now appears that these very rate schedules, almost arbitrarily imposed, are responsible for the revolt that is now brewing among the large power users. Throughout the country, municipalities and industrial plants in surprising numbers have decided to cease paying annually huge sums of money into the coffers of the power trust. They have bought or are buying individual power plants and are manufacturing the needed current at a cost which is only a fraction of the amount formerly paid to the local utility company.

Even New York City has been invaded by this trust-busting epidemic. Since December, 1932, in the very heart of the New York Edison Company's most efficiently served and most profitable territory, at No. 1 Park Avenue, an independent power plant is serving a nineteen-story office building which had formerly been paying, at the rate of 2.65 cents per kilowatt hour, $45,000 annually to the power company. The Chicago Pneumatic Tool Company installed the machinery without a single dollar paid in advance. They expect to collect its cost out of the savings it will effect for the owners of the building. According to the contract, the plant in ten years will not only pay for itself but show for the owners a profit of $190,000, or about $19,000 a year, besides furnishing all the power they want.

The owners or managers of hundreds of other buildings, hotels, and industrial concerns have adopted the same procedure. The last few years have also shown a steady increase in the number of smaller municipalities that have cut loose from the domination of the power interests and erected their own power plant. Most of these installations have resulted in impressive reductions in the cost of current for the use of the municipality, and in some instances profits from sold current have been so large as entirely to eliminate the necessity of local taxes. The list of municipalities that have taken this step is long and is steadily growing. Among those that have been able through operation of their own power plants to eliminate all local taxes are South River, New Jersey, with a population of 6,600; Spooner, Wisconsin, with 2,300; Chanute, Kansas, with 9,900; Pawhuska, Oklahoma, with 6,500; Ponca City, Oklahoma, with 16,000.

A measure of the inroads such independent installation appears to be making is found in the fact that the country's largest firm dealing in Diesel generating plants has sold within the last seven years over 8,000 units with an aggregate output of 2,000,000 horse-power. Out of that total over 1,000 plants represented purchases by various municipalities. Industrial companies bought over 1,000,000 horse-power. Obviously these very formidable figures represent a still more formidable total revenue now lost to the power trust. Purchases of independent plants are expected to increase as soon as economic conditions improve and industrial activity is renewed. Meanwhile the power trust is fighting the invasion with its customary tactics.

In Pennsylvania, in the center of one of the power trust's most extensive transmission networks, a municipality less than two years ago bought its own power plant. An ally of the power company, in an effort to arouse dissatisfaction with the municipal service, has installed in his factory some fifty-horse-power motors which are connected with the local lines. These motors are turned on and off at frequent intervals and often at the most inopportune times, in order to cause flickering and a temporary drop in voltage throughout the system and thereby inconvenience other users or possibly interrupt service. But the citizens refuse to be dissatisfied. The town is saving money. It finished its year with an $11,000 surplus, reduction in taxes are in prospect, and the complete elimination of local taxes may ultimately follow.

An important manufacturer located in one of the industrial areas of the Atlantic seaboard made a study of power costs and found that through purchase of an independent plant he could cut his expenses very materially. He contracted for the purchase of a unit, to be paid for out of savings, and was preparing for its installation when he was asked to call on his banker. The bank held some of this manufacturer's notes and he was told politely that unless he canceled the contract for an independent plant those notes would be called. Since it meant bankruptcy he canceled the contract, and the power company, which had not appeared at all in these proceedings, retained a large customer.

Another manufacturer, also a large customer of a power company, had a somewhat different experience. Since he did not owe money to any bank he could not be squeezed so easily. He contracted to install an independent power plant and paid a deposit to apply on its purchase price. Shortly afterward, however, he "changed his mind," and the reasons given included certain concessions, including reimbursement for the deposit he had paid, with the power company's compliments. Other large power companies have found it expedient to use contract forms whose text is printed in small type, particularly those portions relating to the length of the term for which the contract runs and provisions for additional billings at higher rates if the required amount of current is not used. When a large user decides to install his own plant he may discover that his contract still has two, three, or four years to run and that short-rate billings will be so large that he might better cancel the order.

Always farsighted, the power trust has even found that certain State legislatures have perhaps unwittingly enacted laws that now make it practically impossible for small communities to purchase their own power plants, unless the manufacturer assumes all risk and does all the necessary financing. Most Eastern States have such laws. In Central Western and Far Western States in which no such legislation has as yet been enacted, the number of municipalities that have built their own power plants is growing much faster.

Obviously this invasion of the domain of the power trust will be extended substantially as soon as economic conditions permit freer and more extensive financing of such installations. It is reasonable to assume that as this menace to the security of the power trust increases, organized resistance will grow apace. Perhaps the new Edison Electric Institute will keep its mantle of purity for a little while. But who will believe that its sponsors, trained in the hard-hitting N. E. L. A., will sit by with their hands folded while a process of decentralization reduces their profits?

[This is the twelfth of a series of articles on electric power and the consumer.]

In the Driftway

ONE of the Drifter's favorite stories had to do with the mother who was trying to avoid paying carfare for her little boy, on the ground that he was under six, and when the conductor of the street-car protested that the child looked older, replied: "Can I help it if he worries!" Some such answer might be made now, in times of industrial unrest and economic uncertainty. None of us can help it if we are obliged to worry. But if our cheery advertisers are to be believed, we really do worry unnecessarily, and the cause of our anxiety is not far to seek or hard to remedy. The Drifter sees substantially the same picture everywhere he looks. There is a young man or a charming young lady leaning, head on hand, in an attitude of utter dejection. Underneath is some such caption as "Worried today?" and at the bottom is the name of the cure. Unfortunately the diagnosis seems to vary with the commodity which the advertiser seeks to dispose of to the public. Are you worried? You have a sore throat and should gargle with Glugg's Aspirin. Are you downhearted? Wash your underwear with Bluebell Soap and be the most sought-after girl in the office. Do you suffer from dejection? Constipation is the great American disease and Blott's pills will cure it. Tired? Sad? Lonely? Anxious? Smoke Dromedaries and steady your nerves. Open a savings account and get rid of the blues. Chew Dum's Gum and cure halitosis. Or take a spoonful of Bluebottle's Milk of Acidulation and never doubt that you will be the Life of the Party.

* * *

LIFE would undoubtedly be a simpler affair if in truth our ills could be treated so easily. If every young woman who found herself without dancing partners could wash with a new kind of soap and turn into a Mae West overnight; if the man who is not succeeding in business could just take a pill and be made vice-president of the company forthwith; if a certain brand of tobacco really kept one from losing one's temper; if white teeth really solved domestic ills; if a light over the kitchen sink made mother permanently happy—the revolution would be indefinitely postponed and the good old capitalist system could sit back in its chair and draw a long breath of relief. For if one nostrum did not cure us, there would be a number of others that we could easily try. Among them all we must surely find the way to health, wealth, and happiness. Indeed, one suspects that the American people are busy right now in making the rounds from soap to pills and from pills to washing powders to find the end of the rainbow. Otherwise, our advertisers, being hard-headed gentlemen who probably do not take their own prescriptions, would not spend good money on this form of pep talk. It must pay. Possibly what they are doing in the large is catering to the universal capacity for self-deception, for unwillingness to face the bitter truth. For Mary Ann knows well enough why she is a wallflower, only she won't admit it. And poor Brown is perfectly aware of his own shortcomings in the head which make his promotion impossible. But both of them read a highly colored story about some other Mary or Brown who was relieved of his God-given deficiencies of beauty or brains by a magic potion. Others have found a Fairy Godmother. Why should not we all? This is the secret of our advertisers' success. Why worry? Take a pill and everything will be all right in the morning.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

The Mission Menace

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

There has appeared in American life during the depression a force which, seen at first hand, must alarm any intelligent observer. I refer to the several major charitable agencies which now find their largest activities in the field of giving relief to unemployed single men. One such agency houses in New York City alone over a thousand men. The conditions and influences at work are tending to make of these men paupers and enemies of society; and I plead with all students of economics and social problems, even of ethics, to come and examine the methods and aims of these giant missions.

The pauperizing influences, which I realize must be common to all "institutions" whose purpose is to "relieve" people, whether jobless, insane, or afflicted with old age, are three in number. They are the features which have made such institutions a by-word for misery and futility. During the depression, hundreds of thousands of unemployed have come to know the inside of an "institution" and have learned a new name which sounds the depths of contempt—a "mission-stiff."

A "mission-stiff," recognizable as a type all over the world, is one who has a regular job with the agency or institution. He personifies the first pauperizing circumstance, which may be described as the relation between keeper and inmate. This relation, somewhat like that between guard and prisoner, tempts both parties to anger and friction. I take orders from the men in the furniture establishment like an employee, when I work my required time during the week. When I move my tray along the counter in the dining-hall, I am not a customer but an inmate, and have to take orders from the men in charge. If the spoons are dirty or the coffee cold or if there is not enough to eat, I have no right to speak about it; to behave properly I must sit where I'm told and be quiet; and I can comfort myself by reading the framed Scriptures on the walls.

There is thus ruled out that equilibrium of freedom, typical of capitalism—the fact that the usual person takes orders when he is an employee or shopkeeper, but gives orders when he is a customer. The inmate instead must take what it is the keeper's pleasure to give him, whether at work or at the dining table. What if there is no clock in the clubroom, or not enough benches, and you must get written and stamped permission to take a bath? Of course the food and service are all free (except for three days' work a week or as required) and the door is open if you wish to leave.

My first day's work was in the furniture store. About an hour altogether was spent in moving beds and tables; the rest of the time I sat around or admired the fine finish on the repaired furniture—a finish bespeaking unhurried application of low-cost labor. The second day I worked at scrubbing a floor, washing a stairway, and dusting the under side of another stairway—with confidential instructions to “go slow.” Here I discovered the second pauperizing influence: the function of human labor in an institution is not primarily to produce goods or services; it is not primarily even to produce profits. It is mainly conceived of as keeping idle hands busy. The consequences of this perversion are bound to be terrific. If the inmates of the lodge where I stay were trained and perfected in self-governing, we could reduce the three days weekly to one necessary day. But instead, it is a house divided against itself, and no good can come of it until the set-up is changed from a “profit” basis—without even making profits—to some democratic collective basis.

The third demoralizing feature of mission relief is methodical starvation. Suppose you had lived for two months on the following menu, or variations of it, eked out with stale buns bummed from a bakery: Monday, 7 a.m., corn mush, white bread, coffee; 6 p.m., salmon loaf, macaroni, white bread, coffee. Tuesday: 7 a.m., oatmeal, bread, coffee; 12 m. (if on work day) soup, bread, coffee; 6 p.m., plate of beans, bread, coffee. Could you dig a ditch, help tear down a house, or do a day's work washing windows? Why don't these men get out and rustle more food? The reason is, the next bowl of soup is served two hours from now; let us sit here and wait for it, or take a walk and come back. Starved men; sick from constipation and malnutrition; conditioned by their training not to gather together and sack a grocery store, or burgle a house, or raid the cart of a peddler displaying chocolates, nuts, and fruits.

The missions are threatening the country with hoards of paupers. Let us hope the government can do better with its camps than merely make “inmates” out of the boys “on the road.”

New York, December 20

BILL RAWLINSON

Justice for Greek Courts

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

I have been a reader of The Nation for nearly ten years and I am in general agreement with the social and economic philosophy of your journal. This association gives me the right to say that your editorial in the issue of November 15, 1933, commenting on the decision of the Greek court refusing the extradition of Samuel Insull was, to say the least, irresponsible. In the first sentence you implied that the Greek court's refusal to permit extradition was explained by its having been bribed by Insull. This is a perfectly unwarranted accusation. Ignorance is no excuse for such a statement and that is the only thing the writer of the editorial can claim. He does not know that the Greek courts have a tradition of independence, impartiality, and proud detachment from political or other considerations which places them above the courts of even the biggest countries in the world. It would take long to explain this phenomenon, but suffice it to say that the Greek judges are not elected or appointed by politicians, machines, or interested groups but are chosen after very severe examinations by a committee formed from the highest judicial officers and professors of the university, and their judicial conduct is watched continuously by their superiors.

New York, December 5

STEPHEN P. LADAS

A Word from Mr. Stern

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

I am highly gratified by your complimentary reference to my purchase of the New York Evening Post. You make a statement, however, on which I feel I must set you straight. You say: “Although we regret his championship of currency inflation, Mr. Stern is . . .”

I have never championed currency inflation. No paper I own has ever championed currency inflation. The New York Evening Post will not champion currency inflation, regarding all such proposals as blind, useless, and dangerous.

We have fought for a program of credit expansion, not currency inflation. We have pointed out that one of the broad bases of the depression is the shrinkage in the volume of bank credit from sixty billion dollars in 1929 to forty billion today. We are convinced that this shrinkage is the most important factor in the disastrous decline in prices. We have, therefore, urged restoration of part, at least, of the evaporated bank credit. Not by currency inflation, however, but by direct discounting of Treasury notes with the Federal Reserve Banks.

It is an essential part of our policy that this newly created credit shall be used to distribute purchasing power by (a) payment to depositors in closed banks, (b) unemployment relief, (c) public works. It is our basic thought not to inflate, but to restore credit and mass purchasing power to a normal level.

Philadelphia, December 18

J. DAVID STERN

Books and Kitchen Gadgets

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

The Highlander Folk School was started in the fall of 1932 at Monteagle, Tennessee, for the purpose of training rural and industrial workers for the new social order. The school is unique in that it combines a radical labor college with a broad cultural program of community education. Without compromising a frank revolutionary social philosophy, the school has become an organic part of the mountain community and is now a social and cultural center for a group of one hundred people. One object of the school is to demonstrate how much can be accomplished with very little money. The Monteagle school will operate on a budget of $50 a month including the living expenses of a staff of five.

A second unit of the school was started in December, 1933, at Allardt, Tennessee. A building will be erected with volunteer labor. In the meantime we shall have to live in a large empty farmhouse. Five members of the staff and two resident students are on the ground empty-handed. This is an urgent appeal for the following equipment or the cash equivalent: winter work clothes, rain coats and rubbers, twelve cots and mattress ticks, thirty-six blankets, army style preferred, twelve pillows and pillow cases, twenty-four sheets and towels, two sets of dishes, two sets of silverware, cooking utensils, kitchen gadgets, pressure cooker, dutch oven, paint and paint brushes, soap, canned goods and food of all kinds, books, especially in the field of social sciences, farming equipment.

A friend has offered us three dollars for every one dollar that we raise; thus every dollar contributed at this time is worth four dollars to us. Checks should be mailed to Kirby Page, Treasurer, Highlander Folk School, 52 Vanderbilt Avenue, New York. Goods may be mailed direct to the school at Allardt.

HIGHLANDER FOLK SCHOOL

Allardt, Tenn., December 15

Books, Films, Drama

Are Reviewers Critics?

IT is my contention that the American reviewer of books is by no means a critic. To qualify as a critic, a reviewer should be somewhat judicial, show a certain knowledge of literature and history and some acquaintance with the meaning of the words he reads and uses. Hardly any American reviewers measure up to this standard.

The characteristic vices of American reviewing in general have surely never been better exemplified than in the reviews of "Anthony Adverse." I cannot, to be sure, see how anyone could read "Anthony Adverse" and remain unimpressed: it has an amazing number and variety of living characters, and the first two-thirds of it, at least, is extraordinarily readable. It is full of color and exciting episodes, and is in the main an admirable story, in spite of the fact that a tremendous amount of patient research has gone into building up the background. But I also cannot see how any reviewer could honestly think it a great book. Yet out of all the reviews I read I could find only one, The Nation's, which did not declare it epoch-making, though a few unofficial observers, like F. P. A. and Elmer Davis, did venture to stand against the united front of reviewers.

Let us begin with the leading review in the New York Sunday Times. "'Anthony Adverse' is America's most original contribution to the great tradition of the picaresque novel." The Oxford Dictionary says: "A picaresque novel is one which has a rogue for hero." Now if there is anything certain about Anthony, it is that he is not a rogue. He is almost painfully well-meaning in all his endeavors, and even though his slave-trading career was a little shady, it is represented to us as a very uncharacteristic episode in his life. He rises in the world by his own honest effort, and but for a sudden spurt of invention on the part of the author, would die a saint. He does not even misuse his great natural charm—that is, unless you expect chastity of your eighteenth-century heroes. "This necessary outline," the review goes on, "may be properly ignored except in so far as it establishes the stamina as well as the range of a novel which the word picaresque might misrepresent." I wonder if "Anthony Adverse" could fairly be said to outdo in stamina and range "Gil Blas," though the Spanish hero traveled only in Spain and, in my edition, lived through no more than 600 pages of adventures. In fact, are not stamina and range two of the characteristics of the great picaresque novels? "We should not be surprised, and we could not be anything but pleased, if 'Anthony Adverse' became the best-loved book of our time." And with this genteel pat on the head, the unfortunate Mr. Allen, who surely deserves better, is abandoned to a place among the Thornton Bourgeoisie.

The Sunday literary supplement of the New York Herald Tribune devoted most of its front page to an outline of the story. Among other general remarks which introduced this outline, the reviewer said: "A number of years ago a little jingle often was printed on bookplates and bookmarks which, if I recall it correctly, declared:

There is no frigate like a book to bear us miles away,
Nor any courser like a page of prancing poetry."

As the reader knows, the reviewer does not "recall it correctly," and it is not as a writer of little jingles that Emily Dickinson is remembered. The review concluded with a mention of Mr. Allen's "clear, lovely, and explicit prose." It may be as well at this moment to pluck for your admiration one of Mr. Allen's flowers. I do not pretend that the paragraph I cite is a fair example of Mr. Allen's style; but it is not the only instance of his overwriting, and it seems to me that any book which contains such passages should not go unchallenged. Consider his description of Faith Paleologus, who seduced Anthony: "Yet there was something too strange about her to name as a guilty one the quality that was uniquely hers. She seemed designed by the inscrutable for a use that was incomplete: for a purpose doomed to defeat by finding an end in itself. It was her hips." Surely this is one of the most glorious anti-climaxes in the history of letters. "They were not those of a woman, but of something else. A lemure's, perhaps," A woman with the hips of a spirit of the dead would indeed be too strange. "Exquisitely designed for the relief of lovers, they were inadequate for anything more. In their image was implicit an obstruction to life." It seems to me that any hips which could give relief to lovers had already done more than most hips. But what Mr. Allen is being so "clear, lovely, and explicit" about, the modest cannot hope to surmise.

The New Republic put the judgment of most reviewers clearly when it declared: "Its monumental bulk alone raises it above the common mass of novels into a region appreciably nearer the stars." Here I take refuge in the words of Elmer Davis: "I am unable to agree with most of our readers that a large book is necessarily a great book." Even if you concede that "Anthony Adverse" is to literature what the Empire State Building is to architecture, it is still possible to discover a gap between both and the stars. But at least the New Republic goes so far as to reassure us: "It will not be known as the Great American Novel."

The Book-of-the-Month Club Bulletin calls "Anthony Adverse" "one of the richest, liveliest, and most diversified kinds of story-telling, told by a poet and a scholar." Perhaps the bulletin should be considered as advertising and not as criticism, but in spite of Mr. Allen's wide reading, his scholarship is far from even. Thus in history, it seems to me that Mr. Allen is occasionally shaky. Take the following instance: Anthony is observing a military review conducted by Napoleon in 1802 in the Champs de Mars, consistently called "Champ," incidentally. This is his impression of the scene: "All the landscape from the Barrière de l'Etoile to the Pont d'Iena and from that bridge to the Tuileries began to move upon the Champs de Mars." But the battle to commemorate which the Pont d'Iena was named, if not constructed, was not fought until 1806. And in 1802, or at any other time, only a hero of romance could see the Etoile from the Champs de Mars.

Yet the reviewer for the Saturday Review of Literature declared: "Hervey Allen's knowledge of the past of which he writes seems complete and, whether complete or not, it is thoroughly satisfying to a reader who refuses to admit a peculiar ignorance of history." Certain as he was of his history, this reviewer was modest about his literature, for by far the greater part of his energies was devoted to disclaiming special knowledge. He says roundly: "If my knowledge of American fiction were more thorough than it is, I would say bluntly that 'Anthony Adverse' is the best historical novel that this country has produced. Pleading possible ignorance, I am almost certain that it is the best, and quite sure that it is the most ambitious." Well, if to speak "bluntly" of "Anthony Adverse" is to describe it in these terms, what would the reviewer have found to say "bluntly" of "The Scarlet Letter" or "Death Comes for the Archbishop" or "A Son of the Middle Border" or even "God's Angry Man," if the latest must be thought to be the greatest? Or does his "possible ignorance" include them?

To the reader who enjoyed "Anthony Adverse," these comments will seem unimportant and irrelevant. But the case of the reviewer is, I maintain, different. The main business of the critic is to be a critic. Why is it, then, that so many American reviewers are in the main content to praise or to decry, but reluctant to examine? Why do literary editors choose reviewers, as they would a jury, for lack of special knowledge?

At all events—and this is my point—whatever else "Anthony Adverse" has accomplished, it has shown up the reviewers.

K. S. THOMPSON

Memoirs of a Diplomat

What Me Befell. By J. J. Jusserand. Houghton Mifflin Company. $4.50.

A CONVENTIONAL diplomat in many ways, M. Jusserand was an exceptional one in his extraordinary capacity for friendships, his rare understanding and appreciation of the countries to which he was sent, and his genuine literary achievements. He was unusual also for his wit, his sparkling conversation, his knowledge of many things, and his ability to find time for scholarship, innumerable addresses, and the production of seventeen books, one in Latin, five in French, and eleven in English, of which his "Literary History of the English People," in three volumes, and his "Piers Plowman" are probably the most important. So great was his popularity that he was Minister only to Denmark and Ambassador only to the United States. He arrived in Washington in 1903. When he was recalled in 1924 for a reason that is not wholly clear, it was a great personal blow to him and a distinct loss to both the United States and France. It is no exaggeration to say that no other foreign ambassador was ever so close to the head of the country to which he was accredited as was Jusserand to Theodore Roosevelt, of whose "tennis Cabinet" he was a member, with whom he talked books, history, politics at all hours of the day and night, and whom he accompanied on those mad-cap hikes around Washington which were at once the joy and the horror of official Washington. The closeness of this relationship led to great expectations of the posthumous and, sadly enough, unfinished work before us.

It is not possible to say that M. Jusserand's book throws any new light on the first President Roosevelt, whose remarkable versatility is herein again set forth, together with those endearing traits which made him so beloved by all his intimates. The record here does not show that M. Jusserand was wholly up to date at the time he wrote this volume. At least his treatment of the taking of the Panama Canal Zone, and other episodes, is incomplete, and it is obvious that, like so many of those close to the Rough Rider President, he was unable to be critical or detached in his picture of one of the most fascinating of men. He does, however, bring out some facts more clearly, as, for example, Roosevelt's steadily growing distrust of the Kaiser, and the part which Jusserand himself played in inducing the President to bring about the Algeciras conference on Morocco—another case in which we violated George Washington's farewell advice and became involved in a purely European situation in which we should never have taken part, even though we got out of it well. During the days leading up to that conference Jusserand was really at times acting as Secretary of State for Roosevelt. On April 25, 1906, President Roosevelt wrote to Jusserand that it was due more to him than to any other man "that the year which has closed has not seen a war between Germany and France." As for the Algeciras conference, Roosevelt went on, Jusserand was the man "most instrumental in having this kind of conference arranged for. I came into the matter most unwillingly and I could not have come into it at all if I had not possessed entire confidence alike in your unfailing soundness of judgment and in your high integrity . . ."

Such a relationship between a President and an ambassador has its tremendous dangers as well as its opportunities. M. Jusserand proves that being so close to an Administration makes it impossible to obtain, or at least to record, a general view of the scene before him. We have no picture of the struggle of the country as a whole to free itself from the shackles of special privilege and big business—which have now been loosened far more, though perhaps only temporarily, by the second Roosevelt than by the ever-compromising first. Perhaps the truth is that life flowed very easily for Jusserand. He was devotedly happy in his married life; he had private means; he led the dual life of littérateur and diplomat; he had devoted friends and superb health and strength—so it is not to be wondered at that he was without James Bryce's deep interest in the travail of America and other democracies, that no single problem of general uplift or social justice figures in these pages. For him the old-fashioned political game was entirely satisfying; his supreme happiness lay in his close friendships with the King of Denmark and the President of the United States. He was useful in the making of the Russo-Japanese peace in 1905, as well as in the Morocco matter, but he held the old belief that the world could be run by secret diplomacy, and bluffing and battleships and war, and grabbing the territory of others. Indeed, no part of his earlier life seemed to please Jusserand more than the role he played in getting Morocco for France by the same old stealing, steady encroachments, and then using the excuse of a native uprising to finish the job of depriving the "backward peoples" of their sovereignty.

Jusserand even approved of the Germans doing a little of this—but not too much. That is the only note of friendliness to the Germans. All through this book runs the intense war-time hatred apparently unchanged as late as July 14, 1932, when the last words were penned. There is no burying of the hatchet. Recognition of the post-war revelations as to the origins of the war it was impossible to expect, first, because that would have involved severe criticism of the diplomacy of his own country, and, secondly, because death ended his writing when he had only reached the close of Theodore Roosevelt's rule. This is a misfortune, for he might have thrown some light on the mystery of the change in President Wilson between his "peace without victory" speech of January 23, 1917, and the declaration of war, in addition to painting a picture of Wilson and Washington in war time.

All through the volume run complete content with his country's own record and conduct and similarly complete satisfaction with the fine speeches and nice achievements of M. J. J. Jusserand. It is quite naive and harmless vanity, though the listing of his oratorical successes palls at times. On the other hand, the book contains many amusing anecdotes and stories, and is, of course, charming. His characterizations of public men—except the Kaiser—suffer from his wholesale admiration of those of whom he writes; he remained the diplomat to the end. The last page of the manuscript is reproduced pictorially. It is in the same small, delicate handwriting in which many book reviews came for publication to the office of The Nation, especially during the editorship of Wendell P. Garrison.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Grand Tour

The Journey. By Rose Caylor. Covici-Friede. $2.50.

MISS CAYLOR'S novel has all the proper qualifications for one of those very rare, completely absorbing, and slightly hysterical experiences of the character, say, of a light leap off the tower of the Empire State Building. It produces the same exhilaration, presumably, and the same faint suspicion that there is more to the deed than the gesture. It is spectacular and foolish; it is witty, very funny, and rather sad. It is not to be recommended to the stricter adherents of the Genteel Tradition. The hero is no gentleman although he is the most exasperating and amusing young man to be met in recent fiction, and the heroine, alas, is a most common and typical, ten-cent-store-variety American beauty. Yet for all readers who are not embarrassed to acknowledge Mark Twain as an American, this book should be a major event.

The "journey" is Caryl's fateful passage from tawdry, dream-filled adolescence to equally tawdry, disillusioned maturity, and it takes no longer than a few summer months, owing a little to the absurd Jimmy but mostly to the dear girls. Besides her ticket to New Orleans—where Jimmy fled right after their marriage ceremony in Chicago—and her bags, Caryl travels equipped only with her clichés—"a woman's place is with her husband"—and the education gained from the fiction magazines, rotogravure sections, advertisements, and movies. It is, of course, an equipment which suffices for many American marriages, but marriage with Jimmy is no ordinary affair. Jimmy is a newspaperman, a cynic who wears an overcoat in summer, and once, as a member of the Rainbow Division, spent several hours at the bottom of a German latrine. Moreover, he has an annoying and well-developed faculty for being entirely self-sufficient at exactly the wrong times. And he has odd friends, like Rixo, who also wears an overcoat in summer and was in the same latrine, and Mr. Gardener, who apparently is a mute, and Victor, the pugnacious undertaker's assistant. Naturally the girls only make matters worse.

Out of the wasteland of crusading, persecuting wives Miss Caylor revives some; from behind their plates of chicken à la king, their ormolu and taffeta drapes, she draws others. One group flaps about Caryl like so many righteous harpies mouthing their imagined wrongs; the others, wiser birds of prey, too practical to waste time on suspicion and bickering, enjoy their drinks and systematically gather diamonds as safeguards against the next inevitable divorce. Neither sisterhood escapes Miss Caylor's robust scorn; each is shown up in all its parasitical futility and grotesqueness, but in the latter she admits a shade more friendliness. It is one of the ormolu ladies, anxious to help a visiting author find material in New Orleans, who remembers the leper colony and asks, "Why don't you try, hon', to work the lepers in?"

So brief a résumé of "The Journey" is really only an offering of nickels where millions wait to be enjoyed. It can give no clue to the leisured style so rich in tangents of associations and reflections, or to the magnificent details of character and situation. The callow horror of Caryl's married life can only be intimated, and the chief merit of the book not even suggested. Within the broad farce of "The Journey" is some of the best social satire since "Babbitt."

FLORENCE CODMAN

Mr. Belloc's Theory of History

Charles the First, King of England. By Hilaire Belloc. J. B. Lippincott Company. $4.

"IT is not my case alone," said Charles Stuart, on trial for his life before a hostile Parliament. "It is the freedom and liberty of the people of England, and do you pretend what you will, I stand more for their liberties, for if power without law may make laws . . . I do not know what subject he is in England that can be sure of his life or anything that he calls his own." Here, in this speech, lies the clue to Hilaire Belloc's interest in the "martyred king," for here it is made plain that Charles shared his biographer's views on government. The subjects of Mr. Belloc's biographies are chosen not at random, not out of sentiment, not out of interest in a period. Danton, Marie Antoinette, Richelieu, Wolsey—they are all selected to illustrate and to develop a theory of history which he began to formulate thirty years ago. This most recent biography, in which the subject himself expresses the theory, might well be the climax of Mr. Belloc's writing.

The theory is based upon an admiration for the democratic ideal. Mr. Belloc believes that the fulfilment of that ideal, "the greatest good of the greatest number," can best be achieved through an absolute monarchy. He conceives this to be only superficially a paradox. Under the feudal system, which was built and bulwarked by the church, ownership—which spells power—was not the exclusive privilege of the few. On the contrary, almost every man held his piece of land, down to the meanest villein, who held it only for life. An unbroken chain of responsibility extended from serf to lord to greater lord and eventually to king. In this chain lay the king's power. Yet—and fortunately for the democratic ideal—the king, ever jealous of the potential power of the great nobles, allied himself with the poor, and so in the class struggle a neat balance of power was established. Unfortunately, this system, early debilitated by war and plague and famine, had its chief prop knocked from under it when the Reformation attacked the church. The nobles and middle classes enriched themselves; the king grew poorer and weaker by the year. At last the breakdown was complete: an oligarchy of the rich ruled; the kingship was merely a vestigial trace of another age; capitalism had arrived, and with it the economic enslavement of the proletariat.

The ill-starred reign of Charles I was, in Mr. Belloc's opinion, one of the crises in the tremendous struggle between oligarchy and monarchy. With the impact of these titanic forces, the small figure of the king was crushed. With his death true monarchy died, yet his failure was not so much a personal defeat as it was the defeat of the medieval idea. This is the thesis of "Charles the First," and it is a thesis which compels the work to be less a biography than a study of the warring economic and spiritual forces which existed in England in the seventeenth century.

Mr. Belloc finds the economic forces to have been more important than anyone has ever supposed. Because of economic conditions the king was marked for defeat from the start. The inflation of the currency, which had been brought about by the influx of American gold into Europe, enriched the gentry and impoverished the king, whose principal revenue came in fixed sums. No amount of playing with the pound could better the situation; prices obstinately rose; and the nearly bankrupt Crown was at the mercy of the newly rich gentry which made up the Parliament. The gentry was as avaricious as it was rich; it resisted taxation until resistance became rebellion. So it appears that the Eliots and Hampdens and Pym and Cromwells were not single-minded religious fanatics, disinterested warriors for justice; they were shrewd business men with an eye to the future. This throws the whole story of the Great Rebellion into a new and arresting light. Naturally, considering Mr. Belloc's prejudices, it is a light that is kind to the hapless king.

Occasionally it is too kind. Mr. Belloc errs in attempting to make his picture too nearly perfect, his theory too watertight. Charles was a hero and a man of honor, Mr. Belloc would have us believe. In the main, that is true. But Mr. Belloc would make him completely a man of honor, and thereby he falsifies his statement. He says that Charles's great weakness as a statesman was that he could not tell a lie. As a matter of fact, Charles told hundreds of barefaced lies: he lied to Spain, to France, to the Catholics, to the Protestants, to the Parliament, to the Scotch Covenanters. The point was that he could not tell a good lie. Again, Mr. Belloc would like to prove that by the time of Charles monarchy had fallen into disrepute through a series of weak rulers. This is partially true: Mary and Edward and James were weak. But Mr. Belloc dislikes partial truths and, to make a perfect generalization, insists, without evidence, that Elizabeth was weak, referring to her complacently throughout the book as "the unfortunate Elizabeth." There are other examples: he turns the feckless Duke of Buckingham, the favorite of Charles, into the Father of the English navy.

Yet in spite of these flaws, which seem to indicate an admirable passion for perfection, his theory holds surprisingly well. He has made Charles and his opponents convincing characters. Indeed, he has done something more important; he has made monarchy and oligarchy a pair of believable and powerful protagonists. In a vigorous prose of slightly archaic flavor, he has steered this tightly reasoned biography safely past sentimentality, pedantry, and the modern brand of psychological guesswork.

MARY MCCARTHY

Study of a Child

The Beginning of a Mortal. By Max Miller. Illustrated by John Sloan. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

THIS delightful book is devoted to unrelated episodes in the life of a small boy reared in a sawmill town on the Pacific Coast and on a ranch in Montana. The author has a singularly retentive memory, not only for the detailed incidents of his boyhood, but also for the emotional tone that accompanied them, and the mental bewilderment that resulted when he tried to fit the inscrutable behavior of adults into a small boy's cosmos. Each of the twenty chapters deals with a separate incident in the life of his family and his neighbors, briefly and lucidly told. And almost every one of them ends with a situation in which the boy is befuddled by what some older person has said or done, and is screwing up his courage to ask a question whose answer he burns to know, but seldom gets. The simplicity and restraint with which each incident is told suggests nothing so much as a style nurtured on the English Bible, in which book the child's grave and conscientious parents evidently believed devoutly. They appear also to have believed that a small boy should keep his random ideas to himself. And his scanty supply of neighbors seemed ironically intent upon teasing him with remarks that roused more questions than they answered. I can recall no more accurate picture of the wistful charm of a sturdy child's mind trying to make sense out of what it sees and hears, and having a hard but rather exciting time doing it.

The illustrations are conceived and executed in the spirit of the text. One feels that the artist had a small boy at his elbow, reminding him in agitated whispers not to forget to adorn his sketch with the alarm clock on Lawrence's shelf and the glasses on Annie's nose. But with all due credit to the author and the illustrator one cannot but feel that if the author's mother was the photographer who took the snapshot of her son at the age of seven, she is a more consummate artist than either of them. All the character study of the 253 pages is expressed in that shrewd, reticent, competent little fellow, with his hands in his pockets, who adorns the frontispiece. One would have to go to the Dutch painters to find such an inspired portrait of a child. If the book is about the "beginning of a mortal," the snapshot by this unknown artist shows at a glance that at the age of seven he was well begun. One wonders if such a complete small boy could be produced anywhere but on the American frontier.

E. R. WEMBRIDGE

Japanese Proletarian Writers

The Cannery Boat by Takiji Kobayashi and Other Japanese Short Stories. International Publishers. $1.50.

SEVERAL years ago, in Japan, proletarian writers were popular. They were featured in the capitalist press as well as in the proletarian journals because they drew circulation. But when the Manchurian adventure was being prepared, the Japanese government launched its first offensive against them. The revolutionary press was driven underground; the columns of bourgeois periodicals were closed to its writers; and Kobayashi, one of Japan's few major writers in modern times, was killed. However, in the few years permitted for its development, proletarian literature in Japan showed remarkable vigor and variety. In presenting examples of this literature "The Cannery Boat" can be considered as one of the important publications of the year.

The question of what is proletarian literature will in the long run be answered by examples rather than by definitions. Here are excellent examples of proletarian writing. What are its characteristics? They vary with each of the seven writers represented. Kobayashi, who is the most stirring, makes use of bold and picturesque metaphor; Kuroshima, in his remarkable story The Factory in the Sea, shows a careful plot structure and makes use of romantic motivations; Teppei Kataoka employs a denouement reminiscent of Maupassant. Some of the stories are direct, factual pieces of reporting that have the peculiar eloquence of good reporting; others are built on sentiment. In other words, there are as many manners as there are writers, and the fear some American writers have expressed that proletarian literature must suffer from a dull sameness is groundless if we are to judge from these examples.

There is, however, a uniformity of content. All the stories deal with the class struggle. The Cannery Boat, unfortunately abridged here to comply with censorship regulations, has for its characters the crews which catch and pack the crab meat that comes, tinned, to American tables. It describes their exploitation, which is excused by the shipowners in the name of patriotism. These cannery boats, working off the Siberian coasts, are a demonstration of Japanese power to Soviet Russia, and the conditions borne by the workers are a token of Japanese virility and endurance. Other stories deal with a strike in a Soy factory, conditions of the silk weavers, telegraph linesmen mending wires blown down by a storm, and dispossessed farmers.

If to the American writer the subject matter seems restricted, he should read this volume to see what variety it affords. After all, the subject matter of most Occidental literature in the last several centuries has been uniform—consisting mainly of the incidents and conflicts in the sexual relationship between men and women. Original writers have never failed to make new discoveries in it; and powerful writers have never failed to give it freshness by their intensity. Certainly the class struggle, with its special relationships between the classes and with its individuals within and between the classes, offers at least as much scope.

Everyone interested in the course of the short story should by all means read this book. But even more, everybody interested in contemporary political developments should read it. In showing the revolutionary movement in its Japanese setting it makes amazingly clear the truly international nature of that movement. The setting of these stories is, for us, picturesque, but it becomes clear that revolutionary workers in Japan think, organize, demonstrate, and act like revolutionary workers in America, like the triumphant revolutionary workers in Russia, like the revolutionary workers of China, described so vividly in Agnes Smedley's recent book, "Chinese Destinies." The power and courage and persistence of the revolutionary movement, checked but not defeated by fascist reactions, is made stirringly real in this collection.

ISIDOR SCHNEIDER

Shorter Notices

Chronicle of an Infamous Woman. By David Liebovitz. The Macaulay Company. $2.

"Infamous" is the qualification her Adirondack neighbors bestow on Martina when it becomes known that she is living with other men while her husband lies dying. The myth of her infamy continues to grow during her attempts to make a respectable second marriage and to be just about her last love affair. Mr. Liebovitz would distinguish truth from myth by acting at times as a research writer who has access to Martina's diary and who therefore has the authority to defend her, and at times as a novelist who must create the characters and sequence of events mentioned in the diary. This mixture of attitudes and methods is not successful, in part because the difficulties involved in creating and interweaving the myth and the reality are not met with any great skill, and in part because neither the myth nor the object of the myth seems very important. Martina is a plausible character (her name if not legion is familiar enough), but to attempt in such a complex manner as Mr. Liebovitz's to say that she was honest with herself and bore no malice to the society that enjoyed calling her infamous is not to endow her with special disinction.

The Finished Scoundrel. By Royal Ornan Shreve. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $3.

From the beginning of the Revolutionary War until the end of the War of 1812 General James Wilkinson took an active part in the military and political affairs of the United States. He rose to be commander-in-chief of the forces of the United States and held that position with incompetence and unscrupulousness for many years. His career was extraordinary because of the facility with which he always seemed to get out of the political and financial scrapes in which he involved himself in the struggle to support his extravagance and his ego. Those scrapes extended all the way from treason, in connection with the Burr conspiracy to separate the Southwest from the United States, to petty peculation of rations while in command at New Orleans. General Wilkinson survived the Burr treason trial, two courts martial, and ignominious defeat before Canada in the War of 1812. He had the support of President Jefferson and the toleration of President Madison. Hamilton wrote to Washington that Wilkinson was "a man of more than ordinary talent, courage, and enterprise," a judgment with which Washington agreed, though neither of them trusted the General. As he comes out in the pages of Mr. Shreve's cluttered and scattered account, General Wilkinson is a paltry figure, who seems to have attained the position he did as a result of a great deal of energy, a talent for intrigue, and the lack of better men to lead the inefficient armies of the United States at the time. Mr. Shreve's book is unfortunately written in the breathless vernacular of a radio announcer. The biography loses the interest which the material possesses through the author's inability to fuse it into a coherent and interesting narrative.

Our Times: The United States, 1900-1925. Volume V: Over Here, 1914-1918. By Mark Sullivan. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.75.

In this story of the back of the front, of those who kept the home fires burning, Mr. Sullivan continues his method—popularized by a score of imitators—of presenting history largely through newspaper headlines, text, and cartoons; by the songs and slang and slogans of the period; by the books that were written and the plays that were produced. America's war effort in France is not described in this volume. It is the story of how the United States—aloof and uncomprehending in 1914—was relentlessly pushed and pulled into the European whirlpool, and of the vivid and spectacular procession of events which ensued. Perhaps the narrative is less understanding, less alertly informed than its immediate predecessor—the tale of Roosevelt's retirement and Taft's regime—but the period itself was so highly volatile and hysterical that it is hard even yet to precipitate it, and Mr. Sullivan's own relation to the era was less sure. One feels, though, that his appraisal of the chief figure of the epoch, President Wilson—a man who rose and fell through devotion to words and ideals—will be accepted as just except among those still bitterly partisan.

Comedy American Style. By Jessie Fauset. Frederick A. Stokes Company. $2.

So closely do Miss Fauset's characters adhere to the color line—in that we never see them except when they are reacting to the question of "passing" or staying colored—that one must defer to her superior knowledge of their specialized psychology, and take them on faith. "Comedy American Style" is a well-written problem novel, dealing with that isolated group of people who exist on the border-line of race, and pointing the moral that it is better for the Negro of mixed blood to stay with his kind. The title is well chosen for a country where the presence of blond Negroes gives an especially ironic emphasis to the comedy of racial purity.

Psychoanalysis and Its Derivatives. By H. Crichton-Miller. Henry Holt and Company. $1.25.

Some years ago William McDougall suggested the group name of the "school of integral psychology" for a number of psychologists in the United States and Europe who, he believed, were not caught too securely in the web of some favorite system of psychology and psychotherapy but were free to pick from each what was scientifically most sound. Among others he included H. Crichton-Miller. Dr. Miller's book now being reviewed is a highly critical and unusually impartial study of the four systems of psychology developed by Freud, Jung, Adler, and Prinzhorn—the author betrays some leaning toward Prinzhorn, who in the study represents the eclectic school. The basic concepts of each system are presented, plus two chapters devoted to their contrasts. The material is carefully analyzed for the reader, similarities and differences are clearly defined, and many obscure points are clarified. In addition, there is a carefully chosen bibliography. The interested layman who has perhaps been overwhelmed during the past few years with a too great abundance of literature on the subject and the professional psychologist who is in need of evaluating the concepts he follows will both find the book immensely valuable. For the less well-informed it offers a concise and lucid presentation of the intricacies of psychoanalysis and an eclectic psychology.

Modern Man in Search of a Soul. By C. G. Jung. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

By far the most interesting item in this collection of essays and speeches is The Spiritual Problem of the Modern Man, in which Jung has embodied some of his most important speculations. The essential characteristic of the modern man is, he says, just the fact that his intense individualism and his loss of faith in any group standards have thrown him back upon psychology as a last resort. Truly "modern men" are rare, and when the term is used it is not to be taken by any means to signify "average men," for the true "modern man" is one who has not merely broken with the past but is seeking to justify that break. Where such are found they are, however, set apart by the fact that they are acutely aware of the importance of their unconscious inheritance and concerned with the effort to find in it the solution to the problems which were solved in the past by tradition. The psychoanalyst is engaged in the effort to aid them, but it is not yet certain how much psychoanalysis can do, and Jung quotes the ominous motto which Freud affixed to his "Interpretation of Dreams": "If I cannot bend the gods on high, I will at least set Acheron in an uproar." All the essays in the volume are marked by that tentative as well as eclectic attitude which so strikingly distinguishes the author from the other leading psychoanalysts.

Thackeray. By G. V. Ellis. Great Lives Series. The Macmillan Company. 75 cents.

This is one of the few biographies in the series which attempts the Stracheyan manner. Not being successful it becomes one of the least successful of the biographies in the series. It makes the point that in his life, as well as in his novels, Thackeray was an eighteenth-century figure lost in the nineteenth. The point is interesting but is given too much importance.

WHEN YOU GROPE FOR A WORD

Roget's International THESAURUS

"Words grouped by Ideas"

Complete list of synonyms, antonyms, phrases, slang, etc., in fact everything to help find the right word. The one indispensable book for all writers. A necessary complement of the dictionary.

The only large type edition.

Now $3 a copy.

from CROWELL'S List

THOMAS Y. CROWELL CO.
393 Fourth Avenue, New York

HOW LONG HAS THIS BEEN GOING ON?
THE ANSWER

to that celebrated question, always heard after each wreck of America's false gods, is another question: "How long have you been reading

PLAIN TALK

The Great American Flimflams have been "going on" longer than PLAIN TALK—but if you read PLAIN TALK each month you won't be surprised the next time your favorite demagogue is exploded

In the January Number

On sale now at leading news-stands:—Morris A. Bealle explodes the "Smear Huey Long" campaign by the enemies of the All-American Kingfish; Bryce Oliver passes an orchid (well deserved) to John F. Curry and Tammany Hall; names named in Brooklyn's "hot" Beer terrorism; Henry Victor Clay warns of Bootleg Medicine and the "Tug-well" Bill; many others.

"The Magazine of Neglected Truth"

Single copy, 25c; by the year $2.50

If you dealer has sold out send 25c for a copy
PLAIN TALK, Washington, D. C.

Films

Retrospect: 1933

THIS is the season when the American public indulges to the full its fondness for list-making, its almost medieval passion for tabulation. But while the magic of numbers may be as potent in the screen world as elsewhere, the task of compiling the Ten Best Films of the Year is one that involves more ingenuity than judgment. For the sad truth is that except for three or four films every year the productions of Hollywood are on such a uniform level of quality that the making of distinctions between them gets down to the most futile sort of quibbling and hair-splitting. What is the exact value of determining, for example, whether "I Cover the Waterfront" was a shade better or a shade worse than "Advice to the Lovelorn"? If it is objected that this making of fine distinctions is the business of criticism in every field of art, one must point out that there are times when one must think of the Hollywood cinema less as an art than as an industry. At such times its quantitative aspects seem more important than its qualitative. And for this reason it seems more profitable at this time to offer a few generalizations about its output as a whole during the past year than to attempt to arrange the separate items in that output in any sort of pleasing order. What can be said, in general, therefore, of the advance made by the Hollywood talking picture during the year 1933?

Anyone who has been at all faithful in his devotions throughout the year must be convinced that there has been an advance. Technically, the sound-film in America has been brought to a point of development far exceeding even the most optimistic hopes of its champions of four or five years ago. Mechanical processes of recording sound and of articulating it properly with the photographic image have improved simultaneously with the ability of directors to use it as an integral element of a complex art. This has been as much the result of study and experience as of the final reduction of the novelty of sound on the screen. The great successes of the year, "Cavalcade" and "Little Women," have been first and foremost technical triumphs, since neither of the stories on which these films were based would have been nearly as effective for a contemporary American audience without the special vitalization which the new medium made possible. In both films an admirable balance was struck between the best elements of both the literary drama and the old-fashioned silent screen. The failures were films like "The Silver Cord" and "Our Betters" in which a too literal translation of original stage plays resulted only in dull, sluggish, and unconvincing theater. Experiment in the use of special sound effects, while it has only just begun, has been marked in types as far apart as the musical operetta and the scientific fantasy. In the latter department, James Whale's "Invisible Man" has been the most remarkable tour de force. An interesting and too little appreciated experiment in narrative technique was to be seen in "The Power and the Glory." But one may sum all this up by saying that those responsible for the talking picture in this country have now attained to a knowledge and mastery of its resources which make of it an unsurpassed medium for the expression of whatever there may be to express in our time.

What it has so far expressed, it must be admitted, has been no more significant, no less confused, than what is to be found in most other forms of expression at the moment. "Cavalcade," as far as its content was concerned, was a foggy mixture of romantic nostalgia and half-hearted British jingoism. "Little Women," which is the best-mounted and best-directed film of the year, is after all no more than a sweetly picturesque evocation of an unfortunately altogether irrevocable past. From the standpoint of theme, the most enterprising picture of the year was "The Power and the Glory"; but certain details of treatment considerably weakened its effectiveness. "I Am a Fugitive" and "Wild Boys of the Road" were efforts at documentary social criticism which missed their mark through being canceled out at the end by the note of sentimental reform. The proletarian note, creeping in slyly in Lubitsch's "Trouble in Paradise," becomes a sporadic outcry in "Westward Passage" and the more recent "Counsellor-at-Law." Sex, on the other hand, has won through to almost incredible triumphs of articulateness in such pictures as "The Story of Temple Drake," "Design for Living," and Mae West's "She Done Him Wrong." In brief, the talking picture, like pretty much everything else in the present period, reflects the evasion, the abandonment, and the confusion of the period.

The new importation at the Acme is the work of Fedor Ozep, a member of the so-called histrionic school of Russian direction which was replaced by the dialectic school of Eisenstein and Pudovkin. "Mirages de Paris" is a pretty bald imitation of René Clair's various successful attempts at rendering the physical and moral climat of left-bank Paris. There is a burlesque of an operatic number straight out of "Le Million" and a flat use of the singing chorus. The trouble is undoubtedly that the Russian director is not at all at home in these Parisian garrets and back-stages of music halls. His failure to make anything of them merely emphasizes for us the essentially French nature of Clair's talent.

WILLIAM TROY

Drama

Tempest and Sunshine

UPON "Jezebel" (Ethel Barrymore Theater) a good many managerial hopes appear to have been built. The theory evidently was that the long-prophesied revival of romance was due at last, and that if a romance was wanted, Owen Davis could be depended upon to turn out a job more workman-like than most. Mr. McClintic then did the very best he knew how in the matter of presentation, and Miriam Hopkins succeeded without effort in looking very lovely indeed in the role of the she-devil with a heart of gold. Unfortunately, however, the final fruit of all this well-meaning competence failed to produce upon the audience anything like the effect that was obviously hoped for. There was polite applause and probably a sincere disposition on the part of friends to congratulate everybody concerned. Indeed, such obvious pains and such respectable results hardly deserve any less. But no one is likely to think very much more about the whole business, or to wonder for very long either whether the heroine's reform was permanent or whether her own true love recovered from yellow fever on that terrible lepers' island to which she had determined to follow him.

The scene is the deep South just before the Civil War, and Miss Hopkins appears as a reigning beauty in whom the hot blood of the terrible Kendricks runs with its destructive force. When she learns that the lover whom she has expected to wait for her has got himself married to a Yankee belle, trouble is sure to follow and it promptly does—against a background positively cluttered with all the accessories of ante bellum romance. There are singing darkies, high-flown compliments, points of honor, and crinolines too wide to go through the door. There are also a stately dinner, a moss-covered oak, a duel at dawn, and a comic house nigger with a proper contempt for Abolitionist agents. On the dramatic side there is a big scene when all the heroine's guests make it plain that even a Kendrick can go too far, and another big scene when she rises purified through suffering. Yet despite the "Yes Suh," of the blacks, the "you alls" of their masters, and a good deal of really lovely scenery and costuming, nothing seems to result except a rather pretty pageant participated in by highly decorative puppets.

Probably no one is entirely to blame, and I am inclined to think—"Anthony Adverse" notwithstanding—that the public is merely not quite ready to return to histrionics so simple as those upon which this play bases its appeal. Perhaps we are morbid and sophisticated and corrupt. Perhaps our habit of demanding rank flavors when we cannot get psychological subtleties is all wrong. But the fact remains that we are no longer content with the kind of situation and the kind of characterization which used to be good enough for our fathers—in the theater at least. Goodness only knows, Miss Hopkins is made wicked enough, and goodness only knows, the color is laid on with a lavish hand, but something is obviously lacking. Perhaps it is subtlety of characterization, or merely freshness of pattern. Perhaps, on the other hand, it is something more complicated and less tangible which we will have to call contemporaneous feeling. All the motives are understandable enough and even believable enough, but nothing ever becomes more than merely picturesque because nothing ever strikes a chord to which we are particularly sensitive. No one, I suppose, would actually mistake "Jezebel" for a play written fifty years ago, but it might easily be mistaken for a revision of some such work. In other words, there is nothing in it which can mean anything different to us than it would have meant to an audience of the eighties. The themes, the characterizations, and the emotions are unmistakably old-fashioned, and one finds oneself thinking, almost inevitably, of Albion Tourgée, Mrs. E. D. E. N. Southworth, or even of Mr. Davis himself in that now almost legendary period when he was writing about Nellie the Beautiful Cloak Model. Perhaps many a contemporary play is not really any more subtle, but fashion counts for much in everything except the really first-rate.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Contributors to This Issue

LOUIS FISCHER, author of "Machines and Men in Russia," is the Moscow correspondent of The Nation.

BENJAMIN GLASSBERG is superintendent of the Department of Outdoor Relief of Milwaukee County.

JOHN STRACHEY, author of "The Coming Struggle for Power" and "The Menace of Fascism," has just returned to England after a lecture tour in this country.

FRANK CLAY CROSS is a writer and lecturer on agricultural subjects. He is a regular contributor to the Country Home.

PAUL Y. ANDERSON is a Washington correspondent of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

D. C. CLAUS has had twenty years of intimate contact with the electrical industries.

FLORENCE CODMAN is a regular contributor of reviews to The Nation.

MARY MCCARTHY contributes reviews to various periodicals.

E. R. WEMBRIDGE is the author of "Life Among the Lowbrows."

ISIDOR SCHNEIDER is the author of "The Temptation of Anthony."

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	29
EDITORIALS:
Roosevelt Succeeds Through Failure	32
The Milk Scandal	33
Civilizing the Indian	33
E. W. Howe Retires	34
CARTOON. By William Steig	35
ISSUES AND MEN. MR. HULL, PAN-AMERICA, AND THE TARIFFS. By Oswald Garrison Villard	36
CALL FOR MR. THROTTLEBOTTOM! By James Rorty	37
THE NEW IRISH WAR. By an Irish Observer	39
THE TWO WINGS OF THE BLUE EAGLE. III. THE WING UPON THE RIGHT (CONT.). By John Strachey	42
THE RUSSIAN REVOLUTION IN CLOTHES. By Margaret Green	44
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter	45
CORRESPONDENCE	46
BOOKS, MUSIC, DRAMA:
Poem. By Lincoln Reis	48
Archibald MacLeish. By Eda Lou Walton	48
Homo Nordicus—U. S. A. By Melville J. Herskovits	49
Distinguished Failure. By Gertrude Diamant	49
Peace by Default. By Carleton Beals	50
Three Books on the New Deal. By Mauritz A. Hallgren	51
Shorter Notices	51
The Dance: The Monte Carlo Ballet Russe. By Lydia Nadejewa	52
Music: Orpheus in New York. By Kenneth Burke	52
Drama: On Adequate Acting. By Joseph Wood Krutch	56
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE	56

BOARD OF EDITORS

ERNEST GRUENING FREDA KIRCHWEY
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
MAURITZ A. HALLGREN MARGARET MARSHALL
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD
CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $5.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. British Agent, Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England.

THE POLICY SET FORTH by Franklin D. Roosevelt in his speech at the Woodrow Wilson Foundation dinner on December 28 amounts to little less than a repudiation of the Monroe Doctrine as it has been interpreted and applied in recent years. For he declared flatly—and it is the first time such a pledge has been made by any President—that “the definite policy of the United States from now on is one opposed to armed intervention.” The importance of these words cannot be exaggerated, either as an official statement of intention or for their effect on inter-American relations. Coming so soon after the adjournment of the conference at Montevideo, they serve to confirm and give substance to the peaceful aims proclaimed there by Secretary Hull. Mr. Roosevelt gives full credit to Mr. Hull for his work in creating “a better state of feeling” at Montevideo, but the President’s own words will, we believe, do more to establish a sense of confidence and security in the other American nations than the work of many Pan-American conferences. He admitted, with disarming candor, that until now the nations to the south have found plausible reasons for their suspicions and fears of the United States, and he asserted that under the new policy that would no longer need to be the case. He qualified his position in just one important respect. If disorder in one nation “affects the other nations of the continent,” it becomes the “concern” of those nations. He did not discuss in what possible ways that concern might express itself, but he insisted that whatever measures might be necessary should be jointly undertaken by “the whole continent in which we are all neighbors.” And this is another unprecedented and tremendously significant step forward in American foreign policy. The Colossus of the North has laid down his arms at last.

THE IMPORTANCE of Mr. Roosevelt’s pronouncement makes it all the more unfortunate that he failed to make equally explicit promises in regard to those subtler forms of intervention that operate through diplomatic and financial channels. We have landed no marines in Cuba and, on the authority of the President’s words, we may assume that none will be landed. But our warships line the harbor at Havana, and the present government of the island operates under the handicap of our tacit disapproval. This is intervention. In Haiti American officials supervise the customs and see to it that private American holders of Haitian bonds are paid in full—a form of protection that even owners of United States government bonds are not offered. This, too, is intervention. If the President wishes completely to establish faith in “the altruism of the richest American republic,” which he admits has hitherto been lacking in Latin America, he will quickly take steps to abandon these measures of economic intervention which are no less potent because they are applied without the use of army or navy.

MR. ROOSEVELT, in the same address, reiterated his program for world peace. It is a simple set of proposals put forward in such common-sense and practical terms that the obvious impossibility of its general acceptance becomes a measure of the madness of the world. Mr. Roosevelt wants two things: an agreement among the nations to eliminate weapons of offense and “a simple declaration that no nation will permit any of its armed forces to cross its own borders into the territory of another nation.” That is all. It should be easy to achieve, should it not?—especially if Mr. Roosevelt is right in his belief that 90 per cent of the human beings in the world would gladly accept such a policy. He calls upon the people to make their will to peace felt by the politicians who pretend to lead them and who oppose and ridicule such sane proposals as these. But can his call be answered? Most of the people of Europe and Asia are ruled by dictatorships or by governments pursuing cold-blooded policies of reprisal or aggrandizement or panicky measures of self-protection. Nothing short of general revolution would establish in power the masses to whom Mr. Roosevelt addresses his appeal. And so, while we enthusiastically indorse the good sense and humanity of the President’s proposals, we are forced to cast a skeptical glance over the countries in which Mussolini and Hitler and the other political and military bosses of Europe and the Far East carry on their uninterrupted games with arms and negotiations and the lives of the people.

OUR REFUSAL to recognize the government of President Grau San Martin in Cuba is having the disastrous economic results foreseeable to persons familiar with Latin American conditions. The American policy has encouraged every disaffected element in the island to oppose the present regime, and there is so much insecurity in the interior of the island that unless recognition of the Grau Government by the Washington Administration is speedily obtained, the present sugar crop will be largely lost. The larger sugar mills, almost entirely controlled by American interests, are faced with strikes and other difficulties which make it doubtful if the bulk of the cane will be ground. Several large mills have already definitely closed for the season. This action, in turn, increases unemployment and thus disorder. Because of the virtual paralysis of industry in the interior of Cuba the National City Bank of New York recently closed three of its branches, including that at Guantanamo. The Royal Bank of Canada has closed its branches at Matanzas and Manzanillo.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT is to be congratulated on his Christmas Day proclamation restoring full rights of citizenship to some 1,500 persons convicted of conspiracy to defeat the draft during the war, or under the espionage act. The American Civil Liberties Union has made a long campaign for amnesty, and deserves much credit for the result. Both the Coolidge and Hoover administrations declined to issue a general proclamation, maintaining that each person affected should apply individually for restoration of civil rights. The American Civil Liberties Union contended, on the other hand, that those convicted under the war laws stood in an exceptional position morally if not legally, and that the federal government itself had admitted this by issuing many commutations. The Union maintained also that it would be practically impossible fifteen years after the war to reach all the persons concerned and to get them, even if they were willing, through the red tape necessary for individual amnesty. The Roosevelt Administration conceded the justice of an amnesty proclamation, but at first held that all persons affected should be looked up and their names included. Eventually this was seen to be impracticable and the President's Christmas proclamation resulted. The action applies to some 155 members of the Industrial Workers of the World, convicted in the Chicago, Sacramento, and Wichita trials, to various members of the Socialist Party, and to a considerable number of pacifists and other protestants.

THE BANKERS of New York City are gluttons for punishment. Not satisfied with having lost through incompetence and dishonesty the confidence of most of their fellow-citizens, they have proceeded to insult such friends as remain by proposing one of the most fantastic schemes of business ever conceived outside a lunatic asylum. Without attempting to comment on the various incredible details of the code of "fair competition" which they proposed to the Recovery Administration, it is enough to say that the plan would virtually drive out the checking accounts of all persons unable or unwilling to maintain an average balance of $500. It is true, of course, that the account of a small depositor who asks for much service is not profitable, but banks outside of New York City have got around this by making slight extra charges for anything beyond a certain set minimum. It is even more true also that American bankers have developed unnecessarily expensive methods which make it impossible to serve small depositors as economically as, say, French banks do. The plight of our bankers today is another puncture in that already sadly deflated gas bag once known as American business efficiency. Yet if the banking mind were illuminated with a gleam of intelligence, it would realize that this was the time of all times to retain the goodwill of the small depositor even at some out-of-pocket expense. General Johnson has rejected the proposed code out of hand, and has also repudiated the federal "master code" on which the bankers based their inflated charges. A final code is to be worked out between now and the end of January. It is to be hoped that the bankers will take warning from the public—and also the official—reception of their plan and devise a less fantastic set of rules. There is sound reason for government banking, but it would be ironic if the bankers should bring it upon themselves simply because they made it impossible for ordinary persons to do business in any other way.

PENNSYLVANIA has obtained the first results of its decisive anti-machine stand at the last elections. A confused, leaderless legislature, normally ultra-reactionary, has ratified the federal child-labor amendment at a special session, and has approved provisions for pensions for the aged and the blind. These were the only three measures of Governor Gifford Pinchot's broad social legislative program that survived, but in such a politics-ridden State as Pennsylvania even this modicum of liberalism must be regarded as highly unusual. And as a matter of fact what actually happened is even more unusual than the recorded results. The House of Representatives, lacking both Republican and Democratic whip-cracking, actually lined up behind a Socialist, Darlington Hoopes of Reading, to push through virtually the whole Pinchot program. It was in the State Senate, where only half the membership comes up for reelection in 1934, that the social-welfare bills were killed—not by a vote on the floor but by smothering in committee. Pinchot's proposals included a minimum-wage bill for women and children, a State child-labor law, a forty-four-hour-week bill, a bill abolishing industrial deputy sheriffs and the infamous coal-and-iron police, a full-crew railroad statute, workmen's-compensation revisions, and bills authorizing limited-dividend housing corporations. The Mellon-Grundy-Martin combination has killed this legislation for the time being, but Governor Pinchot is already planning another special session for March, and the program will again be presented. With the expected continuation of the anti-machine fight at the polls in 1934, and a consequent liberal trend in the new legislature, it seems likely that the entire Pinchot program will be approved.

THE STUDENTS of Yale University are being introduced to public affairs by way of the picket line and a policeman's club, and at least some of them do not at all like what they find. Lawrence Hill and William Gordon, members of the Yale chapter of the National Student League, were arrested during the first part of December for standing in the picket line during the Kirschner foundry strike in New Haven. Hill was clubbed by a policeman, charged with resisting an officer and with breach of the peace, and convicted on all three counts by Judge Devlin in the City Court.

Gordon, charged with breach of the peace for looking at the badge of an officer who had threatened to "clip him along-side of the head" when he was trying to get witnesses for Hill and two persons arrested earlier, was fined $25. Hill's case was appealed. Immediately after the arrests the Yale Daily News gave the matter wide publicity, and two groups of students were organized to protest to the Mayor. The first group was refused admittance. The second was permitted to send a delegation of three as spokesmen to His Honor, whereupon they were harangued with a blast against communism. A large number of students attempted to be present at the trials, but the police cleared the courtroom of everyone not directly connected with the cases.

IT IS POINTED OUT by persons interested in the controversy that many of the students taking part in the various protests had never demonstrated in anything but a football rally before. The arrests, moreover, followed not only the picketing but articles in the Yale Daily News describing conditions in the Kirschner plant. Dean Clarence Mendel is quoted as saying: "Yale college authorities are entirely out of sympathy with the interference of students in New Haven affairs about which they are uninformed. . . . The college will not encourage the students in any extra-legal attempts to determine the right or wrong of any local problems." Somebody should inform the dean that picketing has been declared legal by no less a tribunal than the Supreme Court of the United States; there was, therefore, nothing extra-legal in the action of the students, unless it is illegal to print articles describing conditions in a particular factory. If the articles are unfavorable and untrue, there are still libel laws to which the factory owners may have recourse. If they are true, there is every reason for college students to take an interest in them and in strikes generally. There is something most unseemly in the attitude of a college officer who deliberately opposes, and attempts to persuade the undergraduates in his charge to oppose, student criticism of local industrial conditions. Yale is doubtless offering courses in sociology and economics. Where is there a better place for a direct application of the theories taught in the classroom than in the town in which the college is situated?

THE first national birth-control conference ever held in Washington will open on January 15, under the auspices of Margaret Sanger's National Committee on Federal Legislation for Birth Control. A number of topics relevant to the general subject of contraception will be discussed by eminent physicians, ministers, and experts in education and sociology. A special medical session not open to the general public will be held for the discussion of various methods of contraception not yet widely known, including the Russian experiment in immunization. It is to be hoped that Mrs. Sanger can persuade a large number of Senators and Representatives to take an interest in the conference, to grace it with their presence, and later to consider seriously the question of removing the legislative bans on the dissemination of contraceptive information. It cannot be said too often that such information should be freely available to every person who needs it, that it should be offered under sufficient medical supervision to insure that only sound and healthful advice is given, and that properly supervised information should not be forbidden the mails on the ground of obscenity. When such steps have been taken, persons who are prohibited on religious or other grounds from asking for or receiving contraceptive information can still refuse it. Others can receive it freely.

LIKE all advanced thinkers, we resent the theory that human nature cannot be changed. As Bernard Shaw once said, if it could not, mankind would still be living in the trees, and that always struck us as a knock-down argument. We have even read with sympathetic interest the accounts of those persons who, like our own Moscow correspondent, insist that man is being made over with surprising rapidity in Russia, and we were inclined to accept their accounts as fact until a few days ago when we saw in the newspapers the report of a disturbing incident. It seems that when Harpo Marx made his debut in Leningrad, his six-minute act was followed by a twenty-minute demonstration of wild approval on the part of an audience supposedly composed of new men equipped with completely reconditioned psyches. Apparently he strikes the Communist worker precisely as he struck the American bourgeois, and we don't know exactly where that leaves the theory that the interests, standards, and reactions of the collectivized soul are totally different from those of the mere individualist. Perhaps Harpo implies some comment on the class struggle which we failed to catch, but we are inclined to suspect that there is another explanation, connected with the comedian's name. Probably the Comintern will have a new hope for the revolution in America when it learns that we have not merely one Marx but four.

THE PRICE that intellectual Germany is paying for the Nazi regime is illustrated anew by the news that the Warburg Library will shortly be moved away from Hamburg, either to London or to the United States. This is one of the greatest collections of documents relating to the history of art and religion, with special reference to the Renaissance, in the world. To it students have gone from the United States, from England, and from numerous other countries. It was housed in a special building erected as a memorial to the founder, Professor Aby Warburg, by his brothers in Hamburg and New York. There is, of course, no more public-spirited, high-minded, philanthropic family anywhere than the Warburgs. But they are Jews, and that is enough for the Nazi defenders of pure Germanic culture. So this superb library is to be transported beyond the seas where it will be safe from Nazi ruthlessness. Meanwhile the Nazis have again shown their enmity to a great mind of Europe, now of America, by seizing the property of Professor Einstein. What has happened at Frankfort is also characteristic. Some years ago the university there was rehabilitated and heavily endowed by citizens of the United States and of Frankfort, largely Jews. The deed of gift stipulated that no one should be debarred from study at the university because of his creed. When the Nazis came to power, the names of all the Jewish donors were removed from the bronze tablets upon which they had been commemorated, and there was immediately the rankest discrimination against Jewish students. When attention was called to the deed of gift, the Nazis replied with their customary falsity that the Jewish students were not being barred because of their religion but solely because of their race, as to which there was no reference in the deed!

Roosevelt Succeeds Through Failure

A COUPLE of months ago word was going about the country that the New Deal had collapsed. Not merely were those who all along had doubted the efficacy of the recovery program saying "I told you so," but within the Roosevelt camp itself a defeatist attitude was widespread although covertly expressed. Business had receded from the high tide of July; the NRA was behind in promulgating its codes, and those announced were seldom satisfactory either to employers or employees. The former were engaged in sabotage and the latter were calling strikes. The dollar had declined 40 per cent in foreign-exchange value, prices were rising in this country while wages were stationary, and many persons were beginning to realize from the first touches that inflation in practice was not the glittering paradise they had been led to expect. The prediction was more or less general that the Roosevelt program would crack up about the beginning of the new year.

The new year is here, but meanwhile a complete change of view seems to have taken place. Confidence in President Roosevelt is as strong as it was last spring. Talk of the imminent collapse of his program has subsided. This sudden shift in public sentiment must be mainly psychological because economic conditions have undergone almost no change since last autumn. The Roosevelt program is practically where it was with one exception, and that is that the President's financial policy is now revealed as an almost complete failure. Fortunate failure! In no way has Mr. Roosevelt been so lucky as in the failure of his scheme for raising prices through depreciating the currency, and if we look for the underlying cause of the present spirit of greater confidence, it may be attributed in no small degree to the emerging belief that nothing much is going to happen in the near future to the domestic purchasing power of the dollar.

Mr. Roosevelt began his term with a definite determination to raise prices to pre-depression levels. On the one hand, he planned to raise the income of two classes in particular—the farmers and the low-paid industrial workers. On the other hand, he aimed to raise prices in general for the benefit of the debtor class. The country as a whole fell in with the program without stopping to ask whether there was any sound reason to raise prices at all or if there was any way of advancing one class except at the expense of another. To carry out his plan Mr. Roosevelt relied upon processing taxes and wage minimums at home. Abroad he deliberately sought to depreciate the value of the dollar. Not satisfied with the abandonment of the gold standard, he drove the dollar still lower in the foreign market by his gold-purchasing program in the hope that domestic prices would rise accordingly and there would be a great transfer of money into commodities. Nothing of the sort happened. There was a certain shift of capital (which was not desired) from this to other countries, but it was less than the circumstances warranted. Europeans, with the recollection fresh before them of the havoc of war and post-war inflation, began to get rid of their American dollars at a sacrifice. Americans, with a long history behind them of established currency, refused to be as panicky as they ought to have been. The "Buy Now" campaign petered out ignominiously and is now forgotten.

The attempt to raise prices in general failed almost entirely. The attempt to raise those of the farmer in particular was a little more successful. There has been an increase in the cost of living in America of about 16 per cent since last spring. This is assignable in the main to dearer food—that is, to the effort to raise farmers' prices through the processing taxes. The farmer has profited somewhat by higher prices, although not as much as had been hoped. The value of ten leading crops in 1933 was 42 per cent higher than in 1932 (for a lesser amount), but it was slightly less than in 1931 and about half of what it was in 1929. Despite somewhat higher prices, many farmers were still in a rebellious mood last autumn. What has quieted them since has been the direct money paid out by the federal government for acreage reduction, for hog slaughtering, and as crop loans.

The result of the effort to help especially the low-paid industrial worker is harder to assay than that in behalf of the farmer. Some low wages have been bettered, but in consequence certain workers have been displaced for more productive ones. A survey in Buffalo indicates that unemployment among women workers there, which amounted to 25 per cent in 1932, rose to 56 per cent in 1933. There may be a definite connection between this and minimum wages. There is somewhat less unemployment now than a year ago, but the National Industrial Conference Board says that weekly earnings per worker have declined with the shortening of the working week. Like the farmer, the low-paid or unemployed industrial worker seems to have benefited not so much by the stimulation of private industry as by direct government relief.

A comparison of various indices suggests that business in general may be about 10 per cent better than at this time last year. The National Retail Dry Goods Association reports that trade was 18 per cent better in the first half of December, 1933, than in 1932, but this is based on money received, not on the volume of goods sold, and is partly accounted for by higher prices. In some lines the volume of goods sold was less, indicating a declining standard of living.

On the whole, the material gains of the Roosevelt Administration so far have been slight and probably based more on gradually emerging forces making for economic recovery than on political palliatives. But the psychological and educational gains have been substantial. The country has at least passed from Hoover do-nothingism to a policy of self-help, and Mr. Roosevelt's energy and buoyancy have been a healthful tonic. The Administration is shifting from the attempt to revive industry by artificially raising prices to an effort to stimulate it by industrial projects of its own, by loans, and by direct relief.

The cruelty of inflated prices without increased income for the average American has been postponed, but by no means averted. Indeed, the present tendencies at Washington may bring through inexorable economic forces what Mr. Roosevelt failed to achieve by artificial political means. Federal expenditures are running and will continue to run far ahead of receipts. There is no hope of a balanced budget.

Probably we should not try for one. If it is fair to pass on any burden to the future, it is fair to pass on some of the present load. But that means big bond issues and thus an inflation of credit and prices. Unless an attempt is made by the present Congress to pay in part as we go through drastic taxation of the well-to-do, we shall shortly be confronted by enormously ballooned prices without a corresponding increase in income for the average man. In effect that will be a capital levy, but a capital levy falling chiefly not on the rich but on the poor.

The Milk Scandal

THE forced resignation recently of Clyde L. King as federal milk administrator resulted from a situation that had the makings of a major scandal and not from minor differences between the right and left wings of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, as the press generally reported. The Philadelphian, it seems, had permitted friendship and personal business associations to stand in the way of milk regulations aimed at protecting the consumer and the independent dairyman as well as the large producers and distributors making up what the small farmer calls the milk trust. Although Mr. King's earlier administrative actions, including the foisting of an unfair method of marketing upon the dairyman, and the confiscation of the books of the powerful and almost monopolistic Interstate Milk Producers' Association just before they were to be audited, cast some doubt upon his fitness for the delicate task of unbiased supervision, it was not until it was revealed that one of the leading lights of the milk trust had a desk in Mr. King's office in Washington that the storm really broke. Mr. King himself denied undue friendliness with the large milk interests, although he had been in their service for many years as an "impartial" arbitrator. But Henry N. Woolman, secretary-treasurer of Philadelphia's largest dairy (the Supplee-Wills-Jones Company) and a director of the National Dairy Products Corporation and the Philadelphia Milk Exchange—nominal head of the milk trust which controls the industry in ten Eastern States—admitted to a Senate committee that he dictated his correspondence in Mr. King's office, that he conferred frequently with Mr. King about the formulation of marketing agreements, and that he had been a close friend of the administrator for some seventeen years and his employer for several years.

His pet project has been the basic-surplus plan of marketing control. Briefly, this gives the farmer one price for a stipulated amount of bulk milk and another smaller price for any milk produced above that "quota." But there is no such restriction upon the distributor. The spread of profit is never diminished, since a price cut is passed on to the farmer. On the other hand, higher prices for the farmer simply mean higher prices for the consumer; the distributor takes no loss. This system gives large distributors average earnings of 25 per cent, while the small farmer is lucky to break even. The large cooperatives are, of course, controlled by the distributors, and share the profits. That strikes and widespread bootlegging of milk are produced by tactics like these—and that of forcing independent dairymen into bankruptcy—is not to be wondered at.

In thirteen cities marketing agreements of this nature have been forced upon the producer and consumer by the large middle-man interests. But they have failed to hold up under fire. Immediately upon Mr. King's withdrawal, Secretary Wallace, who favors rigid production control as the sanest solution of the milk problem, began the work of revising these pacts. The Chicago marketing agreement has already been scrapped. The vicious Philadelphia agreement goes next. The New York pact, not yet completed, is destined for thorough renovation. Mr. Wallace has characterized the profits of milk distributors as exorbitant; that he plans to cut them from both ends by raising prices to farmers and reducing retail costs would seem to follow naturally. In Pennsylvania, meanwhile, the milk trust has won a legislative victory by succeeding in keeping its large cooperatives from the jurisdiction of the new State Milk Control Board. But the victory may prove a Pyrrhic one; agrarian revolts in the commonwealth will probably alter this at an expected special session.

That the milk problem is moving toward solution through some form of socialization is indicated by the turn of events since the King ouster. The new administrator, Jerry H. Mason of Iowa, will carry out the Wallace and Tugwell policies of enlightened social planning. Municipal distribution of milk in our great cities would seem to be the solution for the present unsatisfactory conditions. There is no valid reason why such a plan should not work, and it might well be a first step toward eventual nationalization of the whole milk industry.

Civilizing the Indian

THE American policy with the Indian tribes which occupied the territory of the United States before white men came has always been a simple one. We robbed them, murdered them, and then proceeded to "civilize" them. Of the three, the civilizing process has been by no means the least painful. Of late years it has consisted in a system of education for Indian children which took them from their parents at the age of seven, kept them in a boarding-school until they were eighteen, underfed and underclothed them, forcibly exposed them to the worst features of the routine of white public schools, and spared no pains, at any point, to stamp out their Indian culture and heritage. They were then restored to their homes, which had become alien to them, and were at the same time compelled to live generally separate and remote from white civilization, only the least significant features of which had ever been presented to them. In brief, their traditions were destroyed and they were given nothing valuable to take their place.

It was to be expected that when John Collier was appointed Commissioner of Indian Affairs by President Roosevelt he would attempt to change this policy. Having spent a number of years in efforts to ameliorate the condition of the Indians, he at least knew what he would like to do for them. And the measure of his success so far is as heartening as it is astonishing. Curiously enough, he was helped by the necessity of rigorous economy in the administration of the Indian Bureau. It cost about $400 a year to keep an Indian child in a boarding-school. Mr. Collier has instituted a system of community day schools for which the cost is less than half that—in some cases a quarter of it. The boarding-schools have not been entirely done away with. But whereas they formerly took all Indian children as pupils, they now take only special classes of children—orphans without homes, children with a definitely bad home environment, children without local school facilities, and high-school pupils desiring special vocational training not offered by local schools. The number of boarding-school children in 1931 was 21,677; by 1935 it is estimated that this number will have been reduced to 13,660, and that at the same time about 65,000 children will be attending local day schools or public schools. And in the meantime most of the objectionable features of the boarding-schools that remain in operation have been modified, and attempts are being made to bring the boarding-school into contact with the Indian community as much as possible.

The community day schools are, of course, the most interesting feature of Commissioner Collier's educational program. Ideally it would be preferable to establish such a program of community education—which would be offered to and participated in by adults as well as children—over a comparatively long period of time and by slow degrees. The economic stringency, however, has made haste necessary, with the result that one of the greatest problems in the new program is finding suitable teachers, either Indian or white, as fast as the schools are built and equipped. Unlike the ten- or eight-month schedule of the ordinary public-school teacher, these teachers must be on the job every month in the year. The summer is the time when they teach the parents of the children to make gardens and to practice sanitation not so imperative in the winter. In the Navajo country alone there will be fifty or sixty new school centers, about fourteen of them including advanced training through eighteen or twenty years of age. These schools must actually be built, and funds from the Public Works or Civil Works Administration are being supplied for the purpose. Here they will attempt to teach the parents of the children and the children themselves better ways of living in their own hogans, better ways of utilizing their water and soil, better ways of handling their sheep and goats, at the same time that they teach the three R's and encourage Indian arts and crafts, which until now we have been at such pains to destroy or to vulgarize. The closest possible cooperation will be maintained, through the children in many cases, between the school and the parents. The school, indeed, will eventually be the social center of the community, and it will influence the Indians themselves without at the same time antagonizing, frightening, or exploiting them.

That this is a better way of "civilizing" them than our earlier methods seems obvious. Inevitably Indians must be exposed to white civilization, but they will find it infinitely more helpful and friendly than heretofore, and they will, moreover, understand and be able to make use of it. At the same time what is useful and beautiful in Indian culture—and there is much—will so far as possible be saved for them, or for us. It was another Roosevelt who established the Bureau of American Ethnology to preserve what was left of aboriginal culture before it was lost to us forever. President Roosevelt today has carried on an admirable family tradition by placing in charge of Indian affairs a man who has devoted his life to the Indians.

E. W. Howe Retires

THE publisher, editor, and sole author of E. W. Howe's Monthly has every right to put down his pen, as he now does at eighty. The paper had finished its twenty-second year, and Mr. Howe must have grown weary of writing even those paragraphs which connoisseurs of journalism considered the best of their kind. But thousands of his readers will be sorry for the change, and doubtless he himself will be lost for a while without that page upon which he carved so many perfect sayings.

He has his high place among those American writers who have chosen the footpath to fame. This is the path of common sense, and it is so seldom taken in our practical land that one who follows it to the end is set down as an eccentric. Mr. Howe as the Sage of Potato Hill (Kansas) has been one of our eccentrics. Without the mockery of Artemus Ward, without the rage of Mark Twain, without the boisterous brogue of Mr. Dooley, he has yet managed to strike us as something of a crank; and all because he has refused to surrender his rustic illusion not only that the world is a very simple place to those who can see it simply but that those who do not so see it are deliberately perverse. To every problem he has turned the cold shoulder of a sage who knows that "millions of people have lived millions of years and tried everything," the best of them finding in the end that there are no problems beyond the primeval ones connected with the practice of "fairness, politeness, industry, and thrift."

To say that virtues of that sort are the sole concern of man is not to say that they are easily achieved, nor has Mr. Howe said this. Like Jonathan Swift he notes the rarity of the very simplest virtues and so concludes them to be the hardest to attain. The "higher" ones are "big talk," all the schemes for reorganizing society are "big talk" to which a plain man will pay no heed. For the plain man, knowing how he ought to live, knows also that if he lived that way—and every other man likewise—there would be no crises. To which there is doubtless an answer. But Mr. Howe is not the kind of writer whom one answers. He is unanswerable, as any perfect writer is. Witness the following sentences from the Monthly, some of which in all probability go over ground covered by Mr. Howe in the Atchison Daily Globe between 1877 and 1911. For he has never changed his mind, and he has never changed his tune.

A good scare is worth more to a man than good advice. . . . Half the promises people say were never kept were never made. . . . War is so wicked, so unnecessary, so foolish, that I rather believe the people should be punished for submitting to it. . . . The greatest punishment is to be despised by your neighbors, the world, and members of your family. . . . Except the flood, nothing was ever as bad as reported. . . . After a woman has looked at a man three or four times she notices something about him that should be changed; and after an acquaintance of a few weeks she will suggest that the change be made. . . . Financial sense is knowing that many men will promise to do a certain thing and fail to do it. . . . We are not free; it was not intended we should be. A book of rules is placed in our cradle, and we never get rid of it until we reach our graves. Then we are free, and only then.

"This new poison gas of mine completely dissolves the lungs and intestines."

Issues and Men

Mr. Hull, Pan-America, and the Tariffs

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S telegram of commendation to Secretary Hull concerning his achievement at Montevideo was well deserved. While the details of all that has taken place are lacking, enough has come out to make it plain that the United States made a better showing than for a long time past. Secretary Hull's obvious sincerity and simplicity, his genuine kindliness, his earnestness, and his straightforward way in dealing with those with whom he comes in contact have all plainly had their effect in Montevideo. Merely to send a man of this type was a tremendous change from the past. There was every evidence at the outset that a lot of dynamite was lying around loose which would be exploded against the United States if it tried any of its domineering, swashbuckling, and Lord-of-Creation tactics of the past. No one could possibly accuse Mr. Hull of anything of the kind, and the dynamite did not go off. But more than that, I suspect that Mr. Hull was behind various important actions which seemed to originate with South American delegations. He also made valuable concrete proposals for tariff reductions, which the South Americans cannot but have taken as a pledge really to do away with some of the tariff obstacles which have been placed by the United States in the path of their prosperity. Mr. Hull cannot, of course, bind Congress to his policy.

Now this whole achievement of the Secretary of State's is tremendously important. It looks not only as if the South Americans would sign some of the peace pacts which still lack their signature, but as if Mr. Hull had gone far to allay South American and Central American anger and suspicion. He practically promised that the United States would not intervene again, and President Roosevelt has now formally pledged this. There cannot fail to be a marked psychological change in the attitude of the other American republics toward us. If we are not hereafter considered to be the big, bad wolf of the Americas the credit will be Mr. Hull's and also the President's. As I have said in writing about other phases of the Roosevelt Administration, here, too, it is the change in spirit of the present Administration which counts so much, as contrasted with that of the Hoover, Coolidge, and Harding administrations. It goes to show again that if a great country behaves honestly, pleasantly, and decently to its less powerful neighbors, it will meet with an instantaneous response. Certainly the difference between the attitude of our delegation at the Montevideo conference and the attitude of those we sent to previous conferences is just the difference between the personality of Mr. Hull and that of the smug, pontifical, and at times overbearing Charles E. Hughes.

With respect to Mr. Hull's trade proposal, he asked "that a general understanding among all important countries should at the earliest possible date be brought about in concert for the elimination of the more useless and hurtful trade barriers and for the reduction of tariffs in accordance with a moderate tariff policy." He repeated his thesis that business recovery depends on the restoration of international trade.

He said that he asked for no treaty, conventions, or legal commitments by the conference, and then he offered a resolution to the effect "that the governments of the American republics should promptly undertake to promote trade among their respective people and other nations and reduce high trade barriers through the negotiation of comprehensive bilateral reciprocity treaties based on mutual concessions." Perhaps this was only a friendly gesture; perhaps it meant a good deal more than appeared on the surface. Mr. Hull met with some opposition, notably from a representative of Salvador, who declared that "a plan for tariff reduction for American merchandise might be viewed as a customs union which would endanger Latin American sales to Europe. The difficulty is that Latin Americans buy most of their goods from the United States, and sell most of their products to Europe."

But is it not precisely a customs union with Central and South America that the government of the United States ought to aim at if it cannot put through a lateral tariff reduction in favor of all the world? We ought, of course, to dominate all American markets. We have the goods, we can make quicker deliveries. Especially do we produce the automobiles they need. There is only one thing that stands in the way of our doing it, and that is the purely nationalistic feeling which arises from the fact that different flags float over the several countries. If the United States has a manifest destiny it is that it should find its best markets in Central and South America. We have an enormous amount of capital invested in all the republics, some of which is, I am afraid, hopelessly lost. But surely nothing could so quickly restore prosperity there as to start the wheels of industry turning again. And nothing could do this better than our giving the South Americans a better chance to pay us with goods for the goods they take from us, and should take in ever-increasing measure. Nothing that anyone can think of, not the Monroe Doctrine, or international conferences, or signing of peace pacts, could mean as much to the future development and stability of the Latin American republics as would the inclusion of those states in a customs union with North America. Many times it has been pointed out that the great industrial rise of the German Empire did not begin with the establishment of the empire in the Palace of Versailles in 1871, that it dated back far beyond that to the Frankfort Conference which brought about a customs union between the several German states. But, I hear it said, this is suggesting the impossible. Yes, if we are going to say that it is impossible and refrain from a straight-out fight with our tariff barons. Sooner or later the United States will have to make that fight if we are going to regain the measure of prosperity to which we are fully entitled.

Donald Garrison Villard

Call for Mr. Throttlebottom!

By JAMES RORTY

FLOATING around in the otherwise capitalist alphabet soup of the New Deal are a couple of decorative ingredients which threaten to become functional and nutritious. They are the Consumers' Advisory Board of the NRA and the Consumers' Counsel of the AAA. Some of the best and most nearly radical brains in Washington are concentrated about these two advisory boards. Maybe "they can't win," as the custodians of lawful, profit-motivated business would put it. But already they have done enough to give the leaders of the patent-medicine, drug, cosmetic, food, and advertising industries the most acute attack of jitters that this writer has ever had the pleasure of witnessing.

It all goes back to this business of trying to materialize Mr. Throttlebottom, the man nobody knows, who is reputed to be the ultimate consumer whom business is theoretically set up to serve. It was two weeks before Christmas when this weird ectoplasm began to take shape in the steam arising from the hearings on the Tugwell bill.

"Do you see what I see?" said the ad men to the patent-medicine men. And the drug men, the cosmeticians, the vitamin men of the food industry, and the Fourth Estate, all chimed in on a chorus that became more and more hysterical as the hearings proceeded.

Here is what they saw, aided by the suave interpolation of Dr. Robert S. Lynd, called over from the Consumers' Advisory Board to answer the ad men's charge that the Tugwell bill is "contrary to the spirit and intent of the NRA." They saw that the drive of the Consumers' Advisory Board of the NRA for consumer representation on the Code Authorities and for quality standards in the codes, the effort of the Consumers' Counsel of the AAA (headed by Frederick C. Howe) to insert quality standards in the food-processing and other AAA agreements, and the controls and penalties embodied in the Tugwell bill, especially the labeling provisions, are all coordinate elements in the attempt of the President's left-wing advisers to do right by Mr. and Mrs. Throttlebottom and the children. From the point of view of business-as-usual this is the sin against the Holy Ghost, nothing less. Business, especially the interlocked drug, cosmetic, food, and advertising business, is organized to do Mr. Throttlebottom right, and the difference is more than a matter of phrasing.

Amid audible grinding of teeth by the assembled ad men Dr. Lynd argued from the premises of "service" and "truth in advertising" to which Printers' Ink and other organs of the advertising business have long proclaimed allegiance. Today, he pointed out, because of the elaborate fabrication of commodities, the widespread use of synthetic materials, and current packaging processes, it is necessary that fair competition, the avowed objective of the NRA, should include quality competition as well as price competition. For example, the AAA found that the milk agreements, in order to quote prices at all, had also to quote butter fat. In nearly every line of merchandizing a need exists for quality standards on which to base price competition. In fact, some of the producers and growers, such as the citrus-fruit growers, rice millers, and clingstone-peach canners, had actually asked for quality grades in the AAA agreements.

The object of the NRA is to increase net buying power, which means that it must not only increase wages but stop losses through sub-standard buying. Both government and industry avoid such losses by buying on specification. Should not consumers—in 1929, 30,000,000 families spent 60 per cent of the national income over retail counters—know what they are buying? Under the New Deal labor, the consumer, and government are recognized as copartners in American industry. The proposed food and drug bill, like the quality standards going into the recovery codes, represents a simple and necessary aid to the isolated consumer in his difficult and largely helpless effort to compete on an equal footing with the massed resources of industry.

Note how carefully Dr. Lynd kept within the zone of theoretical agreement. None the less, the ad men lost no time in putting him on the spot. The December 14 issue of Printers' Ink gave as a headline to a mangled version of his statement, "Opposes NRA, Says Lynd," and in the December 21 issue Roy Dickinson, president of Printers' Ink, declared:

... it is my firm belief that Professor Lynd's plans in the Consumers' Advisory Board, in connection with the Consumers' Board of the AAA, are a definite threat to the success of the whole NRA program. His scheme of attempting at this time to change the whole system of distribution of trade-marked, advertised merchandise is a distinct menace to the whole industrial machine out of which wages, profits, and government taxes must come. Both President Roosevelt and General Johnson have publicly expressed themselves that increased advertising of quality-branded merchandise is an integral and essential part of the whole recovery program. Professor Lynd . . . would attack over a wide front the whole system on which not only advertising but profits depend. Which viewpoint is truly representative of the Administration attitude? It is time that advertisers, publishers, and all other industries dependent on advertising were told what they may expect and get ready to fight for their existence if the Lynd viewpoint is representative.

Mr. Throttlebottom mustn't know too much. If Dr. Lynd has his way, he is likely to get both wise and nasty, as Mr. Dickinson calls out his mob. It is too bad Printers' Ink hasn't a larger consumer circulation. If Mr. Throttlebottom could get himself organized and incorporated into something a little more tangible than the mystical entity in whose behalf Dr. Lynd and other New Dealers are struggling, it would pay him to reprint some of Mr. Dickinson's recent stuff and distribute it widely under the title "The Ad Men at Bay." The impression left upon the reader would be much like the final reel of a gangster melodrama in which the good-bad gangsters draw their rods and "blast their way out." This ferocity becomes understandable when we add up what is at stake.

According to Printers' Ink, about $350,000,000 a year is at stake for the advertising business alone. This money is paid by advertisers, chiefly through advertising agencies which collect a commission, to newspaper and magazine publishers, broadcasters, and other advertising media for the advertising of foods, drugs, and cosmetics. This advertising is theoretically designed to inform and instruct Mr. Throttlebottom, eliminate his halitosis, pep him up with vitamins, and otherwise make him a better and more popular fellow. As a matter of fact the Big Idea is something quite different, and the annual "take" is a lot more than $350,000,000. The big idea of advertising (see almost any textbook) is to establish a prestige, an ambience, around a given product or service which will remove it from price competition. But the only real competition, the only competition which benefits the consumer, is price competition based on specified qualities and grades—precisely the kind of competition which Professors Tugwell, Lynd, and their colleagues in the Consumers' Advisory Board of the NRA and the Consumers' Counsel of the AAA are trying to bring about.

Modern advertising represents not so much a competitive selling of goods and services as a competitive manufacture of consumption habits, a competitive production of customers, the technique of which was accurately described by another noisome professor, Thorstein Veblen, in "Absentee Ownership," published in 1923:

The production of customers by sales-publicity is evidently the same thing as a production of systematized illusions organized into serviceable "action patterns"—serviceable, that is, for the use of the seller on whose account and for whose profit the customer is being produced. It follows, therefore, that the technicians in charge of this work . . . are by way of being experts and experimenters in applied psychology, with a workman-like bent in the direction of what may be called creative psychiatry. Their day's work will necessarily run on the creative guidance of habit and bias, by recourse to shock effects, tropismatic reactions, animal orientation, forced movements, fixation of ideas, verbal intoxication. It is a trading on that range of human infirmities which blossom in devout observances and fruit in the psychopathic wards.

What is attacked by the Tugwell bill, and even more by the attempt to embody quality standards in the codes, is this enterprise in "creative psychiatry" and the largely irrational and uneconomic consumption habits which advertisers manufacture and capitalize. In "Recent Social Trends" Dr. Lynd notes that the Maxwell House coffee habit of the American people was bought in 1928 for $42,000,000 and the Jell-o habit in 1925 for $35,000,000. Doubtless the asking price for the Listerine habit and the Crazy Crystal habit would also be impressive if we knew them.

When the ad men and the medicine men howl about the Brain Trust's attack on the "whole system on which not only advertising but profits depend," this is the system they are howling about, and the loudness of the howl is directly proportioned to the size of the howler's stake in the matter. The capitalized claims of the food, drug, and cosmetic advertisers upon Mr. Throttlebottom's shrinking dollar, after he has been creatively psyched, would probably run into billions.

The stake of the advertising business, otherwise known as the Fourth Estate, is smaller but even more indispensable. Newspapers and magazines derive about two-thirds of their income from advertisers, and about 60 per cent of this advertising income is contributed by the food, drug, and cosmetics advertisers. Naturally, the publishers want this creative psyching of Mr. Throttlebottom to go right on. Naturally, the advertising business, as represented by Printers' Ink, is allied with the drug, food, and cosmetics advertisers in fighting the Tugwell bill. Naturally, when they contemplate what would happen if quality standards were systematically introduced into the codes, they become hysterical and incoherent. (Credit should be given to Advertising and Selling and Editor and Publisher for handling the issue fairly.)

In contrast the functionalists in Washington are almost excessively lucid. One fears, indeed, that for all their suavity and sweet reasonableness they have made themselves all too clear. They have gone so far as to sponsor the work of a committee, headed by Dr. Lynd, which has recommended the establishment of a Consumers' Standards Board under the joint control of the Consumers' Advisory Board of the NRA and the Consumers' Counsel of the AAA, with a technical director and a technical staff of commodity experts and an interdepartmental advisory committee drawn from federal bureaus. The budget asked for provides $65,000 for the first year for administrative expenses, plus $250,000 for research and testing. Dr. Lynd's report quotes that devastating sentence in the impeccable Hoover's 1922 report ■ Secretary of Commerce:

The lack of . . . established grades and standards of quality adds very largely to the cost of distribution because of the necessity of buying and selling upon sample or otherwise, and because of the risk of fraud and misrepresentation and consequently the larger margins of trading.

Still keeping on the safe, sane, and conservative territory of economic and technical truisms, Dr. Lynd's report goes on to quote a 1930 report of the Bureau of Standards:

Producers are experts in their own commodity fields but seldom does the consumer get the full benefit of this knowledge. Under present conditions this group knowledge is suppressed, and the tendency is all too frequent to give the buyer merely what he asks for.

In the interest of accuracy the writer would amend this last statement to read: "The tendency is to force the buyer to take what he has been taught to ask for, in the interest of the seller."

Moreover, as F. J. Schlink points out in his recent "Open Letter to President Roosevelt," "it is impossible for a private consumer to secure access to the immensely valuable findings of the Bureau of Standards, paid for in every major respect by general taxation of consumers." In this letter Mr. Schlink urges a Department of the Consumer with Cabinet representation and equal status with other federal departments. But even the less sweeping recommendations of Dr. Lynd's committee are calculated to freeze the blood of the embattled ad men, drug men, cosmetic men, vitamin men, and the rest. According to Dr. Lynd:

The standards promulgated by the Consumers' Board would not stop at the point at which the commercial standards of the Bureau of Standards must now stop, that is, at a type of standard to which 65 per cent of an industry is ready to agree, but would go on beyond this to a thoroughly satisfactory set of consumer grades and labels. Past experience has shown that the official promulgation of definite consumer standards, even though they go beyond current practice, operates as a norm to which competitive business tends to approximate.

It requires but little imagination to see that what is here envisaged is a fundamental reorganization of distribution in the direction of function. This would entail a huge deflation of the vested interest of advertisers and the advertising business in the exploitation of the American consumer; also probably huge economies in both production and distribution.

Even poor old Throttlebottom should be able to see this if there were any way of getting the word to him. There isn't, for the reason that our instruments of social communication, the daily and periodical press and the radio, are in effect the advertising business. That is why the writer cannot see that any tactical advantage would be gained if the much-wronged and kicked-about Consumers' Advisory Board were to resign in a body, as they have been repeatedly urged to do by the People's Lobby, the Emergency Conference of Consumers' Organizations, and other groups acting in behalf of that mystical economic entity Mr. Throttlebottom. What would happen if they did? They would make the first page once, as did the resignation of Professor Ogburn from the Consumers' Advisory Board last summer. And that would be about all, except for an immense sigh of relief and satisfaction heaved by the ad men, the patent-medicine men, the vitamin men, and the rest.

Not that the Consumers' Advisory Board has not had to take it and keep on taking it. Thus far it has not been able to put a genuine consumers' representative or a quality standard in any of the NRA codes. And when it has complained, Charles Michelson, as NRA publicity director, has prudently muffled the complaints. Professor Paul H. Douglas is now busy organizing Consumer County Councils as a sort of field organization for the Consumers' Advisory Board. Maybe it will be possible to get the word to Mr. Throttlebottom that way, although probably not if General Johnson can stop it. And maybe Mr. Schlink, who with Mr. Leon Henderson of the Remedial Loan Department of the Russell Sage Foundation has just been appointed special adviser to General Johnson, will be able to start something. But it does not look too hopeful. The Consumers' Counsel of the AAA has done perhaps a little better. Professor Tugwell seemed to win more than half of his battle with Mr. Peek. Just before the latter stepped out, he "made a sacrifice hit" in behalf of business-as-usual by getting about a hundred codes transferred from the AAA to the NRA. But the important food-processing codes were retained by the AAA, from which Mr. Peek resigned.

When Congress meets we shall see whether the call for Mr. Throttlebottom can be made effectively without benefit of, or at least without enthusiastic cooperation by, the Fourth Estate. The necessity for such a call is implicit in the recent statistics of prices, profits, and wage trends as recorded by Business Week. For the first nine months of 1933 the earnings of industry increased 160 per cent over the same period of 1932, while the farmers' gross income rose only 24 per cent and pay rolls decreased 3.2 per cent. The threat of a buyers' strike still looms. And when that happens, when the creatively psychéd Mr. Throttlebottom quits buying, then at last business-as-usual, even the advertising business, must stop, look, and listen.

The New Irish War

By AN IRISH OBSERVER

THE preliminaries to the present Irish situation may be told in a few sentences. Twelve years ago the treaty between Great Britain and Ireland was signed and the relations between the two countries were supposed to be settled permanently. For some ten years the Irish government respected the bond, while interpreting it freely. Then Mr. De Valera returned to power and one of his first actions was to hold back those annual payments on Irish land, bought from the landlords for distribution among the landless men, which are known as the land annuities. This, he said, he was legally entitled to do. He would not, however, discuss the matter except with an arbitration board chosen from outside the Empire. The British government refused to agree to such a board though it declared itself willing to consider a board drawn from within the Empire. From that point the situation has developed into a state of warfare between the two countries.

Tariffs on the British side have totally ruined our main export trade—cattle; while tariffs on the Irish side have hit several British industries. (In tariffs the British have to date collected all but £2,000,000 of the money thus due to them.)

The worst feature of this warfare, however, has been the gradual hardening of mind on the Irish side. Mr. De Valera proceeded to interpret the treaty even more loosely than before; he removed the Oath of Allegiance and the appeal to the Privy Council, he reduced the status of the Governor-General, and so on. Finally he has raised the old question of the treaty and declared that it must go body and bones. He has thus gone back to the fundamental question which the treaty was supposed to have settled and which the British naturally refuse to reopen. But no alteration in the treaty except such modifications as may be permissible under the Statute of Westminster is possible without the express desire of the people. That Mr. De Valera has guaranteed. He will consult them before he moves further.

If one wished, therefore, to be cynical one could say that the Irish situation has no real existence. It is purely hypothetical, and the source of the hypothesis is the doubt in the mind of the Irish people whether or not they want what Mr. De Valera wants them to want. There is no reality in Irish politics—yet. That will come when the people are definitely called upon to choose.

It is not surprising that the people should be confused. Ten years ago Mr. De Valera repudiated the treaty and by a majority vote the people repudiated him. To any other man, to any other people, that would be perfectly clear and final. The alternatives would be to accept the vote of the majority or to retire from the field of politics. Mr. De Valera and his party did neither. Characteristically he revolted against the despotism of the fact—and for once it might appear that he has revolted with success. For he revolted against ■ judgment of a people who do not themselves like to face facts. He set to work to persuade the people that they did not mean what they said, and all that has occurred in recent months is part and parcel of the persuasive process.

As he persuaded the people to elect him in 1932 as a treaty worker (the man who was in 1922 the treaty breaker), so he has succeeded by degrees in persuading the people to allow him to whittle away the treaty bit by bit, to rouse in the young folk all the hatred of England which was supposed to have passed with the "troubles," to raise again the cry of an Irish republic, and to wage an economic war with Great Britain—and finally he is in process of persuading them to bring back the old situation of pre-treaty days by refusing to recognize the treaty at all.

One must admire the tenacity and power of such a man. For ten years he fought against the fact of that treaty. He may end by wiping it out of existence—a sin against Ireland as it appears to him. It will be his day of triumph if and when he induces the Irish people to cry "Mea culpa," and take on their shoulders the inevitable penance that must follow on the definite acknowledgment of a change of mind. If he does so, it will be, incidentally, an exposure of the old fallacy that there is anything in the nature of a spontaneous national movement, another proof that all popular movements so called are merely the mass-expression of men of vision and power. It will make a mockery of democracy in Ireland for generations to come.

If one is willing to look at the present Irish situation from that point of view one will see at once why the alignment of parties is what it is. On the one side, the idealists led by Mr. De Valera, to wit, Fianna Fail. On the other side, the United Ireland Party, the men who originally accepted the treaty and membership in the Commonwealth of Nations—what one may call, is indeed obliged to call, the practical men of affairs. On the flank of Mr. De Valera, urging him on and on, is the Irish Republican Army, which at least is consistent in that it never accepted the treaty and, unlike Mr. De Valera, never pretended to work it. On the flank of the treaty party, the United Ireland Party, is the so-called Blue Shirt Army, whose leaders realize that Irish democracy is threatened by the very man who has set out to uphold it, but who have swung over to ■ left of their own and in despair favor secretly the establishment of a dictatorship. Last of all there is the official Labor Party, which has no political vision at all, is purely opportunist, and follows Mr. De Valera mainly for what it can get out of him for the workers.

The annuities are supposedly the bone of contention in the present Irish situation. They are not really. The question at bottom is the old question which Mr. De Valera's extraordinary will-power and personal attraction have managed to revive—that old question which was fought out for so many painful weeks in the autumn of 1921 in the Irish Dail: Shall Ireland accept the treaty or shall she not? Or, more accurately, shall Ireland repudiate the treaty she has signed or shall she accept it irrevocably?

It may be truly said that few people in Ireland today appear to care half so much what the answer to that question will be as that some final answer should at last be given to it. That, for example, is the attitude repeatedly taken by Frank MacDermot, the leader of the Farmers' Party, which recently merged into the United Ireland Party. He expresses the feeling widely observed in Ireland that it is ignoble to shilly-shally over a question that involves the honor of a nation.

It will naturally occur to the reader of this résumé that it is strange that an idealist party like Fianna Fail, Mr. De Valera's party, should contemplate the breaking of a treaty. According to Fianna Fail, however, the treaty was never accepted as a final settlement. Its signatories put their names to it under duress, and therefore it is not binding and no moral question or question of national honor is involved in the breaking of it. It may represent the surrender of an army, even of a generation, but it does not represent the surrender of a people.

A few days ago an interviewer got from Mr. De Valera a significant avowal—the import of which has so far been recognized by nobody. The week before, the President had been skirmishing with J. H. Thomas, attempting to get from him an admission that Ireland was free to make her own choice, to stay in the Commonwealth of Nations or to leave it as she chose, and Mr. Thomas had refused to be drawn. "Well," said Mr. De Valera to this journalist, "if there is no free choice there are no moral bonds. You do what you can do, then." Apply it to the treaty and you get his position. The treaty was not a free choice; it was accepted under duress; there is no moral bond.

Nobody will ever get ■ franker statement from Mr. De Valera as to his views than that. He wished to leave the Commonwealth and he was himself prepared to leave. He was asked if, in that case, he was prepared to pay the price, and he replied that Ireland expected no better treatment outside the Commonwealth than any other country would get, France or Denmark, for example. He was asked then whether, if an Irish republic were declared and internationally recognized, he would be satisfied with the North left out, and he replied in the negative.

Obviously he is ■ man who knows his own mind completely. He has thought it all out. Only on one point is he vague, and that concerns not his views but his intentions. And he can have no clear outlook as to his intentions simply because the choice rests finally not with him, who is strong, but with the electorate, which is weak. The electorate may be secretly thinking things out for itself now—one might say at the last moment—but if it is, then it is for the first time in the history of Irish politics. But it may also be thinking nothing out. It may be in that state of mind in which it will presently throw up its hands and leave the thinking to this amazing man who would like nothing better.

And there, truly, is the secret of Mr. De Valera's power over his people. He is the born apostle. He is the lay priest of politics. His habit is not so much to implement the wishes of his followers as to tell them what to do.

He is the typical Irish Catholic—rather Low Church, that is to say—in that he looks at things not from the point of view of men and women but from the point of view of angels and archangels. He would understand the mentality of the New England Puritan, with which he has several points in common. He thinks not in time but in eternity. He thinks much of honor, the worldly code, but far more of morals, the heavenly code. So that in the breaking of a bond he is less concerned with what is done than with what may be done. It is no use suggesting to him that "on ne fait pas ces choses," seeing that all questions with him are ultimately theological. It is a quality of mind entirely beyond the comprehension of the more downright Saxon mind. It involves many fine national traits and many ignoble ones. Between it and the mentality that respects the code of men there can be no sympathy.

In addition, he is respected universally because he possesses, as a man of the people, all the finer traits of the Irishman. He has courage. He has imagination. He lives in tradition and thinks in history. His private life is beyond reproach. He is a democrat. He came out of the simple life of the land and he thinks in terms of it and loves the people of it. He hates the modern machine age. His very austerity appeals. And he can occasionally lose his temper. Lastly, he is the traditional type of patriot—and even martyr. He would allow himself to be hanged, drawn, and quartered for Ireland.

The Irish are a young and in many ways unformed people, and their national character has not yet been consolidated in liberty. Like every other country they get the government they deserve. Between the practical, more worldly, more understandable government of President Cosgrave, and this visionary, rather difficile, idealistic government of De Valera it is easy enough to see the divided mind of the modern Irishman, the Irishman who, according to the British, wants to have it both ways but who, in a kinder judgment, is simply feeling his way toward a full national self-consciousness, a political philosophy of his own. The situation which is at present developing before his eyes is merely the articulation of one of the many problems with which he will be faced in the course of his history as a freedman. At the moment it is a question of whether he wants to be severely nationalistic or is prepared to be liberally international; and of how much and in what sort of coin he is prepared to pay for whichever brand of political philosophy he decides to adopt in the end.

For one thing, therefore, the Irish people may be eminently grateful to Mr. De Valera. He is forcing the pace of their mental development. To every periodical and newspaper in the English-speaking world which has again become interested in the Irish question the thing is merely a matter of an interesting crisis. But to the Irish it is far different. They are a people still passing through a revolution and to them there can be no static present. Everything is part of a process of becoming.

They have been badly served by all their leaders up to the present. The old Irish Parliamentary Party led them on their emotions for nearly fifty years, but with rare exceptions—such as Davitt, who was a constructive mind—it never appealed to their brains. This country should know that well, for here the habits and methods of that old Parliamentary Irish Party still linger on. Do we not know well the eloquent Irishman who has names for Ireland by the dozen and quotations by the score? You may hear them weaving their words about the pitiful vision of Cathleen ni Houlihan in chains any night of the year in their over-picturesquely christened clubrooms. They are the children of the "old gang" and they have all its faults and all its qualities. It was a party of great political acumen, no detachment, powerful oratorical gifts, no constructive ability, and not the shred of a political philosophy. The main thing they did was to propagandize the Irish cause so efficiently that there is not a country on the earth that is not familiar to some degree with the pantheon of Irish misery. They had great belief in their country's future and no program for it. They did little to educate Irish democracy.

All this the new generation of Sinn Fein realized fully, but they did not go far enough in remedying the lack by a long chalk. Instead, they developed a new vision of their own—the Ireland-to-Be instead of the Ireland-of-the-Past—and with statistics and diagrams they replaced the names and the quotations. Arthur Griffith proved to our satisfaction that we were being impoverished by English rule, but except by strongly believing in whole-hearted protection, nobody attempted to show us how to bring it about. Worst of all, Griffith no more attempted to develop a political philosophy than did the old party which he dethroned.

The result was what one might expect. The revolution found Ireland unprepared, and when liberty—or, to be cautious, a measure of it—came with the treaty, Ireland was in exactly the same position as the Russian Duma at the fall of the Czars. It felt the time had come to do things but it did not know what to do. Some things it has been clear about; the restoration of the national language, folklore, a native culture, the development of neglected industrial resources, and the harnessing of the Shannon are examples of constructive political thinking. Cautious experiments in protection had also been made before Mr. De Valera came to power and went whole-hog protectionist. But when these things had been done, the first native government stopped. It had set its house in order. It had set the machinery going. And that, apparently, was liberty. A people who had associated liberty with a state of the greatest emotional enthusiasm and with poetic names and highfalutin quotations and with nothing else could not be expected to like it. So we come back to the present situation, in which Ireland is at last being forced to define its own desires in terms of a practical world.

The only group which might be expected to help here, which might well have been expected to define autonomy beforehand, is the Irish Labor Party. Unhappily Irish Labor has produced only two big men during the last fifty years, Jim Larkin and Jim Connolly. It is the tragedy of Irish Labor that Connolly went over to nationalism in the nineteen hundreds, was shot in 1916, and has been treated ever since as a martyr whom everybody hears of and nobody reads; while Larkin was in Sing Sing during the revolution, has always been a practical man, opportunist in the best sense, has never lowered the red flag to wave the green, and therefore has little influence in a country so fervently nationalistic as Ireland. The history of Irish Labor has consistently been one of the swallowing of the little whale by the great whale, and anyone who wishes to read that history cannot do better than to take that fine work "Labor and Nationalism in Ireland," by Professor Clarkson of Brooklyn College of the City of New York, and study it with care. The key to the Irish problem is within the pages of that book. For the key to the present impasse is in the hands of the men and women who made Ireland by the sweat of their brows. If Ireland has any future it lies with neither of the political parties but in the hands of non-political labor.

The Two Wings of the Blue Eagle

III. The Wing upon the Right (cont.)

By JOHN STRACHEY

THE purpose of the preceding article in this series was to form an estimate of the permanent effect upon American capitalism of the New Deal. It was submitted that in respect of two of the innate and fatal tendencies of capitalism—namely, the overexpansion of credit and the breeding of monopoly—the New Deal intensifies those very features of the system which produced the last crash. Now the third factor which has been at the root of the trouble is the tendency to mechanization. It is obvious that closely associated with the concentration of capital, with the supplanting of dozens of small firms by a few giants, goes the drive to better and better, more and more mechanized methods of production. There is no need for me to enlarge on the length to which this tendency has already gone in America, or on the rapidity with which it is still moving. The technocrats, in spite of their alleged statistical carelessness and their utter inability to suggest anything sane to do about it, drew this picture very graphically. Quite the best and most up-to-date figures on this subject which I have seen are to be found, however, in Stuart Chase's article What Hope for the Jobless? in the November number of Current History. A more alarming piece of work can hardly be imagined. Mr. Chase picks out and puts into high relief the employment and production figures of the brief boom of last summer. Taking the 1923-25 levels of employment and production at 100, we find that at the worst moment of the slump, namely, last March, production had sunk to 56 and employment to 57. Then the dollar was unleashed. Production responded superbly. By June it was up to 92, almost back, that is, to the 1923-25 level. But employment only went back to 65.

I remember noting these figures at the time and guessing at their meaning. Mr. Chase has now remorselessly exposed that meaning.

What they mean, in a word, is that Mr. Roosevelt has had his boom. And that the new boom left the unemployment problem substantially untouched. Mr. Chase has worked out, with a wealth of care and caution, a prognosis from these facts, and he comes to the conclusion that even if the New Deal succeeds in producing, during the whole of 1934, a level of production better than that of last summer—a level of 100, equal to that of 1923-25—it will still leave from 9,000,000 to 12,000,000 American workers totally unemployed.

Mr. Chase gives one graphic example of the way the thing is working. The A. O. Smith Corporation of Milwaukee has just put in a new mill with a capacity to produce 10,000 motor-car frames per day. The old mill also produced 10,000 frames per day. But it employed 2,000 men in doing so. The new mill produces the same output with 200 men. Ninety per cent of the workers have been dispensed with at a blow. Eighteen hundred men have suddenly dropped straight out of the market. They have ceased to be consumers—of anything except State-provided groceries at any rate. The 2,000 men working A. O. Smith's old mill were all customers. You could sell them things. You could sell the better-paid of them, I dare say, radios and perhaps even some of the motor cars they were helping to make. But what a "prospect" for the enterprising salesman is provided by the new mill! Its iron hands have, I understand, superhuman deftness and intelligence. But it has no ears for the radio, nor does it drive a motor car. You cannot even sell it tooth paste.

This is, of course, an extreme case. But there is not the slightest doubt about the whole broad process of the replacement of "hungering, thirsting [also consuming] men" by non-consuming machines. Mechanization going hand in hand with monopoly is squeezing the market to nothing. Monopoly decimates the great staple market of the middle class. Mechanization cuts and cuts again into what market the workers themselves provided. Already it has driven 10,000,000 or 12,000,000 of them and their families out of the market altogether.

And now, for the third time, we must ask what will be the effect of the provisions of the NRA upon all this? Well, clearly, if you wish to check and delay the replacement of men by machines, then the vital thing is to make human labor as cheap as you can. If you wish to minimize the urge of the capitalist to produce with fewer workers, you must allow him to pay as little as he possibly can to each worker and to work him as long hours as possible. Then there will be some hope that when the capitalist comes to strike the balance, he will find that it will not pay him to purchase expensive new machines, and so cut down his wage bill. But what if you fix wage minima which are high, nominally at any rate, or maxima of hours which are undoubtedly lower than have been customary in America? What if, too, you forbid the capitalist to compete with his rivals by cutting prices? Obviously you give every capitalist the very maximum possible inducement to substitute machines for men. The NRA must, I should have thought, have sent every single struggling capitalist in the country searching desperately for new methods of eliminating wage workers. For not only has the NRA made hand workers a costly luxury, but it has canalized the whole force of inter-capitalist competition into the one field of higher and higher mechanization. For it has forbidden competition on wages, hours, or prices. Thus the only remaining form which the struggle between different capitalists for the shrinking market can take is the struggle for the best machines. And in this struggle the big capitalist must, of course, always win.

The influence of the NRA in this direction is already being felt; the process of mechanization has already, it seems, been accelerated. The New York Herald Tribune of September 12, for example, reported a boom in the stocks of machine companies. For the short hours imposed on white-collar workers have forced executives to be "on the lookout for ways to handle the same amount of bookkeeping without added expense." Similarly, in the industrial field, the New York Herald Tribune of September 25 announced "Machine Producers Report Large Gains," and told us that textile mills were seeking high-speed machinery in order to operate "under present high production costs."

There have been, I am informed, certain tentative provisions, in some of the codes, of an anti-mechanization nature. There has been some gesture toward the idea of checking by agreement the drive toward more and more automatic methods of production. But, moving about the country, I could find no evidence whatever that anything effective had been done in this direction. And now I see that General Johnson himself has repudiated with scorn the view that the Blue Eagle would lend itself to anything so reactionary as the checking of American technical progress.

It is now time to sum up our conclusions on the NRA. In the first article we concluded that the inflationary side of the New Deal, though spectacular, was at bottom neither here nor there. America will, at my guess, go through the mill of inflation. But quite certainly this will do nothing whatever to produce a new, more orderly, or more stable form of capitalism. In the two following articles we have attempted some analysis of the main provisions of the New Deal. Do the codes and the other regulations, taken together, represent any step toward socialism or even toward a new organized, integrated form of capitalism? Our submission has been that on the contrary they represent merely an intensification of the three great innate tendencies of the capitalist system—namely, the drive to reckless, unplanned credit expansion, the drive toward monopoly, and the drive toward mechanization. And these are just the three things which caused the last slump. These are the three factors which, by increasing the appalling gap between the power of the capitalists to produce and the power of the workers to consume, by piling up an unparalleled concentration of wealth at one end of the social system and an unparalleled mass of misery and starvation, of "non-consumption," at the other end, finally make the operation of the whole system impossible.

To put the matter in the much-abused but none the less indispensable terminology of Marxism, the New Deal intensifies to an unparalleled degree the main contradiction of capitalism. Far from making for that mythical entity, an "organized capitalism," the New Deal is simply a part of the general transformation, which is going on all over the world today, of capitalism from its older, free-market form into its newer, monopoly, or imperialist, form.

And with the introduction of the word "imperialist" we come to the next important step in the argument. Since the New Deal only impoverishes the internal market still more, since it closes more and more rapidly all remaining avenues for the disposal of their commodities at home, what way out does it leave for the capitalists? It leaves open the alternative of disposing of their products abroad. It leaves open the alternative of imperialism. Whatever the New Deal ushers in for America, it inaugurates for the rest of the world an outward drive of American imperialism on a scale and with an intensity of which the world has hitherto had no experience.

It is extraordinary to watch the remorseless action of this economic reality upon the policies of the Roosevelt Administration. I should imagine that as far as personal opinions are concerned, the present Cabinet is one of the least imperialist or aggressive which the United States has ever had. And yet there can be no doubt that the exigencies of the economic situation have driven Mr. Roosevelt and his ministers along a course which is leading them into ever more violent conflict with the rest of the world.

This conflict has expressed itself in the consciousness of the Administration by the discovery that its internal economic policy is incompatible with any form of international cooperation. Within a few months of the President's inauguration this fact forced itself on his attention. He had not the slightest hesitation in destroying all possibility of world economic cooperation in order to push on the monetary part of the New Deal. Moreover, it is significant that the particular form of inflation which Mr. Roosevelt and his advisers have adopted is of the most imperialist and aggressive type imaginable. The forced depreciation of the dollar in terms of foreign currencies, before there has been any corresponding rise in the American price level, is undeniably equivalent to a pro rata increase in the American tariff and a pro rata bounty on all American exports. This is a virulently aggressive economic policy; and it is evidently being steadily pursued by the Administration.

Naturally, all manner of cries and lamentations are arising in London and Paris as the full effect of the depreciation of the dollar and the consequent forcing of American exports upon the world markets is felt. These protests will grow more and more frenzied; Lombard Street and the Bourse will more and more accuse the American government of taking the most unfair advantage of them. President Roosevelt will hardly, however, be deflected from his chosen course by such protests, for he has a perfect answer to them. And this is to ask the self-righteous British capitalists where it was that he learned this policy of forced currency depreciation. For he learned it in the bank parlor of the Bank of England. In plain words, Great Britain, ever since she went off the gold standard in 1931, has been playing precisely the same game with the pound as President Roosevelt is now playing with the dollar. The British created what they called, politely, the "Exchange Equalization Fund." The purpose of this fund was not, however, to equalize the exchange, whatever that may mean, but to hold down the pound to the advantageously low level to which it fell in the autumn of 1931.

The pound stayed down until America went off the gold standard. This event occurred while Mr. MacDonald was, as he put it, "all at sea." (He merely meant that he was crossing the Atlantic.) By this stroke Mr. Roosevelt wiped out the differential advantage which the British exporters had achieved. But he has not been content with that; he is now steadily driving the dollar down until the American exporters in their turn obtain a substantial advantage. In doing so he is merely teaching the British that two can play at this game.

Thus there is no question whatever of there being any right or wrong about the embittered economic struggle which is going on between Britain and America, and between America and every other exporting capitalist nation, for that matter. (Japan has pushed the policy of exchange depreciation much farther than either Britain or America.) What has happened is that the comparatively feeble and obsolete economic weapons of the tariff, the export bounty, and the other established devices of economic nationalism have been superseded by the incomparably sharper weapon of competitive exchange depreciation. The technique of economic warfare is evidently advancing quite as rapidly as the technique of actual war. Just as the machine-gun, the flame-thrower, and the super-bomber have superseded the musket and the bayonet, so currency depreciation has superseded the tariff or the export bounty.

It is only too obvious, however, that there is no clear line of demarcation between the two kinds of warfare. The economic struggle between the great capitalist empires of today passes inevitably into actual armed strife. It has already done so in the case of Japan, and the one prophecy which we can make without hesitation is that war is fast approaching between the other major empires. War is approaching, it is vital to realize, not because anybody wants it, not because the capitalists underestimate the risk to themselves of a new war, not because of the plots of the armament makers (though these are real enough), but because the economic situation of each capitalist state is so desperate that policies have to be adopted which injure vitally the interests of every rival.

The New Deal is no exception to this rule. Designed, I have no doubt, purely as a measure of internal recovery, its authors have discovered, to their sincere surprise, that it involves an assault upon the interests of every other capitalist state. They are committed to it; they cannot turn back. An inexorable destiny is driving America to take step after step along the road which leads to the next war.

[This is the last of a series of three articles by Mr. Strachey.]

The Russian Revolution in Clothes

By MARGARET GREEN

THE Soviets have discarded tradition in clothes as well as in ideas. As a result they are in a way to evolve altogether new styles along with a new society. Moreover, certain practical considerations point in the same direction. Since citizens are not allowed to leave the country, they cannot return with clothes from Vienna, Paris, New York, or Shanghai. They cannot order them from abroad because they have no valuta (rubles cannot be changed into foreign money). Newcomers bring foreign clothes with them, but the clothes, along with the people who wear them, are so quickly adapted and absorbed that they make very little impression.

Although fashion magazines seep into the country and the Soviet Government actually prints a fashion magazine containing direct copies of these foreign styles, there is very little evidence that they have any influence. The reason, I think, is that they seem incongruous with Soviet life. Several times I stopped at newsstands and turned over the various publications; and every time I picked up the fashion magazine the salesgirl and I laughed together at its styles, so remote were they from Russian life as it is.

It might be supposed that the thousands of tourists passing through the country would introduce the styles of the outside world, but three reasons militate against it. The natives look at the clothes of foreigners with interest. Women, and sometimes men, on the streets, street-cars, and trains touched the material in my suits and remarked that it was very good. They even admired my clothes, but in the same way as we might admire the royal robes of Orientals. How beautiful, how beautifully made, we say. They are finer than anything we have; we may even admit that they are more becoming to more people, and more comfortable than our clothes. We may wish quite honestly that we wore clothes like theirs, but, if they should give us the most gorgeous suit, we would not wear it on the street. It is much easier to wear clothes like those of the people we associate with. One day in Moscow I saw some calico in a store and it came to me that I should like to buy a few yards and make a simple dress such as Russian women wear. I realized that if I stayed I should want to be very much like others.

The Russians will not copy foreign styles because they are not imitators. It is true that they talk much about equaling and surpassing other countries in technique, but that does not imply imitation. They want to develop their best talents in their own way. Wherever you look in Moscow, you will see people doing things in their own way. One day on a bus I noticed that the man in front of me had put his ticket inside his ear—not behind it, but inside as though it were a wad of cotton. That was an original idea. His pockets were full of bottles of oil, his hands held a gunny sack of potatoes and three loaves of bread. Probably living in a room with five or ten other people had developed his ingenuity; and certainly, on looking him over, I could see no other possible place for the ticket. What would an American have done under the same circumstances? He would have looked slavishly around to see whether other people were sticking their tickets straight or crooked in the fronts or sides of their hat bands.

In the Soviet Union one is not judged by one's clothes. In Moscow and Petrograd one soon learns that people in the shabbiest clothes or even in ridiculous clothes are to be entrusted with passports or anything one has; that they are to be found in the big, red-papered offices of high officials. Not only poor clothes but good clothes as well go unnoticed. The Russians are not clothes conscious. I soon learned to look not at clothes but at faces. The first time I walked down a Leningrad street among people who were barefooted or wore miserable shoes I felt that I must be conspicuously well dressed—I had felt well dressed in the same clothes two weeks before on Fifth Avenue. A girl spoke to me and I was flattered. She pointed to my hair and then to hers, plainly indicating that she wished hers was curly. As we walked along together she felt of my silk suit and picked at her own funny little dress, saying that mine was very good and hers very poor. She wanted to know how I held up my stockings, and I showed her right there on the crowded street. Then thinking she might like to see an American woman's wardrobe, I asked her to come to my room, and we entered the spacious October Hotel where men and women miserably clothed were passing in and out with perfect assurance.

Lola, my new friend, took in her hands eagerly the first dress I showed her. "Crêpe de Chine," she said admiringly. She knew the words. But she did not hold the dress up in front of herself to get the effect. Immediately she turned it wrong side out and examined the seams. Then she said that it was all made by machinery, even the embroidery on the sleeves. That I-wonder-how-I-would-look-in-it expression with which American women look at each other's clothes was absent. Instead, I think something like this was running through her mind: "Some day we too will have crêpe de Chine dresses made by machines."

She did not seem interested in seeing more than the one dress but she wanted to examine my shoes. She put her hand inside and said how well they were made. Then she took off her own poor little shoes, padded inside with wads of cloth. Her plump little feet that matched her rounded body were covered with socks knit by hand of something almost as coarse as our wrapping twine. I had brought with me two pearl necklaces from Woolworth's to give as presents in the land where tips are insults. I gave one to Lola—and I brought the other one back with me. She put it on, but she did not turn her head toward the mirror to see how she looked in pearls.

I told her they came from New York, and she wanted to know how high the buildings are in New York and how long the hours of the office workers. She is a bookkeeper in a factory. She is young, but she is more interested in ideas than in dresses. When it came to ideas we had language difficulties. She had been speaking Russian and I English, an arrangement not impossible for our women's exchanges. Just then a guide came in and interpreted for us. Lola had her explain to me that when she had met me on the street she was looking for a place to have her hair curled and had asked directions of me, not noticing that I was a foreigner. She had not noticed my New York suit!

Much of my time in Russia I spent with a guide, and many times I meant to say to her: "Katherine, in America there is a saying, 'Better be dead than out of style,' and it is literally true for many people. What would you say to that?" But day after day the question stuck in my throat. I could not let her know I was thinking such trivial things. She was quite suitably dressed herself, but she is one who takes off her clothes at night and puts them on in the morning; you could not call the process dressing.

Do the women in Russia dress for men? I asked them, and they said no. And at times I was almost persuaded. But if women do not dress for men, I said to myself, and men are not attracted by clothes, then the best-dressed men will be seen with the most poorly dressed girls. But it is not so. From all I could observe, the men and women who chose each other were dressed on much the same scale of expense and fashion, which showed me that clothes, even when they are not good ones, do represent the people who wear them. A real attempt is made to dress up for the theater, and pride in clothes is apparent when, between the acts, couples go round and round the lobby arm in arm. Such pitiful attempts at dressing up—a baby-blue taffeta dress with the gores and ruffles of thirty years ago, silk stockings sewed up terribly, and bedroom slippers! But of course they were not pitiful to themselves, because they compare their clothes with each other's, not with those of outsiders. Once a nurse asked me to go to the opera with her and a friend of hers, a young doctor. They had an extra ticket.

She said, "Please wear a good dress." Then gently, as though I were an injured patient, she asked, "Have you a good dress?" If I had told her how much I had spent in New York for the suit I had on! And she was asking me if I had a good dress! And I had been feeling sorry for the Russians!

The country has been cleared of bourgeois clothes during sixteen years of struggle. None are left except a few pieces of lace sometimes seen on little boys' coats and a few black silk dresses for old ladies. The new clothes will evolve from the needs and desires of the people and not from the styles of a royal court or of foreign countries. To what extent those influences have determined style in the past, museums and books on costume demonstrate. Style in the Soviet Union will not be at the mercy of fashion dictators who are at the mercy of silk manufacturers or cotton growers. The new styles will be simple. They will be based on utility, in that respect following a fundamental principle of art.

Will there be uniformity and therefore monotony in the Russian clothes of the future? I think not. Even their present garments, poor as they are, show personality. There is no reason why the people should lose their capacity for expression. And if the dresses come from the factories too much alike to suit a Soviet woman with original tastes, she can write her protest to Pravda. Moreover, she can design clothes herself and submit the designs. If she proves capable, she may design the staple dresses for thousands of women and so raise the style level. At any time she will be free to buy material and make any sort of costume she chooses.

What may the Russians not do for the whole world in clothes? Especially for the men, I hope they will do something graceful. Men do not look right sitting down in their suits and they all look alike standing up. They might as well be in boxes. The Tolstoy or Russian blouses are a good starting-point.

In the Driftway

ACCORDING to William Seagle and William Gropper truth is not only stranger than fiction but also much funnier. In a book called "There Ought to Be a Law" Mr. Seagle has collected and Mr. Gropper has illustrated some of the sillier laws which with due solemnity have been inscribed upon the statute books of the various States and still remain there. The book opens with a quotation from Ambrose Bierce: "In the time of Henry III, of England, a law was made which prescribed the death penalty for 'kyllynge, woundynge, or mamynge' a fairy, and it was universally respected." And the quotation fairly indicates the intelligence and imagination which inform the laws to which this book is dedicated.

* * * * *

NO proud native son, whatever his State, can feel superior. As Mr. Seagle points out in his introduction: "The most frequently represented States in the present Oxford anthology of American laws are neither Tennessee nor Mississippi but such great civilized States as Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Connecticut, and New York." His explanation of the phenomenon of idiotic and unenforceable legislation lays part of the blame at a door which must by now be practically buried in various and sundry blames, namely, Puritanism. "The Puritans," he says, "were never bothered very much by the problem of the enforceability of legislation. It was enough for them that an Evil existed. . . . Puritan laws have always been in essence declarations of moral disapproval rather than commands." Another reason, he thinks, lies in the democratic ideal, "a government of laws, not men," which has tended to give American legislation a highly particularistic character. Still another and very pungent reason he finds in the low intellectual content of most State legislatures.

THE Drifter has the space to repeat only a few of the choicest laws, and he can give no adequate idea whatever of the humor and point of William Gropper's drawings. Suffice it to say that the well-known Gropper feet and faces are shown in some of the funniest attitudes they have ever assumed. So far as laws go, a statute of Ohio makes it a felony for an instructor of roller skating to seduce a female pupil. In Pennsylvania "it shall be unlawful for any person to use any cannon, gun, revolver, or other explosive device at any serenade of any wedding." In North Carolina "a special law has been enacted to permit bus companies to furnish free transportation to blind preachers." A law of New Mexico makes it a misdemeanor for the warden of a penitentiary to allow a convict to leave the institution on election day in order to vote. In California poverty is a crime, for "every person found sleeping or lodging in . . . any room or apartment which contains less than 500 cubic feet of space in the clear for each person so occupying such room or apartment is guilty of a misdemeanor." But perhaps the best example of misplaced legislative zeal is to be found in an Ohio law entitled "An Act to Protect Employers of Stenographers," which makes it a misdemeanor for a stenographer to divulge the character or contents of an employer's dictation.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Free Speech with No Exceptions

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

"I don't believe in lynching—but these kidnappers, Holmes and Thurmond deserved it." That was the invariable answer I received from people of about the mental status of tabloid readers. In a way this seems also to be the attitude of your correspondents in the December 20 issue of The Nation. They believe in free speech, but—and as soon as "but" is added to free speech, its death knell is sounded. Let me remind your correspondents that during the years of the war and the palmy days of the Honorable A. Mitchell Palmer, the right of free speech was similarly attacked and considerably curtailed. In those days the slogan was: "We believe in free speech, but not in free license."

It seems to me that the libel and slander laws, both civil and criminal, of the various States should be adequate protection against such false and slanderous statements as the Hitlerites have uttered against the Jews in Germany. One example in this country seems to stand out. I am referring to the action in libel brought by Aaron Sapiro against Henry Ford in the federal courts at Detroit. True, this case did not proceed to judgment, but I doubt that Mr. Ford would have settled this action had his attorneys not been convinced that the plaintiff had more than a fair chance to succeed on trial. Perhaps our libel and criminal laws are in need of revision or amendment, but under no circumstances must such revision or amendment infringe upon our constitutional right to free speech. The point is that if we believe in our government, a legal course must be pursued. Miss Gruening says that free speech does not actually exist for large portions of our population. This is only too true. But shall we who are in favor of free speech for Communists, Socialists, and others show the same bigotry and narrow-mindedness as reactionaries simply because Hitler's agents want to preach something entirely repugnant to our doctrines?

The Nation and the American Civil Liberties Union are to be congratulated upon their unflinching stand in favor of free speech. Only by consistently favoring and actively fighting for freedom of thought and expression can we ever approach anything like true justice for all people within our borders.

New York, December 19

PHILIP GLABERMAN

"Fit to Print"

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Your editorial in the issue of December 13 entitled Fit to Print came with particular pertinence to the members of at least the two universities mentioned who had in hundreds braved the freezing weather of the night of December 12 to participate in the anti-fascist demonstration which marked Hans Luther's appearance as guest speaker at the Institute of Arts and Sciences, a Columbia unit. What our reputedly most accurate journals consider news becomes a vital matter when their importance to the general public is carefully judged. Prejudicial reporting of crucial events in the only alive and progressive student movement in America is a pernicious evil which it is difficult to fight. The Times has now against its name for fairness and impartiality not only its neglect of the New York University Anti-War Conference and its somewhat peculiar emphasis on Dr. Butler's message as the focal point of the first session of the Columbia conference, but also its misleading statement concerning the anti-Luther demonstration, which declared approximately that if it had not been for the cold, many more students would undoubtedly have taken part in the rally.

It disregarded the fact that many more students than one thousand cannot very well be confined to the one street corner where, in violation of their constitutional right of assemblage, the seventy or eighty instructed police officers chose to confine them by physical force. The news of that evening was not, obviously, the apologetic and ridiculous remarks of the Nazi ambassador, but the vigorous display of anti-fascist sentiment among students from all parts of the city. For fair reports of that Tuesday night one had to turn to the so-called "yellow journals"—the News, the Mirror, the Evening Journal.

New York, December 14

GERTRUDE EPSTEIN

Theodor Lessing

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Theodor Lessing was murdered on August 30, 1933, at Marienbad. The crime committed has made the whole cultural world indignant and has shaken its conscience. Theodor Lessing died for many. His work must live on. His own words were: "No one can or should today withdraw from danger. Therefore I do not feel myself endangered at Marienbad. Perhaps I can be more useful in death than I was in life."

The immeasurable wealth of this mind and this soul embodied in many writings can only be safeguarded if the work of the great thinker and poet is collected and made available for everyone. We intend to found a Theodor Lessing House, an institute in which all the writings of Theodor Lessing will be edited with the cooperation of congenial minds, for whom this Lessing House will become a place for work and who will make it an asylum for all independent philosophers. Our first intention is the publication in all leading languages of his not yet edited writings, among them an autobiography.

To carry on these tasks a Theodor Lessing Fund will be created in Prague. We appeal to all those for whom the work and the doctrine of Theodor Lessing have been of significance, to all those who desire that an infamous murder shall not triumph over the spirit, to promote the realization of these aims. In this behalf contributions are asked, payable to the "Lessing Fund Account" through the National City Bank, New York, or the Chase National Bank, New York.

F. X. SALDA, ROMAIN ROLLAND, OTTO KAR
FISCHER, ALBERT EINSTEIN, MAX BROD, JUDAH MAGNES, HUGO BERGMANN

New York, December 15

No Fun to Be Single

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

The writer of these lines is fifty years old, single, and a graduate of a European university. He has been an American citizen for many years. During his stay in America he was employed in research and developing work. Three years ago he lost his position and life savings by bank failures and stock-market crashes. He is now greatly in debt and unable to secure work because he is single. All federal and State employment agencies take care of men with dependents or young people.

May the privilege be granted to the writer through your nation-wide circulation to be informed whether single men are less desirable in the human race and society and deserve exclusion from an honest livelihood? Single people left adrift without any chance for employment, reduced in the number of relatives, if any, on whom to call for help, deprived of all sympathetic and moral encouragement that family ties offer, should be able to count upon fair consideration from the government.

Pittsburgh, Pa., December 18 PAUL SCHNURMANN

White-Collar Workers

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Not once in the six years' existence of the Office Workers' Union have we called for public assistance in our work of organizing white-collar workers; even during the past three years of unemployment our own members have generously supported all our activities. Today, however, we find ourselves in need of about $300 which we cannot possibly raise from the members of the union, almost all of whom have had their salaries slashed and a great many of whom are either partially or totally unemployed.

At the present time we are conducting energetic campaigns of organization in the department stores and in Wall Street, and have assisted in organizing the Dry Goods Workers' Union. Only with some outside assistance can we possibly complete the plans for organization worked out by our executive board for the next three months.

New York, November 30

JAY ENGLE
Emergency Finance Committee

Help: Financial Hindrance!

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

I am teaching English to boys and girls at my place. I was sent some copies of the New York Times and London Times from a friend of mine. I read them with great interest and much pleasure and I got some material for English teaching from them. To my great regret I am not able to subscribe to the New York Times and the London Times financial hindrance. It is my hearty desire that any of your readers will kindly send me her or his London Times or New York Times in order to help me in English teaching and good English learning.

SEITARO MATSUBA

Tanabecho Nishimurogun, Wakayamalsen, Japan

Free Thought in Cleveland

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

The Cleveland Free Thought College has been established for two months. Our activities include lectures, debates, and classes in public speaking. We are also trying to build a library and we maintain a reading room which is open nightly. We wish to extend an invitation to all Nation readers in Cleveland and vicinity to attend our activities.

If any of your readers have books or pamphlets on Free Thought which they could contribute to our library, we should greatly appreciate receiving them.

Cleveland, December 1

ADELAIDE SCHUSTER

The Medical Bureau

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

The strides of the Soviet Union in medicine, prophylaxis, and public-health service have been great; but problems always arise, and help and advice from friendly American sources will be invaluable. An organization is therefore being formed for the exchange of discoveries and conclusions in medical research in the two countries. This organization will be called the Medical Bureau. The Medical Bureau will model itself on the Technical Bureau, a highly successful organization of friendly American engineers who for over a year have been rendering voluntary, non-remunerative consulting services to Soviet factories, farms, and scientific institutes. The Medical Bureau will be an affiliate of the Friends of the Soviet Union.

Members of the allied medical professions who are interested in the development of the closest scientific and fraternal relations between Soviet and American medical scientists, and hence in the formation of the Medical Bureau, are invited to write for additional information to the Medical Bureau, Room 330, 80 East Eleventh Street, New York.

P. L. CARSON, W. MENDELSON, A. H.
WOLFSON, W. WINACOUR, S. ROSE, The Provisional Committee; IDA WOLFSON,
Executive Secretary

New York, December 20

Samuel Guy Inman

will sum up and analyze the work of the recent Pan-American Conference at Montevideo in next week's issue of The Nation

Books, Music, Drama

Poem

By LINCOLN REIS

It was my confusion to love quickly,
I, who had intended caution in friendship,
While you, ignoring design, discovered darkness,
Touched finger with finger,
And I was no Anthony inclined to a miracle.
Silence announced our meetings; with lips that moistened
Shapeless in desire, wit could find no word,
Conceit no phrase to echo wonder; but you
Continued to end innocence with a glance.
Here with no presence, with distinction lost,
And your person shadow to contradiction,
I would exhibit virtue, assert
No influence to sense; but memory
Dissolving into contact, ends distance with body
Or speaks of color, memory become seal to desire.

Archibald MacLeish

Poems 1924-1933. By Archibald MacLeish. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.

THIS book, as the poet tells us, is not a collected edition of his poems but a reprint of such poems from Mr. MacLeish's various earlier books as he himself chooses to preserve. "The Hamlet of A. MacLeish" is here, "Conquistador," all but one poem of "New Found Land," and several new poems not before printed. "Pot of Earth," one of Mr. MacLeish's earliest poems, is also reprinted. And the poet chooses, evidently, to preserve his attack on many elements in American society in "Frescoes for Mr. Rockefeller's City."

Now everyone knows that Archibald MacLeish has of late frequently been called upon to state and to defend his political position. And most readers of poetry know that Mr. MacLeish is a lyrical poet, not an expert satirist or a social theorist. His art has been injured by his compulsion to fight—in poetry—when, obviously, his is not the mind or the technique of the controversialist. Let us, then, examine his work without regard for anything but its artistry and its poetic message.

Archibald MacLeish's technique is of unquestionable excellence. He is one of the fine lyric poets of our times. He has experimented with rhymes and has made of the terza rima the perfect medium for his purposes in "Conquistador." One can trace the development of his art—despite his statement that he cares nothing about this evolution—by returning to the fragile improvisations in lyric form which he included in "Streets in the Moon" and excluded from this final volume. MacLeish has completely worked out the ways and means whereby poetry of statement can become the largely undramatic and almost purely lyrical instrument for conveying the story of emotion—this being what his narratives are. His music is, on the whole, much closer to Pound's in the more lyrical "Cantos" than to Eliot's.

MacLeish's imagery and syntax are not original in themselves. This type of imagery and syntax is fairly characteristic of the whole "Waste Land" school. But MacLeish's use of the same general type of imagery and syntax as Eliot's and Pound's is his own. His imagery, consisting very largely of simple comparisons and the use of descriptive adjectives—an imagery which shows no particular richness of association, intellectual or sensuous—is perfectly adapted both to poetry of simple statement and to parallelistic structure in poetry. MacLeish has relaxed syntax. He points, in his shaping of sentences, not toward any condensing or hardening of the English sentence, but toward a classical balancing of clause against clause, phrase against phrase—toward, therefore, the inclusion rather than the exclusion of many prepositions and connectives. Our language uses phrases and clauses as attachments to the body of the sentence, and connectives are links indicating the grammatical relationship. MacLeish, using clause balanced against clause, phrase against phrase, linking his ideas frequently by an "and" or an "or," develops, not the poetic paragraph (like Milton's), but the long-lined and parallel rhythm of simple descriptive and, to some extent, repetitive statement. This form of statement and rhythm is the best medium for the nostalgic repeating of lost instances of beauty.

Someone has pointed out that in English poetry the elements of rhyme, repeated rhythms, and rich or exotic imagery come more or less from the influence of the Romance languages and verse forms; that the elements of abrupt rhythm, clipped speech, action, and realistic imagery are of Anglo-Saxon origin. MacLeish seems to be curiously aware of these two influences in our poetic language. He employs them separately. Passages in "The Hamlet" are very like Anglo-Saxon, rhythmically and in statement. But in his lyrics and his lyrical narratives MacLeish moves away from Anglo-Saxon rhymes, clipped dramatic speech, and boldly realistic imagery. Here he holds to simple statement of emotion, often descriptive, to a loose sentence structure, and to colorful imagery, never exactly complex or lush but serving as an embroidery and a repetition of his theme. Thus he combines the usual essentials of narrative verse with those of lyrical verse, and his overemphasis on the lyrical side is just sufficient to prevent him from being a dramatic storyteller; it is not so strong as to dwarf his ability to tell a tale in episodic moments of beauty.

In his narratives and in his lyrics MacLeish employs a speaker who tells the tale. This speaker is almost never, at the moment, an actor in the story. He is indulging simply in nostalgic day-dreaming over a lost past. What effect has this on the reader? What mood does this use of the narrator induce? The reader reacts with a similar nostalgia, that of recollection. The reader is not thrust into the immediate action. He is called upon to recollect passion, beauty, heroism. This he does, but only after he is persuaded into the mood of the poem by the music of the poem. Then MacLeish's pictures of lost power and loveliness begin to pervade his senses. If the reader is in an active, decisive state of mind, he may resist both the poet's music and his nostalgia, and surely he will resist the poet's philosophy.

MacLeish's nostalgia is less dramatic than Eliot's, in a sense less passionate. It is not the fatuous and repetitive day-dreaming of Aiken. In his general attitude toward life MacLeish again resembles Pound of the many lyric poems. To the general feeling of defeat prevalent among these poets of the past he has contributed only one idea—that the American poet must return to his own land, cannot remain in exile. Though in his own land he be unhappy, there he must stay or be rootless. MacLeish states that he speaks to his own lost generation and wishes to speak to no one else. Certainly he sums up the feelings of that generation. He states their sad desire to retreat and their inability quite to neglect the present. MacLeish's strongest passion is a sense of irrevocable loss. He recognizes only to reject the almost violent images which the world presents of gains that must be made.

What we seem to need today, leaving aside for once all questions of a poet's sociological outlook, is the poet like Hopkins who can develop richer powers of association in language, more exactness and directness of expression, the poet who is a whole man and not a cripple sensuously or intellectually. Whatever that poet's particular philosophy might be, so long as it was based on an intellectual incisiveness and a direct rather than a remote or oblique awareness of sensuous delight in the actual world, he would have something to say to the present generation.

All the poets of the "Waste Land" school have been crippled. They have developed, therefore, an amazing precocity in sensations of suffering and defeat, a passionate life in letters. But they are not whole. They could not be. They have developed a superb technique for poetry, but they have also inevitably chosen a philosophy of despair and a nostalgia for the past. In MacLeish this philosophy has influenced imagery, syntax, rhythm, and in his poems it is so fused with these elements as to find almost perfect expression. Poets may, to be sure, write of whatever they please, must certainly write whatever they feel most, but no school of poetry which so perfectly expresses one generation of people as does MacLeish's is likely to express another, younger generation as well. So we progress.

EDA LOU WALTON

Homo Nordicus—U.S.A.

The Conquest of a Continent, or the Expansion of Races in America. By Madison Grant. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.

AS is fitting, this volume—a profession of faith and the exposition of the tenets of that faith—is introduced by one who has long battled at the side of the author for racial purity and the higher civilization. "The character of a country depends upon the racial character of the men and women who dominate it," begins this word of praise from Henry Fairfield Osborn, who continues as follows:

My faith is unshaken in the ultimate beneficial recognition of racial values and in the stimulating and generous emulation aroused by racial consciousness. . . . I set great store by the great mass of documentary evidence assembled by Grant in the present volume. I think it explodes the bubble of the opponents of racial values, that they are merely myths. The theme of the present work is that America was made by Protestants of Nordic origin and that their ideas about what makes true greatness should be perpetuated. That this is a precious heritage which we should not impair or dilute by permitting the entrance and dominance of alien values and peoples of alien minds and hearts. . . . I stand with the author not only in nailing his colors to the mast but in giving an entirely indisputable historic, patriotic, and governmental basis to the fact that in origin and evolution our country is fundamentally Nordic.

Thus the distinguished paleontologist leads the reader to the expectation of great things. This, however, is unfortunately not realized, for instead of a documented presentation of data, one finds only page after page of historical generalizations and anthropological errors. The book, indeed, has no documentation at all, unless the eighteen-page bibliography be so regarded, and even these titles, the sources from which material for a "racial" interpretation of American history has presumably been drawn, do not bear close analysis. Not only does one miss the names of most students—of no matter what type of theoretical complexion—who have worked in the field of race, but also the names of numerous outstanding American historians.

Beginning with the "cradle of mankind," the author envisages a process of racial differentiation that is in direct contradiction to the more widely accepted contemporary scientific position. Characterizing this position as "old-fashioned," it is thus maintained that the process which Mr. Grant envisages has produced types of mankind so distinct that they must be regarded as different species rather than races. Even after admitting that "race is hard to define," and recognizing the extensiveness of race crossing, the author does not hesitate to interpret not only American but human history in terms of this very word. Inevitably, the book is not the more easily understandable for this and other lapses from logic that characterize it. Thus, Mr. Grant, though apparently quite in accordance with the position held by authorities that "it is unsafe to attribute the inception of any cultural feature to a given race," and with its corollary, that to mark a physical type because of its language or social behavior leads to error, finds no difficulty in maintaining the thesis that American culture has been determined by the "Nordic Protestantism" of a single group in the population. Similarly, in discussing the "racial" types which he claims characterize the several States of the Union, he is able to take the fact that many of the people of Louisiana do not claim English as their native tongue and are followers of the Catholic church as a reproach to their Americanism.

Space does not permit restatement, to say nothing of quotation, of point after point of opinion in this "documented" presentation. It is with some regret that the temptation to detail discussions of immigration and segregation laws, of rules for registration and deportation of aliens, of the countries to the north and south of the United States, and of the white man's burden must be forgone. It may merely be stated that the work is of the type which, exemplified in earlier books by this same author and by those who agree with him, raised such a storm of scholarly protest as to justify the feeling that the last of them had been seen. Such works, however, are apparently still being written.

MELVILLE J. HERSKOVITS

Distinguished Failure

De Vriendt Goes Home. By Arnold Zweig. The Viking Press. $2.50.

LIKE "Sergeant Grischa," Zweig's latest book portrays an individual tragedy against a background of social conflict. "De Vriendt Goes Home" is only superficially a novel of Zionism. Departing from the realism of the earlier work, Zweig uses the locale of Palestine and the specific conflicts of the Zionist movement as a means to project the story in semi-allegorical terms, exploring those ultimate issues that confront the poet and philosopher rather than the propagandist for any immediate cause. As in "Grischa," the question at issue is justice; but where the emphasis there was on the injustice that a mass upheaval may work in the individual destiny, "De Vriendt" takes up the problem of justice in the formal sense. There is the symbolic figure of the English secret-service agent who tracks down a murderer, only to condone the crime in the end, and set the murderer free. Here, as in Wassermann's "Maurizius Case," the justified crime forms the theme, and a poetic and ethical insight is opposed to the conventional judgments of society.

De Vriendt, the protagonist, is a strange and complex personality, a man whose psychic predicament might serve as material for the writing of a modern "Faust." An orthodox Dutch Jew, a member of the Agudists—the most fanatical and mystical of the orthodox sects—he is secretly involved in a homosexual relationship with an Arab boy. This pagan love creates an inner conflict that he cannot resolve, and he appeases his sense of guilt by writing a long and blasphemous poem called "The Trial of God." Outwardly, however, he remains the medieval Agudist, in bitter conflict with the modern spirit of Zionism, and an enemy of all secularization of Jewish life. He instigates a plan to alienate British support from the Zionists, to form an alliance with the Arabs, and to renounce the Jewish claim to possession of the Wailing Wall. Publication of the plan infuriates all camps. The Arabs, ripe for uprising, hail De Vriendt as the instrument of God. The Zionists denounce him as a traitor; the English secret service prepares to seclude him, knowing that his murder will be the signal for chaos. With the sultry and ominous landscape of Palestine as backdrop, the story shuttles skilfully between individual drama and political conflicts, follows the adventures of the Englishman Irmin in his pursuit of the young radical Zionist who murders De Vriendt, vividly reports the Arab uprisings, and gives cross-sections of the various hostile groups within the Zionist movement.

While a fine passion for justice and humanity animates the book, the strength of the novel does not lie in its ethical fervor but rather in those parts that make concrete Zweig's emotion in characterization or in straight realistic narrative. The inner conflicts from which De Vriendt suffers could in themselves form the theme of the novel; and the chapter describing his death, in which De Vriendt beholds Jehovah, whom he has rejected, and is received back again, is a unique and impressive piece of fantasy. Again, The Death of an Old Man, in which the aged pioneer Nachmann begs his comrades "not to waste a useful bit of earth" for his grave, has all the simplicity and powerful realism of the Russian writers.

This last chapter proves the sheer power of strong realistic writing as against allegorical mysticism. The book suffers from a tendency toward mysticism, a peculiarly German variety, that dominates even so naturalistic a study as "Alexanderplatz," and crops out in the rational Thomas Mann whenever he deals with the psychic aspects of death. On the whole, "De Vriendt" does not come off. But its failure is due to a too great exuberance of allegory and a chaotic richness of ideas.

GERTRUDE DIAMANT

Peace by Default

Peace by Revolution. By Frank Tannenbaum. Columbia University Press. $3.50.

THIS is Frank Tannenbaum's "interpretation" of Mexico. Better stated, it is a distillation, an intellectualized summary, often in dialectic, of his extensive investigations and first-hand findings. All distilled tequila, to put the metaphor into Mexican terms, looks alike and tastes alike; the maguery plant from which it comes, however is a growing thing, individualized, rooted in the soil, of remarkable aesthetic stimulation.

Tannenbaum is well equipped to make such a distillation. He has been in Mexico many times and for extended periods; his previous study of the agrarian problem was heaped with ample statistics and tabulated most of the laws, some of which have been enforced; he has ridden far and wide through the country in search of material on education. Though he is thus well qualified to make the present sweeping generalizations, less opinion and more homely close-ups of Mexican life—the knack which makes Hindus's books on the Soviet Union so admirable—would provide us with a more convincing and living picture than does the present semi-academic and oracular version.

I sympathize heartily with most of Tannenbaum's specific analyses, though not always with his exuberant optimism or his contemporary judgments. His thesis is very similar to that of Stuart Chase, but with some of the exaggerations toned down; and unlike Chase he has not taken a non-typical community, so thoroughly studied by Robert Redfield, and improperly elevated it to a type in order to make unfortunate conclusions; he draws upon a vaster store of knowledge and personal observation. But the general thesis that Mexico has been more or less in decline and has suddenly started on the upgrade with the post-Díaz revolution distorts history and irradiates the achievements of the revolution with too much sweet hopefulness.

The first half of the book, background material, contributes nothing new, but is a clear exposition not encumbered with too much finesse; the best part deals with the revolution, and on this the author's material on education contributes considerable new data. If in the first part he rather glosses over the church-state struggle, in the latter part he tells us most convincingly of the brighter aspects of the 1910-20 revolution.

It was a great social upheaval; it fundamentally altered human social relationships; it abolished peonage; it created the free village; it introduced enlightened labor reforms; it gave away a certain amount of land; it promoted popular education; and today it is building roads, teaching students athletics, and capably "managing" its currency. Its achievements are notable.

What Tannenbaum fails to inform us of—and this is inexcusable at this late date—is that, except for popular education, the revolution reached its maximum expression about 1926, at the time of the arrival of Ambassador Morrow; and that since then its purposes have been increasingly aborted, agrarian reform has been largely sidetracked, the leadership has to a great extent, for opportunistic reasons and for the accumulation of private wealth, largely betrayed the popular hopes. This is a normal cycle, but it should have been recorded even at the expense of anti-climax.

Tannenbaum gives no record of the smash-up of the Mexican labor and peasant movements by Portes Gil and his successors, or of the implications of the relations of the workers and peasants with the present semi-fascist, one-party ruling group, the National Revolutionary Party (P. N. R.). He leads us to believe that the peasant is expanding his organizations; actually they have been largely destroyed or converted into meaningless tails to the kite of the P. N. R. He lauds the peasant leagues of Vera Cruz and San Luis Potosí, without warning us that they are adjuncts to the political ambitions of Governor Tejeda and General Cedillo, the latter infamous for his jailing and murdering of striking teachers.

Tannenbaum's praise of the labor leader, Morones, should be checked up with Gruening's documented study, "Mexico and Its Heritage," for Morones's graft, bureaucracy, racketeering, and palatial living, his destruction of rival unions, his utilization of his position as Secretary of Labor to crush the Jalisco mine strikes and break up the 1926-27 railway strike, were important factors, far more so than the opposition of Obregón, in the decline and defeat of the Mexican labor movement. Tannenbaum tells us that today "labor unionism is probably stronger than it was." Ridiculous. The revolution gave labor much, but when he speaks of "labor's present power" as an organized reality, he is dealing with ghostly memories. Labor was not even given a voice in the formulation of the final labor code.

Tannenbaum ends one of his chapters on labor legislation with the statement that the Díaz style of capitalism is dead, "and a new type, more native, more Mexican, has come on the horizon and is replacing the previous forms. Here the revolution has created something new and challenging." But beyond these evasive phrases the matter is not elucidated. Here, indeed, may well be the clue to the post-1926 developments, here may even turn out to be the key to the whole Mexican revolution. Mexican labor was utilized to combat foreign capitalism and thereby won some advantages. But as soon as Mexican nationalism had won the day against American diplomacy, and the ruling group had utilized its political position to found a native bourgeoisie, labor was smashed, and its role has been increasingly difficult. Tannenbaum's book gives no hint that new armed struggles are impending to vindicate the revolution and make new advances. Except for the chapters on education, the present book could be dated 1926. It might be well to remember that Gruening's monumental book, with its hard, exact appraisals, its encyclopedic information and documented case studies, was printed in 1928.

CARLETON BEALS

Three Books on the New Deal

The Roosevelt Revolution. By Ernest K. Lindley. The Viking Press. $2.50.

Roosevelt and His America. By Bernard Fay. Little, Brown and Company. $2.75.

The Future Comes. By Charles A. Beard and George H. E. Smith. The Macmillan Company. $1.75.

AFTER reading these three works on the New Deal, along with several others, one is convinced that it is still too early to attempt a sound critical analysis, in book length, of the Roosevelt experiment. The Administration's economic and social program is not yet out of its formative stage. Changes in direction and tempo and even in ultimate purpose are bound to be made as this or that section of the program proves unworkable or unpopular. Until a more definite pattern has developed and results of measurable weight have appeared, it would seem the better part of wisdom to refrain from formulating anything resembling a definitive criticism of Mr. Roosevelt and the New Deal. Indeed, so rapidly has the scene been changing that it would probably be better to leave the task of criticism to the journalists.

The first of the three frankly sympathetic studies here under consideration is, of course, journalism rather than scholarly criticism. Mr. Lindley presents an exceedingly friendly though at all times sober review of the first six or seven months of the Roosevelt Administration. His is essentially a recapitulation of well-known facts and interpretations concerning the New Deal—"A History of the New Deal," according to his own subtitle—but he imparts a number of personal, human touches and relates a number of little-known facts which, together with the freshness and coherence of his style, make his study something substantially more than a mere rehash of newspaper clippings. Mr. Lindley endeavors at all times to be fair—to the Republicans by giving them credit for such little good as they did achieve while they were in office, to Mr. Roosevelt by not attributing to him certain superlative qualities which the man clearly does not possess. One could wish that Mr. Lindley had brushed up on his foreign policy and his economics before writing this book. His knowledge of the history and fundamentals of American foreign policy is perhaps equal to that of the average Washington correspondent, which is saying very little; and he appears to have swallowed whole the economic theories which the miscalled "liberal" wing of the Administration has been putting forward.

M. Fay's work is really a diagnosis of the American temperament and an exposition of the clever manner in which Mr. Roosevelt has taken advantage of that temperament. According to M. Fay, the American people are at their best when facing a crisis, and therefore Mr. Roosevelt, "in order to obtain complete power and to win the sympathy of the whole nation, took care not to spare them the abrupt shock of reality" when the banking structure collapsed last March. M. Fay knows the American people and he knows American history. Best of all, perhaps, he knows Franklin Roosevelt, of whom he has given us a character sketch much more real and convincing than that presented in Mr. Lindley's study.

Messrs. Beard and Smith, at work on a comprehensive survey of American policy, needed an outline of the legislation enacted to date under the Roosevelt Administration. This outline or draft report has been printed under the title given above. It is without question the best factual digest of New Deal legislation available to date. The authors seek neither to appraise the Roosevelt Administration as a whole nor to dispute any of its theories or contentions, but merely to weigh and understand such laws as it has caused to be enacted. "The Future Comes" has little spice but much meat; indeed, much more meat than is to be found in either of the other two volumes.

MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

Shorter Notices

Ah King. By W. Somerset Maugham. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

Ah King was the name of a Chinese boy who accompanied Mr. Maugham as a servant on a trip through the Malay Peninsula, a trip which provided the material for these six stories of white officialdom. Despite an annoying indifference to train time Ah King was an admirable servant, efficient and wholly impersonal. It was his unexpected tears at parting which moved Mr. Maugham to use his name as a book title. This is the only display of such sentiment in the stories. Murder and incest, a nasty example of complacent cowardice, a nastier incident of the stupid peril of innocence, are treated with the same detachment as a rogue's improbable reform and a cuckold husband's first step toward wisdom. It is a suave, sleek method. When a story fails as The Vessel of Wrath does, it is the validity of the material which may be questioned and not the way it is handled. The Door of Opportunity succeeds because the balance between character and incident is recorded with a certainty and ease that make the narrative tense and exhilarating. If the author allows himself no feeling, neither does he indulge in the more intellectual sport of cynicism. This prohibits, of course, any great dramatic qualities or any satire. But Mr. Maugham, with disarming self-confidence in his truly acute powers of observation and in his technical skill, never attempts to produce more than exciting exhibitions of human behavior.

The Eugenic Predicament. By S. J. Holmes. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

An apter title for this book would be "A Eugenist's Predicament," for it reflects a biologist's vacillations between his loyalty to science and his allegiance to a cult. The result is a curious hodge-podge of fact and myth, of scientifically validated conclusions and unsubstantiated prejudices. The author at first graciously concedes many of the contentions of the critics of eugenics. Then with complete sang-froid he ignores these doubts while he parades the hoary, often-refuted eugenic chestnuts, and like a faithful missionary reasserts his faith in the eugenic theology. He acknowledges, for example, that insanity is not a definite clinical entity, but this does not deter him from presenting evidence treating it as such, to support his belief that insanity should be attributed to "bad heredity." He sees no incongruity in the eugenic creed that under capitalism occupational status is closely related to native ability, postulating, particularly for this country, that opportunity exists for unrestricted mobility from class to class for those "endowed with intelligence and ambition." Consequently he is agitated about differential fertility, fearing that the high birth-rate of the poor, who are to him synonymous with the biologically inferior, and the low birth-rate of the financially successful, to him superior stock, are leading to the deterioration of the race. This phobia obsesses him as it does all the eugenists, in spite of the fact that where contraceptive information is made available to the masses the birth-rate of all classes tends to be equalized and the difference in birth-rate may thus be regarded as a temporary one. The birth-rate of the industrial workers of Stockholm since the World War, for instance, is even lower than that of the bourgeoisie, and in Bremen there has been a relatively greater decline in the birth-rate among workers than among the wealthy and the middle classes. A clue to the set of the author's mind is given in a passing reference in which, with condescending joviality, he dismisses criticisms of the Nordic myth as products of the defense mechanism of Jewish anthropologists.

Rabble in Arms. By Kenneth Roberts. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

"Rabble in Arms" is a sequel to "Arundel," and carries the fortunes of two Yankee soldiers through the northern campaign of the Revolutionary War. It is solid, unreflective historical romancing—870 pages—in the manner of Scott, with the medieval glamor replaced by an American variety—redolence of rum and frying pork, wood smoke, pine forests, painted Indians. There is a veneer of realism in the treatment of the Revolutionary army, but nothing that should prevent the novel from becoming collateral reading in the public schools.

Victoria. By Arthur Ponsonby. Great Lives Series. The Macmillan Company. 75 cents.

The author does not use the narrative method; he writes his little book as a series of essays: The Queen and Her Ministers, The Queen and Foreign Affairs, The Queen and the Empire, The Queen's Husband, etc. The advantage of the method is that a large volume of information can be conveniently handled; the disadvantage that it makes for less fluent reading than continuous narrative provides. Lord Ponsonby's portrait of Victoria is competent but hardly more.

The Dance

The Monte Carlo Ballet Russe

THE Monte Carlo Ballet Russe, which will give performances at the St. James Theater through January, presents a group of talented young dancers under the direction of Leonide Massine of the glamorous Diaghileff Ballet. The company also includes Woizikovsky, Dolin, and Danilova of the same famous group which America first saw in 1916.

The first ballet of the opening program, "La Concurrence," at once made it clear that the century-and-a-half-old art of the Russian ballet is alive to the spirit of our time, and is capable of adapting its technique even to the unlimited naturalism of André Derain, the French painter, who was the author and designer of this humorous ballet. A simple story of two competing tailors serves to bring to the stage a variety of excitable French townsmen; and the choreography of George Balanchine is fresh, animated, and highly amusing throughout. The humor was enhanced by a bit of classical ballet danced by a group in tarlatan skirts of the "tutu" or lampshade era. Credit must be given to the admirable coordination of the group as a whole and to the accomplished and exquisite performance of the fifteen-year-old dancer Toumanova. Woizikovsky displayed the inexhaustible possibilities of bodily gesture. The music of Georges Auric, like the ballet, was contemporary in spirit but lived a far less successful life of its own.

The chief number of the evening was "Les Presages," Leonide Massine's translation into choreography of Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, with décor by André Masson. Its structure approaches Diaghileff's dream of a synthesis in ballet form of the plastic, musical, and pictorial arts. But the dream remains unrealized. Perhaps the weakness lies in Massine's deliberate division of the symphony into four elaborate and disconnected scenes, or perhaps in the difficulties that symphonic music in general presents to the medium of the dance. Moreover, if André Masson's strident décor symbolized in a way the desperate conflict between destiny and man, the simplification of the stylized costumes came close to the banal, while the acid greens and garish purples distracted the attention from the perfect correlation of music and dance. In consequence, the ballet did no more than afford an opportunity for some astonishing dancing, marked by brilliant precision, beauty, and intelligence.

As a finale, in contrast to "Les Presages," came "Le Beau Danube," arranged from the music of Johann Strauss. No philosophical pretension here, only the smooth, graceful choreography of the versatile Massine, rich with midinette gaiety and hussar nonchalance.

So the influence of the genius, Serge Diaghileff, continues. His followers claim that they have resurrected his great work. They do utilize his technique and his idea of correlating the arts. But the Diaghileff ballet in its pioneering stage was a powerful movement, raising and solving problems of aesthetics, while the Monte Carlo group shows none of this turbulent creative spirit.

What is generally known abroad as the Ballet Russe is, of course, the Russian ballet as Diaghileff and Fokine developed it. The old Imperial Ballet was quite different. Only the technique was the same. The Diaghileff ballet, with its emotional significance, color, and freedom of movement, constituted a revolution against the coldly perfect Imperial Ballet, which was static and stylized, quite devoid of emotional content, and designed only for the expression of intricate choreographic patterns. The upheavals and aspirations of the years 1905-07 reached the ivory tower of the ballet and spurred the two romantic rebels, Fokine and Diaghileff, to create new forms. Needless to say, they met with stubborn resistance from an audience content with visual illusions. Fokine won his battle only after his triumph in Europe. Diaghileff went into voluntary exile to develop and express the potential qualities of Russian dancers and painters. Both, however, maintained the superb technique of the Imperial Ballet, which is evident in the dancing of the Monte Carlo group; and in Soviet Russia the State Ballet has also preserved this same technique, which has proved adaptable to the new and vastly different rhythms, themes, ideas, and feelings of a collective society.

LYDIA NADEJENA

Music

Orpheus in New York

THE two performances by the New York Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Nikolai Sokoloff, establish this organization as a valuable adjunct to the city's musical resources. The men seem to have been made particularly at home in music of a somewhat pensive quality, such as the Symphony in B Flat by Ernest Chausson, a secularly meditative pupil of the religiously meditative César Franck; the groans, sighs, and upward-reachings of Strauss's Death and Transfiguration; the more sentiment-loving moments of Brahms's Fourth Symphony; and Debussy's Blessed Damsel. In their choice of contemporary numbers, however, they are not happy.

The Debussy number—for soprano, contralto, chorus of frail women's voices, and orchestra—reminded us of the "Po-escape" aesthetic which underlies the entire nineteenth-century genius of music. By this we mean the poet's intention to leave us with the mood he has imposed upon us. The work would provide no "formal release" for undoing what it had done to us. It would give us a realm of purgatorial moodiness to which there is a "way in" but no "way out," much as though one were to hypnotize a man and leave it at that, relying upon his own natural resistance for the restoration of his non-hypnotic temper. One devises the formula for the production of a spell; in Debussy's case, we are asked to acquiesce in a melancholy, an almost too Orphic "invitation," which can make us understand why even so musical a writer as Plato would have banished the softnesses of music from his Republic.

Where fit this art of wizardry into the ideals of a so-called "scientific" age? Our own conjecture is somewhat roundabout. It is that, since the quality of sound does have an intense capacity for the eliciting of emotional response (if one cares so to employ it), any marked extension of the expressive medium may lead correspondingly into marginal or exceptional states of consciousness. Hence, even devices discovered through sheer inventiveness, nimbleness, and curiosity may turn the sincere devotee toward remoter fields of imagination and sensibility, rare modalities of feeling that go with the rare modalities of tone. The inventor who, like an ancient alchemist, had begun by experimenting with his medium, is found in the end to have experimented upon himself and his fellows!

In any case, though much of contemporary music is but a new kind of parlor composition, a new kind of display piece in which dissonance and irregularity of rhythm happen to take the place occupied by trills, arpeggios, cadenzas, and runs in an earlier age, Debussy would go only so far as the emotions unmistakably followed. The result is not an industrious divertissement in new sound; it is religious enchantment, the suasive strategy of a magician, mournful formulas of a faith which is without the solidity of dogma, and perhaps wisely left vague. When hearing a work so thoroughly an embodiment of the romantic ideal—wherein the partial or exceptional or even dangerous experience is made, by lyric simplification and extension, to serve as the whole—we may ask ourselves whether the composer relies upon a certain lethargy or recalcitrance on the part of his audience, trusting that they will not really be convinced, but will lend themselves merely, will suspend their resistance only for the duration of the work, as with the story by Poe. And when recalling Thomas Mann's many tributes to the influence which Wagner exerted upon him, particularly the cumbrously beautiful reminiscences in his recent volume "Past Masters," we realize that these unresolved spells really can persist, that there have actually been "Northern wizards" surviving among us all these many centuries after the Druidic lore had supposedly vanished. As for the final act of liberation, the admonition "When I clap my hands and say 'awake' you will awaken," in the Poe aesthetic this "release" is purposely omitted—and the history of our first Wagnerites is the history of men whose hypnotic subjection to the master remained with them throughout their lives. Opera, as perfected during the nineteenth century, aimed to expand a rare moodiness, an exceptional exaltation, to the point where it served as an entire Weltanschauung, a philosophy of living. And perhaps the tendency of many modern composers to turn from opera to ballet, with its more mechanistic patterns, represents in a large part the attempt to reaffirm standards more in keeping with the ideals of "science." Yet the ballet itself continually reverts to the production of operatic moods—of emotional suasion as distinct from sheer intellectual maneuvers—possibly because of the fact that new forms of tonal and rhythmic imagination will tend to produce a corresponding readjustment in the qualities of our response. And thus it happens that, concomitantly with the "century of progress," when "pure science" and "disinterested mind" became the password, the Liszt-Wagner-Debussy devices of allurement were perfected.

We should recall a very interesting evening of contempo-

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
EUGENE O'NEILL'S comedy

AH, WILDERNESS!

with GEORGE M. COHAN

GUILD THEATRE Fifty-second Street West of Broadway
Eves. 8:20—Mats. Thurs. and Sat. 2:20

MOLIERE'S COMEDY WITH MUSIC

The School for Husbands

with OSGOOD PERKINS and JUNE WALKER

EMPIRE THEATRE BROADWAY and 40th STREET.
Eves., 8:40. Mat. Thurs., Sat., 2:40

MAXWELL ANDERSON'S new play

MARY OF SCOTLAND

HELEN HAYES PHILIP MERIVALE HELEN MENKEN
ALVIN THEATRE — 52nd Street, West of Broadway —
Eves. 8:20, Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:20

MEN IN WHITE

The Group Theatre and Sidney Harmon and
James R. Ullman present Sidney Kingsley's play

An experience thrilling and absorbing, genuine and complete.—J. W. KRUTCH, The Nation.

BROADHURST THEATRE—44th St. W. of Broadway
Eves. 50c to $2.50. Mats. Wed & Sat.

PEACE & EARTH AN ANTI-WAR PLAY

SIDNEY HOWARD: "The play and audience both an experience to remember."
HARRY F. WARD: "I am urging everybody to see it immediately."

CIVIC REPERTORY THEATRE 14th St. & 4th Ave.
Prices 30c, 45c, 60c, $1, $1.50, No Tax—Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:30

"The Theatre has unleashed one of its thunderbolts under Jed Harris's direction."

BROOKS ATKINSON—N. Y. Times.

Jed Harris Production

The Green Bay Tree

CORT THEATRE, 48th St. E. of B'way
Mats. Wed. and Saturday 2:30

"The PURSUIT of HAPPINESS"

"Merry mixture of folklore and farce."

—John Mason Brown, Eve. Post

"A smart and bawdy satire . . . a wolf in sheep's clothing."

—Percy Hammond, Herald Tribune

AVON THEATRE, 45th Street West of Broadway. CHI. 4-7860
Eves. 8:45, $1 to $2.50; Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:30, 75c & $2

PLAZA, 58th Street, East of Madison

Direction of LEO BRECHER

SAT., JANUARY 6, to WED., JANUARY 10, Inclusive
KATHERINE HEPBURN in LOUISA M. ALCOTT'S

LITTLE WOMEN

THURSDAY AND FRIDAY, JANUARY 11 and 12
EAST LYNN with ANN HARDING and CLIVE BROOK

DEBATE

CLARENCE DARROW vs. JOHN HAYNES HOLMES
FANNIE HURST, Chairman

"CAN CIVILIZATION BE SAVED?"

FRIDAY, JANUARY 19th, 8:30 P. M.

MECCA TEMPLE, West 55th Street, New York

Tickets—$2.00, $1.50, $1.00, $.75, $.50, $.25—No Tax

BROOKLYN FORUM—7 East 15th Street, N. Y.—ALG. 4-2620
Rond School—Columbia Univ.—N. Y. U.—Wanamakers

□ JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH says □

AH, WILDERNESS! Guild Theater. Tender and humorous story of a young boy trying to grow up. Highly entertaining but not one of O'Neill's major works.

AS THOUSANDS CHEER. Music Box. Hilarious series of hard-hitting satirical sketches in a first-rate musical review. Clifton Webb, Leslie Adams, Helen Broderick, and Marilyn Miller help make it the best thing of its kind.

CHAMPAGNE, SEC. Shubert Theater. Irreverent adaptation of "Die Fledermaus." Gay, inexhaustibly tuneful, and consistently diverting.

DOUBLE DOOR. Ritz Theater. Exciting but not too convincing melodrama based on the Wendel case.

HER MASTER'S VOICE. Plymouth Theater. Clare Kummer at the top of her form provides a full evening of her original and slightly delirious kind of wit. With Roland Young and Laura Hope Crews.

LET 'EM EAT CAKE. Imperial Theater. Sequel to "Of Thee I Sing," with Victor Moore and the other stars in continuations of their former roles. Very funny in spots but marred by a good deal of lost motion.

MARY OF SCOTLAND. Alvin Theater. Superb performances by Helen Hayes and Philip Merivale in a play by Maxwell Anderson. A great success though I found myself less moved than I should have been.

MEN IN WHITE. Broadhurst Theater. The problems of a young doctor made into a surprisingly moving and absorbing play. Thanks to a superb production by the Group Theater it becomes one of the two current offerings which no one can afford to miss.

PEACE ON EARTH. Civic Repertory Theater. Rather flat-footed propaganda against capitalist war. Much liked by those who like that sort of thing.

SHE LOVES ME NOT. Morosco Theater. Fast and furious farce about a Princeton Galahad who rescues the wrong girl with unexpected results. Very fast and very funny.

SAILOR, BEWARE! Lyceum Theater. Adventures of a sailor in love. Entertainingly bawdy comedy in which the sex life of our naval heroes is treated without reserve. (P.M.)

THE GREEN BAY TREE. Cort Theater. Powerful and absorbing psychological portrait of a cultivated and somewhat effeminate egotist. Probably the most original play of the year, and like "Men in White" not to be missed by anyone interested in the theater.

THE PURSUIT OF HAPPINESS. Avon Theater. Historical farce-comedy centering about the pleasant old New England custom of bundling. Spicy, impudent, and genuinely amusing.

THE SCHOOL FOR HUSBANDS. Empire Theater. Arthur Guiterman and Lawrence Langner make a picturesque and flippant adaptation of Molière's "The School for Husbands." There is much difference of opinion concerning its merits as entertainment but I found it charming and funny, as well as not too far from the spirit of the original author. With June Walker and Osgood Perkins.

TOBACCO ROAD. Masque Theater. Grotesquely humorous treatment of human degeneracy as exemplified by the poor whites of Georgia, with a remarkable performance by Henry Hull. Not recommended to the squeamish.

rary music recently furnished at the New School for Social Research. First was a Sonata for Piano, by Isador Freed, played by the composer—energetic playing, a steady attack of sound, manifesting that "manliness" which is still welcome for all that it comes easy to the piano. The work was more in the virtuoso concert manner than is the rule with American music. Next came Angels, by Carl Ruggles, for six flutes. Originally scored for muted trumpets, and also arranged for strings, it seems to have found in flutes the instrument that would wholly reinforce its "angelic" quality, at least in so far as flutes go up. In fact, they can even go up so buoyantly that one might call for something very heavy to hold them down, as when listening to Henry Brant's Concerto for Flute on the same program, since the soloist, Georges Barrère, was accompanied by nothing other than ten more flutes. Within the work there was much attempt at change, the first movement being in a tempo mainly slow, and the second given to a scherzo-like fluctuancy of mood. At least, that was the avowed intention—but the noticeability of the instruments prevailed above all else, making it a flutiness i' the extreme. Wallingford Riegger's Trio for Harp, Flute, and Cello, given the same evening by Carlos Salzedos, Georges Barrère, and Horace Britt, offered a well-balanced assortment of textures; a plucking, a whistle, and a buzz evidently make for a good distribution of sound in which the destiny of the composer's themes, as they go from voice to voice, can be easily followed. We should also mention a pleasurable display piece, Carlos Salzedo's Sonata for Harp and Piano, starring the harp and ending with a short coda-like procession that began faintly, grew strong, and slowly vanished. Of all the concerts given this season at the New School, this one was certainly the most noteworthy as regards the general quality of the performance. We should remember, from earlier concerts, the Quartet Number Four of Bela Bartok, played by the Brosa String Quartet—its first movement of sharp scraping; its second con sordino, tiny, intricate, like gossamer, partly because muted strings sound that way and partly because the music itself was swift and light; the third ponderous and sustained; the fourth pizzicato, with everything picked out; the fifth "conservative" of all that had gone before. Throughout, the performers conveyed the great authoritativeness of this composer. He finds many ways of keeping all his instruments going steadily about their business, all asserting themselves and not merely "helping out." One felt here the work of a skilled rhetorician, who could embark upon varied kinds of discourse with confidence. In closing we should also recall the String Quartet, by Ruth Crawford. Like those disturbances of attention which seem sometimes to manifest themselves as Ideenflucht (or flight of ideas) and at other times as idée fixe, her music had its moments when the voices were widely scattered and others when they clung to their discoveries with an almost angry tenacity, determined to remember it, to dwell upon it, to let nothing separate them from it. Thus particularly toward the end, when dissonance was abandoned and in its stead we got an insistent climbing and descending of scales which, if my memory and observation are correct, was done almost wholly in unison. Might one call this composer the Marianne Moore of music, having in mind thereby that great precision of statement, the epigrammatic quality, which distinguishes Miss Moore's verse? Again, as with Miss Moore's verse, this is not ease-music: it is feminine, but it is the caustic aspect of femininity.

Among forthcoming items to which one might look forward, we should mention the six concerts in a "Contemporary Chamber Music Festival," to be presented by the Roth Quartet at intervals beginning January 22. This quartet promises New York audiences an opportunity to hear several important works by contemporary American and European composers.

KENNETH BURKE

ST. JAMES THEATER

44th STREET, WEST
OF BROADWAY

S. HUOK presents MONTE CARLO

BALLET Russe

W. DE BASIL, Director General

"Ambrosial Entertainment"—Pitts Sanborn, World-Tel.

Every Evening inc. Sunday at 8:30; Matinees Wed. & Sat. at 2:45

500 GOOD SEATS AT $1.10 and $1.65

☐ OPEN SHELF ☐

The best book on Intestinal Stasis (constipation and allied disorders). A simple, detailed discussion of causes and the newer methods employed by leading physicians of America and Europe to prevent, control and cure this condition.

An interesting, practical book full of useful information. By Charles M. Campbell and Albert K. Detwiler, M.D. Authoritative, 320 pages, illustrated. More than 35,000 copies sold at $3. New Price $1 (by mail $1.12 with return privilege.)

THE Lazy Colon

EDUCATIONAL PRESS, INC.
East 12th Street New York

Moscow Daily News Soviet Periodicals

We accept subscriptions to all Newspapers and Magazines published in the Soviet Union. There are Soviet Periodicals in English, French, German and 23 other languages. In addition to the vast number of Newspapers and Magazines in the Russian language.

MOSCOW DAILY NEWS In English
In word and picture it sets forth the whole of Soviet activity and its reflection in industry, culture and daily life.

Daily Ed. 1 yr. $8. Weekly Ed. 1 yr. $2.

AMKNIGA CORP.

Dept. C4, 258-5th Avenue, N. Y.
Full Descriptive List on Request.

MOSKAUER RUNDSCHAU ИЗВЕСТИЯ

☐ INSTRUCTION ☐

NEW RUSSIAN CLASSES FORMING

$1.50 Monthly
Also French, Spanish, Italian, German
FREE TRIAL LESSONS
LANGUAGE EXCHANGE CENTRE

156 West 45th Street Longaore 5-8310

INVESTMENT COURSE

Principles of Investment, an elementary course
Designed for Women Investors
Tuesdays, 11 to 12:30, Jan. 9 to Feb. 27
Eight Lectures Fee $11*

Bryn Mawr Club—Park Lane, 299 Park Ave.
CLARA I. TAYLOR, Investment Counselor
551 Fifth Ave. VANDERBILT 3-2770
* Includes Federal Tax.

EXPERIENCED young woman, piano teacher, specialist with children, has opening for limited number additional pupils. Box 282, c/o The Nation.

SCHOOL

LAKEWOOD MODERN SCHOOL
A residential progressive school for children—kindergarten and elementary
119 CARRY ST. LAKEWOOD, N. J.
P. O. Box 153 Phone Lakewood 1031
JAS. H. DICK, Prin.

PERSONAL

YOUNG MAN desires to improve his knowledge of English, wishes to meet person willing to learn Russian. Box 280, c/o The Nation.

☐ RESORTS ☐

ZINDOREST PARK

MONROE, N. Y. Phone: 300
Formerly a millionaire's estate of 150 acres, beautifully landscaped. Fine skating and other Winter sports. Saddle horses. Ideal for vacation and week-ends. 1½ hours on Erie R.R. or Route 17.
Open All Year

BREEZEMONT FARM

35 Minutes from Broadway

A home of taste and easy comfort. On a beautiful large Westchester Estate.

All sports on premises.

Under the same management as the old "Russian Inn."

Armonk, N. Y. Armonk Village 555

The LAKE VIEW

is preferred for excellent location, splendid modern cuisine and different clientele.

Rates very reasonable.

59 Madison Ave., Lakewood, N. J.

R. SILVER A. EPSTEIN

Tel. Lakewood 287-963

TOPSTONE FARM

For a delightful vacation or week-end in the Connecticut hills, restful, secluded. In charming woodland country. Now at special rates. Skating. Saddle-horses on the place. Instruction. R.F.D. 4. Ridgefield, Conn. Phone 648

CHESTERS' ZUNBARG

A delightful hide-away in the mountains inviting people of better taste. Wholesome food, delightful companionship, all outdoor sports. Reduced rates. Woodbourne, N. Y. Tel. Fallsburg 186-J

☐ FOR RENT ☐

APARTMENTS

E. 15th St. 240—Attractive six room apartment, 2 baths, private house, opposite Stuyvesant Park. $90. Also basement suitable for doctor.

UNFURNISHED ROOM

MODERN couple have large, unfurnished room, all conveniences, $25; 20 minutes subway, Times Sq. G. Zoul, 43-21 57th St. Woodside, L. I. Lincoln Avenue Station.

WANTED

WANTED: Furnished room or apartment. Moderate rental, by young woman pianist. Excellent references. Box 281, c/o The Nation.

FOR SALE

PART or all of lease to gold mine which has produced $130,000.00 in past operations. $10,000.00 required to develop lower tunnel. C. H. S., 1015 W. Watson Street, Lewistown, Montana.

HELP WANTED

GIRL school or business, care children, assist housework evenings, exchange for room, board, slight remuneration. Tel. SLocum 6-8298 or write Box 278, c/o The Nation.

POSITIONS WANTED

TWO young women, tall, strong, well-schooled, intelligent and industrious, with creative ability, wish to be apprenticed in some art or craft. Box 279, c/o The Nation.

EXPERT Stenographer, typist, desires position as secretary to writer. Intelligent, attractive, college student. Majoring English. Miss Kopelman. PE 6-7641.

TORG SIN

Stores are located in over 1,000 cities of

SOVIET RUSSIA

An order on TORG SIN enables your relatives in Soviet Russia to purchase various domestic or imported articles, at reasonable prices, in those stores.

PRICES REDUCED

about 50%

For orders on Torgsin apply to your local bank, companies listed below, or their authorized agents.

Amalgamated Bank, New York
Am-Deutra Transport Corp.
American Express Co.
Gdynia-America Line
Hlas
Icor, Biro-Bidjan Corp.
Manufacturers Trust Co.
Publio Nat'l Bank & Trust Co.
R.C.A. Communications, Inc.
Union Tours, Inc.
World Tourists, Inc.
Hudson Co. Nat'l Bank, Bayonne, N. J.
The Pennsylvania Co., Philadelphia
Union Savings Bank, Pittsburgh
U. S. Trust Co., Boston, Mass.
Lincoln Trust Co., Providence, R. I.
Amalgamated Trust & Sav. Bank, Chicago
Bank of America, California

GENERAL REPRESENTATIVE in U.S.A. c/o AMTORG, 261 Fifth Ave., N.Y.

☐ LECTURES ☐

THE PEOPLE'S INSTITUTE

AT COOPER UNION

8th Street and Astor Place, at 8 o'clock
Admission Free

Friday, January 5th

EVERETT DEAN MARTIN

"The Protestant Reformation as a Revolutionary Movement."

Sunday, January 7th

PROFESSOR SCOTT M. BUCHANAN

"Money and Human Value."

Tuesday, January 9th

PROFESSOR SCOTT M. BUCHANAN

"Machines and Instruments in the 17th Century."

OPEN FORUM

SERIES OF THREE LECTURES

Jan. 5—PROF. OAKLEY JOHNSON

"The Future of the Youth"

Jan. 12—GERTRUDE HUTCHINSON

"New Morals in a New World"

Jan. 19—JULES KARSTEIN

"Dictatorships"

PROSPECT PARK BRANCH OF

FRIENDS OF THE SOVIET UNION

1071 Bergen St. (nr. Nostrand Av.), Brooklyn

ADMISSION 10c

THE BRONX FORUM

Rabbi Henry A. Schorr, Executive Director

Meeting in Temple Adath Israel

Grand Concourse at 169th Street

Wednesday Eve., Jan. 10, 8:30 o'clock

SCOTT HEARING will speak on "WHITHER AMERICA?"

Drama

On Adequate Acting

NO satire on the dramatic critic and his activity ever ends without some reference to his habit of concluding his reviews with the remark that Mr. So-and-so, as the hero, was adequate. For once, moreover, satire corresponds with fact, and there are several reasons why even the most voluble commentator usually breaks down when faced with the necessity of saying something about the average performance of the average play. One reason is that he cannot know very much about acting for the simple reason that most of his experience has been in a theater which affords almost no opportunity for comparing the interpretations of two performers in the same role. Another reason is that acting, as genuine interpretative art, hardly exists in America today. There are literally hundreds of "types" from whom a casting director with a good memory and an exhaustive card index can choose someone more or less fitted by nature to represent any particular contemporary character. There are also a score or more of men and women either sufficiently handsome or sufficiently gifted with a spectacular personality to attract the interest of an audience and thus to rate as "stars." But I doubt if it would be possible to find a dozen performers of either sex who are capable of forming for themselves an original conception of a character in a play and of projecting that conception in such a way as to give the spectator an insight which another performer would have failed to give.

□ SYMPOSIUM □ LECTURES □

2nd Symposium by the members of the Graduate Faculty of Political and Social Science

Sunday Evening, January 7th, at 8:30

HAS CAPITALISM FAILED?

EMIL LEDERER ARTHUR FEILER
HERMANN KANTOROWICZ

Admission $1, Proceeds to "The University in Exile"
THE NEW SCHOOL FOR SOCIAL RESEARCH
66 West 12th Street Phone ALg. 4-2567

Psychology of American Life

Seven lectures on immediate problems

Monday 8.30, January 8 to February 19

Morris S. Viteles Joseph Jastrow Wm. Moulton Marston
Everett Dean Martin Kurt Koffka Abraham Myerson

First lecture January 8, by Dr. A. A. Brill on "Mental Factors in Financial Depressions."

Saturday Luncheon, Jan. 6 at 1:00 p.m. 55c.

"This Money Business: Inflation and Labor."

John T. Flynn Harry W. Laidler George Soule
Write or phone for Bulletin of courses in Socialism,
Economics, Literature, Psychology and other subjects.

RAND SCHOOL of SOCIAL SCIENCE
7 East 15th Street ALg. 4-3094

After ten years of professional playgoing I can still count on my fingers the occasions when the adjective "adequate" did not say pretty much all that could honestly be said, or when we actually got a genuine interpretation made by a performer who knew what he was doing and who achieved an effect by the practice of a genuine art, instead of either blundering into it or—what is more usual in the case of stars—simply behaving in the manner which the audience had come to expect of him. Nearly four years ago Eva Le Gallienne gave a performance of Juliet which ought to have been praised even more than it was because it broke with a sugary tradition and created a believable character by presenting Shakespeare's heroine as a strong, impetuous, almost ruthless girl. Two years ago Romney Brent transformed a crude "nance" part in "The Warrior's Husband" into something to be remembered—and for his pains got mentioned as second in importance to an attractive girl with a good figure who was thereupon catapulted into stardom. Last year Leslie Adams in "Good-Bye Again" was given a role which consisted of few words and nothing much to do except to sit and wait, but by sheer force of his comic intelligence he made the whole play turn about him almost as much as it did about the nominal hero. There are other cases, of course, but there are not very many of them.

It so happens that the present season has been particularly rich in good performances—which means that three actors have earned for themselves the right to be taken seriously as interpretative artists. The first is J. Edward Bromberg, whose playing of the old doctor in "Men in White" is even more the result of a genuine power of interpretation than one is likely to realize unless one has seen him in another part—that, for example, of the love-sick merchant in "Big Night." The second is Osgood Perkins in "The School for Husbands," and the third is Henry Hull in "Tobacco Road." Mr. Perkins is perhaps the only actor except Romney Brent who has shown himself to be really at home in artificial comedy, where a consistent, non-realistic style must be created. Mr. Hull gives a performance which for completeness, for the integration of voice and gait and gesture, has not often been equaled in recent years. They deserve a greater reward than they are likely to get in our theater, and the least we can do is to point them out as exceptions to the rule that "adequate" is really adequate to describe a performance.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

[Mr. Troy's regular column of film criticism, which is unavoidably left out of this issue, will appear as usual next week.]

Contributors to This Issue

JAMES RORTY will publish this spring a book on advertising entitled "Advertising—Not to Praise."

JOHN STRACHEY is the author of "The Coming Struggle for Power" and "The Menace of Fascism."

MARGARET GREEN taught for three months in an Anglo-American school in Moscow and lived in a Zavod, twenty persons occupying three rooms.

LINCOLN REIS, a graduate student in philosophy at Columbia University, is engaged in research in medieval logic.

EDA LOU WALTON, associate professor of English at Washington Square College, New York University, is the author of "Jane Matthew and Other Poems."

MELVILLE J. HERSKOVITS is in the department of anthropology at Northwestern University.

CARLETON BEALS is the author of "Porfirio Díaz," "The Mexican Maze," and "The Crime of Cuba."

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXVIII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 17, 1934

No. 3576

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	57
EDITORIALS:
Told in Billions	59
A Needed Amendment	60
Mr. Sullivan Bores from Without	61
A Sea Tradition	62
ISSUES AND MEN. THE SENATE PROGRESSIVES' DILEMMA.
By Oswald Garrison Villard	63
GERMAN WRITERS SAY "YES." By Herbert Solow	64
THE MINISTER AND THE DEPRESSION. By Hubert Herring	66
AMERICAN DIPLOMACY IN CUBA. By Carleton Beals	68
YOUTH MEETS IN WASHINGTON. By Selden Rodman	70
BIG NEWS COMES TO RUSSIA. By Milly Bennett	72
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter	73
CORRESPONDENCE	73
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE	76
BOOKS, DRAMA, FILMS:
Declamation. By Willard Maas	77
Jakob Wassermann. By Joseph Wood Krutch	77
Abstract Woman. By Mark Van Doren	78
A Stubborn Politician. By Louis M. Hacker	78
"Spider of the Escorial." By Arthur P. Whitaker	79
Stalin and World Revolution. By Louis Fischer	79
Shooting Straight to Glory. By Caroline Gordon	80
Drama: Miss Hepburn and "The Lake." By Joseph Wood Krutch	81
Films: "Lot in Sodom." By William Troy	82

BOARD OF EDITORS

ERNEST GRUENING FRED A. KIRCHWEY
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
MAURITZ A. HALLGREN MARGARET MARSHALL
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $5.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. British Agent, Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England.

THE SUPREME COURT, as "Mr. Dooley" once astutely remarked, follows the election returns. Sometimes, of course, it is a good many years behind them, but by and large it has bowed to the public will in interpreting the federal Constitution during the century and a half of that document's existence. Obviously it has had to. Otherwise we should have had to scrap the Constitution or government would have had to cease to be a living organism. In reading the judgment of the court on the Minnesota law establishing a moratorium on foreclosures of mortgages, we feel that Chief Justice Hughes, supported by Justices Brandeis, Stone, Roberts, and Cardozo, has bowed to the inevitable rather than expounded the certain. The minority opinion—by Justices Sutherland, Van Devanter, McReynolds, and Butler—is an impressive statement of cold logic, but must be discarded for what Justice Hughes aptly calls "the protection of a basic interest of society." Had the Minnesota statute stood alone, the court might have upheld the letter of the Constitution and thrown out the law, but with our whole recovery legislation hanging by the same thread the path of necessity was plain. It is fortunate for the country—and for the court—that the Minnesota law has been upheld, but the circumstances must increase the amazement of all thinking persons at a system whereby policy vital to 120,000,000 people depends upon a five-to-four vote among nine men.

IN HIS SPEECH at the Woodrow Wilson dinner on December 28 President Roosevelt paid eloquent tribute to the desire of the peoples of the world for peace. Governments make war, he said; peoples fight wars against their will. He asked an agreement among nations to eliminate offensive weapons and a declaration that "no nation will permit any of its armed forces to cross its own borders into the territory of another nation." Evidently Mr. Roosevelt is concerned with war on the land. On the sea it is another matter. For in his new budget he asked an appropriation of $53,819,000 for continued work on fifteen cruisers now being built and for the laying down of the last of the 10,000-ton cruisers permitted under the London naval treaty—an increase of $1,622,000 over the navy budget for last year. An additional $2,700,000 was provided to increase the navy's enlisted strength by 3,000 men, and another million dollars was added to bring the fleet into the Atlantic from the Pacific next spring and to return it next fall. All this is on top of $238,000,000 of public-works funds turned over to the navy by executive order some months ago. The President is acquiring a reputation for courage; he is said to be a man who will try anything once, no matter how unpopular it may be, if it appears to be worth while. What if the President in his budget speech had said: "The $53,819,000 asked by the navy will be used instead for relief to the workers thrown out of jobs by the abandonment of our cruiser-construction program. We have no use for more cruisers. We, both government and people, want peace, not war"? The big-navy hornets would have been about his ears, sure enough, but we venture to guess that they would have been unnoticed in the deafening chorus of applause from his countrymen.

THERE is so much to commend in the report on Philippine independence just made by a committee sponsored by the Foreign Policy Association and the World Peace Foundation that Mr. Roosevelt might well accept it as a program to be presented to Congress. The Hare-Hawes-Cutting act has been rejected by the Philippine legislature and is so objectionable in this country to all believers in common decency that it ought to be regarded as permanently in the discard. The unofficial committee now reporting agrees on two points which must be embodied in any reasonable bill: first, the date of independence must be definitely set, and, second, it must be far enough ahead to allow for proper preparation and a gradual transition. It is suggested that American sovereignty terminate at the end of ten years, subject to the conclusion of an international neutralization agreement, and that responsible local government should begin at once. The committee rightly regards neutralization as an essential condition of independence, saying:

The committee regards the possession of the Philippines by the United States as a definite liability. But . . . any withdrawal from the Philippines, without taking safeguards to prevent the islands from falling into the hands of any foreign Power, would be as unjust to the Filipino people as withdrawal prompted solely by a desire to increase the profits of certain American producers.

Tariffs and regulation of immigration are, of course, two old difficulties. The committee advises fifteen years of moderate duties on the part of both countries. "If it is deemed necessary for the United States to protect domestic beet-sugar production," it says, "such protection should take the form of a direct aid from the American government, such as a processing tax." The way to handle immigration, it is suggested, would be through a quota.

WHEN HITLER came to power the Protestant churches, in obedience to the call for "coordination," united to form a single great national church, the Reichskirche. The new regime seemed to have successfully surmounted the conflicts that had divided the evangelical sects. As the Reich had one Chancellor, so the church had its Reichsbishop; the states had their bishops as they had their Stathalter, or vice-regents. Corresponding to the Reich cabinet, the church had its Clerical Ministry, and what the National Socialist Party was in the state, the German Christians movement became for the church. But this union brought no unity; in this corporate church antagonisms were more bitter than they had been before. A few weeks ago the directorate of the German Christians ousted the directorate of the Berlin churches, and had itself to resign a few days later because of the storm of protest that arose. Storm troopers were sent to the centers of greatest disaffection and clergymen were arrested in Stettin, Greiz, Breslau, Leipzig, and Hamburg. But without avail. The Clerical Ministry resigned and the Third Reich met with its first political defeat. Reichsbishop Müller, Hitler's personal appointee, now offered to make concessions: clergymen would be exempted from the Aryan law; Hossenfelder, the director of the German Christians, a Nazi fanatic, would be withdrawn and the theological faculties would enjoy greater freedom. For a short time all seemed peaceful, but the German Christians continued their underground propaganda against accepted creeds and for the half-pagan, half-Christian sort of Wotan worship with which the Nazi government hopes to restore to its people pride of race and nationality.

ON SUNDAY, January 7, the Reichsbishop undertook a second and more vigorous offensive. A religious ceremony attended by a thousand children was stopped and the pastors were arrested. The government threatened to suspend all opposition clergymen who should dare to read in their churches the protest of the Pastors' Emergency Federation, an organization consisting of 6,000 Protestant clergymen, and ordered the reinstatement in the regulations of the church of the suspended Aryan paragraph. These measures showed that the Nazis were determined on a fight to the finish. It is possible that the announcements of Cardinals Faulhaber (Munich) and Bertram (Breslau) that they would support the fight of their Protestant colleagues had something to do with this change of front. National Socialist leaders saw in the protests of these dignitaries of German Catholicism against a "pagan hierarchy" the return of the officially dissolved Centrist Party.

DESPITE Mayor LaGuardia's repeated assertion that he is out of politics, it is a pretty game of politics that is being played by him and Governor Lehman. Nor is this said with any disrespect to the Mayor of New York City, for he has shown himself not only the better strategist but the more disinterested public servant. On January 2 Mr. LaGuardia laid before the Board of Estimate a bill to be submitted to the legislature allocating to himself plenary powers for the reorganization of the city government and the rehabilitation of its finances. He asked for these powers, some of which would contravene the city charter, on the ground that there was a financial emergency, the city being without necessary funds to carry out its commitments for relief, and being unable to meet the demand for a balanced budget by February 1 which would make possible a federal loan of $23,000,000. The financial emergency was to be met by economy, by elimination of unnecessary jobs, and by a compulsory furlough without pay for teachers, firemen, and policemen—specifically exempted from the general reorganization—and other city employees with a few definite exceptions. The Board of Estimate accepted the bill in a resolution which cut the time limit from two years to about eight months, making the Mayor's new powers terminate on October 1, 1934.

MAYOR LAGUARDIA announced that he would himself present the bill to the legislature, but before he had time to do so, Governor Lehman entered the scene with a strongly worded letter to the Mayor which he made public before Mr. LaGuardia had a chance to read it. The Governor, having sat silent during the Walker administration, the Seabury inquiry, and the final acts of the O'Brien administration, which safely salted away as many city jobs as possible for the deserving boys of Tammany Hall, now found himself gravely exercised over what he termed the proposals for a dictatorship made by Mayor LaGuardia. Moreover, although he himself was present at the negotiations between the city and its creditors, the bankers, last November, when the latter laid down the very stringent terms on which they would make further loans to the city, he denied that a financial emergency existed and declared that "the city of New York, if efficiently administered, should have better credit than it has had for years." He did not, however, point out just how this efficient administration could be worked out with the existing Board of Aldermen, controlled by Tammany Hall, possessing both the determination and the power to block every proposal for financial reorganization which would deprive the Hall of any part of its share of the spoils. In reply to this the Mayor first declared that he would accept any plan which would give him the power to balance the city's budget, and then, with the utmost good temper, reasserted the existence of the financial emergency, denied that he sought dictatorial powers for himself, since the acts of the city were subject to review by the legislature, and pointed out that talk of dictatorship was idle since the city had just ended sixteen years of political dictatorship which had drained its financial resources and laid on the taxpayers burdens which they were unable to meet.

THE MOST TELLING POINT in Mr. LaGuardia's reply was that he would "take any plan that will give me a balanced budget." This should dispose of his alleged ambitions to be a dictator. His next step, presumably, will be one of compromise, and he could not do better than to ask for the powers proposed in his bill for himself and the Board of Estimate together. (If he had done so in the first place, the Governor might well have countered by another compromise which insisted on the concurrence of the Board of Aldermen!) It is hard to see what objection Governor Lehman can make to this without bringing down on his head accusations of being determined to save Tammany at all costs. The citizens of New York thought well enough of Mr. LaGuardia to elect him Mayor by a comfortable majority. It would be a sad irony if they did not think well enough of him two months later to permit him the opportunity to rescue them from the fix in which they were placed by the government they repudiated. Evidence of sweeping approval of the Mayor's plan on the part of the city as a whole would do much to convince the Governor and the legislature of its desirability.

WITH THE START of the new year the commonwealth of Pennsylvania and Governor Gifford Pinchot embarked upon a liquor experiment which it is to be hoped will be successful. One hundred of the contemplated 240 State liquor stores opened their doors, in the face of a mud-slinging campaign by the Philadelphia and Pittsburgh liquor interests that once used to buy and sell the State legislature. Prices are higher, because of taxes, than those prevailing in the Canadian provincial commissaries, but lower than those in neighboring New Jersey, where liquor can be bought in cigar stores, chain groceries, and department stores. The expected rush to New Jersey, where swinging doors, bars, and brass rails are still in vogue, has failed to materialize, and Pennsylvanians are doing their drinking either at home or in restaurants and hotels. Meanwhile, Michigan's State liquor stores have also opened, Ohio is stocking 250 State stores, Montana has declared a State liquor monopoly, Oregon, Washington, Iowa, Mississippi, and Wyoming are considering doing likewise, and the New York legislature at this session will have before it a plan to manufacture liquor as well as sell it. Virginia is looking with favorable eyes upon a State dispensary plan. Most other States have barred the saloon and adopted rigid forms of control. Gradually, out of the chaos into which repeal thrust them, liquor laws of varying excellence are being evolved.

THE EDITORS OF THE NATION salute the editors of the weekly New Masses and wish them well—or at least as well as possible short of the immediate establishment of the Communist state, which would in all probability mean the disestablishment of The Nation. The New Masses program is to support "the militant sections of the working class, the living core of which is the Communist Party." It will fight "against imperialist war, against fascism, evictions, hunger and wage cuts, lynchings and oppression of the Negro people." Modesty forbids The Nation to state how many of these causes have been its causes also; this is a note of congratulation, not the beginning of an argument. The New Masses for January 2 begins with a series of editorial paragraphs on the news, which are followed by longer editorials; then come, among others, an article by John Strachey, a cartoon by Art Young, an article on the Reichstag trial, what editors know as an "off" piece by John Dos Passos, a Washington dispatch about Congress, and a diverting correspondence between Josephine Herbst and Bruce Bliven of the New Republic. Book reviews follow, and articles on art, the theater, the films, and music. It will be seen that in make-up the New Masses is not radically different from, say—The Nation! In tone, of course, it is and will be. Since it supports and believes in the Communist Party, the New Masses has the good fortune to know exactly where it is going, what it wants, and how it plans to get it. This is an estimable position compared to that of an editor who sees the future less clearly and the past less narrowly. But a paper that sets itself up as a lively and intelligent champion of an even newer deal than the New Deal deserves a lot of readers. To this extent, The Nation wishes the New Masses well!

Told in Billions

AN outlay of ten and a half billion dollars in the year ending June 30 and a deficit of more than seven billion; an additional outlay of almost six and a half billion in the next fiscal year resulting in an additional deficit of just under two billion; a total spending of some seventeen billion by the time the next fiscal year is up (in June, 1935) and a total deficit of some nine billion—this, in brief, is the budget which President Roosevelt has presented to the country. It means, in equally abbreviated terms, that the government will have to raise ten billions in the next six months—to meet the deficit and the refinancing or liquidation of past obligations. It means also that the national debt—which remained almost unchanged at less than two billions for many years up to 1916, which jumped to more than twenty-six billions in 1919, which fell to sixteen billions in 1930, and which rose to about twenty-four billions in 1933—will reach nearly thirty billions by the end of this June. If we include the probable guaranty by the government of the principal of the farm- and home-mortgage bonds, the debt will be increased by June, 1935, to nearly thirty-six billions.

When these unimaginable figures were announced, the country gasped. Then, with commendable nerve and optimism, it braced itself to accept the idea of expenditures, deficits, and debts of almost astronomical dimensions. After all, in order to climb out of an unprecedented depression, a country must be prepared to use unprecedented measures—provided, of course, that the measures work. This view of the President's program was summed up by Arthur Krock in the New York Times:

Estimates, broad but not considered fantastic, have placed the national income at ninety billion dollars for the year 1929 and at fifty billion dollars in a normal year. To spend one-ninth or one-seventh of the 1929 income or one-fifth of the country's normal income in order to restore normal economic conditions for a long period of time would not seem wasteful to most people.

The ease with which the average citizen has adjusted himself has been the greater, perhaps, for the reason that the main burden of repayment of these recovery debts is put off to a later and presumably a better year. His taxes will not now be appreciably higher; and when they do go up, eventually they must if the debt is to be reduced, he is willing to believe that, if industry revives as the President promises, he will be able to meet them with considerably less anguish. Americans, despite the horrid warnings of the past few years, are not afraid of future burdens. It is the weight of past obligations that depresses them; and these, they believe, will be relieved by the money that the new budget promises will flow from the government treasury into their empty pockets.

Granting the general theory behind the Administration's recovery program, the need of these vast expenditures is beyond argument. The government has staked everything on one great chance—that industry will resume normal activity if credit is eased and the buying power of the people is increased. To this end it has tried to raise the lowest level of wages to a level at least of minimum subsistence; it has put several million men to work either in industry or on made employment; it has paid out many millions of dollars in direct relief; it has attempted to reduce the debts of farm and home owners and to raise farm prices. To this end it has also already poured money to the amount of some two billion dollars, mostly in the form of loans, into banks and railway companies and agriculture. None of these activities can be curtailed while the emergency remains acute. One may argue the advisability of this measure or that—we believe, for example, that more money should go into direct relief and public works and less into loans to industry and banks and railways—but one must admit that together they represent a fairly consistent effort. The government is priming the pump on the assumption that the pump will work. This is its great gamble, and to pour in seventeen billions is surely not extreme, in comparison with the outpouring of goods and wages and profits that is presently expected as a result.

Our doubts are all centered on the President's confidence in this result. Will recovery begin as briskly and proceed as steadily as Mr. Roosevelt hopes? Even if the pump is sound and enough water remains at the bottom of the well, it seems to us that greater improvements are looked for within the next few months than the events of the past few months give reasons for anticipating. The budget allots almost four billion dollars to the RFC for this year's expenses, but it calls for no further appropriation in the following year; instead, a refund of $480,000,000 is expected. The expenditure for public works in the two years will be kept well within the three billions already appropriated by Congress. The amounts allotted for relief are left vague; some will come out of RFC appropriations, some presumably from funds now listed as for undesignated needs. The whole outlay is based on an expectation that business will pick up from its present level of 67—using the average of 1923-25 as the basis of calculation—to 80 in the coming year and to 98 in the year after. If business fails to react according to specifications and the President consequently faces the need of another vast emergency budget, the probability of currency inflation becomes almost a certainty.

Even if recovery proceeds at the rate anticipated, the danger of inflation in the face of such unparalleled debts remains acute. It took eleven post-war years to reduce the national debt something more than ten billion dollars; and the depression caught us with some seven billions of war-time indebtedness still hanging around our necks. If 1935 brings back even the moderate prosperity of 1925, we may have some fifteen billion more dollars to pay back than we had ten years previously—on the same income. To carry the interest charges on this increased debt and reduce it to even a pre-depression level within the following eight or ten years—provided the next depression gives us that much time—will mean vastly heavier taxes. We could avoid these in just one way—by outright currency inflation. No one who has ever lived through a currency inflation will assert that that form of debt reduction is less painful than the apparently more arduous method of paying increased taxes. But if Mr. Roosevelt's hopes should prove vain, if in 1935 we have not yet attained the level of prosperity we had in 1925, if we have less money than we had then with which to meet our vastly greater obligations—who can expect anything better than inflation and widespread repudiation?

Despite these possibilities of catastrophe, The Nation supports Mr. Roosevelt's general intentions and methods. We believe in paying out public money for the purposes of recovery. But we believe, too, that the country should never lose sight of the mountain of debt it is so cheerfully shouldering. And the Administration should face the job of reducing this tremendous burden with the same courage and frankness with which it announced the necessity of creating it. John Maynard Keynes, in an open letter to President Roosevelt, has advocated strongly, for the purpose of increasing national purchasing power, large government expenditure "which is financed through loans and is not merely a transfer through taxation from existing incomes." It is obvious that such vast expenditures as President Roosevelt projects could only be financed in this way. No conceivable current taxation could meet the estimated costs of recovery. But the day of reckoning must come, and the government should plan for it now when the debts are being incurred.

The Nation proposes in a later issue to discuss in greater detail the problems of taxation and inflation that are created by the President's budget.

A Needed Amendment

THERE are few better illustrations of the odd, unchartable changes in the currents of public opinion in the United States than the attitude of the country in regard to alcoholic liquor and toward child labor. The prohibition amendment went into effect in 1920, designed to accomplish a social reform. Four years later, without any appreciable change in the general temper of the country, another social reform was sought in the submission to the States of an amendment making it possible for Congress to restrict child labor. There was far more public sentiment for restricting child labor than for eliminating liquor. In a general plebiscite prohibition could have hoped to win only by a narrow majority, if at all. On the other hand, general opinion was clearly behind restricting child labor. Congress had twice passed laws with that intention, and there was widespread disappointment when in each case they were declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court. The chief opposition to curtailing child labor came from a numerically insignificant but politically powerful group of employers who wished to exploit children for purely selfish purposes because they were the cheapest kind of human help.

Yet in spite of a national sentiment against child labor, the constitutional amendment languished. The general public was too much occupied with automobiles and movies, while small, aggressive lobbies of manufacturers had their way with legislatures. From 1924 to 1932, inclusive, only Arizona, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Montana, and Wisconsin ratified the amendment, while it was rejected by one or both of the legislative branches of thirty-four States. In other States the amendment perished in early processes of legislation or was never considered. The child-labor amendment did not suffer because of dissatisfaction with prohibition. Sentiment against prohibition had not crystallized decisively a decade ago, when most of the State legislatures passed on child labor, nor was there any general attempt then to couple the two amendments. It has remained for President Butler of Columbia University to do that—without justification, we think—in a recent statement.

At the end of the year 1932 it looked as if the child-labor amendment had failed. Yet in 1933, when the public turned violently against prohibition and cast it out, there was a sudden and favorable revival of interest in the child-labor amendment. Fourteen States ratified it, in eleven of which it had previously been rejected by one or both houses of the legislature. Thus twenty States have now approved the measure, and favorable action is expected shortly in several more, notably New York and Massachusetts.

Doubtless the industrial depression was a powerful influence both in turning the public against prohibition of liquor and in making it more aggressively in favor of limiting the exploitation of children's toil. When there is not work enough for adult men and women, it becomes obvious that to injure the coming generation by premature employment is not only inhuman but economically crazy. The Nation feels that the changed public sentiment both in regard to liquor and child labor is sound. President Butler's attempt to discredit the child-labor amendment along with that against liquor on the ground that both constitute federal interference with local government and the family is an argument which, if accepted, would block all effort toward social legislation on a national scale in this country. Prohibition was resented not because it was federal rather than local action, but because it was a restriction which people in general did not want. President Butler's other ground of opposition—that a legislature having once rejected a constitutional amendment cannot reverse itself—is a legalistic point which must be left to the Supreme Court. Even in case of an adverse ruling, it would be possible to submit and obtain the ratification of a new amendment of precisely the same sort. Some persons have felt that with the prohibitions against child labor in the NRA codes a constitutional amendment is needless, but the codes expire in 1935 and even if they are renewed, it is desirable to give Congress permanent power to deal with the question.

The particular reason that it seems necessary to deal with child labor federally rather than through legislation by States is the existence of economic rivalries among the latter. Probably the people of New England would be glad to stop grinding up children's lives in their factories if it were not for losing their textile business to the South. Likewise the South would not willingly countenance child labor except for the hope of profit in the establishment of new industry. The number of children under sixteen years of age in the textile industry of the United States decreased 59 per cent between 1920 and 1930, but in the same period the number of children in the textile mills of South Carolina and Georgia increased 24 and 12 per cent, respectively.

It cannot be too strongly emphasized that the child-labor measure, unlike the liquor amendment, is permissive, not mandatory. The child-labor amendment does nothing of itself at all. It merely gives Congress the authority to "limit, regulate, and prohibit" the labor of persons under eighteen years of age, a power which undoubtedly would be exercised in conformity with popular demand. We hope the measure will be ratified by the necessary thirty-six States.

Mr. Sullivan Bores from Without

MARK SULLIVAN, Medicine Ball Man to Herbert Hoover, has fallen victim to another obsession. Briefly, the Ancient Mariner of the New York Herald Tribune and numerous other newspapers is convinced that a certain group of "young intellectuals" of which Rexford G. Tugwell is head devil are "gradually" and "quietly" transforming the "familiar American type of social organization" into "one which the word 'Russian' describes more nearly than any other."

Not that Mr. Sullivan has been brief about it; during December, or Anti-Tugwell Month, he used every word at his command not once but five times. On December 12 Mr. Sullivan pointed out that the conflict between George N. Peek and Rexford G. Tugwell was in reality a "struggle between contrasting ideals of government." Mr. Peek, he said, was in favor of the "familiar" American system; Mr. Tugwell wanted to change it into "one which in a brief space can best be described as a nearer approximation to the Russian system than to any existing one." "Professor Tugwell and his adherents," Mr. Sullivan revealed, "have quietly got hold of what the technique of social change would call the key places of government, and . . . they are using the leverage quietly but powerfully to bring about a revolution, a silent revolution but yet a revolution." (The italics are ours.) It was the silence that Mr. Sullivan found so ominous. "The important point," he cried, "is that the public should be enabled to see the struggle . . . and to decide which [side] they wish to win."

On December 13 it was apparent that Mr. Sullivan had spent the night in a cold sweat. "It is accurate to describe the issue," he wrote, "by saying that Mr. Peek believes in the familiar American type of social organization, while Professor Tugwell believes in the type which the public generally calls socialism." "The charge," he said, returning to it even before he had left it, "amounts to this: that Tugwell in his official actions within the Department of Agriculture . . . does what seems designed to bring about in America gradually and quietly the social system he believes in." Mr. Sullivan then quoted Mr. Peek as follows: "I feel that . . . new methods of social control should be clearly outlined, and that the people as a whole should have the right and duty to make the ultimate decision." In order to avoid any misunderstanding, Mr. Sullivan then "amplified" Mr. Peek's "allusion." "Mr. Peek and others feel," ran Mr. Sullivan's exegesis, "that Professor Tugwell and the intellectuals associated with him are trying to bring about adoption of their conception of a social system without letting the public know it is being done." That was his story and he stuck to it. ". . . they [Mr. Peek and others] feel," he said, turning around and going back, "that Dr. Tugwell and his associates by virtue of having key places of government are introducing their social philosophy quietly and gradually in a manner which opponents of the proposed system would call lacking in public notice"!

On Sunday, December 17, for the benefit of those who had not heard him, the Ancient Mariner told his story once more from the beginning. "What is going on," he said, "is a tug of war between two sets of forces . . . one of the groups trying to keep America approximately what it has been, the other group pulling us toward an objective for which the only practicable description is 'collectivism.'" Two paragraphs later, amplifying his allusion, he wrote: "To the average man, however, not familiar with the terminology of social science, 'Russian' describes more nearly than any other word the form of social organization toward which we are moving." "There would be," he wrote bitterly, "no roll call in Congress on this all important issue." "Never," quoth he, "will Congress vote for or against what Professor Tugwell calls a 'Workers' World.'" On the contrary, it will be put over by "some twenty or thirty young radicals, some of them having important k. p. in the g. [the abbreviations are ours], typified and quietly led by Professor Tugwell."

On December 18 Mr. Sullivan lamented that "Foes of New Social Order Lack Leaders to Combat Radicals. . . . American System Gradually Is Being Displaced with Little or No Protest." On December 20 hope sprang. "Mark Sullivan Thinks President Will Disappoint his 'State Socialism' Clique by Checking Drift Away from Fundamental American System." Hope soon faded, however, for on December 22 "NRA Radicals Are Suspected of Attempting Social Sabotage. Mark Sullivan Says More Conservative Colleagues See Signs of Boring from Within."

While Mr. Tugwell was boring from within Mr. Sullivan continued to be even more boring from without. On Sunday, December 24, for the benefit of those who had just flown in from the North Pole or had not seen his correspondence the Sunday before, Mr. Sullivan once more recapitulated in two and a half columns the whole desperate situation. "Mr. Tugwell," he said, "as Assistant Secretary of Agriculture . . . occupies a position in what the technique of revolution calls the 'key places' of government. . . . Critics and opponents of this radical group . . . feel that the group is moving quietly and gradually, adroitly and with much tactical skill, to bring about in America, with a minimum of public attention, a change which would introduce into America a social order which would be about the opposite of what we have always had."

It was on December 28, however, that he reached the heights, when he urged Mr. Roosevelt to "concentrate on recovery, shelve reforms." We had had the impression, which we were sure the President shared, that his "reforms" were somehow supposed to have something to do with bringing about "recovery." If they were not, the fact has certainly been lacking in public notice, and we are grateful to Mr. Sullivan for bringing it gradually and quietly, adroitly and with much tactical skill, to our attention. Meanwhile we are able to offer a grain of comfort to one who obviously prefers his revolutions fast and loud. According to everything we have heard and read, it has always been extremely difficult if not impossible to keep a revolution secret for any length of time.

A Sea Tradition

WHILE pushing her way through the Mediterranean the other day the American Export Line's steamship Exarch bumped into the island of Cyprus. The ship was not seriously damaged and no lives were lost, but the captain shot himself. The tradition of the sea, say some by way of explanation. But there is no such tradition. When a captain's ship goes down through his own negligence, there is an unwritten code which dictates that he should go with it. Also when a captain loses a ship, even through no fault of his own, the owners often will not give him another billet, in which case it may seem better to him to end his life. But a trivial or even pretty serious accident may happen to a ship, and if the skipper is held blameless he will be continued in command. The cabled details of the stranding of the Exarch are too meager to explain her captain's action. Undoubtedly there was more behind it than the dispatches told.

But even in its generally accepted form the code in regard to a captain and his ship is a hard one, much harder than that applying to other men in equally responsible positions. A doctor whose patient dies through careless treatment does not jump out of the hospital window. A lawyer who bungles a murder defense and whose client is condemned to death is not by tradition required to hang himself. Steamship executives ashore do not observe any code so rigid as that applying to their captains. They can mismanage their companies, causing hundreds of employees to lose their livelihood and hundreds of stockholders to lose their savings. Yet public opinion does not demand that they take cyanide of potassium. Lord Kysant ruined the great Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, but tradition did not compel him to jump off the dock. He hung around until he was sentenced to jail by an unsympathetic court.

Maybe it would be a good idea if our business ethics were stiffened by the development of a code which decreed that whenever a railroad went into a receivership, a manufacturing company was declared bankrupt, or a bank closed its doors, the president should repair to his speakeasy and order a goblet of hemlock. Of course someone may retort that presidents in such circumstances have followed practically that course. Some have, but they have always been the wrong ones. They have been either highly conscientious, strictly honest men who were overcome by remorse, or else executives who had lost their fortunes with the business and felt there was nothing more to live for. Our cities are full of discredited business officials who, having lined their pockets out of other peoples' losses, not only fail to end their lives but stand around licking their chops waiting for a new bunch of suckers to come their way. They never even miss a lunch.

We doubt if the code in regard to a captain and his ship serves any good purpose. It seems to be a survival of an antiquated conception of ethics or discipline long outmoded in other walks of life. Sailors commonly regard the tradition as unjust. It is the general public which thoughtlessly upholds it by cheering whenever it is observed. Doubtless it will go the way of other superstitions in time, but we are not sanguine of early reform. It may last as long as lynching, capital punishment, or war.

Issues and Men

The Senate Progressives' Dilemma

WHATEVER fears any of us may have about bi-metallism at 16 to 1 or a printing-press inflation destructive to almost every class in the community, the reconvening of Congress is neither to be regretted nor dreaded. In the first place, we are still a democracy, and despite the grant of dictatorial powers to the President, the Congress yet remains the final seat of authority. It is still a debating body, if it chooses to be, and whenever it assembles, additional light is sure to be cast upon economic and social problems. The Senate especially remains an open forum—the only political body in the United States in which there can be full, free, and unlimited discussion of public questions. Moreover, the assembly of Congress compelled Mr. Roosevelt to report on the state of the Union and to show his hand on various policies. Perhaps he may yet do away with the financial uncertainty which is widely heralded as responsible for the lack of return of complete confidence. It is plain that this Congress is not going to give the President any trouble, unless it be in respect to his currency policies and inflation.

Unfortunately, Republican opposition is extremely weak. Never before has the party been so impotent. It is without a single man in the Congress who can lay claim to being a leader of statesman-like stature. There are scarcely more than 100 regular Republicans in the House and only 27 in the Senate. Their present leadership is beneath contempt. The Saturday Evening Post is justified in despairing of the rehabilitation of a party which has fallen into the hands of such a group as Messrs. Snell, Bolton, and Bacon in the House, McNary in the Senate, Ogden L. Mills, and Everett Sanders, chairman of the National Committee, who is bitterly disliked by many persons and in addition represents the defeated Hoover leadership. The names of none of these men mean anything to the American people. They connote no policy, no definite program. These men wish to put Humpty-Dumpty back on the wall again, that is all. They take counsel of Herbert Hoover of all men, who is hopelessly buried but does not know it. Nor is the regular party leadership on the Democratic side very much better, which is a regrettable fact for Mr. Roosevelt himself. Every President needs skilful and aggressive opposition—and criticism from his own side. No one will pretend that the Democratic leaders will be able to offer any more constructive ideas on how to bring the country back to "normalcy" than can Mr. Roosevelt. As I have said, if there is to be any mutiny it will come, as everybody can see, from the inflationists and silver Congressmen and Senators, who have behind them a large body of constituents frightened nearly to death by the existing situation and wild to get rid of their debts by means of any nostrum.

But what of the Progressive Senators? In the past they have shown the best leadership in the Senate and they offered the only real opposition in the days of Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover. What stand will they take? Some of them, like Senator La Follette, are in an extremely difficult position. For some time past it has seemed plain that they could not much longer remain in the Republican Party and retain their hold upon their supporters. In the first place, the gap between their views and those of their ostensible party has steadily widened. In the second place, several of them openly came out for the election of President Roosevelt. In the third place, local conditions have made it necessary for them to state definitely under which flag they propose to operate hereafter, with the result that several of them are considering setting up an entirely new standard, precisely as the first Senator La Follette created a party of his own during the 1924 campaign. The situation has become compelling for Senator Johnson and the present Senator La Follette because both are candidates for reelection this year, and they will naturally have to let the voters in their States know exactly where they stand. Their situation is further complicated by the fact that both have profited in the past by Democratic votes. While the Democratic State administration in Wisconsin is a complete failure, the present temper of the voters there is such that they would stand by the President overwhelmingly. Should La Follette run as third-party candidate he might, however, lure both Democrats and Republicans to vote for him, especially if, while avowing friendliness to the President, he stood on a more radical platform than that of Mr. Roosevelt himself. He has been under a disadvantage for a long time in running as a member of a party with which he is utterly out of sympathy. Should he not now cut loose from this body of death?

Already the Herald Tribune has reported that a conference recently took place in Chicago which was attended by Senators La Follette, Shipstead, Nye, and Fraser, with a view to forming an active independent block in the present session. Of course neither Senators Borah nor Norris will go along with this, though the latter will be completely sympathetic. I should think that Senator Bone of Washington, Senator Costigan of Colorado, and Senator Johnson would be extremely sympathetic to such a move, and one might easily prophesy that if these men make a good start and have a clear-cut program to offer, still other recruits will join them. Such a block would be able to exercise even more influence than in the past if they decided to cut loose from both the old parties and to demand the long overdue political realignment. The Middle West and Northwest are more than ready for a new party. Much, it is true, will hinge upon its objectives. To state that it will guarantee a job, a living wage, and independence for the farmer will not be enough; there must be more specific proposals. And there the rub comes. The multiplicity of issues makes agreement extraordinarily difficult. But as has been said, if the Progressives decide to go on the rampage they can exert considerable power and perhaps even head President Roosevelt farther to the left.

Donald Garrison Kilgore

German Writers Say "Yes"

By HERBERT SOLOW

FOR intellectuals to be acceptable to the Hitler regime they must worship or be silent. To literary men who have for some years expressed admiration for National Socialism, this presents few difficulties. Many German writers, however, before Hitler's rise to power, expressed concretely or in a general way their devotion to democracy, socialism, or pacifism and their intention of combating principles which they regarded as a blight on human culture. How has this type of writer stood up through a year of "coordination"?

First of all, there is the case of Gerhart Hauptmann. The author of that famous drama of social rebellion "The Weavers" praised and accepted honor from Friedrich Ebert, first President of the Weimar republic. He was a warm friend of such men as Paul Löbe, Social-Democratic president of the Reichstag on the eve of Hitler's coup, who after a course in rock-crushing in a concentration camp is now an inmate of a Nazi dungeon. As the months of Hitler barbarism rolled by, many were shocked that Hauptmann uttered no protest or reproach, not even when his close friends were jailed, beaten, and exiled. On November 11 the exiled Alfred Kerr, Germany's leading dramatic critic, who did more to build Hauptmann's international reputation than any other individual, gave voice to his bitter resentment. The following extracts give the gist of Kerr's piece, which was published, on the eve of the German elections, in the Deutsche Freiheit, a Socialist daily of Saarbrücken:

Since yesterday there is nothing in common between him and me, neither in life nor in death. I do not know this coward. May thorns grow under his feet and may the consciousness of shame choke him at every breath. Hauptmann, Gerhart, has lost his honor. . . . Not only has he found no word of condemnation for these most barbarous of barbarians. He does not wish to risk his economic status. So he has not simply ducked: he fawns. . . . With the respect he universally enjoys he could have dealt a blow to the reputation of these murderers, slaves, hangmen, liars, violators of every law, who hunt down before his eyes his own weaver folk and men whose sole crime is their birth. . . . Out of fright, out of desire for gain, out of sordid weakness, he used his last ounce of strength to hoist the Hakenkreuz rag on his dwelling. . . . Hauptmann has deserted to the enemy.

On the same day there appeared in the Berliner Tageblatt an article from Hauptmann's pen entitled "Ich Sage Ja" ("I Say Yes"). Hailing Germany's bolt from the League of Nations as a step toward peace, he indorsed all the details of Hitler's foreign policy and urged national support of the Chancellor and his program.

Hauptmann is, however, not alone in abandoning opposition to Hitlerism. This distinguished literary figure has distinguished company.

Of the many new magazines established by exiles, the least political and the least aggressive in fighting Hitlerism is Die Sammlung. Published in Amsterdam by the Querido Verlag, this monthly is edited by Klaus Mann, the son of Thomas Mann, and is sponsored by André Gide, Aldous

Huxley, and Heinrich Mann. Its contents are largely belles-lettres, and compared with those of, say, the Neue Deutsche Blätter, which is also largely literary in its interests, they have a somewhat academic tone. The first issue contained verse, two stories, a piece on the theater, and a personal essay by Jakob Wassermann. In addition, there was an essay by Heinrich Mann called Moral Education Through the German Upheaval, and a discussion of Jewish mass settlement and national minorities. The three subsequent issues contained stories and verse by Franz Kafka, Elsa Lasker-Schüler, Lion Feuchtwanger, André Gide, A. M. Frey, Max Herrmann, and other distinguished representatives of literary currents which thrived under the Weimar republic. There were pages from Aldous Huxley's new Central American notebook, an essay on music by H. E. Jacob, an essay by André Maurois on Proust and Ruskin, a study of Gide by Ilya Ehrenbourg, and a piece on Hölderlin by J. Sorel. On the more political side there were articles by Klaus and Heinrich Mann (hardly politicians!), some deploring of extremism in general by the semi-mystical Max Brod, and—high point of radicalism—a piece by Ernst Toller. The last-named was the one pro-Communist contributor in four issues; his piece was childhood memoirs! And there you have Die Sammlung.

No wonder some people were surprised when, on October 10, the "semi-official" Leipzig Börsenblatt für den deutschen Buchhandel published a communiqué of the Reichsstelle zur Förderung des deutschen Schriftentums (National Bureau for the Advancement of German Literature) which charged the Sammlung with inciting war against Germany, labeled all collaborators "intellectual traitors to the fatherland," and ordered German publishers to bring out no more works by such authors. Among those surprised was Alfred Döblin, who had written the article on Jewish mass settlement. Known chiefly as the author of "Alexanderplatz," "the last word in expressionism," Döblin is also author of a volume of essays urging intellectual youth to abandon pure aestheticism and enter the struggle on behalf of justice, progress, peace, and culture. On learning of the Reichsstelle's condemnation through S. Fischer (the Jewish-owned publishing house which has published a book dedicated to Göring "mit Sieg-Heil"), Döblin wired from abroad as follows: "Disavow all literary and political connection with editor of magazine Sammlung. Request you publish this quickly in suitable manner. Orientation of magazine was unknown to me."

Among the other collaborators announced by the Sammlung was René Schickele, an Alsatian whose regionalism produced not only charming genre tales, but also an anti-militarist slant aiming at a Franco-German rapprochement which might save his beloved province from further carnage. His reply to the pressure of the government which frankly proposes not only the reconquest of Alsace but a general war was this wire to Fischer: "Sadly surprised by political character of Sammlung since my occasional collaboration had in view only purely literary journal. . . . Henceforth will strictly steer clear of such things."

Another collaborator who had been announced was Thomas Mann, who, as father of the editor and brother of one of the sponsors, could hardly have been completely in the dark as to the journal's intentions. This is the writer who only last year at a Goethe memorial meeting in Vienna praised democracy and socialism, and whose every book voices the culture and aspirations of the Weimar republic which Hitler has drowned in blood. Threatened with National Socialist disfavor, he wired his publishers (Fischer again) as follows: "Can only affirm character first number Sammlung does not correspond to its original program." Thereupon he ordered his son to strike his name from the masthead. Criticized for this action by the Social-Democratic Vienna Arbeit-erzeitung, Mann explained:

As long as there was freedom of speech in Germany, I, as one who loved his fatherland and wanted to see it happy and respected, supported with all my might what I held desirable and right. . . . At this time, pure, positive, and creative art, serving the higher Germany, is nearer my nature than the polemical, and it is to this fact that my urgent wish as long as possible not to be cut off from my public in Germany is related. This is an idealistic interest which, as might easily be proved, has nothing to do with crass opportunism. Sincerely and demonstrably, this is not a matter of sales . . . but of opportunities for intellectual and artistic influence . . . my new book has just appeared in Germany. . . . I face the question whether I shall sacrifice the life of my creation, disappointing and abandoning those in Germany who heed my voice and have sympathetically waited years, especially for this new work . . . just for the sake of having my name on the list of contributors to a magazine.

These three eager defenders of culture were, however, not the first in the field. Stefan Zweig, heroic bard of a Jewish Renaissance and German pacifist spokesman for Romain Rolland, beat them to it. Even before the Reichsstelle could publish its condemnation of Die Sammlung, Zweig wrote his publisher (Insel) as follows:

When the editor . . . addressed me I agreed to give him a fragment of my work in progress . . . after he assured me the paper would be . . . in no sense political in nature. I never meant to collaborate regularly. I really learn to my great surprise that it is not a question of a purely literary, but of a largely political organ. The press condition . . . has, then, been violated. I have already written the editor that I will not do so, that is, I will not do so, that is, it is only for

The publishers supplied copies of the week at most, so to the Reichsstelle. The Börsenblatt, but I didn't think of the embattled idealists, and while beginning to hear about blessings soberly concluded that to walk over the rent—he might not find it essential to say—says, "That's all right,

To these heroes who decline to get more leisure than I power of Hitler to confer—the "When I go to buy a cap me on the back, "Ah, add many more names. Let us the stoop Mrs. O'Reilly Walter Bloem, Otto Brues, nipkin! what'll ye be doin' Halbe, Hanns Johst, Heinrich?" So I'm beginning to Josef Ponten, Wilhelm von Sater all, I got leisure.

In 1932 these writers signed a build Germany's first memorial to the payment of a debt "to the native life, but there is a little to the future," they also approved after's correspondent goes the traditional powers which he attacks children and that all him into exile." About one year later them, they have the the auspices of the Reichsverband Deutscher Schriftsteller the following memorial to Adolf Hitler:

Peace, work, honor, and freedom are the greatest goods of every nation and the conditions of honest international relations. A consciousness of our power and restored unity, our frank will to serve without reservation internal and external peace, and our determination to do nothing inconsistent with our or the fatherland's honor, move us in this crucial hour, Mr. Chancellor, to give you this solemn pledge of our most enduring fealty.

And among the eighty-eight names attached to this statement were all those admirers of Heine listed above.

Rudolf Binding, an eminent literary contributor to the old liberal Frankfurter Zeitung, has also come out with a violently chauvinistic attack on Romain Rolland and all who, because of Nazi book-burnings, racial discrimination, exilings and killings, fail to see that at last "a nation which had ceased to believe in itself has begun to believe, and this belief makes it beautiful."

This knuckling under to Hitler has not of course been unanimous, and I do not want anyone to ask "What else could the poor chaps do?" and go unanswered. Let me cite the case of Hermynia zur Mühlen, a moderately popular novelist of the Weimar period whose latest work has just been published in Switzerland. Not only did her publisher, Englehorn of Stuttgart, forward to her the boycott threat of the Reichsstelle, but he suggested that in breaking with the Neue Deutsche Blätter—collaboration in which was her crime—she would not lose honor but would fall into "the best of company," and cited the easy capitulation of Thomas Mann, Döblin, Schickele, and Stefan Zweig. Zur Mühlen's reply follows in part:

Inasmuch as I do not share your view that the Third Reich is identical with Germany, or the "Leader" with the German people, I cannot reconcile either my convictions or my feelings of decency with following the example of the four gentlemen cited above. I am more concerned, about the South

The letters which we print below are only part of those we have received in answer to our question "Is this the voice of the South?" in The Nation for December 27. It will be seen that these eight correspondents are from six of the Southern States and that they express eight different shades of opinion, from blanket agreement with John Gould Fletcher to an almost complete agreement with The Nation. Other letters received expressed still other points of view, but space forbids their use. Charles Finger writes from Fayetteville, Arkansas, that the voice of the South is a "sane voice"; that "Mr. Fletcher is in error. He reports . . . but the faint echo of a vanished past." Clara Mae Jessup, a Southerner now living in New York, although she personally does not agree with him, says Mr. Fletcher's letter is the voice of the South and "of the North also." She adds, "The fight is against an economic system in which race and sectional prejudice is a symptom rather than a cause." Douglas L. Hunt, a Northerner who has lived many years in Tennessee, sees much that is not only inevitable but sound in Mr. Fletcher's position, and he declares that this position "is not the voice of the entire South, but of an important part of it," and that it "deserved slightly more understanding than you gave it." Eleanor Copenhaver, of Marion, Virginia, agrees with Mr. Fletcher in resenting "the habit of the North of pointing a superior finger at the South." But she too declares the issue to be one of class rather than of race. The correspondence as a whole indicates what was plain enough from the beginning,

The Minister and the Depression

By HUBERT HERRING

THERE are some 150,000 ministers of organized religion in the United States. The direct and clearly traceable toll which the economic collapse has exacted of this substantial group can at best be guessed at. The Catholic clergy suffer no unemployment; it is part of the genius of the Roman church that it lifts its ministers out of the world of fret and care and sets them free to serve without thought of gain or loss. The Catholic clergy are, for the most part, poor—poor in days of depression, equally poor in days of prosperity. They are never without work. The Jewish clergy are also in a favored position. There is no guaranty of life positions, but the rabbinate is closely guarded, and applicants are subjected to a long and arduous training. As a result, there has been little overproduction of applicants and virtually no unemployment. Many rabbis have shared in the depression through suffering reductions in salary, but rabbinical salaries have been the highest among the clergy.

The burden of the depression has fallen most heavily upon ministers of the Protestant groups. The diversity and variety of these groups make this inevitable. The ministers of the denominations most highly centralized have suffered the least. The clergy of the Episcopal and the Methodist churches are, in theory at least, assured of positions, and while salaries may be cut or disappear altogether, there is the backing of a strong central hierarchy. The ministers of the more loosely organized denominations such as the Disciples of Christ, the Baptists, the Congregationalists, and the Presbyterians have suffered the most unemployment. The figures him and the Protestant faith are without this coward. May the consciousness of shame claim say that fully one-Hauptmann, Gerhart, has lost his honor. has he found no word of condemnation for these most barbarous of barbarians. He does not wish to risk his economic status. So he has not simply ducked: he fawns. . . . With the respect he universally enjoys he could have dealt a blow to the reputation of these murderers, slaves, hangmen, liars, violators of every law, who hunt down before his eyes his own weaver folk and men whose sole crime is their birth. . . . Out of fright, out of desire for gain, out of sordid weakness, he used his last ounce of strength to hoist the Hakenkreuz rag on his dwelling. . . . Hauptmann has deserted to the enemy.

On the same day there appeared in the Berliner Tageblatt an article from Hauptmann's pen entitled "Ich Sage Ja" ("I Say Yes"). Hailing Germany's bolt from the League of Nations as a step toward peace, he indorsed all the details of Hitler's foreign policy and urged national support of the Chancellor and his program.

Hauptmann is, however, not alone in abandoning opposition to Hitlerism. This distinguished literary figure has distinguished company.

Of the many new magazines established by exiles, the least political and the least aggressive in fighting Hitlerism is Die Sammlung. Published in Amsterdam by the Querido Verlag, this monthly is edited by Klaus Mann, the son of Thomas Mann, and is sponsored by André Gide, Aldous

the exceptions are so rare as to prove the rule. Another force is the growing impatience with competitive denominationalism. Churches merge for greater economy and effectiveness, and fewer ministers are required. In thousands of villages and towns, two, three, or four churches have pooled their resources, organized a community church under one or another name, and dismissed one or two ministers from gainful employment. Furthermore, thousands of churches have been forced to give up altogether. Many of these existed only in name, but the depression has forced the cleaning up of the badly padded denominational rolls. Reductions in salaries are, of course, the rule. It is the rare church in which the minister's salary has not been cut from 10 to 25 per cent, and in many cases the cut has ranged from 25 to 100 per cent. Reports from different sections of the country, especially from farming and industrial centers, make bitter reading. Hundreds of ministers, probably several thousands, are living on in their parsonages, conducting their services, accepting from their neighbors any surplus of foodstuffs which can be spared, and receiving an occasional offering of money.

That the depression has levied a heavy economic toll upon the ministers is clear, but a more significant and interesting question is, What has the depression done to the thinking of the minister? What happens to the minister when revolution breaks out, disrupting traditional economic and social values, reducing one-third of the population of the country to actual want, evicting hundreds of thousands from their homes, sweeping away savings, and stripping from great sections of the population faith in the security of the economic system under which they have been reared? What happens to the minister whose church has been made the handmaiden of the capitalistic order when that order shows signs of crumbling and of disappearing altogether? What happens to the minister who believes devoutly in the religion he professes when the financial security of his employers shows signs of vanishing? There can be no blanket word in many things happen, and the responses which ministers during these days of crisis divide them into fairly and culture. One typical response is to fall back upon "the old" through S. Fischer (his is the traditional escape mechanism of the devout Catholic; and the con- tation of magazine was the same. The orthodox rabbi will

Among the other collative Protestant will talk about lung was René Schickele, a he loyal Catholic will fall back reduced not only charming ge the same yesterday, today, and ist slant aiming at a Fran is a flight which is contemplated, might save his beloved pre and its brutal obstinacies. There reply to the pressure of th of reason, for trust in those higher poses not only the recon we are nothing. Millions today was this wire to Fischer: from reality, and joyfully commit acter of Sammlung since ily felt and implicitly trusted. Their view only purely liter in leading this retreat. strictly steer clear of s

There are other avenues of escape which have proved immensely satisfying to large numbers of ministers. One of the most fascinating of these, from the standpoint of the bystander, is that known as the Oxford movement, or more commonly as Buchmanism after its founder and high priest, one Frank Buchman. Buchmanism has been sweeping this country, Canada, and England. Its votaries carry its glad tidings all over the world. Emerson's dictum on the Church of England, that its cardinal tenet is "By taste are ye saved," applies with double force to Buchmanism. Its appeal is to the comfortable. Its "house parties" are always adorned with at least one Lady This or Lord That, at least one son of a rubber magnate or daughter of an oil king. The best people gather where the flag of Buchmanism is raised. There are neither intellectual difficulties nor social obligations in the Buchman scheme. Much is made of sin, of all the neat little sins, easily sorted and filed. The central obsession is sex. The "house parties" are gorgeous riots of confession. The instinct which compels drummers to swap their adventures in venery is sublimated, and the dapper youth home from college tells about the janitor's daughter, the supposedly sedate matron reveals that she is not so good as she should be. Over these Christian bacchanalia broods the explosively sunny presence of a leader—Buchman or one of his lieutenants—talking affectionately and endlessly about "absolute purity, honesty, unselfishness, and love." The simplest decision of the day—the choice of a cereal or the choice of a hat—is subject to "guidance." The Buchmanite bids his intellect a joyous farewell and leaves all to God. Of care for the plight of the victims of the most serious social revolution of modern times, there is not a trace.

Not all ministers take to their heels and seek escape. The depression years have stimulated solid thinking on the social applications of religion, and the churches are today showing more interest in the ordering of society than at any time in their history. The social emphasis is not new among the ministers. For many years there have been a few brave spirits who dared, in the name of religion, to protest against those who, in Edward A. Ross's phrase, "sinned by syndicate." These men have boldly sought to interpret the creeds in social terms. Today they are coming in usually on their own, and under the compulsion of our social reviver prefers to numbers are greatly augmenting.

This social movement has not been a new thing, that is, adherents of any one creed. In the past it has been for years a powerful and of the week at most, so movement to stress social justice and hands, but I didn't think forces of self-interest and undisciplined beginning to hear about cal of Pope Leo XIII on "The Church and the Rent"—he of Pope Pius XI on "Reconstruction"—says, "That's all right, proved powerful instruments in the past. You got more leisure than I bent upon making the church a better place." When I go to buy a new suit, the man slaps me on the back, "Ah, rebuilding. The National Catholic Review. On the stoop Mrs. O'Reilly done much to prick the social conscience. Snipkin! what'll ye be doin' work of Father John A. Ryan at all?" So I'm beginning to luminous chapters in American history after all, I got leisure. have also done much. The inheritance of the past has been forgotten, and the uncompromising demands of Israel upon predatory wealth the life, but there is a little many of the rabbis of the present. The writer's correspondent goes influences are at work among the Protestant children and that all Federal Council of Churches demonstrate them, they have the pecially is it true of the younger men who are graduating from the theological seminaries. They view the task of the church in militantly social terms. They propose to use their ministry as an instrument for putting an end to an economic and social system which exalts property interests over human rights. It is no wonder that many of these recent graduates are finding their way blocked by the older "statesmen" of the church.

If one is asked to put one's finger on the single most significant effect of the depression upon the thinking of the Protestant ministry, the answer must be found in this increased determination to apply religion in social terms. It is significant that during the past five years, whenever ministers have met together, the one absorbing interest has been economic and social rebuilding. I have seen this time and again. The older emphases—missions, evangelism, church organization—are still maintained, but the younger men have lost interest in these things. They are asking, and with increased emphasis, what the church can do and intends to do on the vexed questions of war, uncontrolled economic banditry, the whole disorderly house of our modern civilization, and the penalties which it exacts in unemployment, insecurity, and misery. It is impossible to compute in neat statistics the strength of this movement within the Protestant churches. In some denominations there is almost none of it; in others it flourishes. I would venture the guess that at least 10 per cent of the ministers of the major Protestant denominations would agree in insisting that the chief job of the church is to work for a reordering of society. They would not agree as to the terms of the reordering, but the agreement upon the need is significant.

The other side of the picture is not so rosy. If it is true that the depression has increased the number of those ministers who are determined to use the church as an instrument for social regeneration, it is equally true that the forces of conservatism are doing their best to keep the church, be it in the North or the South, as it has been for centuries. Correspondence

Voices from the South

[The letters which we print below are only part of those we have received in answer to our question "Is this the voice of the South?" in The Nation for December 27. It will be seen that these eight correspondents are from six of the Southern States and that they express eight different shades of opinion, from blanket agreement with John Gould Fletcher to an almost complete agreement with The Nation. Other letters received expressed still other points of view, but space forbids their use. Charles Finger writes from Fayetteville, Arkansas, that the voice of the South is a "sane voice"; that "Mr. Fletcher is in error. He reports . . . but the faint echo of a vanished past." Clara Mae Jessup, a Southerner now living in New York, although she personally does not agree with him, says Mr. Fletcher's letter is the voice of the South and "of the North also." She adds, "The fight is against an economic system in which race and sectional prejudice is a symptom rather than a cause." Douglas L. Hunt, a Northerner who has lived many years in Tennessee, sees much that is not only inevitable but sound in Mr. Fletcher's position, and he declares that this position "is not the voice of the entire South, but of an important part of it," and that it "deserved slightly more understanding than you gave it." Eleanor Copenhaver, of Marion, Virginia, agrees with Mr. Fletcher in resenting "the habit of the North of pointing a superior finger at the South." But she too declares the issue to be one of class rather than of race. The correspondence as a whole indicates what was plain enough from the beginning,

American Diplomacy in Cuba

By CARLETON BEALS

Havana, December 28

THUS ends garage diplomacy," said a well-known Cuban to me when Sumner Welles, former Ambassador to a non-recognized government, left Havana by plane. One of Welles's numerous secret conferences at small hours of the night, by which he endeavored to force the Grau Government to abdicate in favor of a reactionary coalition, was reported to have been held in a garage. For three months tight-lipped austerity and blue-blooded superciliousness concealed the facts from the Cuban and American public, while hidden intrigue and inept meddling were producing disastrous results and making non-intervention merely a hypocritical pose. This has created an almost insoluble situation.

Throughout Welles's incumbency, as during that of former Ambassador Guggenheim, the fiction of "official" and "non-official" diplomatic activities was maintained. There is and can be no such division of the activities of a diplomatic representative. It was impossible for Welles to divest himself at will of the authority of his position and to act as a simple citizen.

The general tenor of our official position is that we will recognize any provisional government—except this one—strong enough to maintain order if it represents the will of the people. The assumption, of course, is that the State Department is fully qualified to determine what government in Cuba represents the will of the people—an interventionist attitude not one whit different from the traditional non-coercion of previous Washington administrations.

him and in . . . on the theory that the Grau Government is a coward. May the . . . he actively tried to the consciousness of shame . . . say that he sought Hauptmann, Gerhart, has lost his honor. . . . but to has he found no word of condemnation for these monstrous barbarians. He does not wish to risk his economic status. So he has not simply ducked: he fawns . . . With the respect he universally enjoys he could have dealt a blow to the reputation of these murderers, slaves, hangmen, liars, violators of every law, who hunt down before his eyes his own weaver folk and men whose sole crime is their birth. . . . Out of fright, out of desire for gain, out of sordid weakness, he used his last ounce of strength to hoist the Hakenkreuz rag on his dwelling. . . . Hauptmann has deserted to the enemy.

On the same day there appeared in the Berliner Tageblatt an article from Hauptmann's pen entitled "Ich Sage Ja" ("I Say Yes"). Hailing Germany's bolt from the League of Nations as a step toward peace, he indorsed all the details of Hitler's foreign policy and urged national support of the Chancellor and his program.

Hauptmann is, however, not alone in abandoning opposition to Hitlerism. This distinguished literary figure has distinguished company.

Of the many new magazines established by exiles, the least political and the least aggressive in fighting Hitlerism is Die Sammlung. Published in Amsterdam by the Querido Verlag, this monthly is edited by Klaus Mann, the son of Thomas Mann, and is sponsored by André Gide, Aldous is an impossibility. Moreover, he sought to set up a reactionary united front of the most vicious sort. Ever since the fall of the De Céspedes Government, which he brought into being by promoting army treachery, Welles has been actively hostile to the Grau Government; he has consorted with all the enemies of that government, particularly with the A. B. C. terrorist group, then and since so busy exploding bombs and sniping from roof tops in Havana. Not only was the De Céspedes Government an attempt to offset a revolution which would really represent the will of the Cuban people, not only did Welles attempt to reinstate reactionary elements, but later he sought to encourage further military treachery by encouraging the army elements within the Grau Government itself to bring about its destruction—actions not entirely contradictory.

I hold no brief for the present regime in Cuba; on the other hand, a new coup under Welles's leadership could only have led to bitter and fruitless civil war. Coalition government has never worked for any length of time in any revolutionary crisis. Even in the United States, where wide conflicts of ruling ideology do not exist, would it not be absurd to demand that Roosevelt and Farley abdicate, that Al Smith be appointed President with a Cabinet including such names as Hoover, Mellon, O'Brien, Jimmy Walker, Rolph, and John Dewey? This is approximately what Welles was demanding of Cuba—with the weight of a great nation behind him and with that peculiar self-assurance of purple-veined career diplomats.

Why did he assume that all the conspiring pseudo-aristocratic job-hunters of the white Creole Vedado suburb of Havana were representative of Cuba as a whole? Upon what revolutionary precedent did he base his contention that Cuba would be best served by a hybrid coalition of discredited politicians, the present student-army faction, the Nationalists, known R. C. bomb-throwers, and others? Why did he exclude from his program all the powerful labor elements, the essays urging a League, the Communist Party? Why a and enter the these a coalition, why not a complete coalition? and culture. Or ed in by Welles and the State Department through S. Fischer (al r. Cuba, even when its nature had been published a book is the failure to realize that the overthrow Döblin wired from abroad, definite revolution, however hard and political connection he dis into a traditional army coup Request you publish this q ut tias. Revolutions cannot be con- tation of magazine was u the a The ease with which Welles

Among the other coll same, ination concealed the explosive lung was René Schickele, a active ieved, the dictator's downfall, duced not only charming ge he led the accumulation of terrible ist slant aiming at a Fran is d a revolution of great import might save his beloved pre atfully disguised in legal niceties, reply to the pressure of th an But the efforts of the embattled poses not only the recon of e general strike, were sidetracked, was this wire to Fischer: wag utilized, by the United States acter of Sammlung since, mbassy abetted the betrayal of Maview only purely lit Welles, seeking strength, not justice strictly steer clear of s popular will, wished to have General

Herrera, Machado's loyal companion in the assassination of a people, assume the presidency, and only reluctantly abandoned this impossible solution. His puppet De Céspedes Government represented a queer alliance of the Machado officer caste, the American Ambassador, the various old-line political parties, and several secret revolutionary organizations already in the process of dissolution. De Céspedes himself was an amiable old gentleman who had served Machado faithfully, but he lacked the energy and understanding to comprehend the crisis involved. In fact, not the most powerful personality in the world could have ruled Cuba with such contradictory elements, especially when the main objective was to salvage as much as possible of the iniquitous Machado regime.

In most matters the administrative center of the De Céspedes Government was the American Embassy. There the various political factions resorted for instructions; there were agreed upon various important political appointments which suited Welles's fancy. Even so, the nondescript De Céspedes regime, against Welles's wishes, was obliged to abandon in part the judicial system built up by Machado to sustain his power, to abolish the Machado constitutional changes of 1928, and to dissolve the Machado congress by executive decree.

Three army plots were in process. The reactionary Menocal element was getting the upper hand by winning over the Machado officers. The A. B. C., part of the De Céspedes government, was losing its grip on the rank and file and was courting the younger officers. The left-wing of the students' directorate (all the students refused to accept the original Welles mediation and none were part of the government) was propagandizing the rank and file, and a secret organization controlled by Sergeant Fulgencio Batista, ex-member of the A. B. C., was gaining ground. In addition strikes were continuing, and the workers everywhere were seizing mines, factories, and sugar estates.

Twenty-two days after the formation of the De Céspedes Government, was losing its grip on the rank and file of Sergio Carbó, made its revolution, partly out of fear of communism and threatened pay cuts, although the movement was disguised as a protest against inadequate bathing facilities and other minor matters. The officers were just usually sent home. Not a drop of blood was spilled. After prefers to wing of the students jumped into the breach.

away from left-wing elements, and haster workingman, that is, blance of government, an executive cor get work it is only for nationalist program—Cuba's shif the week at most, so Eventually Grau San Martín wə hands, but I didn't think

This was an inevitable outa beginning to hear about ment set up by Welles. If t to talk over the rent—he Machado, then the sergeants rent—says, "That's all right, evil officers of Machado. T You got more leisure than I a certain moral sturdiness be man slaps me on the back, "Ah, fused to accept the first We On the stoop Mrs. O'Reilly of this by immediately exaged, Snipkin! what'll ye be doin' stand strengthened by the a at all?" So I'm beginning to vessels in Cuban waters. Thff after all, I got leisure. populace to a frenzy of hate the dead of night the side of c huge letters, "Down with Amerhe life, but there is a little Welles could hardly be expectrifer's correspondent goes ment. His magic wand had swept ir children and that al and he had set up an illegal governme them, they have the

The press had showered him with praise. He had posed in close embrace with De Céspedes before the movie cameras. The Batista revolt snatched the too easily won laurels from his brow. Inevitably Welles became the chief conspirator against the new government. The enemies of the Grau-Batista regime, with the exception of labor and Communist elements, flocked to the Embassy and were received there with open arms and much advice. Secret diplomacy. Hectic late night sessions. All this feverish activity was disguised as "conciliation." But as one Cuban expressed it to me, "During the brief De Céspedes rule Welles was the real President; when the Grau-Batista revolution destroyed his power, he became the head of the opposition to the existing government."

Welles was particularly close to the A. B. C. group, who were thus encouraged to continue their terroristic tactics. The leaders of this group had become friendly with Welles during the rule of the De Céspedes Government and had hurried to throw overboard their principles and do Welles's bidding. During that twilight period Martinez Saenz, a National City Bank lawyer and Minister of the Treasury, in ten short days made a complete right-about-face, junking the previous A. B. C. program. Under De Céspedes the A. B. C. had tried to convert itself into an open political party. Instead of anonymous leadership unknown to the rank and file, it thereupon had to provide satisfactory leadership and to popularize it with its members and with the country. Those who jumped into open control turned out to be lawyers, bankers, and corporation agents with intimate connections with powerful American interests. Members of the Porra, Machado's secret strong-arm gang, also flocked to the A. B. C., seeking refuge from popular wrath by wrapping themselves in the false cloak of the revolution. The A. B. C. has since allied itself with the deposed Machado army officers and the corrupt ex-President Mario Menocal. It moral leverage when it accepted Welles's

Correspondence the voices from the South

A [The letters which we print below are only part of those we have received in answer to our question "Is this the voice of the South?" in The Nation for December 27. It will be seen that these eight correspondents are from six of the Southern States and that they express eight different shades of opinion, from blanket agreement with John Gould Fletcher to an almost complete agreement with The Nation. Other letters received expressed still other points of view, but space forbids their use. Charles Finger writes from Fayetteville, Arkansas, that the voice of the South is a "sane voice"; that "Mr. Fletcher is in error. He reports . . . but the faint echo of a vanished past." Clara Mae Jessup, a Southerner now living in New York, although she personally does not agree with him, says Mr. Fletcher's letter is the voice of the South and "of the North also." She adds, "The fight is against an economic system in which race and sectional prejudice is a symptom rather than a cause." Douglas L. Hunt, a Northerner who has lived many years in Tennessee, sees much that is not only inevitable but sound in Mr. Fletcher's position, and he declares that this position "is not the voice of the entire South, but "at an important part of it," and that it "deserved slightly more understanding than you gave it." Eleanor Copenhaver, of Marion, Virginia, agrees with Mr. Fletcher in resenting "the habit of the North of pointing a superior finger at the South." But she too declares the issue to be one of class rather than of race. The correspondence as a whole indicates what was plain enough from the beginning,

The last of the three parleys which Welles had with Grau dealt with the new light rate of 9.66 cents a kilowatt-hour (previous rate 17 cents, the highest in the world), which Welles demanded should be revised. According to the President (Welles refused to state what had been discussed), Welles at one point acidly remarked that it would be wise for Grau to remember that he, Welles, was an intimate friend of President Roosevelt.

The present regime is bitter; it accuses Welles of aiding the Machado army officers' resistance when they gathered around him in the Hotel Nacional. At the outset he arrogantly used the authority of his position and in person prevented the arrest of some of the officers, thus making dislodgment of them by semi-pacific means impossible. The government feels that if it had been obliged to occupy an American-owned hotel for its own purposes, Welles would have protested vehemently, but that he made not the slightest protest to the officers for thus seizing American property and converting it into a fortress for the overthrow of the government. Instead, he extended the extra-territoriality of the American Embassy to protect them.

With regard to the leaders of the subsequent tragic Atarés revolt by the A. B. C., army officers, and politicians, the government points out that Blas Hernández was a puppet of Antonio González de Mendoza of the American Sugar Refining Company, at whose home Welles had previously lived; that Ituralde visited the embassy two days prior to the revolt and emerged rubbing his hands and declaring to the press that the Cuban situation was now settled; that after the defeat of the rebels, Collazo was saved from arrest and the consequences of his acts by being placed aboard a P. and O. packet boat by the American battleship launch. Ituralde was one of the worst of all Machado cabinet officials, and is said to have provoked the first important Machado assassination. Collazo rose from the ranks to become the cacique of Matanzas province, a millionaire and a power in the land; he was also a notorious Machado politician. These were the elements with which the A. B. C. and Welles cooperated.

The present Grau Government is a romantic nationalistic affair without a definite program. But on the other hand it is the first government in Cuba's history of purely Cuban origin. Whether it will sustain itself, whether it is doomed in any case, I do not know, though it has been growing increasingly stronger. But Welles's attempt to instal reactionary and discredited elements in control of the Cuban government, his use of the embassy as a clubroom for the reunion of all the enemies of the government, his abetting of the terrorist A. B. C., which talked conciliation during the day and planted bombs during the night, have contributed to instability and armed revolt. Unwittingly Welles has been preparing the ground for a great, unorganized social upheaval in Cuba. His meddling has been very similar in character and purpose to that of Henry Lane Wilson during the Madero administration in Mexico after the revolution against Díaz. Wilson contributed greatly to the downfall of Madero and hence to his subsequent assassination, and he helped spill a river of blood across Mexico for a decade or more. The Cubans will not soon forgive Welles his meddling and his partisanship; he has sowed and reaped a fresh crop of hatred for the United States.

Youth Meets in Washington

By SELDEN RODMAN

him and this coward. May the consciousness of shame chief. Hauptmann, Gerhart, has lost his honor. He has found no word of condemnation for these monstrous barbarians. He does not wish to risk his economic status. So he has not simply ducked: he fawns. . . . With the respect he universally enjoys he could have dealt a blow to the reputation of these murderers, slaves, hangmen, liars, violators of every law, who hunt down before his eyes his own weaver folk and men whose sole crime is their birth. . . . Out of fright, out of desire for gain, out of sordid weakness, he used his last ounce of strength to hoist the Hakenkreuz rag on his dwelling. . . . Hauptmann has deserted to the enemy.

On the same day there appeared in the Berliner Tageblatt an article from Hauptmann's pen entitled "Ich Sage Ja" ("I Say Yes"). Hailing Germany's bolt from the League of Nations as a step toward peace, he indorsed all the details of Hitler's foreign policy and urged national support of the Chancellor and his program.

Hauptmann is, however, not alone in abandoning opposition to Hitlerism. This distinguished literary figure has distinguished company.

Of the many new magazines established by exiles, the least political and the least aggressive in fighting Hitlerism is Die Sammlung. Published in Amsterdam by the Querido Verlag, this monthly is edited by Klaus Mann, the son of Thomas Mann, and is sponsored by André Gide, Aldous political philosophies. The National Student League—the Communist group—was not represented at the outset, but leaders of all the other organizations, and particularly the Know-nothing order to keep the conference open in the future word in many and radicals alike, no resolutions were to be essays urging the adoption of any sort permitted. The N. S. L. and culture. Officially it sent a representative to only one has published a book.

Döblin wired from abroad. The National Student Federation and political connection. The heads of the student government of the colleges, held a five-day convention of magazine was in the Mayflower Hotel.

Among the other college observers, was captured lung was René Schickele, a noted to set up NRA clubs. He led to Secretary Roper's suggestion not only charming gentleman be sent to Washington might save his beloved price expense to study the workings reply to the pressure of the federation go on record poses not only the reconciliation as passed—but not unanimously. was this wire to Fischer: went insurance and elimination acter of Sammlung since defeated.

view only purely literature that there were progressive strictly steer clear of social, in the N. S. F. A. How, I won-

The "United Front." As the Drifter's correspondent goes close, the tension and bitterness ran high over our children and that always being slung right and left. There they have the

[The letters which we print below are only part of those we have received in answer to our question "Is this the voice of the South?" in The Nation for December 27. It will be seen that these eight correspondents are from six of the Southern States and that they express eight different shades of opinion, from blanket agreement with John Gould Fletcher to an almost complete agreement with The Nation. Other letters received expressed still other points of view, but space forbids their use. Charles Finger writes from Fayetteville, Arkansas, that the voice of the South is a "sane voice"; that "Mr. Fletcher is in error. He reports . . . but the faint echo of a vanished past." Clara Mae Jessup, a Southerner now living in New York, although she personally does not agree with him, says Mr. Fletcher's letter is the voice of the South and 'of the North also.' She adds, "The fight is against an economic system in which race and sectional prejudice is a symptom rather than a cause." Douglas L. Hunt, a Northerner who has lived many years in Tennessee, sees much that is not only inevitable but sound in Mr. Fletcher's position, and he declares that this position "is not the voice of the entire South, but "ot an important part of it," and that it "deserved slightly more understanding than you gave it." Eleanor Copenhaver, of Marion, Virginia, agrees with Mr. Fletcher in resenting "the habit of the North of pointing a superior finger at the South." But she too declares the issue to be one of class rather than of race. The correspondence as a whole indicates what was plain enough from the beginning,

Big News Comes to Russia

By MILLY BENNETT

Moscow, December 21

TO the average Muscovite, that Utopian strand of skyscrapers, soda stands, Lincolns, jazz, hornrims, and Mary Pickfords that is the United States of America moved a few notches nearer on November 18 when he pulled his damp and slightly frozen Izvestia out of the mail-box and found four columns—two columns for each—of Litvinov and Roosevelt staring up at him from page 1.

There can be no question that news of recognition, coming to Moscow on that snowbound, blizzardy November day, with the thermometer flirting seriously with sixteen below, found the 200-odd Americans in town "excited" and the 3,000,000-odd Russians "surprised and pleased."

It was an exuberant American, one A. A. Johnson, statistical expert from Springfield, Massachusetts, who proposed a mass demonstration of Moscow's American colony down the Ulitsa Gorki "led by the thirty-four-by-sixty-inch solid-silk American flag that I brought from home for the very purpose." "The Russians would love us for it," he persisted, only slightly discouraged by the measured advice of more solemn souls.

Kings have come—there was Amanullah of Afghanistan, silken rugs run over the pavements to soften the way for his royal feet; Japanese planes have reconnoitered over Soviet territory; Bernard Shaw has roared "Tovarishchii" from the platform of Moscow's Hall of Columns; the French Herriot has been and gone; the Five-Year Plan has been accomplished; four; France has made friends, and Germany has him and the Ukraine." Yet not one of these this coward. May the notes of space in Soviet the consciousness of shame chief say the much as the Hauptmann, Gerhart, has lost his honor. . . . He has found no word of condemnation for these most barbarous of barbarians. He does not wish to risk his economic status. So he has not simply ducked: he fawns . . . With the respect he universally enjoys he could have dealt a blow to the reputation of these murderers, slaves, hangmen, liars, violators of every law, who hunt down before his eyes his own weaver folk and men whose sole crime is their birth. . . . Out of fright, out of desire for gain, out of sordid weakness, he used his last ounce of strength to hoist the Hakenkreuz rag on his dwelling. . . . Hauptmann has deserted to the enemy.

On the same day there appeared in the Berliner Tageblatt an article from Hauptmann's pen entitled "Ich Sage Ja" ("I Say Yes"). Hailing Germany's bolt from the League of Nations as a step toward peace, he indorsed all the details of Hitler's foreign policy and urged national support of the Chancellor and his program.

Hauptmann is, however, not alone in abandoning opposition to Hitlerism. This distinguished literary figure has distinguished company.

Of the many new magazines established by exiles, the least political and the least aggressive in fighting Hitlerism is Die Sammlung. Published in Amsterdam by the Querido Verlag, this monthly is edited by Klaus Mann, the son of Thomas Mann, and is sponsored by André Gide, Aldous hique, the song of praise to America's industrial and scientific development reaching its climax perhaps in an article from the director of the giant tractor plant at Chelyabinsk. After pointing out that the factory is modeled after American plants, he said that all the equipment would have been American as well if the Soviet could only have reached satisfactory terms with American manufacturers.

Within three days of the time that news of recognition reached Moscow a squad of "twenty-minute men" were marching on the town's universities, factories, and shops, delivering talks on the significance of the American-Soviet agreement. At the Communist University this is what the students heard:

Recognition was forced on the United States by the economic crisis, by her need for new markets, and by the political situation and the role that Japan is assuming in the Far East. Both the Soviet Union and the United States strengthen their positions in the Far East by this friendly pact. This step on the part of the United States shows that the foreign policy of the Soviet Union has been correct in the past sixteen years, our policy of advocating international peace and disarmament and of refusing to discuss the debt question until diplomatic relations are established.

It is lunch hour on November 21 at the Seventh Moscow Printshop, called Spark of the Revolution. The big flat-bed and rotary presses are rolling out Krasnaya Zvezda, the Red Army daily; Legkaya Industriya, the light-industry newspaper; the Moscow Daily News; and the German daily, Deutsche Zentralni Zeitung. Linotype operators, printers, pressmen, stonemen are pouring out of the dining-room to where a short, stout fellow, forty or fifty years old, is talking about recognition. He is a representative from the district committee of the Communist Party. He is saying: "America, the leading capitalist country, thought that the Soviets knew a temporary affair, that they could get along without word in the Union." He gets around to the crisis: "America's essays urging anything, anything which might promote better and enter the psychological effect upon Japan's firebrands and culture. On the ship between the Soviet Union and the through S. Fischer (the little fellow mops his brow, gulps has published a book on his way to another speech. Döblin wired from abroad reporters from Komsomolskaya and political connection the American doorbells with such per- Request you publish this question you like living in Moscow?" the cognition open for the United tation of magazine was used the same girl reporter, surely not more

Among the other collective questions to me, I countered: lung was René Schickele, a he lone Russian mujik think about duced not only charming ge the did not change expression as ist slant aiming at a Fran is a fruit. Even America must might save his beloved pre an reply to the pressure of the an poses not only the recon of ing All-Union Photograph Com- was this wire to Fischer: w ures of well-known Americans acter of Sammlung since, in a series called "Moscow Yan- view only purely liter the challenge of the Mayor of Jersey strictly steer clear of s dren to enter into competition with American youngsters for the best composition on the subject of the significance of America's recognition of the Soviet Union. The literary weekly Liternaturnaya Gazeta brings out a special American edition, featuring a leading article called Literature and the Class Struggle in the U. S. A., and carrying full-page discussions of the work of Sinclair Lewis and Theodore Dreiser, both great favorites with Russian readers.

The Foreign Office, a few days after the agreement was reached, tendered a big dinner to American correspondents which turned into a mutual-admiration meeting, and on December 4 the correspondents gave a farewell dinner to A. A. Troyanovski, who goes to Washington as the first Soviet Ambassador. Just to show their good-will, such important individuals as Krestinsky, Rosenholz, and Mezhlauk signified their willingness to attend, an unprecedented occurrence.

And Louis Fischer reports that when he tried to board a street-car the other day, what with the crowds in sheepskins and the ice-coated, snowy pavements, he found it well-nigh impossible to get on; he finally boarded the front end, the entrance reserved for children, cripples, the very old, pregnant women, members of the party, and militiamen, and was promptly challenged. "I'm an American," he said, producing his foreign correspondent's card. "An American? It's all right then," and the guard waved him along with a broad smile.

In the Driftway

"DEAR DRIFTER: You are a smart man and I want to ask you a question. I hear people talking about this thing leisure and I think I have it but I am not sure, so I want to ask your opinion." So a letter begins which arrived in the mail. Anyone who begins by calling the Drifter a "smart man" may, of course, ask all the questions that pop into his head. The Drifter will lend a sympathetic ear, though he does not promise a satisfactory answer. Answers are not much in the Drifter's line. He can sometimes supply an analysis, but what most people mean by an answer is a prescription. To give that one must usually be a quack. Anyhow, for the present the Drifter prefers to go on with the letter, which continues:

I am a hod-carrier by trade, a workingman, that is, and therefore out of a job. If I do get work it is only for a short time, one or two days out of the week at most, so that I have a lot of time on my hands, but I didn't think I was fortunate until now I'm beginning to hear about leisure. My landlord comes to talk over the rent—he comes often to talk over the rent—says, "That's all right, look at the leisure you got. You got more leisure than I have. I'll be around to-morrow." When I go to buy a newspaper the candy-store man slaps me on the back, "Ah, there is a man of leisure." On the stoop Mrs. O'Reilly greets me, "Glory be to God, Snipkin! what'll ye be doin' with all yer laizure, at all at all?" So I'm beginning to think maybe I'm not so bad off after all, I got leisure.

* * * * *

THUS far this sounds like the life, but there is a little more to it than that. The Drifter's correspondent goes on to say that he has a wife and four children and that although he has a lot of leisure to give them, they have the contrariness to prefer potatoes, which are getting dearer. Besides that, winter has arrived and the wind whistles through the flat like a subway train. One child needs a pair of shoes and another is going around without a coat. All of them could do with some more vitamins.

So all in all, Mr. Drifter, I'm thinking, if I have it and it's a good thing, this leisure, maybe I could do something with it? Maybe you know of somebody who wants it? Maybe you could use a little yourself? I would sell it for cheap because I got a lot of it.

* * * * *

NOW that the Drifter has come to the end, he has decided that an answer is easy. He does not have to formulate one of his own. He need only pass out one already given by an eminent American, who is a college president and so, of course, must be right. Nicholas Murray Butler of Columbia University said the other day that nobody could have leisure until he had work to guarantee him a livelihood. Without that, one lacked the tranquillity of mind essential to leisure. And the Drifter might add that it is necessary not only to have work but a sense of security in it in order to attain leisure. For leisure is in part at least a state of mind. The Drifter will make one other comment also. His correspondent will never have any leisure to give away. If sometime he gets the reality, as the Drifter hopes he may, he will sense that it is non-transferable, besides which he will not want to transfer it. As for the spurious leisure which the Drifter's correspondent has at the moment, he will not be able to give that away either—nobody wants it.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence Voices from the South

[The letters which we print below are only part of those we have received in answer to our question "Is this the voice of the South?" in The Nation for December 27. It will be seen that these eight correspondents are from six of the Southern States and that they express eight different shades of opinion, from blanket agreement with John Gould Fletcher to an almost complete agreement with The Nation. Other letters received expressed still other points of view, but space forbids their use. Charles Finger writes from Fayetteville, Arkansas, that the voice of the South is a "sane voice"; that "Mr. Fletcher is in error. He reports . . . but the faint echo of a vanished past." Clara Mae Jessup, a Southerner now living in New York, although she personally does not agree with him, says Mr. Fletcher's letter is the voice of the South and "of the North also." She adds, "The fight is against an economic system in which race and sectional prejudice is a symptom rather than a cause." Douglas L. Hunt, a Northerner who has lived many years in Tennessee, sees much that is not only inevitable but sound in Mr. Fletcher's position, and he declares that this position "is not the voice of the entire South, but "of an important part of it," and that it "deserved slightly more understanding than you gave it." Eleanor Copenhaver, of Marion, Virginia, agrees with Mr. Fletcher in resenting "the habit of the North of pointing a superior finger at the South." But she too declares the issue to be one of class rather than of race. The correspondence as a whole indicates what was plain enough from the beginning, that no one thing is thought to be the cause of lynching, or its cure; that "Northern interference" is not universally resented in the South; that injustice to Negroes is not universally championed. In short, the lynching problem remains with us, with all its antecedents and its accompaniments, but very slowly progress in solving it is being made. The average number of lynchings over the last ten years is considerably less than over the years preceding. There are fewer lynchings than there used to be. Lynching, in and out of a courtroom, seems to most Northerners and to many Southerners a violation of the law to be unequivocally condemned. This is about all that can be said about the matter without risk of vituperative contradiction.—

EDITORS THE NATION.]

From the Editor of the News and Observer

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

I have read with considerable interest and some little resentment the letter of John Gould Fletcher in which he undertakes to express the view of the South with regard to the Scottsboro cases as one of resentment against the North and of determination, as a result, to do what we please with the damn niggers. As the editor of a Southern newspaper and as a younger Southerner than Mr. Fletcher, I am perhaps guilty of sass to my elders in expressing the opinion that Mr. Fletcher's views are those of an educated Southerner of twenty-five years ago but not of today. Mr. Fletcher's views are held today by only a very small group of educated men in the South, and most of them formed their opinions a long time ago.

... Mr. Fletcher comes back into a South in which white men and Negroes have learned slowly that they are not master and slave but men, black and white, who share a common destiny. There are white lynchers and black rogues, but the South generally is populated by white and black men who realize the difficulties in the problem of their relationship. ...

As one Southerner I refuse to accept Victoria Price as an emblem of Southern womanhood. I believe that women in the South will be made safe from the crime of rape and all other crimes in direct proportion to the quality of justice in our courts. The South has suffered because of both the harshness and the leniency of its courts toward the Negroes. We are the murder country because our courts have refused to regard "nigger killings" as serious matters. So far as I know there has never been any failure on the part of Southern courts to convict Negro degenerates guilty of crimes against white women. I hope there never will be. But if the womanhood of the South is sacred, it is too sacred to reduce it to the level of an Alabama prostitute who has tangled herself repeatedly in a maze of falsehood. ...

I particularly resent Mr. Fletcher's protests against The Nation's position as if it were singular and Northern. The Nation has taken no more vigorous position in this matter than the News and Observer and numerous other Southern newspapers whose readers are Southerners who have learned out of long experience that the Negro is their neighbor and will continue to be. They wish him well. Certainly they wish him justice. For the Southerner knows what he so long refused to see: that the ignorance of the Negro, the exploitation of the Negro, injustice to the Negro result only in ignorance, poverty, and injustice for all.

Raleigh, N. C., January 3

JONATHAN DANIELS

From the Dean of Blue Mountain College

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Throughout his letter Mr. John Gould Fletcher voices the beliefs and feelings of the South with perfect fidelity, and nowhere more faithfully than when he says that we are determined to treat the Negro "as a race largely dependent upon us, and inferior to ours." In regard to the racial question we are realists; we treat the Negro as we find him, and that is how we find him. Upon that point all Southern white people, rich or poor, learned or ignorant, are in perfect accord. None doubts it, because the truth of it is incontestable. That you find that truth, or "position," as you prefer to call it, unendurable will strike them with astonishment, just as if you were to find it unendurable that Sunday follows Saturday or that two and two make four, but their conviction in the matter will in no wise be shaken. ...

Now the South today is perfectly willing for the rest of the country to handle its Negro question as it sees fit. If the people of New York wish to eat and sleep with Negroes and to intermarry with them, the South does not care, and will send no agitators to combat practices that it regards with utter abhorrence. If the people of Chicago drive Negroes away from their bathing beaches with brickbats, the South has no feeling in the matter, unless it is a mild sympathy with the Negro for being a victim of Northern inconsistency. The people in the North told the Negro that he was their social equal. We in the South never did.

As best I can make out, the people in the North believe in the Negro as a race but dislike him as an individual. We in the South are consistently opposed to him as a race but like him as an individual. And it seems to me that the Negro is more likely to thrive where he is liked as an individual. Certain it is that the vast majority of the race, as Mr. Fletcher says, are living happy and contented lives in the South today. In spite of local occurrences, magnified by the press out of all proportion to their importance, the white people and the Negroes in the South are on very good terms, enduring each other's foibles and eccentricities with good-natured tolerance.

Is it too much to ask that our indifference toward the problems of the North be reciprocated? We are now convinced that the liquor question can best be handled by local option. Why not let us try local option on the Negro question?

GEORGE T. BUCKLEY

Blue Mountain, Miss., December 25

A Plea for Intelligent Understanding

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

The letter from Mr. John Gould Fletcher—whose efforts as a poet I admire very much—and your answer to it with its implied request for statements of attitudes from Southerners prompt me to add my own note to what will probably be a swelling and discordant chorus.

It seems to me that there are a number of factors that are not properly emphasized when there is a discussion of lynching in the South. First of these is the relationship of the percentage of Negro population in various sections of the South to lynching. For example, Georgia, Louisiana, and Alabama have relatively large Negro populations and also a very bad record for taking the law into their own hands when meting out "justice" to the blacks. On the other hand, Virginia and North Carolina, States in which the whites outnumber the Negroes roughly two to one, have the best records on the subject in the whole South.

The second point is that those States which have the highest illiteracy rate both as to whites and as to Negroes, but particularly as to Negroes, also do most honor to the memory of Judge Lynch. Louisiana, South Carolina, Mississippi, Alabama, and Georgia, in the order named, have the largest percentage of illiterates of all classes in the South, and with the exception of South Carolina also have the worst records in lynching. (I hardly know how to account for the failure of South Carolina to fit into this scheme except that she just naturally won't "stay put.") These States also have an appallingly high rate of illiteracy among Negroes, Louisiana having 38 per cent according to the 1920 census figures. North Carolina and Virginia, however, have fewer illiterate Negroes than most Southern States.

Third, in general there are more lynchings in those States where the economic lot of the Negro is hardest, and fewer where he is more successful.

It would seem, then, that the most effective method of attack on the lynching menace would be an intensification of the effort to bring education to all groups in the South, and a redoubling of efforts to improve the economic status of the Negro.

Mr. Fletcher's objection to Northern interference with Southern problems and Southern justice is a natural and very human one. In emotional moments the South still resurrects and fights anew the Civil War—the irreconcilables still call it the "War between the States." I myself share Mr. Fletcher's antipathy toward the "I-am-better-than-thou" type of reformer, to which Mr. Leibowitz evidently belongs. However, despite my emotional resentment, my common sense and knowledge of human history tell me that outside pressure can be very effective in bringing about reforms, particularly if the outsiders have morality and justice on their side, as they most certainly have in the Scottsboro case. I believe that Mr. Leibowitz's methods have made it almost certain that the Scottsboro boys will be put to death, but in losing a skirmish he has, I think, won a battle. For after the resentments and emotions of the moment have been allowed to quiet down in Alabama and other sections of the South, it will be a long time before there is another "Scottsboro."

After all, the Negro problem in the South is almost purely an emotional one, having its roots partly in slavery but largely in the animosities and crimes of the 'Tragic Era.' If the rest of the country could realize that very important fact, its sympathetic and intelligent criticism would be accepted with better grace down here.

Spartanburg, S. C., December 29 KENNETH D. COATES

The Negro Is a Southern Problem

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

In regard to lynching, I very strongly feel that mob violence must be most heartily condemned by all right-thinking citizens no matter in what section of the country lynching may take place, or to what race the victim may belong. It seems to me that the slowness of court actions aggravates such demonstrations, but that is another matter.

I do not believe that the famous nine Negroes of the Scottsboro trial are guilty, or that even if they were guilty of raping Virginia Price and her companion they would merit the electric chair. However, I heartily agree with Mr. Fletcher in his statement that the Negro is a Southern problem which must be solved by the South alone. I believe much harm will be done by the agitation resulting from the Scottsboro trial, and perhaps many innocent Negroes may suffer injustice as a consequence. I also agree that the majority of the Southern Negroes are living normal and happy lives. . . . I feel that no Northerner can fully appreciate the Southern Negro problem without living in the South for a long period of years. The articles written by Northern authors on the Negro problem in the South often remind me of the European authors who come to the United States, spend six weeks, and forthwith publish a book telling us all that troubles us and exactly how to remedy our troubles.

As to the justice meted out by Southerners to the Negroes as a race and individually, I believe on the whole it is very good. Perhaps in a few thousand years we of the South, both white and Negro, will have reached a higher plane of civilization, and a different or better justice may be possible. But it must be remembered that 50 per cent of the population of many of the Southern States is Negro, and although as a whole this Negro population is not illiterate, it is very ignorant, and some of it is illiterate. With this large proportion of ignorant population the problem is much more complicated than if both races were equally civilized. It cannot be denied that at present the Negro race is inferior to the Southern white race. . . .

As for myself I was born and reared in the South, but lived four years in Boston. My wife, a Northerner, joins me in these sentiments.

Leesburg, Fla., December 29

JOHN W. WILSON

Race Prejudice Is Indefensible

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Deplorably, the voice of John Gould Fletcher is the voice of the South, but hardly recognizable as Mr. Fletcher's voice. Undoubtedly his words would be all but unanimously applauded in every Southern community, and that is justification enough for the existence of the International Labor Defense and the attitude of the editors of The Nation.

If Mr. Fletcher and the South were interested in the merits or demerits of the Scottsboro case, the interest of outsiders would be unnecessary. I too think the Scottsboro Negroes are innocent but that is beside the question. Whether guilty or innocent, as charged in the indictment, does Mr. Fletcher or any intelligent Southerner think that a white man could be convicted or even indicted on the testimony thus far presented against the Scottsboro Negroes? Call such discrimination race prejudice, social inequality, irregular legal procedure, or what you will, I challenge any member of the Southern bar to answer that question affirmatively.

Mr. Fletcher unwittingly indicted the South shamelessly when he warned that if the North did not stay out and quit interfering with our Southern brand of justice, we would, out of resentment, continue to lynch Negroes. If, as he charges, the intrusion of the North is good cause for lynching, why not lynch the real offenders, the Northerners?

It has been said repeatedly that delays in rendering justice are the cause of mob violence, but that is not the cause for lynching Negroes in the South. When there is ample evidence against a Negro, justice is always swift and sure. The real cause is prejudice of one kind or another, and race prejudice is indefensible whether it is aroused against unwelcome intruders from the North or against the Negroes as a race.

In the Scottsboro case, if it had not been for the intervention of outsiders, the Negroes, without benefit of counsel, would long ago have been legally executed. They may ultimately be executed, but thanks to Mr. Leibowitz and the unwelcome organizations that sent him to Alabama, the executions have been delayed long enough for the world to know that the Negroes were the victims of a rank and prejudiced miscarriage of justice; and the wide dissemination of the facts in the case may have educational value.

El Dorado, Ark., December 30

SILAS W. ROGERS

The Fletcher Explosion

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

That the attitude of John Gould Fletcher toward legal justice for the Negro in the South is still the Southern attitude is borne out by a recent inquiry made among the students in a prominent Southern university. Of ten students interviewed on the subject of lynching, all, with one exception, condoned the lynching of Negroes accused of raping white women. Only three opposed other varieties of lynching. Questioned as to the recent action of Governor Rolph of California, the students without exception agreed that the Governor was wrong; but only one thought him guilty of criminal offense. With one exception the students blamed the Governor for making an unwise political move, not for breaking the fundamental law of the land. And just here, I believe, is the root of the evil: nine out of ten are not concerned with the rightness or wrongness of the matter, but with whether or not it can be got away with. . . .

Back of the schools lie the conditions that produce this "anything is all right if you don't get caught" attitude. Baptist and Presbyterian predestination, possibly misunderstood, have contributed to the vapid Rotary-Kiwanis spirit of everything's all right, everybody's O. K. Out of such a background have come generations of men who have murdered niggers and justified themselves by the well-known "God made him so" argument. And such background, part and parcel of the majority thought, is difficult to alter. Though many of us in the South believe some slight progress is being made, we are constantly having our hopes shattered by such explosions as that of Fletcher and such expressions as those of the students here mentioned.

Gainesville, Fla., January 1

THOMAS B. STROUP

Northern Scolding Gets Nowhere

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

In your comment on the letter of John Gould Fletcher in The Nation of December 27 you say you would like to know how large a section of the South he represents. I was born and reared in the central part of North Carolina, a rural section of small farms; lived one year in the northeastern part of South Carolina, a land of plantations and small farms; and have been in Texas for more than forty years. I make yearly visits to North Carolina. I can speak with some degree of authority for the people in all three States.

It is my opinion that Mr. Fletcher is not in accord with many others in considering the conviction in the Scottsboro case a foregone conclusion. A traveling man who spent several days in Decatur a few weeks before the trial told me that he did not hear the case mentioned while he was there. All of us feel keenly the smart of Northern and communistic criticism and interference, but not many believe that the hostility excited by these things was the determining factor in the mind of every one of the twelve jurymen in reaching a verdict. Personally, basing my judgment on the printed evidence, I could not have brought in a verdict of guilty. But while I deeply regret it, my observation leads me to go farther than Mr. Fletcher and say that any man against whom a woman of whatever character swears rape has a mighty poor chance of escaping with his life. I judge this is true both in the North and in the South. . . .

There has always been a law-abiding majority in the South; I trust that it is growing in numbers continuously not only in the South but in the North as well. We believe, however, that you attribute any change for the better to the wrong cause: it has not been due to the carping, critical missionary work of hostile Northern papers; this has hindered rather than helped. It is evident that you do not understand human psychology if it has been your purpose to bring about a kindlier attitude of the Southern white toward the Negro. I am bold to assert that the great majority of Southern whites have all along been against lynching and have deplored any act of injustice to the Negro in court or out. . . .

The true Southerner wants to help the Negro; he is willing to give him work. The first time I ever heard the right of a Negro to work challenged, it was by a man from the North, and I have found this feeling rather generally shared by people from the North. . . .

We may be perverse, but there are some things in addition to those mentioned in Mr. Fletcher's letter that are settled, so far as the South is concerned. I will mention two: The Negro will never be treated as a social equal. The whites, even though they constitute a small minority, will not submit for long at a time to Negro rule in any county in the South.

Fort Worth, Tex., December 29

R. L. PASCHAL

Disgraceful Affairs

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

I certainly do not agree with the attitude expressed by John Gould Fletcher in his letter printed in your issue of December 27. I have never believed that the Southern white man gains anything by keeping the Negro down. On the contrary, I am convinced that most of our excessively high criminal rates, our disease, our ignorance, and our poverty are directly attributable to preoccupation with keeping the Negro down. The chief result is that we have kept down both the white and the black man. This is proved by the hard facts of Southern life.

Mr. Fletcher's argument that radicals from the North are responsible for the miscarriage of justice in Scottsboro has a reminiscent sound in my ear. Interfering damyankees have been held the cause of most of the South's misfortunes; and, according to Mr. Fletcher, in such cases as that of Scottsboro it is absolutely necessary that Southern justice continue being perverted because outsiders are continuing their interference. I should like to have Mr. Fletcher's definition of an "outsider." I wonder if he is ignorant of the fact that every wife-beater regards his neighbors as interfering outsiders, that every gang of thieves and cutthroats regards the law-abiding citizen as an outsider? In the case of Scottsboro I am glad there are outsiders and I congratulate The Nation on the consistency with which it is outside such disgraceful affairs.

Like Mr. Fletcher I also am a Southerner by birth and upbringing. But if I were an Eskimo or Hottentot I hope I would have enough balance and sense of justice to repudiate utterly the attitude expressed by him.

Chapel Hill, N. C., December 27

W. T. COUCH

[The article on the Pan-American Conference, by Samuel Guy Inman, which was announced for this issue will appear next week.]

Contributors to This Issue

HERBERT SOLOW, after three years as assistant editor of the Encyclopaedia of the Social Sciences, has returned to free-lance journalism.

HUBERT HERRING is secretary of the department of social relations of the Congregational Education Society.

CARLETON BEALS is author of "The Crime of Cuba."

SELDEN RODMAN is one of the editors of Common Sense.

MILLY BENNETT is a California newspaperwoman who has spent the last three years in Moscow.

MARK VAN DOREN is the author of "Jonathan Gentry."

LOUIS M. HACKER, in collaboration with Benjamin B. Kendrick, is the author of "The United States Since 1865."

ARTHUR P. WHITAKER is professor of American History at Cornell University.

CAROLINE GORDON is the author of a novel about the South, "Penhally."

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Abstract Woman

The Mother. By Pearl S. Buck. The John Day Company. $2.50.

MRS. BUCK'S heroine has no name. She is simply the wife of a small Chinese farmer surnamed Li who is never called anything except "the man," and she is the mother of three children who are referred to as "the elder son," "the daughter," and "the younger son." Her mother-in-law, her cousin, her cousin's wife, and later on her elder son's wife are known to us only by the terms which designate their relationships to her. Indeed, we have here a whole Chinese village, not to say a whole Chinese class, which passes its monotonous days in a perfect and murmurous anonymity—the murmurousness coming from Mrs. Buck's style as much as from anything else, though it comes also from the type of event which she repeatedly and accentlessly intones.

There was the man. To him there was no change in time, no hope of any new thing day after day. Even in the coming of the children his wife loved there was no new thing, for to him they were born the same and one was like another and all were to be clothed and fed, and when they were grown they must be wed in their turn and once more children born and all was the same, each day like to another, and there was no new thing. . . . Sometimes . . . it fell upon him like a terror that so long as he lived there was naught for him but this, to rise in the morning and go to this land of which they owned but little and rented from a landlord who lived in pleasure in some far city.

There is pleasure in China, then, and doubtless there are people with names. But all of that is hopelessly remote from this village where the mother, deserted by her man after she has borne him only three children, is left to live out her life. Her man, presumably, escapes into the wider world of cities and silver coins and many-colored clothes. She neither escapes nor wishes to escape, though she would like to have her man back for two reasons: she loves him and she could have more children by him. Pregnancy and nursing not only are the deepest joys of her existence; they are the only diversions she has, they are the only events capable of convincing her that she lives and has importance. So her tragedy is that she must spend most of her years in an atmosphere unheavy with procreation. Even her hunger for grandchildren is denied satisfaction. Her elder son's wife is pale, passionless, and barren; her daughter is blind and must be given away to a degenerate youth in whose miserable house she dies childless; and her younger son, escaping like his father, is converted by the Communists, whom he joins, to the belief that all this business of marrying and child-bearing is old-fashioned and irrational. The mother has her only triumph at the end, when, returning from the terrible scene of her younger son's execution as a Communist agitator, she learns that her daughter-in-law has produced a grandson after all. So life goes on.

Mrs. Buck's refusal to name characters and her selection of a wholly unaccentuated style are doubtless proper for the kind of novel she has written, which is a kind that many may write during decades to come when, happily or unhappily, classes are likely to be considered more interesting than individuals as material for fiction. But it is worthy of note that she has not been able in the end to avoid individualizing her people. The mother, the father, each one of the children, the cousin, the landlord's agent who seduces the mother, the village gossip—not one of these but has his uniqueness and picturesque clarity. At the same time that the book reminds us of the similarity which human beings bear to one another it reminds us of the fact that no two of them are identical. This, of course, is what good fiction always has done—and what, proletarian or otherwise, it will always do, though the emphasis may be altered to suit the temper of a time. From the purely literary point of view, if there is such a thing, there would seem then to be no cause either for exultation or for despair in the prospect of a future age when great quantities of class-conscious fiction are to be produced. That fiction will have its individuals—never worry—quite as much as fiction before the flood had its types, its classes, and its common human nature.

MARK VAN DOREN

A Stubborn Politician

Letters of Grover Cleveland, 1850-1908. Selected and Edited by Allan Nevins. Houghton Mifflin Company. $5.

THESE letters, which Mr. Nevins has used all the resources of scholarship to collect and edit, are, I am afraid, a little confusing. The editor, in his introduction, has exhausted the vocabulary of heroism to characterize Grover Cleveland: "courageous soul," "stubborn human integrity," "Bunyan's Valiant-for-Truth," "steadfast heart," these and dozens of similar extravagant phrases assail the eye in the preliminary pages and prefatory passages Mr. Nevins has written. What emerges from the letters, on the other hand, is the picture of a stubborn and unimaginative tory politician who, in the midst of a depression less severe only than the present one, conceived it as his sole function to defend the integrity of the gold standard against the assaults of the silverites.

While farmers in the West and South were mobilizing for political action and listening to exhortations to "raise less corn and more hell," while unemployed workers were organizing great mass demonstrations and converging from a half-dozen different directions on Washington, while desperate strikes filled the land, President Cleveland fiddled with tariff bills and carried on negotiations with private bankers for the issuance of gold bonds which presumably were to be used to maintain the Treasury's gold reserve. That the generous bankers turned right around and obtained the gold from the Treasury with which to buy the bonds, leaving everything exactly where it was before except for their profits of promotion, of course detracts nothing from the President's statesmanship. Like other Bourbons—Herbert Hoover and Alfred E. Smith, for example—Cleveland was sure that the protection of the owning classes against currency heresies was all that was required to assure the stability of American economic institutions.

Offhand, it might be said that Mr. Nevins is entitled to his own definition of a historian: that if he conceives his function to be the building up of the reputations of negligible tory politicians, that is his own concern. I, for one, should be the last to object to a reasoned defense of the right position in either politics or economics. But when the editor can distinguish between Tories and Tories—can say that Grover Cleveland was a great and courageous leader because he knew how to twiddle his thumbs during a national crisis while Herbert Hoover was a weak and ineffectual one because he twiddled his thumbs during another (see Mr. Nevins in Current History for July, 1932)—then a certain bewilderment naturally arises.

Cleveland's little notes to E. C. Benedict make very amusing reading in the light of the editor's noble apostrophes to his hero. The wealthy Mr. Benedict, who like the President was fond of fishing and sailing and on that basis was able to build up quite a charming friendship, was kind enough to take care of Cleveland's private investments during the second Administration. On January 1, 1897, when his address was still the White House, Cleveland wrote as follows to his good friend:

You speak of an investment you lately made and say you were thinking of me at the time and that I can help myself to some of it. I see it has risen in price since then and of course I ought not after my delay to avail myself of your offer. I confess I have been thinking about bonds and income by way of interest, but as I said in my former letter I am willing to abide by your judgment and will do whatever you suggest, or will keep what I have to invest to a more convenient season.

On January 31, still from the same address, Cleveland wrote:

I inclose you check for $6,412.50 in payment of the balance due you on our last transaction, excepting interest, which if I should attempt to adjust I would probably get astray. That can be adjusted hereafter, I suppose. There has a thing occurred within the last day or two which will raise the price of Northern Pacific securities. I believe they have appreciated some under suspicion that something might or had happened, which is undoubtedly an accomplished fact.

Cleveland's letters are almost uniformly dull and trivial but one communication in this book is worth reading, that of Governor Altgeld to Cleveland on July 5, 1894, which bitterly protested against the dispatch of federal troops to Illinois to break the Pullman strike. On the basis of the interchange of telegrams between the two men I cannot for the life of me see anything in Mr. Nevins's contention that Attorney-General Olney had sold Cleveland a bill of goods when he persuaded his chief to send the soldiers. Cleveland, like the stout reactionary he was, knew exactly what he was doing.

LOUIS M. HACKER

"Spider of the Escorial"

Philip II: The First Modern King. By Jean H. Mariéjol. Translated from the French by Warre B. Wells. Harper and Brothers. $3.75.

IF Henry Adams's attempt to apply the second law of thermodynamics to the history of mankind did not meet with conspicuous success, the theory would seem to find better justification in the historiography of Philip II. The vital energy of earlier assaults on this sixteenth-century Lucifer has given way to an equilibrium of pros and cons. In the last half-century the portrayals of him by historians and biographers have become more and more dispassionate—and more and more pallid. The once familiar figure of the "Spider of the Escorial" has been transformed into that of a chief clerk bending over files of correspondence, a mediocrity to whom is denied even the distinction of diabolism. In current accounts of his reign, the murders, massacres, and autos de fe belong to the spirit of the age; only the red tape is Philip's. Thus in 1926 the Spanish historian Ballesteros characterized him as a "bureaucrat-king," in 1932 Loth found him a "very ordinary sort of man," and now Mariéjol declares that "Philip II was neither so black nor so great as he has been painted," and that "he was not a great king" but "a man who fussed with documents."

Why should anyone write a biography of so commonplace a person, even though he was a king? It is not surprising that historians turn out reams of monographs on the subject, for many of their profession hold that history is a science and that it must therefore deal with the recurrent, the constant, the uniform—in short, the commonplace. But there is no such school of scientific biography. The exceptional character is still the proper subject for biographers. Yet they continue to write about Philip, "the prudent king," and they continue to declare that there was nothing unique about him.

We may turn the spirit of the age against Philip's recen-biographers and say that it is in accordance with the spirit of our own age that they debunk villains as well as heroes, reducing both to a dead level of mediocrity. This sort of thing occurs so frequently that we often suspect the mediocrity lies not in the subject but in the mind of the biographer. Or else the biographer finds the subject less commonplace than he would have us believe and his verdict of mediocrity is an obeisance to the Zeitgeist. But even that is changing.

The truth about Philip is that in several respects he was an exceptional person, and that in its totality his character was unique. There was no one else quite like him in Europe. There was no one else quite like him even in Spain. Every other prince in Christendom, including the popes themselves, knew the salutary uses of compromise; not so Philip. No other ruler in the history of Europe has acted more consistently in the profound conviction that he was the agent of God on earth and that God (read Philip) could not fail. Nor was he a typical Spaniard, as most writers assert. If we must generalize about national traits, your Spanish gentleman of the sixteenth century was an individualist, a fighter, and (fighting aside) a loafer. Philip was the dutiful son, the stern father, the king, the champion of the Faith; never once in his life was he ever merely Philip. He loathed fighting, and he was an indefatigable worker. Even on the darker side his character was not Spanish. His dominant emotion, hatred, did not express itself in the hot passion of the South. Says Mariéjol himself: "His acts of vengeance, carried out in cold blood, make us shudder." Devotion to duty and an implacable hatred of all who stood in the way of his performance of it—this seems to me to be the key to Philip's character. If in following the course which his character dictated he brought the empire to the verge of ruin, he could console himself with the reflection that the world was well lost for hate.

Interpretations of Philip's character will always be as numerous as the interpreters. The "facts" about most of the events of his life are now pretty well ascertained. With a prudence worthy of an academic historian and of Philip himself, Mariéjol has chosen to confine himself almost entirely to a statement of these facts. We should be rather grateful to him for having done so, for while his occasional essays at interpretation are neither essentially novel nor convincing, his long familiarity with the period has enabled him to write the most satisfactory narrative of Philip's life that has yet appeared. The story is one of absorbing interest, and Mariéjol has told it clearly and authoritatively. But why call Philip II the first modern king? The translation seems to be a good one in most respects, despite occasional slips. The translator has David dancing before the "bow"; what David danced before was the Ark of the Lord.

ARTHUR P. WHITAKER

Stalin and World Revolution

World Revolution and the U. S. S. R. By Michael T. Florinsky. The Macmillan Company. $2.

THE thesis of this book—that Stalin is substituting Russian Socialist construction for the earlier Communist ideal of world revolution—has had considerable currency in the last few years. Professor Florinsky modestly refrains from adding any new thoughts or interpretations, but most of his long excerpts from official Bolshevik publications—about half the book is given over to quotations—have hitherto been available only to those Russians who frequent Yarmolinsky's Slavonic room at Fifth Avenue and Forty-second Street in New York, or H. H. Fisher's War Collection at Palo Alto, or the Congressional Library at Washington, where the entire interesting bibliography should certainly be on the shelves.

Professor Florinsky knows these sources well, but it is a very far cry from knowing congress protocols to understanding the Soviet Union. Though its subject is extremely important, this book reads like a Ph.D. dissertation, moving from convention to convention, from speech to speech, instead of from one phase of life to another. This stricture would be gratuitous if there were not internal evidence that the author has mastered his theme only mechanically and lacks a real grasp of its true inwardness.

Before criticizing Professor Florinsky's general treatment, however, I owe it to him to say that he must not misquote Lenin and then ridicule him on the basis of the misquotation. In his last testament, Lenin said:

Bukharin is not only the most valuable and most important theoretician of the party, but also is deservedly looked upon as the favorite of the entire party; nevertheless his theoretical views can hardly be accepted as truly Marxian because there is something scholastic about him. He was never trained in dialectics and, I think, never fully understood them.

Professor Florinsky distorts the testament, using the word "dialectician" instead of "theoretician" and then says:

How a man who was never trained in the dialectic method and never fully understood it could in spite of this be the party's "most valuable and important dialectician" is perhaps as difficult to comprehend as the application of the dialectic method itself.

Strange that the application of the dialectic method should seem so difficult to a professor who explains it in seven pages.

This wet little squib fired by the Columbia teacher at N. Lenin was propelled by an attitude of hostility toward the Soviet Union. It is extraordinary, not to use a stronger adjective, for anyone who aspires to be called a Russian authority to say, as Professor Florinsky does (pp. 34 and 62), that the Allies intervened against the Soviets in reprisals against Bolshevik propaganda. They intervened chiefly because they wished to reestablish the eastern front, crush bolshevism, and divide Russia. The secret Anglo-French convention of December 23, 1917, which cut out British and French zones in Russia, and innumerable statements by Lloyd George, Churchill, Poincaré, and others prove this. Did the British occupy large sections of Turkestan and the Caucasus because they were irritated by Communist agitation or because they wished to round out their empire and get more oil? Did the Poles march into the Ukraine in April, 1920, on account of the Comintern or in order to fulfil ancient federalistic, expansionist designs? Did Japan want to stop Zinoviev or seize Siberia up to Chita? History gives the incontrovertible answer, and it is not Professor Florinsky's. When he adds that revolutionary Russia's withdrawal from the imperialistic, immoral World War can be considered "not without good reason" as "something akin to treason," it becomes abundantly clear that the author is handicapped in his study of Soviet affairs by a lack of sympathetic understanding which probably reflects his Czarist Russian background.

Now as to his main thesis. Trotsky maintained that socialism cannot be built in a backward country like Russia with 100,000,000 private-capitalist peasants. Therefore the safe future of the Bolshevik revolution depended on further revolutionary developments abroad. Stalin maintained that since revolution was receding in Europe and Asia, the Bolsheviks had no choice but to build socialism in Russia only, and it could be done by collectivizing and industrializing. The heart of the Stalin-Trotsky controversy and of the Socialism in One Country versus Permanent Revolution conflict is the fate of peasant Russia. If collectivization can succeed in socializing Russian agriculture, then socialism can be built in a single country. One would think, accordingly, that Professor Florinsky would pay some attention to collectivization. Unbelievable as it sounds, he uses the word "collectivization" only twice in the whole volume and then most casually, and does not discuss the process at all.

Secondly, everybody who knows anything about the Stalin-Trotsky struggle will agree that the Chinese revolution of 1924-27 played a role in it second only to the peasant issue. In a book filled with interesting full-page quotations, which nevertheless repeat one another, the author can spare only a page and a half to the Chinese revolution and only six lines to the Stalin-Trotsky storm that raged around it. These six lines, however, are completely wrong. Professor Florinsky says that Stalin wanted a Chinese soviet republic and that Trotsky attacked him for this. But how can that be when Trotsky demanded the stimulation of the world revolution even at the expense of Russia's interests? If China could be made soviet, then the world revolution might be achieved quickly. It is not logical that Trotsky should have been opposed to Stalin's advocacy of a Chinese soviet republic. And it is also not true. Until the summer of 1927, when the Chinese revolution collapsed, Stalin actually was interested in creating a strong nationalist China and favored cooperation with certain bourgeois Chinese elements, while it was Trotsky, not Stalin, who naturally wished for a Chinese soviet republic and an outright Communist uprising. This mistake on so fundamental a question is a heavy count against the author.

Professor Florinsky promised in his preface to examine the changing Bolshevik ideas on world revolution, "along with the interplay of political and economic considerations." The examination of this interplay is absent, and the whole treatment suffers accordingly. Nevertheless, the changing Bolshevik ideas are presented in orderly, academic, faithful fashion by means of translations from the very revealing original statements accompanied by comments by the author on these statements.

LOUIS FISCHER

Shooting Straight to Glory

Kingdom Coming. By Roark Bradford. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

MR. BRADFORD'S book deals with a subject hitherto neglected by American fiction writers—the plight of the Negro suddenly set free by Mr. Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation. The scene of the story is a Red River plantation in the days of the underground railroad—the "true" underground and the "blind" underground by which many an unsuspecting Negro was lured to his death. Ideas of God and freedom hang heavy over the plantation. Of the two the idea of God seems more immediate. Mr. Bradford's Negroes—unless they are abandoned characters—walk in close communion with Sweet King Jesus.

Grammy, his hero—he is named Telegram for a famous race horse—is a fine man with horses, as was his father before him. In the natural course of events he would live to an honored old age, and his son, Good News out of Penny, would follow in his father's footsteps. But the war comes. The master gets on his horse and rides away, leaving Grammy to manage the plantation. This he does creditably until the depredations of the soldiery leave him little to manage. He loads his womenfolk and his baby into a wagon then, and joins the vast encampment of bewildered Negroes in New Orleans.

Leisure and lack of direction take a heavy toll of the encampment. The sophisticated city Negroes initiate many of the newcomers into voodoo rites. Penny, Grammy's wife, becomes a voodoo queen and lets her own baby be killed in order that the devotees may have human blood for their sacrifices. Grammy, undeterred by her threats to burn his eyeballs out and scorch him to a feather, seeks her out and kills her by felling her with a brick. Having punished her and avenged the death of his son, who will now never grow up to be a fine man with horses, he goes back to his tent and falls into a dreamless sleep. The next morning he goes through his trial without even knowing that he has been condemned to death.

Mr. Bradford, more than any other American writer, knows the Negro. He approaches his Negro characters with the proper reverence. In the midst of easy and often careless magazine prose he dwells lovingly on the rhythms of Negro speech. And it has been his brilliant achievement to make these rhythms set forth the workings of the Negro mind. But it is, after all, only one aspect of the Negro mind that he has chosen to deal with.

His plantation scenes are fresh and moving; his characters are seen in a clear and authentic light. Grammy trains the pacing mare to singlefoot by riding her every morning over a tier of rails. Tobin, the overseer, lounging on the porch, is told that there has been a murder over in the bayou. "That so?" he asks with mild curiosity. "White man or nigger?" The relation of white man and black is often thus illuminated by an unforgettable scene or a single phrase.

Mr. Bradford is writing here about things and people loved and remembered. He is not so happy in his New Orleans scenes. Penny, hitherto an exemplary wife and mother, turns into a voodoo queen with bewildering rapidity. The reader balks at the idea of her sacrificing her own child. Henceforth she is not so much a character in the book as a person of whom Mr. Bradford is relating stories which we may or may not believe. And one may fairly charge the author with regrettable paucity of invention in the denouement of "Kingdom Coming." Grammy cheats the firing squad in much the same way that the docile, trusting Willy of Mr. Bradford's brilliant short story eludes the hangman's trap.

The soldier with the pistol said the last word of the charm that set Grammy free. But Grammy did not hear it. He heard a rumble and a roar . . . and he landed squarely in the middle of Free Heaven, right on the lap of the Sweet God Almighty King Jesus.

But what of the Negro who was not armed with this shining simplicity of spirit? There is still a book to be written about his emancipation.

CAROLINE GORDON

Drama

Miss Hepburn and "The Lake"

THE producers of "The Lake" (Martin Beck Theater) have very plainly suffered from the fact that too much was expected of both the play and its star. The only fair thing to do is to forget for a moment what had been heard of both and to ask ourselves what the reaction would have been if the first were not known as the hit of a London season and if the second were not handicapped by a lush reputation grown overnight in the subtropical climate of Hollywood. At best the present production could hardly have repeated the London success, but it might, at least, have been better received by an audience which expected nothing in particular. In England Dorothy Massingham's play acquired a certain extraneous interest because its author, member of a famous literary family, committed suicide shortly after writing this story of a young girl who takes her leave of us with suicide obviously on her mind. In its own right, moreover, the play has elements of unmistakable power, while its equally obvious weaknesses are such that a really extraordinary performance of the leading role might well conceal them. Unfortunately, however, these weaknesses remain all too obvious in the present production.

The first difficulty is, I think, that it has only three moments and that the writing is technically unskilful in so far as it fails adequately to sustain the interest between these moments. Its other conspicuous weakness lies in the fact that the story itself is loosely knit, that the incidents follow one another as a series of possible but fortuitous events instead of being, like those of the most satisfactory fables, logical outgrowths of what preceded them. In the first scene the heroine breaks with the weakling whom she loves; in the second she discovers how deep is her attachment to the man whom she has just married faute de mieux; in the third she learns of his accidental death a few minutes after the wedding. Obviously these truly affecting incidents might have happened, but they are devoid of that meaning and that impressiveness which events can have only when they are brought about by something more than chance, when they proceed from, or are at least particularly appropriate to, the characters involved. Moreover, the heroine is but sketchily presented, and we know her too little to be very deeply concerned with her fate. The play merely marks time between its climaxes when it should be building up our interest in the principal personages, and one can only assume that in England the actress intrusted with the part created a role which the author had left too largely blank. This Katharine Hepburn fails to do, and as a result the play seldom seems much more than a rather faltering sketch which may have been based upon actual incidents but which never achieves the more solid reality of art.

Miss Hepburn has obvious gifts. As a personality she is vivacious, pleasant to look upon, and piquant in that faintly androgynous manner so popular at the moment. She is also very much alive and she knows how to keep the eyes of an audience upon her. It would be ungenerous not to add, also, that there are several moments—notably that in which she confesses her love for her husband—in which she is genuinely effective. But it is equally plain that she is not equal to the task of making the heroine of this play seem a person real enough and definite enough to engage us very deeply. She is shrill, she is metallic, and she seems, far too often, merely a spoiled adolescent when it is very important for the play that we should believe her to be a great deal more than that. I fancy that Miss Hepburn would be an excellent ingenue, but she is not yet a tragedian—certainly not one capable of concealing the weakness of a play like "The Lake." Frances Starr and Blanche Bates are both better in roles which are also better written, probably because the author could be objective about them in a way she could not be about what is, in part at least, a self-portrait.

"The First Apple" (Booth Theater) I found very genuinely if rather quietly amusing. Most reviewers were rather grudging in their praise, but I happen to have a special liking for even minor examples of polite comedy in the great tradition, and that is exactly what "The First Apple" is. Our heroine, a nice girl, pays a call on a young man whom she meets by chance, and to her great amazement she does what she is told it is impossible to do—namely, "go wrong on Brahms." In her horror she not only gets herself engaged to a young man who is as innocent of music as he would be of seduction, but threatens to stick to her new contract even when the original tempter turns up with honorable proposals. The struggle between the representatives of respectability and good sense is very nicely played out on the comic level, and of course sense wins. A good deal of charm is added by the pleasing presence of Irene Purcell.

As its title may possibly suggest, "Big Hearted Herbert" (Biltmore Theater) is in another tradition, but there are some very solid merits to this broadly told tale of a self-made man cured of his boastful "plainness" by a neat trick. J. C. Nugent gets a good deal of broad fun out of the part of the obstreperous husband, and Elizabeth Risdon is also very good indeed in the part of the wife who finally decides to give him a taste of living even plainer than he bargained for. My guess is that

THE THEATRE GUILD presents

EUGENE O'NEILL'S comedy

AH, WILDERNESS!

with GEORGE M. COHAN

GUILD THEATRE Fifty-second Street, West of Broadway
Eves. 8:20—Mats. Thurs. and Sat., 2:20

MOLIERE'S COMEDY WITH MUSIC

The School for Husbandswith OSGOOD PERKINS and JUNE WALKEREMPIRE THEATRE BROADWAY and 40th STREET
Eve., 8:40, Mat. Thurs., Sat., 2:40

MAXWELL ANDERSON'S new play

MARY OF SCOTLANDwith
HELEN HAYES PHILIP MERIVALE HELEN MENKEN
ALVIN THEATRE — 52nd Street, West of Broadway —
Eves. 8:20, Mats. Thurs. & Sat., 2:20

EUGENE O'NEILL'S new play

Days Without EndHENRY MILLER Theater 43 St. E. of B'way—Eves. 8:30
Matinees Thurs. ■ Sat. 2:30MEN IN WHITEThe Group Theatre and Sidney Harmon and James R. Ullman present Sidney Kingsley's playAn experience thrilling and absorbing, genuine and complete.—J. W. KRUTCH, The Nation.BROADHURST THEATRE—44th St. W. of Broadway Eves. 50c to $2.50. Mats. Wed & Sat.PEACE 0 EARTH AN ANTI-WAR PLAYSIDNEY HOWARD: "The play and audience both an experience to remember."
HARRY F. WARD: "I am urging everybody to see it immediately."CIVIC REPERTORY THEATRE 14th St. & 6th Ave.
Prices 30c, 45c, 60c, $1, $1.50, No Tax—Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:30"The Theatre has unleashed one of its thunderbolts under Jed Harris's direction."BROOKS ATKINSON—N. Y. Times.
Jed Harris ProductionThe Green Bay TreeCORT THEATRE, 48th St. E. of B'way
Mats. Wed. and Saturday 2:30"The PURSUIT of HAPPINESS"

"Merry mixture of folklore and farce."

—John Mason Brown, Eve. Post"A smart and bawdy satire . . . a wolf in sheep's clothing."—Percy Hammond, *Herald Tribune*AVON THEATRE, 45th Street West of Broadway. CHi. 4-7860
Eves. 8:45, $1 to $2.50; Mats. Thurs. ■ Sat. 2:30, 75c ■ $2SUNDAY EVENING at 8:45, JANUARY 14
THEATRE ARTS in RUSSIANINA TARASOVA
SongLEE
SIMONSON
TheatreJULIEN
BRYAN
FilmsNew School 66 WEST 12th ST. Tickets 75c, $1, $1.50
Phone ALg. 4-2567 plus ■

Continued on page 84

this is exactly the sort of play which is likely to please a great many people who find the usual Broadway fare a little too highly spiced. I might add that even the sophisticates could easily choose a worse evening's entertainment.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Two new ballets were presented by the Monte Carlo Ballet Russe in the second week of its performances. "The School of Ballet" is a light and graceful comedy. The dancing is consistently good and the pace never lags. The stars of the piece are Leon Woizikovsky, who contributes some delightful humorous dancing, Leonide Massine, and Tatiana Riabouchinska.

As a spectacle of color and design "The Beach," for which Raoul Dufy designed the curtain, scenery, and costumes, is very pleasing. But Irina Baranova has neither the bodily grace nor the technical finish to carry the very literal role of a simple girl in an ordinary bathing suit which happens also to be the pivotal role in the production. At such moments the question arises how far or how directly the dance as an art form should venture into literalness. It would seem, at least, that only dancers unusually gifted both in personality and in technique—a group which would include Massine, Woizikovsky, Danilova, and others in the Monte Carlo ballet—can overcome the old and often banal associations inherent in literal material, and in addition create fresh images. In dancing as in music, abstraction may be the most direct path to response.

M. M.

Films"Lot in Sodom"

TO describe "Lot in Sodom" (Little Carnegie) as a highly interesting experiment in the direction of pure cinema is possibly to do the picture more harm than good in the minds of a certain class of people. For some time it has been impossible not to detect in much of what is written about the screen—one cannot call it criticism—a kind of supersnobbery, directed toward those who have chosen to take the films with a certain amount of seriousness, and taking the form of ridicule of whatever terms these latter employ for the purposes of analysis or description. Thus, it is pretty nearly fatal at the moment to make use of such terms as "pictorial rhythm," "composition," or "montage" in defining one's response to a new picture. Even to refer to the movies as cinema, as in the opening sentence of this review, is to lay oneself open to charges of pretentiousness, obfuscation, and what is perhaps even worse—"artiness." It is to run square into the trap set by those engaged in the favorite game of contemporary journalism, the game that Leonard Woolf, in one of his essays, calls "hunting the highbrow." The horror of appearing to take the films too seriously is of course part of the general horror nowadays of taking anything very seriously. But it is more particularly related to the still very profound distrust of the motion-picture medium—a medium whose origins have been so lowly, whose history has been so checkered, and whose vocabulary of criticism has not yet solidified into any convenient or trustworthy set of clichés. Embarrassed in this manner, those journalists who have been unable to assemble enough gossip or personality to substitute for criticism have been forced to fall back on the ever-reliable appeal to the lowbrow's resentment toward what he does not understand.

These remarks are prompted by "Lot in Sodom" because more than any picture in months it makes one realize how inadequate is the vocabulary we have so far been able to devise to describe or analyze a film which is a film, and not something

INSTRUCTION

LANGUAGE EXCHANGE CENTER
Russian, French, Spanish, Italian.
$1.50 monthly; free trial.
156 West 45th St. LOnagacre 5-8310

Speech Correction

A Workshop for the Development of the Speaking Voice and Through It The Personality

by LORENA KRUPP BRADLEY
Thursdays at 8 P.M.—15 Sessions beginning January 25

Subjects Treated: Mannerisms of Body and Face; Convincing Power Through Vocal Tone; Musical Phrasing of Speech and Song; Rhythm in Poetry and Prose; Emotional Expression of the Voice; The Psychological Release.

Course is designed for professional and business people and laymen.

COURSE TICKETS—$10.00

Institute for Advanced Education
Riverside Drive & 103rd Street
(Approved for Teachers' Credit)
Phone CLarkson 2-1700

LECTURES

THE PEOPLE'S INSTITUTE

AT COOPER UNION

8th Street and Astor Place, at 8 o'clock
Admission Free

Friday, January 12th

EVERETT DEAN MARTIN

"The English Revolutionary Movements Against The House of Stuart."

Sunday, January 14th

CLIFTON FADIMAN

"American Literature and A Broadening Social Outlook."

Tuesday, January 16th

PROFESSOR FREDERICK BARRY

"The Scientific Method in the 17th and 18th Centuries: The Experimental Study of Motion and Force."

SCOTT NEARING

will lecture Fridays at 7 P.M. beginning January 12th

■ CURRENT EVENTS

at the Institute Forum

Irving Place at 15th Street

Admission 25c CLarkson 2-1700

RESORTS

ZINDOREST PARK

MONROE, N. Y. Phone: 300

Formerly a millionaire's estate of 150 acres, beautifully landscaped. Fine skating and other winter sports. Saddle horses. Ideal for vacation and week-ends. 1½ hours on Erie R.R. or Route 17.

Open All Year

BREEZEMONT FARM

85 Minutes from Broadway

A home of taste and easy comfort. On a beautiful large Westchester Estate.

All sports on premises.

Under the same management as the old "Russian Inn."

Armonk, N. Y. Armonk Village 555

The LAKE VIEW

is preferred for excellent location, splendid modern cuisine and different clientele.

Rates very reasonable.

59 Madison Ave., Lakewood, N. J.

R. SILVER A. EPSTEIN

Tel. Lakewood 287-963

RED OAKS

Atlantic Highlands, N. J.

Is ideal for rest and relaxation during the winter. All sports; private lake for skating; saddle horses and nearby golf. 150 acres of beautiful country; spacious house surrounded by pine trees. Excellent cuisine. Just over the hour from New York by auto or train. Central Railroad of New Jersey or the Pennsylvania to Red Bank.

Management Mascha and Hyman Strunsky.
Atlantic Highlands 264

TOPSTONE FARM

For a delightful vacation or week-end in the Connecticut hills, restful, secluded. In charming woodland country. Now at special rates. Skating. Saddle-horses on the place, instruction. R.F.D. 4, Ridgefield, Conn. Phone 648.

THE Crystal Villa, Woodcliff Lake, N. J. For Rest and Recuperation. Altitude 864. All modern improvements. Steam heat. Wholesome Jewish-American meals. Weekly $12.50 up. Daily $2.50. Write or tel. Park Ridge 404. Round trip 90c.

$2 per day including meals; winter sports; Beecher Lodge, warm, modern, cultured. Budd Lake, New Jersey.

OPEN SHELF

The Riddle of Homosexuality

Learn all about it, its causes, effects, and the course it takes, in the current issue of

THE MODERN PSYCHOLOGIST

Other Articles in Current Issues:

Abnormalities of Sex.....D. J. F.
The Psychology of Women.....Sigmund Freud
Sexual Impotence in the Male....W. Iwan Wolfe
Sexual Aberrations.....Alfred Adler
On Lesbian Love.....S. Taylor and numerous others

The Modern Psychologist is 25c at selected newsstands. Or get five issues by sending in $1 to The Modern Psychologist, 310 Riverside Drive, New York.

Name

Address

Henry Sold here without profit. Ask for price list and appreciations by famous men.
Georges — sent free.
Books
None may call himself educated in social thought (says Dr. John Dewey) who lacks acquaintance with the great writings of Henry George.
ROBERT SCHALKENBACH FOUNDATION
15 Park Place, New York City

SUPPORTED BY ENDOWMENTS

Moscow Daily News Soviet Travel

SOVIET PERIODICALS

We accept subscriptions to all Newspapers and Magazines published in the Soviet Union. There are Soviet Periodicals in English, French, German and other languages, in addition to the vast number of Newspaper and Magazines in the Russian language.

In English, French or German

U. S. S. R. IN CONSTRUCTION,

Monthly pictorial, 1 yr., $4

SOVIET CULTURE REVIEW

Monthly illustrated, 1 yr., $1.50

V. O. K. S.

Bi-Monthly, Socio-Economic, 1 yr., $1

AMKNIGA CORP., Dept. C

258-5th Ave., N. Y.

MOSKAUER RUNDSCHAU

ENJOY PHILOSOPHY AS YOU WOULD A LOVER OR A PUZZLE!

Read

THE ART OF PHILOSOPHY

By W. W. HOFFMAN

$2.00 ■ Best Booksellers

Meet the author every Tuesday Eve., 8:30, at Pegasus House, 58 W. 55th St.

GIVE A CHALLENGE TO YOUR BRAIN! Subscribe to THE THRASHER—the weekly bomb-shell—bulletin of the Pegasus Group. $2 a year. Money refunded at any time if not satisfied!

58 WEST 55th ST. NEW YORK CITY

POSITIONS WANTED

IF AN AUTHOR feels despondent about finding a literary assistant or manuscript typist who meets his requirements, he will be agreeably surprised as a result of writing to Box 285, c/o The Nation, or phoning WA 5-9377 mornings.

HELP WANTED

COMFORTABLE home in exchange for answering telephone several times a day. Evening school student or other intelligent woman. Tel. LU 7-5756, 6-8 P.M.

BUSINESS OPPORTUNITY

OPPORTUNITY to share joys of developing vacation camp on Guadalupe River. All conveniences, fine start made. Will consider $2000. to $5000. for part interest. Philip Rawson, New Braunfels, Texas.

WORKSHOP IN GRAPHIC ARTS offers practical courses in

BOOK DESIGN & PRODUCTION with calligraphy, lay-out, type-setting and presswork. Instruction by Joseph Blumenthal of The Spiral Press

WOODCUT AND ENGRAVING
Thorough general work with emphasis on book illustration. Instruction
by Allen Lewis

The New School for Social Research
66 West Twelfth Street · New York

UNUSUAL piano instruction opening vistas of intellectual comprehension of music. Modern methods, plus thoroughness. By B.S. in music. European study, concert work. Private, group lessons: children, adults. Mid-Manhattan studio. Low rates. Limited offer. Box 284 c/o The Nation.

SCHOOL

LAKEWOOD MODERN SCHOOL
A residential progressive school for children—kindergarten and elementary.
119 CARRY ST. LAKEWOOD, N. J.
P. O. Box 153 Phone Lakewood 1031
JAS. H. DICK, Prin.

FOR RENT

FOR RENT: COLUMBIA CO-OPERATIVE, 411 West 114th, 6th Floor. Exceptional, sunny, quiet, lobby large enough classes, Academic atmosphere. $1500.

PERSONAL

WANTED, cultured man to join in furnishing a two or three room apartment. Bronx or Manhattan. Box 283, c/o The Nation.

NEW FRIENDS FOR THE NEW YEAR!

Contacts, correspondence club for the mentally marooned, connects you with debunked people everywhere. Unusual books loaned free. Send 3c stamp to Contacts, P. O. Box 91, Station D., New York City.

□ JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH says □

AH, WILDERNESS! Guild Theater. O'Neill's nostalgic comedy about a youth who discovers love and poetry together. Made doubly effective by the performance of George M. Cohan.

AS THOUSANDS CHEER. Music Box. The best musical review of the year with Clifton Webb, Leslie Adams, Helen Broderick, and Marilyn Miller in a series of acid but amusing sketches.

BIG HEARTED HERBERT. Biltmore Theater. J. C. Nugent and Elisabeth Risdon in a broad but funny farce about the taming of a self-made man.

CHAMPAGNE SEC. Shubert Theater. Somewhat modernized version of the still tuneful "Flendermaus." Very gaily done.

HER MASTER'S VOICE. Plymouth Theater. First-rate specimen of Clare Kummer's very special kind of wit with Roland Young and Laura Hope Crews.

MARY OF SCOTLAND. Alvin Theater. Helen Hayes and Philip Merivale give fine performances in Maxwell Anderson's play. The biggest dramatic hit of the moment but one which left me a little cold.

MEN IN WHITE. Broadhurst Theater. Fine teamwork on the part of the members of the Group Theater helps to make this play about a young doctor one of the things which must not be missed.

PEACE ON EARTH. Civic Repertory Theater. Propaganda play about the next war, in which the workers strike and a young college professor gets framed for murder. Drawing special but enthusiastic audiences which evidently do not agree with me that the play is quite uninspired.

SHE LOVES ME NOT. Morosco Theater. Mad doings at Princeton which involve the efforts of some high-minded students to rescue a not too innocent maiden in distress. Much the funniest farce of the year.

THE FIRST APPLE. Booth Theater. Irene Purcell contributes much charm to a fragile but amusing comedy about—first apples.

THE GREEN BAY TREE. Cort Theater. Absorbing psychological drama about a young man who cannot give up luxury for love. Shares with "Men in White" the first place on the list of dramas.

THE PURSUIT OF HAPPINESS. Avon Theater. Spicy and more or less historical comedy about a young Austrian who finds bundling one of the pleasantest of the new freedoms in Revolutionary New England.

THE LAKE. Avon Theater. Katharine Hepburn in an English tragedy which came highly recommended. Neither the play nor the star quite up to expectations.

THE SCHOOL FOR HUSBANDS. Empire Theater. Sparkling adaptation of Moliere's comedy by Arthur Guiterman and Lawrence Langner. Charming produced, and acted con amore by Osgood Perkins and June Walker.

TOBACCO ROAD. Masque Theater. Superb performance by Henry Hull in a grotesquely humorous play about total depravity exhibited by the poor whites of Georgia. Dramatized from a novel by Erskine Caldwell and not likely to be forgotten even by those who find it a little too strong for their stomachs.

else—a novel, a play, or a poem in celluloid form. Here is a picture whose effect is qualitatively different from the effect produced on us by any other art-form to which we may have responded. Yet such are the limitations of our vocabulary that we can indicate that effect only by analogy with another form. Like Dreyer's "Passion of Joan of Arc," the picture that Dr. John S. Watson, Jr., has made offers an example of lyricism in the cinema: its method is a rhythmical arrangement of symbols rather than a chronological development of action. An objective pattern of events, Mr. Elict's "objective correlative," it undoubtedly possesses in the Biblical story; but what counts is the intensity of feeling which reduces this to its essential symbols for the imagination. The director is the poet, and these smoking plains, fluctuant shapes, tongues of fire, melted together in rhythms that give them at one and the same time emotional and aesthetic unity, constitute his personal vision of the destruction of Sodom. There is no attempt at realistic historical reconstruction, as in "Sign of the Cross" and "Ben Hur," and no undue exploitation of the contemporary fascination with the moeurs to which the Sodomites have given their name. The angel that comes to Lot and the woman turned to stone lose none of their reality to the imagination through being translated from verbal to visual symbols. The story as a whole loses nothing by the translation; and it is because Dr. Watson has recognized so clearly the difference between these two types of symbols that his picture is one of the purest examples in some time of the cinema as distinguished from literature or drama.

The point is here revived with such emphasis because the inability on the part of Norman MacLeod, the director, to distinguish between the language of literature and the language of the screen is undoubtedly the essential reason for the failure of the current film version of "Alice in Wonderland." In the light of this fundamental error, all its weaknesses become immediately explainable—its aimless structure, its jogging tempo, and its uniform deadness of effect. It is a mistake, therefore, to put too much blame on individual performers, like Gary Cooper, whose White Knight is something of a triumph of bad acting, or Charlotte Henry, whose Alice lacks pretty much everything that we associate with the character. The principal responsibility for the catastrophe lies with the director and with those who prepared the script. Alice contracts and expands, it must be admitted, with the most admirable mechanical neatness—but that is exactly the trouble. With what we know of modern double-exposure processes and the rest we are hardly able to be affected where we should be most affected—in our imaginations. Never for a moment is the Looking-glass world on the screen the equivalent of the Looking-glass world of Lewis Carroll's fantasy. No amount of technical ingenuity can compensate for the frustration of the imagination involved in reducing word-symbols, with their infinite potentialities, to a set of more or less fixed and never more than approximate aural and visual symbols. What Mr. McLeod's version of "Alice in Wonderland" most nearly resembles is a joke that has been so badly translated into a foreign language that its whole point is lost.

WILLIAM TROY

SECOND WEEK!
"A screen journey worthy of anyone's attention . . . always bewitching!"
—Mordaunt Hall, N. Y. Times
SWEDEN LAND OF THE VIKINGS
Gorgeous Color Photography—Brilliant Narration
Enchanting Folk Music
55th ST. PLAYHOUSE Just East of 7th Ave. Cont. Noon to Midnight 25c until 2 P. M.

American Premiere of AMKINO'S Soviet Talking Picture!
"ENEMIES OF PROGRESS"
Depicting the crisis of the FAR EAST
Based on the story "The Last Ataman"
Produced in Soviet Russia—China (English Titles) with LIVANOV of the Moscow Art Theater
14th St. Rendezvous of the Intelligentsia
ACME THEATER Union Sq. Midnight Show Every Saturday

DEBATE
CLARENCE DARROW VS. JOHN HAYNES HOLMES
FANNIE HURST, Chairman
"CAN CIVILIZATION BE SAVED?"
FRIDAY, JANUARY 19th, 8:30 P. M.
MFCCA TEMPLE, West 55th Street, New York
Tickets—$2.00, $1.50, $1.00, $.75, $.50, $.25—No Tax
BROOKLYN FORUM—7 East 15th Street, N. Y.—ALG. 4-2620
Rand School—Columbia Univ.—N. Y. U.—Wanamakers

□ DINNER □

The League's Annual Dinner
London Terrace Grill, Wednesday, Jan. 17th
Mary van Kleeck: "New Deals in Industry?"
Nina Tarasova: Folk Songs
Reservations $1.25 Phone TO. Sq. 6-6234
LEAGUE for MUTUAL AID, 104 Fifth Ave.

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	85
EDITORIALS:
Where Will the Money Come From?	88
Rule by Advertisers	89
A National Waterway	89
A Neglected Art	90
ISSUES AND MEN. THE CRUCIAL MONTHS AHEAD. By
Oswald Garrison Villard	91
"ART" AND THE AD MAN. By James Rorty	92
FREEDOM OF SPEECH. By Carl Becker	94
THE NEW DEAL AT MONTEVIDEO. By Samuel Guy Inman	97
A NEW REBELLION IN CHINA. By Crispian Corcoran	99
THE WASHINGTON SEESAW. By Paul Y. Anderson	101
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter	102
CORRESPONDENCE	103
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE	104
BOOKS, ARCHITECTURE, DRAMA:
Sculptured. By Charlotte Wilder	105
Sean O'Faolain. By William Troy	105
Book of a Liberal. By Lewis Galantière	106
White and Black. By Dorothy Van Doren	106
Honesty and Fiction. By Eda Lou Walton	107
Franklin and His Grandson. By William MacDonald	107
Justice Brandeis. By Beryl Harold Levy	108
Shorter Notices	108
Architecture: 1933: Looking Forward at Chicago. By Douglas Haskell	109
Drama: "The Sickness of Today." By Joseph Wood Krutch	110
Films: Garbo and Screen Acting. By William Troy	112

BOARD OF EDITORS

ERNEST GRUENING FREDA KIRCHWEY
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
MAURITZ A. HALLGREN MARGARET MARSHALL
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD
CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $5.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. British Agent, Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, W. C. 1, England.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S latest monetary plan seems to be a compromise designed to please as many persons as possible and gloss over some of the fundamental difficulties of the Administration's financial policy. An obvious defect is that it does not provide the genuine stabilization of values that would ensue from devalorization by a fixed percentage and a simultaneous resumption of gold payments, but Mr. Roosevelt may naturally hesitate to take that step at present, if indeed he intends to take it at all. His scheme seems to contemplate an attempt at a managed currency for an indefinite period, at least within a prescribed range. Whether industry will thrive any better under such modified insecurity of values than it has heretofore, remains to be seen, but there seems to be a feeling that the demand for new kinds of inflation has been staved off for the time. Theoretically, the announcement of a definite intention to devalue the dollar at least 40 per cent should be followed by higher prices. Actually, it is not certain that its immediate effect on domestic prices will be greater than has been that of the lessened value of the dollar in foreign exchange. Apparently this effect has been slight, since such price rises as we have had are more readily attributable to other causes. Mr. Roosevelt's monetary policy has failed to bring the immediate higher prices which he wanted, for which the country, if not the President, may well be thankful. Just the same, in the long run the devaluation of the dollar seems likely to reduce its purchasing power at home as well as abroad, and the gradualness of the process, if it occurs, should not blind the public to the knowledge that the government has confiscated a portion of its savings. This will not have been done by a capital levy or taxes falling specially on the well-to-do, but by a straight slash into the savings of poor as well as rich. In fact, it must fall most heavily on the small saver, his little accumulations are mainly in fixed-dollar values—savings-bank accounts, Liberty bonds, insurance policies, and the like. It may be, though it is not certain, that some such despoliation of the middle class is inevitable, but if so it should not be forgotten as an indictment of the industrial system under which we live.

DESPITE a few unexpected signs of restiveness that developed in the first ten days of its present session, there is no reason to suppose that Congress will not remain the well-mannered though not especially deliberative body which the Administration considers so necessary to its purposes. It is apparent that the Republicans will make little trouble, not only because they have but a handful of votes, but also because they lack intellectual courage. The President gave them a unique opportunity when he bravely announced that his recovery program would make necessary a budgetary deficit of something like seven billion dollars, the largest deficit in the country's history. A determined opposition could doubtless have made excellent political capital out of this startling statement. But the Republicans, either because they were struck mute by the President's audacity or because they suddenly recalled Andrew Mellon's habitual miscalculations in handling the budget, forgot to roar. They contented themselves with a polite request or two for detailed information on how the various recovery appropriations were being expended. The Democrats quite naturally are disposed to go along with the President. Yet it is from the Democratic side that difficulties may be expected if the Administration does not watch its step. Though they have a common party label, the Democrats in Congress represent numerous conflicting economic and sectional interests. It will take very tactful handling to keep them all loyal to the Roosevelt program.

THUS IT WOULD BEHOOVE the Administration not to put Congress to too severe a test. It almost overreached itself when it insisted upon forcing a gag rule on the House with a view to expediting legislation to extend certain provisions of the 1933 Economy Act. This stratagem was both unnecessary and unwise; unnecessary because the House had already indicated its willingness to approve the Administration's economy bill without unreasonable delay, and unwise because it aroused a great deal of hostility among otherwise loyal Democrats. The gag rule is an illiberal and hardly defensible measure at any time, but in the present instance there was added the suggestion that the Administration did not fully trust its own party members in Congress. As it was, the rule was forced through with a margin of only five votes, eighty-four Democrats joining with the solid Republican and Farmer-Labor delegations in opposing it. True, the Democrats were under pressure from several strongly organized lobbies. But this should have warned the Administration to proceed with more than ordinary caution instead of rushing in with a measure that was bound to offend the sensibilities of most Congressmen.

THE RECOVERY ACT was devised, in part at least, to increase consumer purchasing power. This was to be done by spreading employment over a greater number of workers and also, what is more important, by increasing the real wage-income of these workers. Employment has been increased somewhat, but the buying power of the workers as a whole has not been improved. Indeed, to judge by the studies of the American Federation of Labor and other agencies, the real wage-income of the working class is perhaps lower today than it was last spring. For wages have not risen so rapidly or so far as prices. A part of the fault lies with the NRA codes. These permit employers to raise their prices in order to cover the additional labor costs made necessary by the codes. But obviously, if the total wage rise is offset by a commensurate price rise, no expansion of purchasing power has been achieved. General Hugh S. Johnson seems to be aware that the code system has fallen short of its goal in some respects. But instead of supporting the Consumers' Advisory Board in its desire for an inquiry into the effect higher prices have had upon purchasing power, he has sought to minimize the importance of the price factor. He has shown himself equally unconcerned with the wage problem. On the other hand, he is advocating a further reduction of the working week to thirty-two hours from the present forty-hour average. Such a reduction is unquestionably necessary, for the slack in employment is still distressingly large. But under the circumstances any further reduction of the working week that is not accompanied by an absolute rise in the wage-income of the workers as a whole can amount only to an extension of the share-the-work idea.

THE OLD HABIT of appointing unreconstructed Southerners to government posts in the Caribbean seems to persist despite the unfortunate results that almost invariably follow. Puerto Rico, having happily lost a Mississippian as Governor, has now been presented with a native of Georgia. The fact that ex-Governor Gore was politically inept, inexperienced, and hopelessly ignorant of Puerto Rican affairs, while Major General Winship is undoubtedly able and intelligent, only slightly modifies our regret at his appointment. The new Governor has had an excellent record as an officer, and is reputed to be a kind and cultured gentleman, but he unites in himself the attitudes characteristic of the South and of the army—a combination peculiarly unfortunate in Puerto Rico as it would be in any of the Caribbean islands. The first essential for a governor of Puerto Rico is a shrewd understanding of the intense, highly developed political life of the island, and a respect for its people. The second is an ability to keep out of partisan political activities. Mr. Gore failed in both respects. General Winship may know enough to refuse to become entangled in island politics, but we fear that he brings to his position an inbred sense of the superiority of the United States and its institutions and a kindly contempt for "backward" and underprivileged peoples that are bound to injure his chances as governor. When Governor Gore resigned, the Administration had an opportunity to send to Puerto Rico a man who would represent the aims, economic and political, proclaimed by Mr. Roosevelt. By the appointment of Governor Winship, it has forfeited this chance.

THE RESIGNATION of Ramon Grau San Martin and the assumption of the presidency of Cuba by Carlos Hevia on January 15 accentuated rather than lessened confusion in the republic. As this issue of The Nation went to press the differences between Colonel Fulgencio Batista, Chief of Staff of the army, and Antonio Guiteras, Secretary of the Interior, War, and Navy, had apparently reached a stage of open rupture, and a clash of forces was predicted. The one certainty in the situation was that the policy of the United States in the last six months had failed, leaving a condition of greater turmoil than at any time since the fall of Machado. This was bound to happen, as The Nation has repeatedly indicated, in consequence of our refusal either to fish or cut bait. There can be only two courses for the United States to pursue in Latin America. It may forcibly intervene and dictate the government that is to exist, as to its shame it has done in various instances in the past. Or, if it is to live up to our better traditions and the policy of non-intervention recently announced by Mr. Roosevelt, it can refuse to meddle, and recognize any regime which obtains a de facto control of the government. There is no middle course, such as we attempted with President Grau, for it is an accepted doctrine in Latin America that no government in a small state can survive without recognition from the United States. This ought not to be so, but it has become a fact owing to our financial dominance of the Western Hemisphere and a policy followed for many years of imposing our will on less powerful republics. Our continued refusal to recognize President Grau doomed him to defeat as surely as frank intervention. But where has it got either the United States or Cuba?

IGNORING THE PROTESTS of the Dutch government, the Nazis have proceeded with the execution of Marinus van der Lubbe, the young Hollander convicted of having started the Reichstag fire. Several aspects of the case are particularly unpleasant. First, the execution was carried out under the provisions of a retroactive law passed after the fire, making arson punishable by death. Second, Van der Lubbe himself gave little evidence of being aware of what was happening to him. At the trial, after his first explosive acknowledgment of his earlier confession and his plea to "kill me and get it over with," he showed no interest in, and indeed no ability to comprehend the proceedings. Sunk in a lethargy, he evinced all the symptoms of an advanced form of dementia praecox. To guillotine such a person, of whom there were the gravest suspicions of pathological irresponsibility, seems even more horrible than the numerous other murders of which the Nazis have been guilty. With Van der Lubbe's death all hope disappears of solving the question whether or not he had accomplices and who they were. The Nazis may be expected now to turn their attention to Ernst Torgler and the three Bulgarian Communists acquitted of arson but still held in jail. Torgler, as the avowed leader of the Communist Party in Germany, will, it is announced, be tried for high treason and conspiracy against the state. If the critical eye of the world kept the German court from carrying out, in the first trial, the evident bloody intentions of the German government, there is all the more need, in the trial that is to come, of protest from every possible source.

IN THE HITLER-DOLLFUSS FIGHT for supremacy in Austria, the Austrian Premier unquestionably scored a victory in the last engagement. The arrest of an attaché of the German Embassy in a secret meeting of Austrian Nazis proves that Berlin is directing and paying for the movement to overthrow the Dollfuss Government. Documents confiscated on this occasion show that the National Socialists are planning not only the overthrow of the present regime but an Austrian revolution. Heimwehr leaders are demanding a fascist regime. They insist on the suppression of the Social Democratic Party and on the appointment of an administrator for Vienna to take the place of the Social Democratic municipal council. Chancellor Dollfuss does not object to such measures, but he is unwilling at this stage to grant the demand that the most important Cabinet posts be filled with Heimwehr leaders. The Heimwehr, on its part, is trying to force his hand by threatening to make common cause with the National Socialists. Indeed, the presence of Count Alberti, Heimwehr leader for Lower Austria, in the above-mentioned meeting points to a well-developed alliance between the two openly fascist groups. It seems clear that fascism will shortly replace what remains of republican institutions. The latest politico-economic measures of the Dollfuss regime show that the Christian Social Party is prepared to take the final step; it has already announced the appointment of a commission of employers, officials, and workers to outline the reconstruction of Austrian industry in a corporate state.

THE PRESS has long been carrying on a battle with the radio as a dispenser of news, charging that because of federal licensing freedom of the air is unknown. But this year's meeting of the American Academy of Political and Social Science in Philadelphia brought out strikingly the extent and kind of censorship which radio stations themselves exercise. The meeting's topic was the NRA, and one of the speakers was Frederick J. Schlink, head of Consumers' Research. The address was scheduled to be broadcast over the Columbia chain, the president of which, William S. Paley, is a member of the academy. As usual, one of the directors of the local station read the speech first. It was sharply critical, pointing out that the benefit of the NRA to the consumer was still largely negative, because it was permitting commercial prices to rise too rapidly. It also took exception to the great volume of misleading advertising which the radio, among other media, lets loose. After several conferences Columbia decided that the address was a "direct, unwarranted attack on the Administration" and refused Mr. Schlink the air, substituting something more innocuous and "constructive." The Philadelphia Record told the story and it created something of a furor. Columbia officials, including Mr. Paley, disavowed the censorship action of "a subordinate," and General Johnson said it was "silly," adding that the NRA welcomed criticism and Columbia did what it did without any influence or pressure from the Administration. Mr. Schlink was permitted to give his speech on the air a week later and it did not shatter any radio sets.

PHILADELPHIA'S bloody taxicab strike is over, and the powerful Philadelphia Rapid Transit Company has agreed to recognize the union of some 900 drivers—the first union to pierce the paternal Mitten street-railway monopoly. It was in the cause of union recognition that the men converted a lockout into a strike and stayed out seven weeks, and it was in this cause that hundreds of taxicabs were damaged or destroyed and hundreds of strikers arrested for violence. But the significant thing about the strike is that the drivers' victory was achieved without the aid of the National Labor Board. The P. R. T. was one of three large companies which ran into trouble through persistent support of the company union. The others were the Budd Manufacturing Company, also in Philadelphia, and the Weirton steel mills. The National Labor Board made dire threats about what would happen if its demands were not acceded to, but thus far no action has been taken, although according to General Johnson both criminal prosecution and civil lawsuits are contemplated. The same ultimatum was sent to the P. R. T., which promptly refused to recognize the Labor Board's authority, and imported several score more strike-breakers. The settlement was finally made in self-defense; the company was losing heavily by the strike, not only in taxicab transportation but on its trolley and subway lines as well. Senator Wagner hailed the settlement as a victory for the Labor Board, but it is quite obvious that that claim can be disputed.

SOME of the peculiar evils of overbuilding in New York and doubtless other cities are shown by the suit just brought against the Rockefeller Center development by real-estate interests under the control of August Heckscher. The Rockefellers are charged with unlawful competition in an attempt to obtain tenants for the Rockefeller Center buildings by lowering rents below the level which was sufficient to pay fixed charges through bonuses offered to prospective tenants, and by inducing such tenants, for monetary considerations or otherwise, to break leases already contracted in other buildings. It was evident when the elaborate and extensive plans for Rockefeller Center were first published that there was no demand in that neighborhood for the enormous extension of office space which the buildings would afford. It should have been evident that tenants for such buildings could only be had at the expense of other structures already built. And it is evident now that tenants could only be induced to leave their former quarters and lodge their businesses in Rockefeller Center by extraordinary means. Whether or not these means are also illegal, the present lawsuit will demonstrate. It is just as well that a test case of what everybody has been suspecting should be made with defendants as well known as the owners of Rockefeller Center. And if the unfair practices of which they are accused are established, the government could not do a more effective job of relief than to appropriate money for the razing of some of our more splendid business structures and the creation upon their site of public parks or playgrounds, with special benches, perhaps, reserved for the former owners of the vanished towers.

Where Will the Money Come From?

THE depression, if and when it ends, will leave behind it as a monument a public debt higher than any incurred before in the history of the United States, a debt more than sixteen times as great as that which the country supported for many years before the war. Public debts have to be paid off—unless the debtor defaults—and in the process they have to be supported; and it is primarily the people of the country who are called upon to provide the money to do both. If the people fail, if their government cannot get out of them enough to pay the interest and amortization of its debt, the only alternative is repudiation, which in most cases takes the form of printed paper money distributed to the creditors. This process reduces the debt, but it also dilutes the incomes of all the citizens in a way that in the end produces more painful effects than even the most uncomfortable open taxation.

The President's budget message makes it clear that he expects eventually to pay off the vast borrowing projected, not by printed money, but by an increase in the government's receipts consequent upon a return of prosperity within the next two years, at least to the level of 1924. If his expectations are proved wrong, we may as well admit at the start that the country faces repudiation through a dangerous dose of inflation. But let us adopt for a moment the President's role of optimist. Let us assume that when 1936 arrives, the country's prosperity will have reached the figure of 98, which is 1924's proud index number, and that the public debt will be no more than 32 billion dollars. We may, of course, still face certain additional emergency expenses; the railways, for example, can hardly be expected to recover along with the rest of the country, and the government may be forced to purchase and operate them. This alone would add at least 13 billion to the debt. There is the possibility of another wasteful and destructive war. There is the probability of another costly depression. Any of these would necessitate enormous government borrowing and result in another large increase in the national debt.

A sound government fiscal policy is one which will permit a rapid expansion of public expenditures in time of depression or sudden need. The success of such a policy must obviously depend, first, upon the maintenance of a high degree of confidence in public credit, so that the government will always be able to borrow funds at low interest rates, and, second, upon a rapid reduction of the public debt in time of prosperity, so that it can be safely expanded in time of need. That the first of these conditions is not being fulfilled at present is evident from the fact that the Treasury is now faced with the necessity of borrowing 10 billion dollars before June 30 in a market where its short-term notes are selling at a yield of well over 2 per cent and many of its long-term issues at nearly 4 per cent.

Fulfillment of the second condition requires the immediate adoption by the Administration of a realistic taxation policy. If we are to be prepared for future financial emergencies we must plan to reduce the public debt much more rapidly than we did during the post-war decade, probably at the rate of at least 2 billion dollars a year. (Even at this rate eight years would be required to liquidate the cost of the depression and bring the public debt to the 1930 level.) At least another billion dollars will be needed to pay interest at 3 per cent, so that debt service alone will cost the people of the United States in the neighborhood of 3 billion dollars a year. Assuming that general operating expenses can be held to another 3 billion, it appears that the annual federal budget for some years to come can hardly be less than, and may greatly exceed, 6 billion dollars. This is a larger amount than the government has ever collected in any year except in 1920, when prices were about twice as high as they are now and war profits were pouring into the Treasury. It is three times as large as government revenues last year. It is half again as much as the annual receipts during the seven years from 1923 to 1929, when the public debt was being reduced at the rate of a billion a year and prices and wages were 40 per cent higher than at present. If this obligation is to be met, most of the money must be obtained from sharply increased income and inheritance taxes.

It is necessary to inquire whether the very rich can be made to foot a substantial part of the bill. In 1924 the money income of the nation was 70 billion dollars, half again as large as it is now; wholesale prices were 40 per cent higher; unemployment was negligible compared with the 10 million or more persons out of work at present; government receipts were 4 billion dollars—twice the amount collected last year. Of the estimated 44 million persons who were gainfully occupied in that year, income-tax returns were filed by only some 7 million, which presumably included all single persons earning more than $1,000 and all married persons earning more than $2,500. If Huey Long's idea of confiscating all income over 1 million dollars had been put into effect, the seventy-five persons reporting such incomes in 1924 would have had to contribute about 80 million dollars, or enough to "run the government" for five days on a 6-billion-dollar annual budget. If each of the 22,000 persons reporting more than $50,000 a year had been made to disgorge all income above that amount, the Treasury would have been enriched by about $1,200,000,000—not much more than enough to pay interest on a public debt of 32 billion dollars. Apparently most of the gold will have to be found in the foothills rather than the mountain peaks. Out of the total net income of some 25 billion dollars on which taxes were paid in 1924, 91 per cent was earned by persons receiving less than $50,000 a year; 85 per cent by those earning less than $25,000. Obviously, it is the "backbone of America," the good old middle class, which will have to foot the bill when it is finally paid.

And the bill will have to be paid, of course. The only alternative to a budget ultimately balanced by adequate taxation is debt repudiation through uncontrolled inflation. And inflation is in reality no alternative to taxation. It is merely another and a grossly inequitable form of taxation—a devastating sales tax which exhausts the purchasing power of the wage-earner, and a cruel form of capital levy which destroys not the holdings of the very rich but the savings of the small man.

Rule by Advertisers

THE medicine men, the ad men, and the vitamin men have won the first round of the Tugwell-bill fight. They will win the final decision during the next few weeks unless, by some miracle, the people of this country can be induced to crack the whip over Congress and force back into the bill the crucial provisions which were either struck out or modified to death in Senator Copeland's revision. In its present form the bill does not oblige patent-medicine manufacturers to disclose the full formula of their products on the label. The "not a cure" statement has been eliminated, and therapeutic claims may be made if they are supported by substantial medical opinion. Such opinion has been purchased in the past and will doubtless be purchased in the future. The restriction on advertising which threw the big drug houses into a panic has been almost emasculated.

Why did this happen? It happened because the embattled ad men and patent-medicine men cracked the whip over Congress and particularly over the press. All over the country publishers and editors heard the Master's Voice. For example, if you were a country editor how would you feel if you pulled out of your mail this grim communiqué from the Creomulsion Company of Atlanta, Georgia?

GENTLEMEN: You are about to lose a substantial amount of advertising revenue from food, drug, and cosmetic manufacturers. Your pocket-book is about to be filched, and you will see how if you will personally study . . . the inclosed copy of the Tugwell bill. This bill was introduced by two doctors. . . . You publish your paper for profit and as a service to your community. In most virile business organizations the altruistic policies in the final analysis are means to the primary end, which is profit. . . . An isolated editorial or two will not suffice. . . . You need to take an aggressive stand against this measure. You need to bring all personal pressure you can upon your Senators and Representatives. You need to enlighten and thereby arouse your public against this bill that is calculated to greatly restrict personal rights. If this bill should become law we will be forced to cancel immediately every line of Creomulsion advertising.

Doubtless our "free" press, with some honorable exceptions, saw its duty and "enlightened" the public as ordered. But when Dr. Walter Campbell and his associates in the Food and Drug Administration attempted a little enlightenment of their own, what happened? The trade press of the drug, food, and advertising industries raved against the Washington "bureaucrats" who, they alleged, were misusing public funds to tell the truth—nobody has impugned the accuracy of Dr. Campbell's exhibits—to the people. Nor was that all. Congressmen began to get missives like the following from Daniel A. Lundy, "Advertising Counsel and Copy":

MY DEAR SENATOR: It would seem, if Section 6 of the Deficiency Appropriation Act, for the fiscal year of 1919 and prior year, is still active, that Walter Campbell may well be dismissed and prosecuted for his alleged gross violations and abuse of authority in spending government money without permission of the Congress for radio, Paramount newsreel, diversion of his employees' time for selfish purposes, and other means to influence passage of unconstitutional Tugwell-Copeland-Sirovich food and drug bill.

Walter Campbell, it would seem, has overridden all official propriety and wisdom in his alleged overt act, and no public trust or confidence once violated, as in this case, can be restored. There seems but one road for Congress—the road of dismissing the chief of the food and drug department, with penalties, if substantiated.

All others who have aided and abetted in these vicious and irregular proposals, whether in lending their names or in actions, should come under the same discipline.

Honest industry and a decent public prays for a thorough and speedy investigation and not a whitewash of an alleged crime as despicable and deplorable as the sell-out of the Teapot Dome.

Dr. Campbell, an able, honest, and courageous official, is on the spot. Professor Tugwell and his associates are on the spot. The Consumers' Advisory Board of the NRA and especially Dr. Robert S. Lynd are on the spot. F. J. Schlink, director of Consumers' Research, is on the spot. Printers' Ink remarks that "advertisers have been too lenient with F. J. They have underestimated the importance of Consumers' Research."

It would seem that the fight on the Tugwell bill, even if lost, was worth staging for at least one reason: it has given us a concrete example of what rule by business means. It should be clear that every man or woman in public life who challenges the vested interests of even the least defensible commercial rackets—and the proprietary medicine and advertising rackets are in that category—will sooner or later be "taken for a ride." And the Fourth Estate will either have to cooperate with these business gangsters or find some other source of income besides the advertising of the Creomulsion manufacturers and their ilk.

A National Waterway

THE fight against the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway, which in our issue of December 27 we predicted was likely to be made in Congress this winter, took definite and dangerous shape as soon as the new session began. Forces began to mobilize almost at once which darkened the outlook for ratification of the treaty with Canada in spite of a special message in favor of the waterway from President Roosevelt. As we indicated in our previous discussion, there is evidence that the opposition—nominally against the waterway as a navigational project—is actually a covert attack upon the power development contemplated in the scheme, made by utilities interests of New York and neighboring States which see their monopoly and their oppressive rates threatened by government-produced electric current. This is not to say, of course, that men have not been led into the opposition camp for honest reasons, but the suddenness and force with which the storm gathered out of an almost clear sky are not explainable as a spontaneous change in public sentiment. It should be recalled that the St. Lawrence waterway has been before the public as a definite project for more than a decade and had been gaining favor all the time until the recent mobilization against it. A preliminary treaty with Canada was ratified in 1932, and it would seem that the Senate should be more than ever ready to go on with the project today when the federal government is trying to develop a large public-works program.

The arguments urged against the waterway at this stage of the proceedings seem essentially trivial or belated. The technical objections now raised have all been considered and dismissed by our army engineers, whose verdict must naturally be accepted by the average layman just as it is accepted by President Roosevelt. That the waterway may do some damage to local interests, as does every great national project, is to be conceded, although the extent of this damage is probably exaggerated. New facilities create new business, and far from hurting the railroads and ports of the Northern Atlantic States, the waterway is likely to help them. The argument of Senator Wagner of New York that our wheat trade is diminishing and that therefore we should not increase facilities for it would be sound if the waterway were intended only for wheat. The fact is that the waterway will further all kinds of commerce. Virtually it will bring the Atlantic Ocean 1,000 miles inland, making seaports of cities in the Mississippi Valley and putting a new empire in touch by water with the world at large. Not only should it help the much-needed revival of our foreign trade, but it will be of vast service in domestic intercommunication.

Those who seek to create prejudice against the project on the ground that our money is to go to Canadian workmen are on insecure ground. On October 20, last, Brigadier General G. B. Pillsbury, acting chief of army engineers, wrote to Frank P. Walsh, chairman of the Power Authority of the State of New York:

In accordance with your request for information on the percentage of funds furnished by the United States under the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Deep Waterway Treaty which will be expended for American labor, materials, etc., I take pleasure in advising you that of the total estimated expenditures of American funds of $257,992,000 for both navigation and power works, approximately 80 per cent will be expended by United States engineers and United States labor and with United States material. The remainder, under the terms of sub-paragraph (b) of Article III of the treaty, will be for work executed by Canadian engineers and Canadian labor and with Canadian material for works within Canadian territory to be constructed by the temporary St. Lawrence-International Rapids Section Commission. Approximately 60 per cent of the total cost will be expended on works in the State of New York.

If there are some who ask why even a fraction of the expenditures should go to Canadian labor, they should remember that of the three rapids in the St. Lawrence River, Canada is undertaking to build the locks for two entirely at its own expense, as well as doing a fair share of other work toward deepening the present waterway.

The power possibilities of the waterway are not less important than its navigational advantages. As we pointed out on December 27, it is proposed to develop more power from the St. Lawrence rapids along the international boundary—to be divided equally between Canada and the United States—than is at present contemplated at Muscle Shoals and Boulder Dam combined. This, of course, is the reason for the secret utility campaign against the waterway.

As President Roosevelt reminded the country in his message, the waterway is going to be built. If the United States does not participate, the work will be done eventually by Canada alone. Thus navigational facilities—which will be limited—would be available to the United States only to the extent that Canada did not want them.

A Neglected Art

DO you, dear reader, happen to know that many royal hides—including those of King Edward VII, King George V, Czar Nicholas II, and Queen Olga of Greece—are or were tastefully ornamented with designs in tattoo? If you do not, and if—what is perhaps less likely—you are ashamed of such ignorance, then Albert Parry has just published the book for you. You will discover that in his volume called "Tattoo" he provides a rich store of useful information. There are, for instance, times when any one of us might need to know that the possession of an indecorous emblem is sufficient to bar a sailor from reenlistment in the United States navy, or that at least one American court has decided that a gentleman who has seen an innocent design on a lady's thigh is justified in regarding her as a woman of immoral life—even though it is subsequently proved that she was innocence itself.

Mr. Parry's researches take him into the fields of psychology, anthropology, and aesthetics as well as into the records of history. The circus, the jail, the brothel, and the man-of-war interest him no less than the royal courts, and he introduces us to the leading American practitioners of the art as well as to their patrons. What is more, he points with proper pride to the fact that in our country the wickedness of our bad men and women is—literally—not even skin deep. Our prostitutes go in for true love knots, our sentimental criminals are embroidered with tributes to their mothers, and it is only in corrupt Europe that one is likely to find a lawbreaker like a certain Frenchman who had a blue circle about his neck with the inscription, "Executioner, cut on the dotted line."

We shall pass hastily over the fact that a nameless American collector is accustomed to enter into arrangements with the possessors of works which strike his fancy, and that by virtue of these arrangements he has a choice collection of segments of skin which came into his possession by legal process after the death of the original owner. We shall also allude only in passing to the history of a young lady who grew so tired of her career as a typist that she had herself engraved all over for the express purpose of joining a circus. But there is one story so rich in human interest that we must tell it in full.

It seems that there was a certain sailor whose chest, back, and arms had been transformed into a veritable salon of graceful nudes. When, bared to the waist, he worked at his tasks on deck he was both the admiration and the solace of his laboring companions, who forgot their chanteys while they studied art. One day, however, he took to himself a wife of puritanical temperament, and when next the gallery was open to the public the unfortunate results of a censorship were evident: each figure had been newly provided with a brassière and a skirt. There is, we know, a persistent legend to the effect that after Turner's death Ruskin destroyed a great quantity of drawings which offended his sense of decency. We are also familiar with the undisputed fact that Lady Burton burned the manuscript upon which her deceased husband had been laboring for years. But these victims were presumably beyond caring about earthly things. Our sailor had to choose between love and art, and love won.

Issues and Men

The Crucial Months Ahead

THESE are crucial months which lie ahead of us between now and July, especially for the President. By the end of the first half of 1934 we shall know how certain expedients are going to work, and whether the fundamental question, Can a depression be cured by wholesale spending? will be answered affirmatively. Will the gold and silver purchases and other currency experiments or the NRA itself finally raise the level of prices? Will there be continuing reemployment? Will the lot of the farmer improve, or is he profiting—where and when he profits—solely by the direct payments the Treasury is making to him? Are those pessimists correct who say, like John T. Flynn, that there has been no improvement whatever except that created by the government spending? These and various other questions must be answered soon. I fear it is undeniable that if we reach July 1 without substantial changes we shall be measurably in sight of some considerable currency inflation.

For the Administration this period will be the severest test. Mr. Roosevelt will have to use all his suave skill and tact not only in heading off the silver fanatics and those who favor paying off the entire national debt in greenbacks, but in coping with those, like Senator Borah, who are on the rampage once more in the matter of the Allied debts. During this period we shall learn how well the President has selected his personal advisers, and whether the theories of the latter are sound. His subordinates will have finally to prove just how capable they are as administrators, as coordinators, and as field generals in carrying out the policies of the President. Some of them are already the subject of increasing criticism, and their efficiency and wisdom are being doubted—notably in the case of the Postmaster-General. General Johnson himself has said that the greatest need now is to get the various administrators of the several branches of the recovery plan to “click together.” Much will depend on the progress of the agricultural-relief campaign during the coming months. Again, there are new problems always coming up. How, for example, are the railroads to raise the $2,300,000,000 they need to refinance security issues maturing this year? How are the $10,000,000,000 of new government securities to be sold within six months’ time in such a way as not seriously to damage the government’s credit? And can the government bring itself to a definite policy in the matter of the tariff, as suggested by Secretary Hull at Montevideo and Secretary Wallace in his Midwestern speeches, and outlined in part by the Executive Commercial Policy Committee? If so, is there a chance that Congress will give to the President the unlimited power to raise, or lower, or abolish tariffs which the committee apparently desires him to have?

As to the banking situation, no one can assert that it is satisfactory. There are still approximately 3,200 closed banks, and it is no secret that of those that are open many are being kept going by RFC aid, that others are in trouble, and that numerous others would be put out of business if State laws as to the valuation of the securities in their portfolios should be enforced. I am delighted to see that one section of the President’s “brain trust” is at work on a study of the possibilities of an extension of the Postal Savings system so that there may be increased deposits and small checking accounts. The latest figures show that the government now has no less than $1,187,186,208 on deposit, whereas two years ago it had only $347,416,870. In other words, the deposits show a growth in two years of 230 per cent.

During the same time the number of depositors has increased from 1,545,190 to 2,342,133. Obviously, if the $2,500 limit were taken off, the sum on deposit would again be increased, and would provide an additional market for the government securities which must be issued in such large amounts. A. A. Berle, Jr., has just said that we must have a unified banking structure under the control of the federal government, a savings-bank system with a mortgage-rediscout bank at its head to provide liquidity, and a system of large regional banks with branches covering great areas of the country. But as Harry W. Laidler asked him: “Isn’t it logical for the government to go farther, acquire control of the entire banking system, and run it wholly for the service of the community?” The President must take a position on this before very long.

If we turn to the foreign field, there are not only the questions of the tariff, especially in regard to South America, and of the debts, which the President has deliberately allowed to drift; there is the vexed question of currency stabilization, which sooner or later will have to be settled. It cannot be settled in any way without affecting our foreign relations. One act of the President has done more to injure American standing abroad than any other of the many singular and inconsistent acts to our credit and discredit since the conclusion of peace. That is, of course, the dishonoring of the gold clause in our bonds. This has aroused a fury against us in Norway, Denmark, Holland, and Switzerland such as we have not witnessed before. Sooner or later the President, if he is wise, will find a way of rescinding that order, especially since the decision of the House of Lords in the recent Belgian case has upset a precedent which the defenders of the President’s acts had cited as his justification. One thing is certain, we cannot play the moralist and abuse foreign nations for failing to pay the debts that they owe us in the face of this dishonorable breaking of our pledged word.

Upon the outcome of these next fateful months may even depend the future structure of our government, and whether we shall find ourselves face to face with a full-fledged fascist movement in this country. At least we can agree upon one thing in wishing the President all possible success in his program and also the very best of health for the tremendously arduous days which lie before him.

Donald Garrison Killard

"Art" and the Ad Man

By JAMES RORTY

SINCE advertising is essentially a traffic in belief, the profession habitually takes the name of Truth, though usually in vain. And since Beauty is Truth, Truth Beauty, the profession is also forever rendering vain oblations at the shrine of Beauty.

This worship has two major phases. The first is the manufacture, by advertising, of successive exploitable concepts of feminine beauty, of beauty in clothes, houses, furniture, automobiles, kitchens, everything. The second phase of this worship has to do with the ad man's view of his own craft, and would appear to represent, in part at least, a perversion of the normal human instinct of workmanship.

For some reason it is thought necessary for the ad man not merely to sell the idea of beauty but to sell beauty beautifully. It is contended that an attractively designed advertisement of an allegedly beautiful toilet seat is more effective than an ugly advertisement of the same object. But this has never been proved conclusively. On the contrary, there are many examples of very ugly advertising which has been exceptionally effective. Yet the desire for beauty in advertising is inextinguishable and has more or less had its way. Fifteen years ago the well-designed newspaper or magazine advertisement was the exception; today it is the rule. Has the effectiveness of advertising increased proportionately? On the contrary, it has decreased, and one of the factors in this decline is undoubtedly the increased cost of producing this economically superfluous beauty in advertising. There is, of course, a recognized and demonstrated commercial justification for using expensive "art" and expensive typography in the advertising of certain luxury products such as perfumes, de luxe motor cars, and the like. The principle is that of "conspicuous waste," used to create an ambience, a prestige, for the product which will lift it above the rational level of price competition. But as many hard-boiled professionals have often protested, beauty has been permitted to run hog-wild in contemporary advertising practice. Carroll Rheinstrom estimates that 90 per cent of current advertising is waste because of the ad man's preoccupation with his techniques to the exclusion of practical economic considerations.

No, the logical economic explanations don't make sense. Advertising today is often inefficient precisely because it is far better designed and written than it needs to be; certainly it costs far more to produce than it ought to cost. Part of the explanation, I think, lies in a private impurity of the advertising craftsman; he is more interested in beauty than he is in selling. For him the advertisement is a thing in itself. Highly developed craftsmanship in the graphic arts and in writing, enormous expenditures of mechanical skill are deposited at the shrine not of Mammon but of Beauty. And all pretty much in vain. The art isn't really art. The writing isn't really writing. And frequently the worst "art" and the worst "writing" sell products better than the best art and the best writing. The explanation of this curious phenomenon may well be that advertising, since it doesn't make sense in economic, social, or human terms, jumps right through the looking-glass and becomes a thing in itself!

It takes a naive eye to see this. I had to have it pointed out to me by a poet friend who makes his living writing prose for a commercial magazine. He picked up a copy of the publication and pointed to a Camel cigarette advertisement in color. "How much did that cost?" he asked. I estimated rapidly—$1,000 for the drawing, add $200 for the time of the art director and an assistant, $400 for the color plates, $100 for typography, $100 more for miscellaneous mechanical charges, $100 for copy, $300 pro rated for executive and management charges. Total for one advertisement, not counting the cost of the space, about $2,300.

"Well," commented my poet friend, "that's what it's all for, isn't it? That's why Kentucky planters go bankrupt growing tobacco, why Negro and white share-croppers sweat, starve, and revolt, why millions of men and women diligently smoke billions of cigarettes—all so that this magnificent advertisement might be born and live its little hour."

My friend was treating himself to a little poetic license of course. But the more I stared at the phenomenon, the more I became convinced that it made just as much sense upside down as the right side up. And the more I reflected upon the role of the "creative worker" in advertising, the more I came to suspect skullduggery of an obscure, unconscious sort. Ostensibly these craftsmen are employed to write words and draw lines that will persuade their fellow-man to buy certain branded cigarettes, soaps, tooth pastes, and gadgets. But do these artists really give a whoop about these gadgets and gargles or whether people buy them or not? Did I, when I was a member in good standing of the profession? Never a whoop or a whisper. What I cared about was my craft, and that is what every genuine craftsman cares about—that and nothing else. Each piece of copy was a thing in itself. I did a workman-like job, not for dear old Heinz, or Himmelschlüssel, or Rocketeller, or whomever I was serving indirectly, but for myself; because it was pleasant to do a competent job and unpleasant to do a slovenly job. I was aware, of course, that Mr. Rockefeller, via the agency, was paying me, and I tried not to get fired. But I never worried about my duty to Mr. Rockefeller and to his oils and gadgets. The prospect, the customer? I was a bit sorry for the customer, and tried to let him off with as little bamboozlement as possible. But my real loyalty was to the Word, to the materials of my craft.

My indomitable instinct of workmanship was hard on my employer. Unconsciously I sabotaged his interests every day. I tried to write clean, lucid prose, when the clumsy screed that the advertiser wanted to print would probably have sold more goods. When my immediate superior plaintively objected that what I wrote was too good for the audience to which it was addressed, I was indignant and recalcitrant. Ordered to rewrite the advertisement, I seized the opportunity to bring it closer to my standard of craftsmanship, which had nothing to do with commerce. If the client objected, I bullied him if possible; otherwise I made a minimum of grudging concessions.

A percentage of the copy writers in advertising agencies are craftsmen. I have known scores of them. They felt as I felt, and consciously or unconsciously they did what I did. The artists were even more obsessed and obstreperous. As I knew them, their disinterestedness in the profits of Mr. Rockefeller was extreme. They were interested in drawing pretty pictures. As craftsmen they drew them as well as they could, regardless of the advertiser and what he had asked them to draw. Naturally, the picture had to convey a sales message, and they chattered a great deal about "putting a selling punch" in their pictures. But I noticed that the best of them became so interested in the design and the drawing that they frequently left no room for the copy or even for the trademark of the manufacturer. When account executives and advertisers repined at such extravagant oblations at the shrine of Beauty, the artists were haughtier even than the copy writers. And since the average American business man has a puzzled and diffident reverence for art, coupled with an enormous ignorance of the nature of artists, their motivations and techniques, these so-called "commercial" artists did then and still do get away with an astonishing amount of sheer mayhem and murder. The writers did, too, though to a less degree, because most advertisers can read and write. All account executives in agencies and, worse still, all advertisers have an obscene itch to write themselves. Consequently the copy writer must sternly and vigilantly keep these vulgarians in their places. I always considered it to be my duty to stand on my dignity as a "genius"—the word still goes big in the world of commerce, especially on the West Coast—partly as a matter of self-respect, and partly as a practical measure of professional aggrandizement.

Does this seem exaggerated? But how can the honest chronicler record fantasy except in the terms of fantasy? And the vast accumulation of advertising during the post-war decade was fantastic in the extreme. It is still fantastic. Look at it in the pages of any commercial magazine. Does it make sense in terms of the sober, profit-motivated business that advertising is supposed to be?

Recently the investigators of the Psychological Corporation discovered that the variation between advertisements of lowest and highest effectiveness runs as high as 1,000 per cent. An automobile assembly line is considered poor if it permits a quality variation of more than 30 per cent. Is it sensible to believe that a production technique which shows 1,000 per cent variation in the quality of the product is really aimed at its avowed objective, namely, the sale of products and services to customers?

To understand this phenomenon we must employ a far subtler analysis, giving all the factors their due weight, no matter how fantastic they are, and no matter how seemingly irrational the conclusion to which we are led. Veblen furnishes us with the essential clue. In his "Theory of Business Enterprise" and elsewhere Veblen notes that advertising is one element of the "conscientious sabotage" by which business keeps the endlessly procreative force of science-industry from breaking the chains of the profit system. In this view the business man figures as an art-for-art's-saker. His art is the making of money, which has nothing to do with the use of the productive forces by which a society gains its livelihood. The art of making money is perhaps the purest, the most irrational art we know, and its practitioners are utterly intransigent. Today these artists in money-making are prepared to starve millions of people, to plunge the planet in war, to destroy civilization itself rather than compromise the purity of their art.

Veblen saw all this clearly, and Stuart Chase has employed the Veblenian opposition of business and industry in a sequence of useful books. What both failed to see, however, is that the contradictions of capitalism persist even within the mental gears and pistons of its functionaries.

Business sabotages industry by means of advertising. True. But we, as advertising craftsmen consciously or unconsciously motivated not by a desire to make money but by an obsessed delight in the materials of our craft, we in turn sabotaged advertising. We were and are parasites and unconscious saboteurs. During the whole post-war decade we gathered strength, inflated our prestige, consolidated our power. More and more the "creative worker" became the dominant force in agency practice, and advertising consequently became more and more "pure." The shrine of Beauty was buried under the fruits and flowers placed there by devout artists and writers in advertising. We were no humble starvelings. We caused the salaries and fees paid advertising artists and writers to become notorious. Agency production costs hit the ceiling, broke through, and sailed off into the empyrean. We developed an aesthetic of advertising art and copy, a philosophy, a variety of equally fantastic creeds—a whole rich literature of rationalization which should interest the psychiatrists greatly if they ever get around to examining it.

I say "we" with poetic license. I speak for the profession, but I speak without authorization, and I shall doubtless be roundly repudiated and condemned by the menagerie of Cheshire Cats, March Hares, Mad Hatters, and Red Queens who still roam the scant pastures on the other side, the right side, of the advertising looking-glass. As a matter of fact I contributed nothing to this literature of rationalization. I was too busy making a living, trying to keep sane and do a little serious work on the side, and wondering just how soon that beautiful iridescent bubble would break, leaving us "creative workers" with nothing much in our hands and a lot of soap in our eyes.

It broke. Came Black Thursday, and a chill wind blew through the advertising rookeries of the Grand Central district. Advertising appropriations were cut. That exquisite First Article of the ad man's credo, "When business is good it pays to advertise; when business is bad you've got to advertise," was invoked with less and less effect. As the months and years passed the whole structure of the industry began to sideslip and sway. And advertising became less pure. That beautiful, haughty odalisque had to hustle down into the market-place and drag in the customers. She had to speak of price. She became dowdy and blatant and vulgar. The primitive technique of Hogarth in the eighteenth century was resurrected via the tabloids, and moronic sales talk issued in ugly balloons from the mouths of ugly moronic figures. Photography was cheaper than drawings and worked as well or better. Testimonials were cheap and worked best of all. Every time car loadings hit a new low, another big advertiser would go buckeye with testimonials and other loathsome practices.

It occurs to me that in discussing the role of the craftsman in advertising I may have given the impression that his "conscientious sabotage," his interest in the materials of the craft rather than in selling, his attempts to convert advertising into a thing in itself, represent a genuine release of creative capacity. No such impression was intended. If any genuine creation goes on in advertising agencies I have never seen it. I have seen the sort of thing described—the crippled, grotesque make-believe of more or less competent craftsmen who played with the materials of their craft but could never use them in advertising for any creative purpose. By and large there is no such thing as art in advertising any more than there is such a thing as an advertising literature. There is merely sterile virtuosity turned inward because of the impossibility of making art out of the prescribed subject matter. On the door of the art department of an agency where I worked, a friend of mine, one of the ablest and most prolific commercial artists in the business, once tacked a sign. It read: "Fetid Hell-Hole of Lost Souls." There are many hundreds of these fetid hell-holes in the major cities of America. The inmates are of course dedicated to beauty, beauty in advertising. Whether they know it or not, they are, as artists, so many squeaking, tortured eunuchs. The sultans of business pay them well or not so well. They have made sure that they do not fertilize the body of the culture with the dangerous seed of art.

Freedom of Speech

By CARL BECKER

The worth of men consists in their liability to persuasion.

WHITEHEAD

I

THE NATION'S recent affirmation of faith in freedom of speech called forth an unusual number of protests, not against the principle, but against an unlimited application of it. A reexamination of the liberal doctrine is always in order, but never more so than now. The times are such that every liberal may well ask himself, not so much how far he is willing to carry the principle of free speech, but rather how far the principle is capable of carrying him.

It seems necessary to ask what we mean by freedom of speech, since people often have disconcerting ideas about it. A woman once asked me what all the pother was about. Weren't people always free to say what they thought? Of course one must be prepared to face the consequences. I didn't know the answer to that one. Last summer a Columbia University student explained to me that all governments, being based on force, were dictatorships, and that there was no more freedom of speech in the U. S. A. than in the U. S. S. R., the only difference being in the things one was permitted to say. I suggested that, supposing freedom of speech to be a good thing, a poor way of getting more of it than we already had would be to adopt a philosophy which denied that it was worth having. The editors of The Nation do not say that the laws guaranteeing freedom of speech are always effective. They say that freedom of speech, as defined in our fundamental law, is the foundation of free government, and should therefore never be denied to anyone—"even to the Nazis."

The fundamental law guaranteeing freedom of speech was well formulated in the Virginia constitution of 1780: "Any person may speak, write, and publish his sentiments on any subject, being responsible for the abuse [as defined by law] of that liberty." As thus defined, freedom of speech was the principal tenet of the eighteenth-century doctrine of liberal democracy. Its validity, for those who formulated it, rested upon presuppositions which may be put in the form of a syllogism. Major premise: The sole method of arriving at truth is the application of human reason to the problems presented by the universe and the life of men in it. Minor premise: Men are rational creatures who can easily grasp and will gladly accept the truth once it is disclosed to them. Conclusion: By allowing men freedom of speech and the press, relevant knowledge will be made accessible, untrammelled discussion will reconcile divergent interests and opinions, and laws acceptable to all will be enacted. To the early prophets of democracy the syllogism seemed irrefutable; but to us, in the light of liberal democracy as we know it, the minor premise is obviously false, the conclusion invalid. There remains the major premise. What can we do with it?

II

The major premise, with reservations as to "human reason," we can accept—must do so in fact, since there is nothing else to cling to. Even if reason be not always Reason, even if, like Hitler, we have nothing better than our blood to think with, we must make the most of whatever thinking we can muster. "All our dignity," said Pascal, "consists in thought. Endeavor then to think well: that is the essence of morality." It was by taking thought that man first differentiated himself from the beasts; by taking more thought that he achieved whatever men have, by taking thought, judged worthy. What more he may achieve can be achieved, and whether it is worthy can be determined, only by taking still more thought. Since men must in any case think, and do what they think of doing, it seems axiomatic to say that they should be free to think and to express their thoughts as well as they can.

Nevertheless, the statement is not axiomatic—obviously not, since, if it were, The Nation would not bother to print articles about it. There is a catch somewhere. Perhaps we are too prone to think of freedom of speech in terms of Man and Speech. This was the way in which eighteenth-century liberals thought of it. Confronted with a social regime which hedged in the individual at every point, they found the obvious solution in the maximum of liberty for the individual—political liberty, economic liberty, liberty of speech and the press. Knowing little of these liberties in the concrete, they visualized them as ideal abstractions, so that all the spacious but unfurnished chambers in the Temple of Freedom could be brilliantly illuminated by turning on certain phrases—as, for example, Voltaire's epigram: "I disagree absolutely with what you say, but I will defend to the death your right to say it." Liberals still think of liberty somewhat too much in the eighteenth-century manner. Give us, in a mental test, the words "free speech," and we are apt to recall Voltaire's epigram, which then fades into a picture of two amiable, elderly gentlemen engaged in a rational discussion of the existence of the Deity.

Voltaire's epigram expresses a profound truth in the ideal world of knowledge. It would be equally relevant to the world of practical activities if society were a debating club of well-intentioned and reasonable men in which speech, being the only form of action, issued in nothing more dangerous than abstract propositions about reality. Since the activities of men are diverse, the ideal of a debating club is sometimes nearly realized. Mathematical physicists, discussing the nature of the atom, enjoy (at least in this country) the utmost freedom of speech without having (as yet) to call upon The Nation for first aid. Economists, historians, even biologists are more likely to encounter obstacles, since their activities have a more direct bearing on practical affairs. Where the principle of free speech has to fight for its life is in the realm of concrete political activities. Since the eighteenth century we have learned at least this much, that society is something more than a debating club of reasonable men in search of the truth. We know what use men actually make of their liberties. We are therefore in a position to estimate the principle of free speech in terms, not of Man and Speech, but of men and speeches—in terms of the best that has been thought and said by the Honorable Members we have elected, the Attorney-Generals we have known, the Insults we have suffered, the fruity-throated announcers who, every day, for a profit, avail themselves of the Liberty of Lying.

Estimated in terms of its concrete manifestations, the principle of free speech is resolved into a diversity of oral and printed utterances, some of which need to be suppressed. No one has ever thought otherwise. Even the editors of The Nation do not approve of the freedom of speech that issues in slander and libel. Do they approve of the freedom of speech that issues in the lynching of Negroes? In the sale of poisoned cosmetics? The sale of worthless stock to honest but gullible people? They would say that of course there are, as the Virginia constitution recognizes, "abuses" to be defined by law; but that unless the law is careful, the definition may be a greater abuse than the speech it suppresses. True enough: the law is always in danger of being "a ass." But as soon as abuses appear, the principle of free speech is merged in another and broader principle: "Liberty is the right of everyone to do whatever does not injure others"; and we are at once confronted with the fundamental practical problem of all government: What individual acts, including the act that is speech, do here and now injure others?

By no formulation of principles beforehand can answers to this question be provided for concrete situations. The answers must wait on experience. Experience has taught us, or surely will teach us, that the eighteenth-century solution for social ills will no longer serve. Economic liberty, which was to have brought about equality of conditions, has contrived, with the aid of machines, to bring about a monstrous inequality of conditions. That there are rich and poor is nothing new, nor even disastrous. What is disastrous is that a great part of social wealth is owned by the many who do not control it, and controlled by the few who do not own it. Having well learned this, liberals find the obvious solution for social ills not in extending but in restricting the economic liberty of the individual. What we have not learned, or not sufficiently, is that the economic liberty of the individual is intimately associated with his political liberty, and that both are associated with his liberty of speech and the press. It will prove extremely difficult to restrict the one without restricting the others.

The speech that is socially vicious, to the point of endangering all our liberties, functions chiefly as an instrument of the competitive "business" economy. Such an instrument it has always been, no doubt; but never before so important an instrument, for the reason that modern methods of communicating thought are more subtle and effective than any ever before known, while the verification of the truth or relevance of the thought so communicated is far more difficult. The result is that there issues daily from the press and the radio a deluge of statements that are false in fact or misleading in implication, that are made for no other purpose than to fool most of the people most of the time for the economic advantage of a few of the people all of the time. This steady stream of falsification is called by various names which smell, if not too sweet, at least not foul—"advertising," "propaganda," "selling the public." Selling the public is an exact description of what is essential to the "successful" conduct of "business"—so essential that it is itself a business; and not the least of its evil consequences is that it is creating a state of mind disposed to regard anything as O.K. if you can get by with it. This manifestation of free speech is a far greater menace to liberal democracy than the freest dissemination of an alien political philosophy by Nazis or Communists is ever likely to be; and the only defense for it is that to restrict it would endanger the principle of free speech.

III

The danger is chiefly verbal, since the practical problem carries us beyond the speech we condemn to the practical activities that occasion it. The evil cannot of course be cured by creating a board of censors pledged to exclude lies from oral discourse and printed matter. But neither can it be cured by waiting while truth crushed to earth pulls itself up and assembles its battered armor. In the competitive business economy, as it now operates, those who largely control and extensively use the avenues of expression are not seeking truth but profits; and freedom of speech will not cease to be used for purposes that are socially vicious until it ceases to be profitable so to use it. It would seem, then, that the essential thing is either to abolish the profit motive or divert it into socially useful channels. Communists and fascists confidently assert that neither of these objects can be attained through the liberal democratic political mechanism. They may be right. Liberals who think otherwise must at least take account of a disturbing fact: the liberal democratic political mechanism functions by enacting into law the common will that emerges from free discussion. Thus the circle seems completed: for curing the evil effects of free speech we must rely upon a public opinion formed in large part by the speech that is evil.

The editors of The Nation admit that the situation is full of "uncomfortable possibilities," but they hold to the traditional liberal method of meeting them—the promotion, by appealing from free speech drunk to free speech sober, of a "healthy movement to the left." The uncomfortable possibilities, as seen by The Nation, are that "continued economic decline," and the "demand of a despairing people for drastic action," may enable a "well-directed [Nazi] propaganda" [free speech] to bring about the "triumph of fascism . . . with all its attendant horrors." Another uncomfortable possibility, as I see it, is that the "healthy" movement to the left may become "unhealthy," and end in the triumph of communism with all its attendant horrors. Among the attendant horrors, in either case, The Nation would no doubt include, as one of the drastic actions demanded by a despairing people, the drastic suppression of free speech as a political method. The logical dilemma involved in free speech for political objects is therefore this: if social ills cannot be alleviated by the democratic method of free speech, this very freedom of speech will be used by those whose avowed aim is the abolition of the democratic method, and free speech as a part of it. Am I expected to be loyal to the principle of free speech to the point of standing by while, writhing in pain among its worshipers, it commits suicide? It is asking a lot.

It is asking too much only so long as we remain in the realm of logical discourse. In demanding the privilege of free speech from a liberal government in order to convince its citizens that free speech is a present evil, neither Nazis nor Communists have any standing in logic. Their programs, so far as the preliminaries of social reform are concerned at least, are based on an appeal to force rather than to persuasion. Very well, since that is their program, let us cease talking, resort to force, and see which is the stronger. Their own principles teach us that it is logical for them to resist oppression but merely impudent to resent it. Nevertheless, the logic of events is not very logical, and I see no practical virtue in a syllogistic solution of the problem presented by Nazi and Communist propaganda. The freedom of speech which by their own logic I deny them, I am therefore quite willing to concede them in fact.

I concede it because, for one thing, there is a bare chance that the Nazis, or the Communists, or both of them may be, as they seem to claim, true prophets whom the world would not willingly have stoned—agents of the God Woden or the Dialectic duly accredited and predestined to establish truth and justice by a ruthless suppression of oppressors. I should dislike very much to put myself in opposition to the forces, not of persuasion, that make for righteousness, apart from the fact that it would be futile to do so if they are in any case to triumph. But perhaps a better reason for conceding freedom of speech to Nazis and Communists is that freedom of speech can neither be suppressed by argument nor maintained by suppressing argument. The principle of free speech must justify itself or go under. The real danger, from the liberal point of view, is not that Nazis and Communists will destroy liberal democracy by free speaking, but that liberal democracy, through its own failure to cure social ills, will destroy itself by breeding Nazis and Communists. If liberal democracy can sufficiently alleviate social ills, freedom of speech will have sufficiently justified itself; if not, freedom of speech will in any case be lost in the shuffle.

Whatever may be the virtues of freedom of speech in the abstract world of ideas, as a rule of political action it is like any other law—it works well only if the conditions are favorable. It works not too badly in a society in which the material conditions of life, being relatively easy, create no radical conflicts of interest, and in which there exists a common tradition of moral and social ideas, one of which is that just government rests upon the consent, freely expressed and freely given, of the governed. A long-time view of human civilization discloses the fact that such favorable conditions have existed only in a few places or for short times. Experience gives us slight ground for supposing that nineteenth-century liberal democracy is a permanent conquest of intelligence. It may very well be but a passing phase, a cumbersome and extravagant form of government, practicable only in relatively simple agricultural societies suddenly dowered with unaccustomed wealth by the discovery of new instruments of power and the invention of new machines.

Present events do little to discredit this view. Certain European countries have already abandoned liberal democracy—gladly by all accounts—for one or another form of dictatorship. Even in this Land of the Free there are developing, under the pressure of continued economic distress, significant movements to the left and to the right. These movements can surely not be checked by declaring a quarantine—by pronouncing them "unhealthy," and closing the mouths of Nazis and Communists in order to prevent the spread of verbal infection. They can be checked only by removing the economic confusion and distress on which they thrive. Perhaps this can be done by the methods of liberal democracy. Perhaps not. If not, it needs no prophet to tell us that sooner or later a "despairing people" will demand "drastic action." The demand may assume the voice of communism, or of fascism, or of both. It may conceivably lead to another "irreconcilable conflict," similar to that of 1861. Outmoded liberals would not then need, any more than they did in 1861, to ask whether they should abandon the principle of free speech, since the principle of free speech would already have abandoned them. The logic of events would present them—perhaps is already, without their knowing it, presenting them—with nothing better than that choice of evils which liberals always have to face in times when arms speak and laws are silent, the choice of joining one uncongenial armed camp or the other.

There would, it is true, be another way out for any liberal who wished to take it. Any man might in desperation cry, "A plague on both your houses!" Withdrawing from the world of affairs, he might, as a non-resistant pacifist, still exercise the right of private judgment, having deliberately fortified himself to face, as the woman said, "the consequences." In short, he might, as a last refuge from imbecility, turn Christian and practice the precept that it is better to suffer evil than to do it. In that elevated spiritual retreat he would have leisure to meditate the bitter truth of Pascal's profound commonplace: "It is right to follow that which is just, it is necessary to follow that which is stronger."

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

January 24, WEVD, 8:15 p.m.

Radio listeners will not be able to hear Mr. Villard speak over the radio after this date until his return, about April 1, from an extensive lecture tour to the Pacific Coast.

The New Deal at Montevideo

By SAMUEL GUY INMAN

Montevideo, December 26

TO an old stager at Pan-American conferences the difference between the atmosphere of Montevideo and the preceding conferences was nothing less than astounding. The first conference at Washington in 1889 lasted five months, mainly because of the interminable disputes between the United States and Argentina. In every succeeding conference up to the present there has been a threatening Latin American bloc which looked with suspicion on every North American move. Well do I remember during the Fifth Conference at Santiago in 1923 the combination of fourteen Latin American countries to compel a reorganization of the Pan-American Union in order to give more place for Latin American countries and bring about less dominance by the United States. The few concessions granted, after long and painful waiting to hear from Washington, during which delay committee meetings were postponed from day to day, were ungraciously made. Latin American delegations and newspapers were practically unanimous in condemning the superior attitude assumed by the chief of the American delegation, Mr. Fletcher, and his group of lame-duck Senators. "I got all I came after," was the way Mr. Fletcher summed up to me his supposed victories, following the conference. So incensed was Latin America over the optimistic report of our delegation to President Harding that Dr. Estanislao Zeballos of Argentina, former Minister of Foreign Affairs, gave an entire address at the next Williams-town Institute on what he called "the optimistic report of the United States delegation, which does not reveal to that country in the least the sad plight of Pan-Americanism resulting from the Santiago conference."

At Havana in 1928 the same sullen resentment against the United States was evident, although the imperious personality of Charles Evans Hughes kept down the smoldering fires except for a few outbursts which occurred especially in the closing session, when, as the question of intervention finally thrust itself into the limelight, the discussion took such an ugly turn that much of it had to be erased from the record. As if to confirm the suspicions of Latin America, the United States delegation went to Havana on a battleship in company with President Coolidge, who vied with the dictator Machado in such extravagant mutual eulogies that the Cuban government almost forgot the presence of the Latin American delegates.

Throughout the conference there were all kinds of protests against the United States. The head of the Argentine delegation resigned during the conference because of his differences with Mr. Hughes, and suddenly one day, exasperated by the tricks used to avert a discussion of intervention, every Latin American delegation heatedly declared against such tactics on the part of the United States.

At Santiago, Mexico was not represented because of the profound differences with the United States, and Peru and Bolivia sent no delegates because they felt that the United States had favored Chile in the Tacna and Arica question. The shadow of Mexico rested over every act of the Santiago conference and balked the American delegation at every turn. On the other hand, a Mexican delegate said to me here in Montevideo, "We had to come to this conference to find out how much nearer we are to the United States of America than to Argentina and these other South American countries." On two occasions Dr. Puig, Mexican Minister of Foreign Relations, made an extended address concerning the hope offered to Latin America by the new policy of the Roosevelt Administration. The first was after Secretary Hull had made his proposal to reduce tariffs all around on the American continent and to work out bilateral agreements between all American countries, as the United States and Colombia have recently done. This proposal in itself reversed completely the position of Mr. Hughes at Havana when he blocked Argentina's effort to have the Pan-American Union consider economic questions.

When Puig seconded Hull's tariff proposal he did it not because he was sure that Hull and his chief would be able to carry it out, for with the London conference and the farmers' strikes before them Latin American delegates are quite skeptical over the possibility of any general lowering of tariffs in the United States. But the Roosevelt Administration is making a great experiment which, if carried out, will mean new social justice not only in the United States but also for all Latin America. "This New Deal," continued Dr. Puig, "which will mean profound social, economic, and political revision (for this very reason opposed so tenaciously by selfish interests in the United States), needs and should command the unanimous support of this Pan-American assembly."

Here is the real reason that the Seventh Pan-American Conference has had the most favorable atmosphere for co-operation between the north and south of any of the series of congresses since the first meeting at Washington in 1889. The Roosevelt Administration has already shown its resistance to the old policies of dictating what legislation other countries ought to have and using marines to enforce its will. Even if the present Cuban government has not yet been recognized and American collectors of customs are still in Haiti and Santo Domingo, the refusal to land marines in Cuba and the agreement to withdraw them completely from Haiti by October, 1934, thus leaving no shadow of military occupation in any Latin American country, have made a deep impression on our southern neighbors. But a still deeper impression has been made by what is happening in the United States itself. The nations of Latin America believe that the people and government of the United States are turning from their complete trust in money and attempting to build a new order where social justice is the first consideration. For it seems at times that the Latin Americans distrust us not only because of our imperialist program but because of their feeling that big business controls all of our life and purposes. As Dr. Puig says, "This new program we hope is not simply a New Deal but a whole new pack of cards."

The United States could have found no one better fitted to transmit to Latin America the ideas of the new policy than the fine type of Southern gentleman represented by the Secretary of State. The very fact that he is so different from the brilliant, overpowering, imperious Hughes, who headed the American delegation at Havana, or the astute career diplomat Fletcher, who led the lame-duck Senators at Santiago, is his greatest attraction for Latin America. Outside of Dwight Morrow in Mexico no American who has visited Latin America since the memorable visit of Elihu Root in 1906 has made such a favorable impression. Mr. Hull's almost naive simplicity, after all the slick and big-stick diplomats and bankers, is the most commendable trait possible. When, on the first day of his arrival in Montevideo, in a business suit, accompanied only by his secretary, he began to call on each of the heads of the Latin American delegations, ignoring all formality, revealing his great desire first of all for peace in the Chaco, he walked straight into the hearts of Latin Americans. When he declared a few days later that the Roosevelt Administration had no idea of getting behind the international bankers to help them collect their debts and that it disassociated itself from high finance, he entered still further into South American affections. His declarations concerning tariffs, while received with caution and wonder as to how far he could make good, aroused still more appreciation of his own friendly attitude. His statement on peace and the new political attitude of the United States on the American continent, made later on that same day, was a triumph for simplicity and sincerity.

Hull's address on Pan-American peace was made at an afternoon session of the Commission on Peace Machinery in the same impressive sala where the discussion on economics had taken place in the morning; there was thus on one day a square look at two big questions out of some twenty-eight on the agenda of the conference. That afternoon session on peace marks the high spot of friendship and emotional kinship in inter-American gatherings. Another one of the fine figures of the American continent was presiding, Dr. Miguel Cruchaga of Chile, one of the ten ministers of foreign affairs heading their delegations here—which fact alone made this conference stand out as unique. So far the peace commission had done little. Consciousness of the war going on between Bolivia and Paraguay settled like a dense fog over any enthusiasm for new peace machinery. And everyone knew that war in the Chaco might have been stopped if it had not been for the war between the peace pacts—the Kellogg Pact, the League of Nations, the Neutral Commission at Washington, the A. B. C. of South America, all of which had got in each other's way in trying to settle the Chaco question. The conference had before it the youngest of all such schemes, the Argentine Anti-War Pact. The whole peace machinery was so clogged and confused that there seemed no way out, especially if the pride of the United States in the Kellogg Pact and that of Argentina in her anti-war pact were to be saved, for neither one had signed the other's pact or seemed likely to do so. Then came the dramatic presentation of a joint resolution by Argentina and Chile that all the nations of America be appealed to to sign all five peace treaties: the Gondra Treaty on Conciliation, approved at the Fifth Pan-American Conference, providing for conciliation commissions at Washington and Montevideo, respectively, to investigate and report on disputes, but with no right to suggest settlement; the Washington (1929) Conciliation Treaty, which improved the Gondra agreement by providing for recommendations for settling disputes; the Washington Treaty on Arbitration of the same date, which provides for compulsory arbitration of juridical questions; the Kellogg Pact, which commits all signers to renounce war but provides no machinery for settling differences; and the Argentine Pact, recently signed in Rio by six Latin American countries, which provides for conciliation and for signatories to unite in economic and political pressure to compel violators of the pact to keep the peace.

The chairman read the list of countries which had and had not signed these various agreements, thus making clear the confusion in the whole matter and the rivalry between various countries like Argentina and the United States in their attitudes toward peace machinery based on political and economic nationalism. Only Mexico was able to report that she had signed every one of these pacts, as she was able to say she had no serious questions pending with other nations. Then one by one the penitents came to the altar, confessing their sins. The first was Argentina. She had not signed the Kellogg Pact, the Gondra Pact, or the two Washington treaties; she would sign them all! Brazil followed; she had signed all but the Kellogg Pact; she would sign that! Then rose the gray-haired gentleman from Tennessee. What would he say? Was it possible that he would accept the olive branch offered by Argentina? Yes, and much more, the United States would sign the Argentine Pact as it had already signed the other pacts—which was not accurate, as the President has refused to promulgate the Washington Arbitration Treaty after its mutilation by the Senate. Continuing, Secretary Hull made his remarkable address, the most far-reaching speech of any American since Root's famous words in Rio de Janeiro in 1906 and Wilson's in Mobile in 1913. The effect of this declaration was tremendous, especially of the following section, which was quoted often within and without the conference:

May I for a moment direct attention to the significance of this broad policy as my country is steadily carrying it into effect under the Roosevelt Administration, the extent and nature of which should be familiar to each of the nations here represented? My government is doing its utmost, with due regard to commitments made in the past, to end with all possible speed engagements which have been set up by previous circumstances. There are some engagements which can be removed more speedily than others. In some instances disentanglement from obligations of another era can only be brought about through the exercise of some patience. The United States is determined that its new policy of the New Deal—of enlightened liberalism—shall have full effect and shall be recognized in its fullest import by its neighbors. The people of my country strongly feel that the so-called right of conquest must forever be banished from this hemisphere and, most of all, they shun and reject that so-called right for themselves. The New Deal indeed would be an empty boast if it did not mean that.

The adherents continued to announce themselves. Cuba, Haiti, and Santo Domingo threw spice into the gathering by reference to what they hoped the words of the Secretary of State would mean in relation to their respective countries. The conference might have adjourned then with a real accomplishment to its credit, since it had succeeded in getting Argentina and the United States, together with various other countries, to pledge themselves to observe all the peace provisions of the five pacts.

But this unity was to produce two other moving sessions, one when the armistice in the Chaco war was signed, the other when intervention was discussed. The whole conference has been deeply affected by the struggle between Paraguay and Bolivia. Tremendous pressure was being put on these two governments to settle their difficulties. Fortunately the Commission of the League of Nations, with which the whole conference was determined to work in closest cooperation, was in the Chaco itself working for a settlement. At 1 a.m., December 19, the sirens of the Montevideo newspapers announced the news that an eighteen-day armistice had been signed.*

There followed that afternoon the session of Commission II on the Codification of International Law, when intervention was considered. The United States had secured the postponement of the meeting for several days to get more time to study the proposal of a subcommittee which brought forward eleven articles concerning the rights and duties of states, the main one of which was the declaration that "no state has the right to intervene in the internal or external affairs of another state." This was the one question on which the American continent was absolutely divided, with twenty nations standing on one side and one on the other. Not a Latin American nation failed to register itself as completely opposed to intervention. Even Argentina and Chile, which it was rumored might come to the rescue of the United States and ask for a postponement of the vote, were unable to make anything but categorical statements favoring the resolution.

What would Mr. Hull say? For by his attitude here would be judged all the fine promises he had been making.

He was evidently confused by the debate, inadequately interpreted in whispers by a companion at his side. He read his prepared address and added slowly a few words of explanation, the substance of which was that the United States felt that more time would be needed to codify a law on intervention but that the United States voted for the resolution, with the interpretation given by the addresses of President Roosevelt and of himself on the Good Neighbor policy, and that he could absolutely assure every Latin American nation that they need fear no intervention in their countries during the Roosevelt Administration.

Pan-Americanism has been saved from the rocks on to which it was rapidly drifting. After the memorable session on intervention I talked with delegates from Cuba, Guatemala, Santo Domingo, Paraguay, Bolivia, and various other countries. All these confirmed my feeling concerning the positive accomplishments at Montevideo, which mark a real change of course in inter-American relations. The Cuban delegation was among the most enthusiastic. With Haiti and Nicaragua they have been the sharpest critics here of American policy. While they would have liked an unequivocal vote by the United States against intervention, they believe that a great step forward has been taken, that, in fact, the final blow has been given to a practice that has divided the American continent. The magnificent tribute of Dr. Puig of Mexico to President Roosevelt and Mr. Hull and his appeal to them to rise to a great generous new day was a ringing, honest tribute such as had never been heard before in a Pan-American conference. It was only one of the things that made this meeting unique.

A New Rebellion in China

By CRISPIAN CORCORAN

Tientsin, December 1

REGARDLESS of external aggression, natural disasters, and all the other woes which have beset her during the last two years, China cannot abandon her age-old pastime of civil war. Since the fateful day in September, 1931, when the world was startled by the Japanese occupation of Mukden, no fewer than four major conflicts have broken out in different parts of the country. This number does not include the perennial "anti-red" campaign which is constantly in progress to suppress what is essentially an agrarian revolt in the provinces of Kiangsi, Fukien, Hupeh, and Szechwan.

A fortnight or so ago were heard the first rumblings of a new revolt, this time in the maritime province of Fukien, which with Canton supplies 90 per cent of China's overseas emigrants. Several facts invest this new outbreak with great importance. In the first place, its military backbone is the Nineteenth Route Army, famous for its heroic defense of Shanghai. Secondly, the rebels immediately made common cause with the so-called "Communists" in Kiangsi. Thirdly, for the first time since the great anti-North expedition of 1926, a rebellion has taken place which has expressly repudiated the Kuomintang and its founder, Dr. Sun Yat-sen, instead of claiming, as others have claimed, to be the only "true" Kuomintang and to be waging war for the spirit of the founder's message. Finally, the new regime has fearlessly tackled the delicate problem of land reform in the landlord-ridden southern provinces. Instead of vague promises of future action, almost its first official act was to order the survey and reapportionment of the great estates on the principle of "the land to tillers of the land."

The new government was proclaimed on November 20 as a "Workers' and Peasants' Republic." On the same day it issued a proclamation, the main terms of which may be briefly stated as follows:

1. The power of government is taken away from the hopelessly compromised Kuomintang and handed back to a National Assembly of the people to be convened at the earliest possible date.

2. Full equality and freedom to all citizens and inhabitants of China irrespective of race, creed, or sex, with the exception of rebels and "oppressors of the workers and peasants" such as "militarists, mandarins, gentry, landlords, counter-revolutionaries, parasites, and riffraff," who will be "exterminated."

3. Emancipation of workers and peasants; repudiation of all unequal treaties; full enforcement of tariff autonomy.

* War in the Chaco was resumed on January 4, negotiations for peace having failed. Attempts to reach a settlement will continue, and Secretary Hull will discuss the question with other Latin American delegates on his way home.—EDITORS THE NATION.

4. Nationalization of agriculture. An immediate measure toward this aim to be the granting of land only to those who can themselves till it. Forests, mines, waste lands, and so forth to be immediately taken over and managed by the state.

5. Industrial reconstruction. State management of the most important industries.

6. Firm establishment of the right to work, to personal freedom, to freedom of speech, to assembly and publication, as well as the right to strike.

7. Repudiation of the Kuomintang Government. Establishment of a People's Revolutionary Government which it will be the duty of all citizens to defend.

The personnel of the new government shows clearly that here is an attempt to reconstitute the old "united front" of Communists and Kuomintang (under a different name) which obtained until the historic break-up of the Nationalist movement in 1927. Li Chai-sum, head of the new administration, was one of the chief commanders of the Cantonese expedition. Chen Ming-shu, another veteran of the campaign and an old Kuomintang man, is the head of the Executive Committee (that is, virtually Premier); Eugene Chen, who has been Foreign Minister in Nanking, Hankow, and Canton, assumes the same position at Foochow. Tsai Ting-kai, once lauded as the "hero of Chapei" and today the target of Nanking's propaganda machine, will play the same role in the "Cabinet" as Chiang Kai-shek played in the first years of the Kuomintang advance. It is feared in some quarters that he will play it to the bitter end. Like Chiang Kai-shek he is ambitious.

The gulf between actions and words is in China, more than anywhere else, a yawning chasm. Before going into raptures over the Foochow program it is well to remember that Chen Ming-shu and Tsai Ting-kai, nobly announcing the impending "extermination" of militarists, themselves fall under that category. The same applies to Li Chai-sum, an opportunist, who has hitherto leaned rather to the right than to the left. Eugene Chen is not exactly a chameleon as is charged by Nanking. His career has been much more consistent and can stand far closer examination than those of his would-be detractors. Nevertheless, he has been in the wilderness a long time, and it is possible that he is willing to yield a little in principle for the satisfaction of being again "Foreign Minister."

Very indicative is the fact that Mme Sun Yat-sen, who at one time organized the "Third Party" reputed to be one of the factors in the movement, has said in effect that the new uprising is another case of disgruntled militarists and politicians tempting the people with slogans in order to climb over their backs. This report was issued by Nanking's Central News Agency, which is overloading the cable lines with denunciations of the rebels. Nevertheless, since Mme Sun has not taken the trouble to repudiate the message, it may be taken as an indication of her true feelings. Mme Sun is one of the brightest spots in the Chinese political and intellectual world. If she has not allied herself with the movement, it is because very valid reasons have prevented her from doing so. The factor of fear for personal safety may be ruled out. Mme Sun long ago showed that fear is not part of her make-up.

The international aspect of the revolt is important. The Fukien coast is directly opposite Formosa and is recognized as a special sphere of Japanese influence. No political change can be made within the province without a full consideration of the Japanese factor. Although the aims of the present rebellion are outwardly in every way inimical to the Japanese, it must be remembered that Japan has long managed her affairs in China on the principle of divide et impera, and helped any and every faction sow discord when it suited her purpose.

The Foochow regime, although it has tacitly let it be understood that one of the reasons for its dissatisfaction is Nanking's policy of pandering to Tokio, has made no pronouncement on the vital question of relations with the Island Empire. Of course this may be a purely tactical silence guided by the fear that the Japanese and Chiang Kai-shek's troops will unite to crush the present revolt as they united last spring to crush the "anti-Japanese National Salvation Army" of Feng Yu-hsiang and his allied generals in North China. Nevertheless, the position is not such as to prepossess Chinese public opinion in favor of the new government. I myself prefer to think that the movement is not inspired by the Japanese and that it is far less friendly to them than, for instance, Chiang Kai-shek, who has been doing their donkey work for them in north and south for more than two years.

There is so far no indication that the Fukien regime has found allies among other disaffected elements in China. The semi-independent reactionary government of Chen Chi-tang in Canton is an autonomous feudal administration owing allegiance to Chiang Kai-shek. Of late the influence of the politicians of the right wing, headed by the embittered Hu Han-min, has waned in the southern city and the military cabal seems to have decided on armed neutrality. The attitude of other southwestern militarists seems essentially the same, though their future movements are more difficult to predict.

Feng Yu-hsiang, former Christian general and a recent rebel against Nanking, is also sitting on the fence. The southern leaders gave him little but fine phrases when he needed their support last spring. Now, with more than one province under his control despite his recent "defeat," he is giving them some of their own medicine.

There is no doubt that the Fukien movement of revolt will have a beneficial effect. Whether it succeeds or not is immaterial. In a sense it may be said to provide a final test for the Kuomintang. The bankruptcy of the party's policy was made evident by the Japanese crisis. If this situation is not met its influence will be at an end. Nevertheless, it is obvious that China's salvation will come neither from Nanking nor from Foochow. It can come only when the bankruptcy of the present rulers, both in the Kuomintang and out of it, has manifested itself in every field and a new popular movement is born out of the general disintegration. This may find its genesis in the "Soviet" districts of Kiangsi or elsewhere. There are signs of it everywhere. China awaits a movement led neither by generals nor by silk-gowned politicians. The solution of her problems can only come after a new revolutionary era.

[Recent dispatches indicate the imminent defeat of the Nineteenth Route Army by the Nanking forces. This probable shift does not, however, affect the validity of Mr. Corcoran's interpretation of the Fukien revolt and the present conflict of interests in China.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

The Washington Seesaw

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, January 13

"WHEN the Supreme Court displays some common sense, that's news!" Although this rule may not be attributed to a famous editor, it explains the extraordinary furor created by the decision in the Minnesota mortgage case—and the explanation is soundly grounded on experience and logic. The court has taught us to expect the worst, and the contrary occasions surprise. It so happens that in this particular instance I was not surprised. In the first place, I never believed the Constitution to be the stupid instrument expounded by Jim Beck and his kind. In the second place, it has been obvious, almost since last March, that the country is under what amounts to a dictatorship by common consent, and that interference would be brushed aside. That the dictator is a man who believes in democratic processes, is willing to take counsel, and is concerned with the plight of the common man is but another lucky break proving that God takes care of drunken men and the United States of America. As I asserted here a year ago, there are four old men on the court who would take particular delight in defying the popular will, knowing that the mob was at the door. The doubtful and deciding element consisted of Hughes and Roberts. Following the Senate debate over his confirmation, it was evident that the Chief Justice had dedicated the remainder of his life to proving that he was not a mere corporation lawyer. Roberts is conservative by nature, but he is young enough to see what is going on in the world, intelligent enough to understand it, and honest enough to discard his prejudices. In that lies the answer to the decision. The quintessence of the question was whether a nation of 125,000,000 people should immediately be plunged into economic and social chaos or the strict letter of a document composed by men who have been in their graves more than a century should be violated. The fact that the decision was close should provoke reflection on the future status of the court. It appears that some editors are striving to persuade themselves and the public that the decision carries no implications touching other recovery measures. I suggest they read the dissenting opinion.

WHILE the highest legal tribunal, by a majority of one, was demonstrating its right of survival, the highest industrial tribunal was adding to the evidence that it should either be drastically reorganized or completely abolished. Nothing in the progress of the recovery program has been more disappointing and demoralizing than the collapse of the National Labor Board. Set up as the supreme arbiter of disputes between labor and capital, it has degenerated into an object of employers' contempt and employees' despair. Buried under a growing mountain of complaints, it blusters and does virtually nothing. It was futile against Ford at Edgewater, and pathetic against National Steel at Weirton. It meets, only to adjourn for the ridiculous reason that the industrial members don't show up. Even Louis Kirstein, the most devoted of them, is missing. Its chairman, Senator Wagner, is away on Capitol Hill, leading the fight against ratification of the President's St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty. Its most diligent officer, Dr. William Leiserson, has resigned as secretary and gone over to the Petroleum Labor Board, apparently in search of action. As thousands of automobile workers are reported discharged for joining the union, General Johnson removes the limitation on working hours in that industry. The strange new friendship which has developed between Donald Richberg and the steel barons since he joined their code authority has aroused profound suspicion among labor men. Probably it is unwarranted. I have had a speaking acquaintance with the man for several years, and have always trusted him. But distrust exists, and it will be the seed of trouble, mostly courted by himself. Prices continue to rise much faster than wages, despite the now strenuous efforts of Mrs. Rumsey and Dexter Keezer, and more than six million men are still looking for work—even such work as lifting rocks from one pile and laying them on another for the CWA.

* * * * *

THIS ominous prospect is mainly responsible for Johnson's decision to move immediately for a national thirty-hour week in industry—and inspires one, incidentally, to wonder whether Senator Black's original thirty-hour bill should not have been incorporated in the Recovery Act. With approximately 85 per cent of industry operating under codes and more than six million unemployed, a further shortening of hours is plainly demanded; with prices soaring as they are it is equally plain that such reduction must be attended by no cut in wages. Johnson sees the problem clearly, and was characteristically frank in discussing it with me.

Most of the codes in force [he said] call for forty hours. We have gone far enough to know that a forty-hour week won't do the job. I never did think it would, but it was necessary to convince some people by actual experience. In fact, even under normal prosperity, a forty-hour week would not result in the absorption of all the unemployed. The change must be made, and the sooner the better. I realize the difficulties from the employer's standpoint. Some of the codes in force have literally raised hell in some industries. Companies without cash reserves, or whose reserves are frozen in closed banks, and which are unable to borrow, will howl their heads off at the idea of cutting hours without cutting wages. But there's only one way out of this depression, and that's to put people to work at decent living wages. When industry goes as far as it can in that direction, it will be the government's duty to help it. We're all in this boat together, and we will all float or sink together.

As suggested by Johnson, the matter of financing increased industrial employment is crucial. Aside from the obvious fact that Wall Street is seeking to engineer a bankers' strike against the Administration, and partially succeeding, there is the genuine fear which prompts well-meaning banks to remain liquid. This fear arises from the fact that the public doesn't trust the banks. All of which serves to emphasize once more that the greatest blunder which Roosevelt ever made was to turn the banks back to the bankers. It is my belief that he already realizes it, and it is my suspicion that before he gets through events will compel him to take them over again. The government is now prepared to take their gold; the next logical step would be the assumption of their commercial functions. Senator Cutting has endeavored to hasten the event by proposing the establishment of a central federal bank, with a government monopoly of credit. If recovery must wait until the public can learn to trust the bankers again, we might as well end everything now.

* * *

THE historic struggle to preserve the constitutional right of any American citizen to advertise and sell poisonous garbage in fancy packages to the sick and suffering as a cure for whatever ails them goes briskly on, and no recognized method of blackmail, coercion, or slander has been overlooked in the campaign to defeat the Tugwell bill and discredit its sponsors, although I believe the food, drug, and cosmetic manufacturers have not yet resorted to kidnapping. Among recent essays of that character was an attempt to get the job of Walter G. Campbell, Chief of the Food and Drug Administration, an official with a long record of devoted and honorable service to his country. The demand for his dismissal came from the ostensible head of a "patriotic" society, and was based on the claim that Campbell had violated the Act of 1919, prohibiting departmental officers from lobbying. Campbell had appeared before a Senate committee (at its request), explained the provisions of the measure, and urged its passage. Had he refused to appear he would have been punishable for contempt. Inquiry revealed that the individual demanding his head manufactures a "home remedy" for gallstones! The corporation which operates a national chain of gaudy fountains dispensing a well-known horse physic in the guise of a newly discovered "tonic" for human beings has heard the call, retained a prominent Democratic politician as counsel, and rallied to the fray. But hold! All is not so well. It was suggested here recently that some friend of the President might properly apprise him of the numbers in which his campaign supporters had rushed to Washington and were cashing in on their prestige. A friend lost no time. Within a week, by what I am assured was sheer coincidence, the Honorable J. Bruce Kremer, attorney for the Drug Institute, arch foe of the Tugwell bill, presented his resignation as Democratic national committeeman for Montana. Almost simultaneously, North Carolina's national committeeman, who had established headquarters here in behalf of the rayon and such other interests as might hire him, retired to private life. I make bold to say that similar resignations will shortly be forthcoming, either voluntarily or by request. Incidentally, Secretary Morgenthau the other day sent for Elmer Irey. It is Irey's duty to uncover income-tax frauds. Being probably the ablest investigator in the government service, he has uncovered plenty of them, but often in the past found himself powerless to do anything about it. Morgenthau told him that the lid was off, the bars were down, the sky was the limit, and no holds barred. Such things tend to prolong this old cynic's faith in the head of this Administration. For years I trembled to print in The Nation the name of any unemployed crook for fear I would wake next day and find him on the Federal Trade Commission.

In the Driftway

IN the midst of the alarms and financial excursions which have filled the newspapers since the President asked for a ten-billion-dollar budget, the mysterious monster that lives in Loch Ness in Scotland has persisted as an item of news. The creature has now been seen by several dozen persons, it has been photographed, shown in the newsreels, described variously by eyewitnesses, and learnedly discussed by experts, not the least of whom is the Right Reverend Sir David Oswald Hunter Blair, Bart., a monk of the Order of St. Benedict, who has been in turn Headmaster and Lord Abbot of the Monastery at Fort Augustus at one end of the famous loch. The Lord Abbot expresses his belief in the existence of the monster and confidently describes it as an amphibian belonging to a species that existed many million years ago. It is not clear whether or not his lordship saw the creature himself, but taking the word of a large number of persons who did, including a number of persons living by the shore of the lake, certain foresters, students and servants at the Fort Augustus Abbey School, and nine independent travelers, he declares that it has "both lungs and gills, four rudimentary lys or paddles, and is about thirty to thirty-five feet long, with a remarkable neck, long and flexible, broad shoulders, and a large, flat, broad tail which can churn the water of the loch" to a foam. As a final picturesque detail, the Lord Abbot adds that the distinguishing characteristic is its skull, which consists of one single bone.

* * *

THIS description is admirably detailed and enlightening. It would, indeed, be convincing if it were not that what other persons saw differed a little from the Lord Abbot's account. W. Urwick Goodbody, a member of the Ness District Fishing Board, reported, according to the New York Times, that he had seen "a creature with a long, thin neck, a small head, and eight humps." Arthur Grant, of Edinburgh, also reported a sight of the creature on January 5. Mr. Grant was pursuing his way along the shore of the lake on a motor cycle, the time being about 1:30 a. m. of a bright moonlight night. He reported what happened as follows:

It was about thirty or forty yards from the Glasgow-Inverness road that I observed in the moonlight on the other side of the road from the loch what appeared to be a large black object. I was almost on it when a small head on a long neck turned in my direction, and the object, taking fright, made two great bounds, crossed the road, and plunged into the loch. . . . It had a long neck with eel-like head and large oval-shaped eyes just on top of its small head. The body was very hefty and I distinctly saw two front flippers. There were two other flippers which seemed to be webbed behind, and there was a tail . . . five or six feet long. The curious thing about the tail was it did not, as far as I could see, come to a point but was rounded off.

* * *

IT is plain from these presumably sober accounts from presumably sane persons that Something Large and Strange is floating about in or walking about on the edge of Loch Ness in northern Scotland. The motion pictures taken so far of the monster show merely a disturbance in the water at some distance from the camera. The accounts by eyewitnesses, as the foregoing extracts show, are very far from being in agreement, and one might add that Mr. Grant had very sharp eyes to see all he saw at night, even in bright moonlight. Nor is this to impugn the veracity of Mr. Grant or any of the other honest accounts of the Scottish monster. The Drifter would even wager that further eyewitnesses will describe the creature, and the more accounts of it there are, the closer they will agree. It is perhaps possible, but certainly not likely, that a large animal, fish or mammal, belonging to an otherwise vanished species, actually inhabits an inland lake twenty-three miles long and eight miles from a bay of the North Sea. It is more easily understandable that if even one person with telling earnestness reported that such a monster had been seen, other persons would, before long, believe just as earnestly that they saw it also. The Drifter does not, of course, like to express an attitude of too great skepticism in the matter, particularly since he has never been in that part of Scotland. Being in a mellow mood, he is willing to declare that if The Nation will pay his traveling expenses to Loch Ness, and if while he stands on its shores in broad daylight, he sees, first, a churning of the water, then a creature, with or without humps, swim to the shore and climb the bank at his feet, and if it is even six instead of sixteen feet long and looks like something other than a beaver—if all these conditions are fulfilled duly and in the presence of witnesses, then and then only will he believe—and will give himself up to the nearest alienist forthwith. There are some things which it is not good for man to see, and Sea Serpents are this sort of thing. But to talk about them—that is another matter!

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

An Answer to Mr. Rodman

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

There are several plain errors of fact in Selden Rodman's article Youth Meets in Washington in The Nation of January 17.

1. The National Student Federation of America was not the group which originally proposed a joint conference of student organizations. The original suggestion came from the Student League for Industrial Democracy, whose representatives took it up with leaders of the Y. M. C. A. and the N. S. F. The proposal was made in the middle of October, not last summer.

2. There never was any clear agreement in the Executive Committee that planned the National Conference of Students in Politics on whether or not resolutions were to be passed. Whenever the subject was mentioned, the representatives of the Student L. I. D. plainly said that if two or three planks—on the R. O. T. C., retrenchment in education, and other things—could get nearly unanimous acceptance, they should be introduced. Such, I am sure, was the understanding of the majority of members of the Executive Committee.

3. Mr. Rodman dismisses the conferences of the Student L. I. D. and of the National Student League with a scant paragraph, most of which is taken up with our demonstration outside the White House. But his description of the White House meeting also is incorrect. It was a protest against the continued appropriation of federal funds for the R. O. T. C., and all the placards were relevant to that particular protest.

4. No program was presented to the Executive Committee before the conference decided whether it should "have a program at all." And if no program had been presented, how could "the leaders of about half the organizations taking part in the conference [have] opposed the program," as Mr. Rodman claims?

5. As for the post-conference attitude of the Student L. I. D. toward the N. S. L., Mr. Rodman might have consulted the L. I. D. He would have learned that we are undertaking several joint activities this spring.

All these points are important, because through these errors of fact Rodman tries to discredit the only student organizations that have shown any aggressiveness and intelligence in building up a student movement, accusing them of bad faith, stupid tactics, and stereotyped thinking.

The Washington conferences were successful because they had color, dash, and militancy and the clash of cleanly opposed points of view. The proof is in the fact that the issues that were raised in Washington are now being debated in undergraduate newspapers and forums throughout the country. And if credit is due to anybody it should go to the Student League for Industrial Democracy, which first had the vision of all these student conferences being staged in one city, which faithfully cooperated in the dreary organizational details, which backed the only sort of program which could have been adopted without splitting the conference, a program which, nevertheless, was one taking a stand on the vital student issues. Credit for Washington should go to the two courageous student organizations that dared to picket and parade at the risk of offending the unemancipated and the prominent campus politicians, and that made the week in Washington the colorful, exciting, and significant event in student annals that it has become.

New York, January 11

JOSEPH P. LASH,
Secretary National Executive Committee,
Student L. I. D.
Member Executive Committee, National Conference of Students in Politics

Is This Currency Inflation?

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

J. David Stern of the New York Evening Post, reproaching you for your regret at his "championship of currency inflation," writes you that he has "never championed currency inflation," and none of his papers ever has championed it.

Now Mr. Stern is highly educated, and he knows very well that we do nine-tenths of our business without the use of specie, by means of bank checks, drafts, and bills of exchange. This is sometimes called "deposit currency," sometimes "bank currency." Both terms are descriptive, for deposits are created mostly by loans, and this, the bulk of our currency, is a credit currency.

"We have fought for a program of credit expansion, not currency inflation," Mr. Stern avers. But credit expansion of the kind he describes results inevitably in bank-currency inflation. His Philadelphia Record, moreover, has denounced Wall Street time and again for the pre-depression inflation of credit which brought the boom and its disastrous consequences. He is now urging that the government practice, in a different field and under certain safeguards, the same sort of inflation; and it is useless to deny it.

Elsewhere I have spoken publicly in praise of Mr. Stern's courage, intelligence, and independence; it is thus the more disquieting to find him attempting, by hair-splitting and quibbling, to mislead the public.

Old Greenwich, Conn., December 29

SILAS BENT

Violent Dissent

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

James Farrell's review of Jack Conroy's "The Disinherited" in The Nation of December 20 struck me as being one of the most malicious bits of slander I have observed among the book reviewers. Practically all of Farrell's adjectives in the review are so false that perhaps he was reading some other book. To call Conroy careless is calumny; Conroy has a better ear than Ring Lardner; besides that, the parts that appeared in the American Mercury received the approval of the most careful man in the United States, H. L. Mencken. For Farrell to call this superb writing slapdash and mere reporting is an insult to an honest and experienced writer. To call it burlesque ought to call for a duel. To say that Conroy re-created almost nothing makes me dubious of Farrell's mentality, for in my opinion "The Disinherited" re-created the experience of work, a man on the job, physically and psychologically, particularly in those basic industries not generally used as subjects of literature, although they ought to be—steel mills, coal mines, auto factories, road building. And Conroy did this better than any other person ever did, including D. H. Lawrence on coal.

New York, December 23

ROBERT WHITCOMB

Lese Majeste?

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Today's issue of a local daily gives front-page prominence to the following A. P. dispatch:

Accused of maligning President Roosevelt, Tom Smallwood, employed on a Civil Works project, was fined $10 by Police Judge Jim Givens, of Muskogee, Oklahoma. The Judge raised the fine from $5 to $10 because, as he said, the defendant bit the hand that was feeding him. Smallwood was allowed to return to work when he promised to be more patriotic in the future.

Although at first sight this incident does not seem of importance, I feel that the issue involved cannot be overstressed. It is unnecessary for me to point out the obvious future of such an ominous beginning.

Los Angeles, Cal., December 18

L. OSHEROFF

UNION OF Soviet Socialist Republics

7% GOLD
BONDS

Interest Payable Quarterly
at
The Chase
National Bank of New York

3 Definite Advantages are afforded investors who purchase this Gold Bond

GOLD STABILITY

The bonds are issued in denominations of 100 gold roubles, at a price of par—100 gold roubles—and accrued interest. (A gold rouble contains 0.774234 grams of pure gold.) Principal and interest payments are based upon this fixed quantity of gold, payable in American currency at the prevailing rate of exchange. Obviously, this provision offers protection against loss resulting from possible further depreciation in the dollar.

SAFETY

Throughout the sixteen years of its existence the U. S. S. R. has untaiingly met all its financial obligations

MARKET

The State Bank of the U. S. S. R. will repurchase these bonds on demand of the holder at any time after one year from date of purchase, at par and accrued interest.

Circular N°40 fully describing these bonds will be sent upon request.

SOVIET AMERICAN SECURITIES CORP.

30 Broad Street

New York

THE OPEN ROAD IN RUSSIA EIGHTH SEASON

In pre-recognition days most American intellectuals who visited the U. S. S. R. went through the Open Road. They did so because this non-commercial organization with its independent representation in the Soviet Union enables the inquiring traveler to see most in the least time and at least cost.

More Americans of the professional classes look forward now to personal exploration of the Soviet world. The Open Road offers them the experience and connections of years of friendly cooperation with key individuals and institutions in the U. S. S. R.

Service to groups and those who travel on their own—Detailed advice on application to

THE OPEN ROAD, Inc.

56 West 45th Street

New York

Cooperating with Intourist

Contributors to This Issue

JAMES RORTY will publish this spring a book on advertising entitled "Advertising—Not to Praise."

CARL BECKER is professor of European history at Cornell University.

SAMUEL GUY INMAN, an authority on Latin American affairs, was an unofficial observer at the recent Pan-American Conference at Montevideo.

CRISPAN CORCORAN is the pseudonym of a newspaperman who has lived many years in China.

PAUL Y. ANDERSON is a Washington correspondent of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

WILLIAM TROY is a member of the English department of Washington Square College, New York University. LEWIS GALANTIÈRE is the author of "France Is Full of Frenchmen."

BERYL HAROLD LEVY is the author of "Reform Judaism in America."

Books, Architecture, Drama

Sculptured

By CHARLOTTE WILDER

Goaded through a vein of rock,
The pinch of marble at her heel,
(Stone pares her temples and her thighs)
She cannot vent her blood on steel,

She may not slake her throat with sighs;
Trapped in motion, she molests
Solids, forcing to a rift
Only the semblance of her eyes.

Sean O'Faolain

A Nest of Simple Folk. By Sean O'Faolain. The Viking Press. $2.50.

SEAN O'FAOLAIN is not a new writer, although this is the impression that one might get from a reading of the many enraptured reviews with which his first novel has been greeted. Although he is still quite young Mr. O'Faolain has been writing, and writing extremely well, for at least six or seven years; his The Bomb-Shop, published in the Dial in 1927, remains, in the opinion of this reviewer, his best single piece of writing to date; and several of the stories in "Midsummer Night Madness," particularly Fugue and The Small Lady, surpass in intensity both of style and characterization anything that may be found in his new work. Nor is Mr. O'Faolain so isolated a figure in recent Irish writing as the almost certain popularity of this new book is likely to make him appear. He belongs, as a matter of fact, to that generation of Irish writers whose common conscience was forged, some fifteen or more years ago, out of the smithy of Stephen Dedalus's soul. Mr. O'Faolain could not write of Ireland as he does, could not make political passion a subject rather than a motive, if Joyce had not written his "Portrait." This is of particular relevance in any study of Mr. O'Faolain's style—a style which reflects a sensibility that has absorbed, with exquisite tact and certainty, all that is best in modern Irish writing. From Joyce this writer has learned much about the use of homely words and images for unsuspected values of imaginative association:

Leo stirred the splinter-end with his toe, and it leaped into flame and then died out. A fir tree grew in his mind, tall and snow-clotted, waving in the flame. Then, sliver of a root, levered from its womb in the bog, it fell like all its ancient branches into a little dust.

He has learned also—what few of Joyce's imitators have ever learned—that in projecting a subjective state a feeling for the precise rhythms of the mind or consciousness is at least as important as the choice of words:

But he ~~man~~ forgot him and all of them, his eyes big with Limerick and the evening that was coloring the tall red houses and the muddy streets wide as a sea.

But neither his use of images nor his handling of rhythms allows us to class Mr. O'Faolain among the many crude imitators of the author of "Ulysses." What has been learned has been assimilated into a personality that is in most respects fundamentally different. It would be better to say that what Mr. O'Faolain, like so many of his contemporaries, owes to Joyce is an enrichment and reorientation of the sensibility which make it possible for him to treat familiar Irish materials with a new freshness and beauty. Of Joyce it may be said that he has changed the whole landscape of a country—no longer does Ireland even look the same as the Ireland of Tom Moore, Lever, and Boucicault. Of this new landscape Mr. O'Faolain is an accomplished painter—on the whole, the most accomplished of the several who have recently appeared. A proper comparison, therefore, would be between Mr. O'Faolain's novel and the earlier novels and stories of Liam O'Flaherty, who gives a more violent reading of the Irish temperament, since he is writing of Aran and the west rather than the "soft" south of Kerry and Cork. Or between Mr. O'Faolain and Peadar O'Donnell, whose tenderly etched studies of the poorest class of Irish peasantry have won him the disfavor of the church and the admiration of the extreme left in Irish politics. And it is impossible, in reading Mr. O'Faolain's evocation of Cork on a sunny morning, to forget the fine descriptions of that city in Frank O'Connor's "Saint and Mary Kate." This comparison alone, if properly undertaken, would reveal how much all these younger Irish writers share in common. If Mr. O'Faolain's novel seems like a miracle among recent works of fiction, then, it is a miracle that does not come as too great a surprise to those who have been following the current development of Irish letters.

"A Nest of Simple Folk" covers a longer span of time than any other Irish novelist, except Joyce in "Work in Progress," has so far essayed: the narrative begins in 1854, with the boy Leo O'Donnell standing before his aunts' house in Kerry, and ends with the same character fighting in Dublin in the rebellion of 1916. Between these two events is crowded enough material to make the substance of at least a half-dozen novels of the average sort. In form it represents a fusion of the biographical with the chronicle or "panel" type of novel: Leo Foxe-Donnell, the son of Judith Foxe and "Long John" O'Donnell, sums up in his psychology and in the contradictions of his career the old conflict between the Anglo-Irish gentry—Protestant in religion, English in manners and loyalties—and the native Catholic peasantry. Any discussion of the work as a whole, its form or its theme, gets down, therefore, to the question of how skilfully Mr. O'Faolain has rendered the fundamental ambiguities of his hero's character. Without going into this question in detail, one must point out that the transition from the sensitive romantic boy of Book I to the rollicking and incredibly callous landlord of Book II is much too abruptly indicated. The sympathetic treatment of the first part, written in a thoroughly poetic subjective style, prepares us for a very different sort of development. The trouble is that Mr. O'Faolain has fallen into that quite common error nowadays which consists in an author's confusing his own sensibility with that of his character; the boy of Book I could not grow up to be the man of Book II, for the boy of Book I is too much like Mr. O'Faolain himself, or like his own image of himself in childhood. In the final section Leo takes on a new and much more credible identity as an old man, surrounded by his wife, Julie Keene, whom he had seduced in the old days, his nephew, Johnny Hussey, who had got him sentenced to jail for ten years, and his son, Johnno, in whom he finds a fellow-conspirator against the forces which have wrecked his life. It is impossible to enumerate all the brilliant character creations which Mr. O'Faolain has fitted into his pattern, all the way from Judith Foxe, who betrays all the instincts of her class in a single dramatic scene, to young Denis Hussey, whose disgust with his father's treachery brings the book to its thematic conclusion. The pattern has been so richly filled in that there is little that bears even remotely on the theme which has been left out. If there is rather less political material than one might expect, it is because Mr. O'Faolain wishes to allow politics to enter no more than it actually does into the everyday lives of these simple folk. But by the same argument one is forced to object that he has allowed religion much too small a place in his scheme. It is true that the hero denounces the priests in several passages; but there is an eloquent suspension of any sort of attitude on the part of the author, who probably wishes to profit by the examples of other Irish writers in recent years. Despite this important blank-space, the novel is a truly comprehensive picture of the social, economic, and political forces in Irish life during the last century which were to lead to the fateful bonfire of 1916. But what is truly admirable in it, what gives it its special significance in this country at the present moment, is the manner in which these forces are represented, not explicitly like so many abstractions, but as actively operative in recognizable human experience. This is to say, finally, that Mr. O'Faolain is something rarer and more necessary to us at the moment than the critic, the social historian, the orator. He is, first and last, the artist.

WILLIAM TROY

Book of a Liberal

The Paris Front. An Unpublished Diary: 1914-1918. By Michel Corday. E. P. Dutton and Company. $5.

THIS is a melancholy book. Were it a work of art, it would affect us as does, say, the Blue Danube waltz, for book and author are the product of a civilization now dead, the manifestation of a view of the world beclouded and perhaps—as a party view—never again to be seen. Corday is a sort of 1880 liberal, a sober, decent humanitarian to whom the notion of unilateral war guilt was from the beginning preposterous; for whom war itself, and not the German's conduct of the war, was the atrocity; who records almost with satisfaction instances of German respect and French disrespect for property in the invaded French territory, examples of French Socialist pusillanimity and German Socialist courage in their respective parliaments. He was close to those in high places, and his shrewd, disheartening diaries display terrifyingly the degree to which personal foibles and jealousies and animosities defeat the national purpose, defeat even the narrower purposes of those in power. As an homme de gauche he is suspicious of Poincaré, he detests Clemenceau, he abhors the military caste (to his mind the product of Jesuit teaching, with the exception of Sarrail, the "republican general"). A bureaucrat, he remains behind the lines, in Paris most of the time, where he takes note of the myths and superstitions, the heedless gaiety and disgusting blood-lust of the civilian population. He repeats—perhaps he said it first—the often-cited half-truth that the nation is quicker to sacrifice its sons than its savings. He records that at any moment until the very end proponents of peace were looked upon as traitors. In short, his are the book and the offended spirit of any liberal in any country during the progress of a war; and for those with perspective sufficient to allow them to see the clear import of these monotonously fragmentary notes, the cumulative effect is severe. But what, in the end, does it prove except that liberalism is a passive will to live and let live? That in a world of base passions liberalism is inconceivable as a national expression and powerless as a party creed? That liberalism is a word which may be used only to define the temperament and bias of an individual, and cannot stand for the sum and substance of a doctrine or of a plan of action? And even so, M. Corday remains a party man and not a man tout court. He displays the shortcomings of the French liberal as well as his more attractive humanitarianism. For example, he cannot hear of a Catholic priest carrying water to the thirsty or binding up the limbs of the wounded without assuring himself that the priest is in the field of danger only for the outrageous purpose of forcing the sacrament upon some helpless and unwilling agnostic. For this humanitarian a priest of that particular church cannot act out of plain pity and love. To answer the question why this should be would demand a survey of the history of the Third Republic. Meanwhile, it should be observed that much of this book will be unintelligible to readers unfamiliar with French politics and personalities in the years immediately preceding the outbreak of the war.

There are many reportings of the wit of Tristan Bernard and the irony of Anatole France—the first very stale and the second very elaborate at this remove in time from their uttering. Somewhat this is due to the anonymous translation, which is a piece of British hack work. The book is heartily puffed by H. G. Wells.

LEWIS GALANTIÈRE

White and Black

Roll, Jordan, Roll. Text by Julia Peterkin. Photographic Studies by Doris Ulmann. Robert O. Ballou. $3.50.

HAVING spent most of her life in South Carolina, Mrs. Peterkin is qualified to write about the Negroes there. There are a few plantations left in the Gullah districts—she lives on one of them—where substantially the same spiritual relationship between white men and Negroes exists as existed before the War of the Rebellion. Although the Negro is no longer a slave and may leave his master when he will, actually he and two or three generations of his ancestors have lived on this same land, have been "looked after" in more or less the same way by white master and mistress, and have kept the same mixture of black and white genteel tradition. Now that the white overseer with his whip and his heavy boot is eliminated, the relationship is often purely benevolent as well as patriarchal. The black servant, by his own lights, is uniformly loyal to his master; the white master would consider it a violation of the code of a gentleman to "let down" his black servant. Both, as Mrs. Peterkin points out, are gentlemen in their way and have the same contempt for white trash and field-working Yankees. Both venerate high breeding, one of the first canons of which is that no gentleman performs manual labor and no gentleman's gentleman permits him to do so.

It is only fair to say that there are other canons of good breeding, and these the black servants exemplify in their persons and in their behavior as much if not more than do the whites. Gentleness, kindness, patience, soft voices, rich laughter, slow gesture—how often they are seen and heard among these Negroes Mrs. Peterkin makes clear. They have a confidence in themselves and in the continuity of their lives which no other racial group in America possesses to the same degree. These children of the forest, snatched untimely from their ancient way of life and subjected to a system of manners and discipline utterly strange to them, have not only, with a kind of somber triumph, adapted the white man's life perfectly to their own, but have actually molded it so that the tradition which is so significant and inescapable a part of the South is as much black as white.

The result Mrs. Peterkin describes with sympathy, humor, and impressive erudition. She knows how the Negroes speak and look and act, what they believe, how their songs grew, what it must mean to be a Negro child, and the importance of their religious beliefs. Exposed to Christianity, they found in it the equality and the freedom denied them in life, and they embraced these new myths with deep and passionate ardor. Mrs. Peterkin's last chapter is a moving account of how Christmas is celebrated, of the preparations which begin as soon as Thanksgiving is over, the scrubbing and mending and cleaning to make the house neat, the food that is prepared, the holly trees that are placed in the yard, the sweet cakes and candies, the songs practiced on meeting nights. Finally on Christmas Eve the celebration begins with the children's performance at the "school breaking." Songs are followed by sugar cane to suck. Then to children and grown-ups alike the preacher tells the Christmas story. As the evening wears on, Watch Night services are held, and singing, prayers, and speeches last until the Christmas sun rises in the East.

Then everybody comes out of doors to watch its glad mounting, for even the sun shouts on Christmas morning. The whole world rejoices when Christians and sinners clasp hands and march round and round giving everybody a glad Christmas handshake. Voices grown husky with singing all night become clear and strong as they lift the last song up to heaven: "Jesus is born in Bethlehem! Peace on earth, good-will toward men!"

It is idle to ask, as many intransigent non-believers will ask, what is the utilitarian value of such a simple Christian faith? Does it keep the Negro from suffering cold or hunger or from being lynched? Certainly not. Neither does it advance the revolution one hour. But that it has a value I do not doubt. A look at the faces in Mrs. Ulmann's photographs shows it clearly—when the face can be seen at all. For many of the pictures are so soft and vague as to be mere black blobs. It is a pity that the printing could not have been better or the photography sharper. But text and pictures together make a valuable record of an important contribution to American culture.

DOROTHY VAN DOREN

Honesty and Fiction

Passions Spin the Plot. By Vardis Fisher. Doubleday, Doran and Company and the Caxton Printers. $2.50.

THIS second novel in Mr. Fisher's tetralogy, which began with "In Tragic Life," continues the story of Vridar Hunter through his college years. Both books are rather like case histories, both seem to be rather thinly disguised autobiography, and as autobiography they are very interesting and quite powerful. Mr. Fisher tells us that his purpose above all others is to write an "honest" book, and this he has done. His ability to describe a strange and primitive country like the Antelope Hill territory, and to interpret the effect of such a background on his characters, is unusual. But honesty in fiction and honesty in biography may be two different things. Honesty in fiction implies selection in order to achieve structure. To describe every experience in a young man's life and its effect upon his character, to document with letters and with diaries the inner struggle of youth, is not necessarily to write a novel. "Passions Spin the Plot" loses dramatic power because of its detailed, episodic form. Written as fiction but giving the impression of autobiography, it falls between the two forms.

Mr. Fisher is acutely aware of the complexities in his chief character. He traces the development of Vridar with great care. We see this very egocentric, extremely sensitive boy suffering as only such a boy would suffer when thrown into a new and somewhat alien environment. The first of his clan to go away to college, Vridar tries to learn what college and what college youths are about. Both his professors and his classmates disillusion him. But nevertheless he remains the stubborn individualist, intent almost exclusively upon his own inner feelings. He is in love with the little playmate of his childhood days, and as the book closes he marries her. One can see that the marriage will bring further tragedy to him, and to her a life she cannot understand.

If the other books in this series follow the same plan, the tetralogy will form a most interesting psychological document. Mr. Fisher's style is without affectation and is a good medium for his analysis of a single life. The other characters in these books are of minor importance. The whole is Vridar's story. But Mr. Fisher can draw character, can give with complete realism the picture of a curious and rather cruel clan society. There is passion behind his writing—and bitterness. Mr. Fisher is able, moreover, to make clear the various forces playing upon his central character and to persuade his readers of their part in forming that character.

EDA LOU WALTON

Franklin and His Grandson

The Two Franklins: Fathers of American Democracy. By Bernard Fay. Little, Brown and Company. $3.50.

Imaginary Conversations with Franklin. By William Cabell Bruce. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.

PROFESSOR FAY has made a lively story out of the relations between Benjamin Franklin and his grandson, Benjamin Franklin Bache, and out of Bache's part in the "second American Revolution," as he calls it, which gave form to Jeffersonian democracy, although the claim of political fatherhood which he puts forward is at least open to debate. "Benny," as Bache is called throughout, was born in Philadelphia in 1769. In 1777, when Franklin went to France to negotiate a treaty of alliance on behalf of the new United States, he took Benny with him, but the lad fell in too readily with French ways, and Franklin, who intended him, as he said, "for a Presbyterian as well as a Republican," sent him to school at Geneva. Back in Philadelphia in 1785, Bache went to the University of Pennsylvania and fell desperately in love, while Franklin, after serving as a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1787, presented Bache with a type foundry and printing establishment, and launched with him an ambitious but unsuccessful venture in publishing children's books, a Latin grammar, and some classical texts.

Bache stuck to printing for the rest of his short life (he died in the yellow-fever epidemic of 1798), but his contribution to American history was that of a partisan journalist. The field was not easily entered. Jefferson's star was rising, but the Federalists were in power with Fenno's Gazette as their organ, and Jefferson, after suggesting that Bache publish "a weekly edition without any padding or advertisements, so that it might be a paper of general distribution through the States and address itself to philosophical minds everywhere," gave the poet Freneau a job in the Department of State and helped him start the National Gazette. Late in 1790, however, Bache began issuing the General Advertiser, according to Professor Fay "an intelligent, philosophical, and erudite paper well fitted for the intellectuals of Pennsylvania," but one which nevertheless mixed news, moral advice, and advertisements "in picturesque and disconcerting disorder."

With the arrival of the French minister Genet, of whose personality and spectacular doings Professor Fay gives an inimitable account, the General Advertiser became his organ. In 1794, with Genet discredited and Freneau no longer to be reckoned with, the paper was rechristened the Aurora, and Bache the political journalist arrived. He achieved a "scoop" by obtaining and publishing a copy of the Jay treaty, attacked Washington without restraint, and made his paper a power in the bitter fight out of which John Adams emerged as President. In 1798 he raised a storm by publishing, probably with Jefferson's connivance, a long communication from Talleyrand, "not any too good or any too clear," which showed that France did not want war. His violent attacks had something to do with provoking the Sedition Act of 1798, but when summoned before a court to answer to the charge of libeling the President he defended himself, was released on bail, and went on with his paper. The last issue of the Aurora before his death carried a charge of falsehood against Adams.

Professor Fay has had access to the Bache papers and has made industrious use of the newspapers of the time. His description of Franklin's last years in Philadelphia is delightful, and the whole volume is sprinkled with attractive sketches and entertaining anecdotes. One does not often find the results of scholarship presented in such an enjoyable form.

The nine scenes of Mr. Bruce's "Imaginary Conversations," each introduced by a prolocutor who speaks in verse, deal with episodes in Franklin's life in France, England, and Philadelphia and with the signing of the Constitution in 1787. The talk, with some exceptions, is too formal to be lifelike, but it is not without interest as an expression of Franklin's ideas.

WILLIAM MACDONALD

Justice Brandeis

Brandeis: Lawyer and Judge in the Modern State. By Alpheus Thomas Mason. Princeton University Press. $2.

WITH the constitutionality of the recovery program recurrently to be tested, and Mr. Justice Brandeis, though beyond the age of retirement, still staunchest of the liberals on the Supreme Court, this presentation of his views is especially welcome and timely. The texts of recent Brandeis decisions are among our most illuminating commentaries on current difficulties, filled, in the tradition of the "Brandeis brief," with economic materials persuasive in determining the course of law. None seems to have been more influential in emancipating the law from narrow professionalism, its bondage to stare decisis. "The logic of words should yield to the logic of realities."

Brandeis is a liberal in a sense in which Holmes is not; Brandeis is more The Nation liberal. Where Holmes would favor a State legislative enactment involving social experiment only because of his conviction that such matters are properly within the province of the legislature, Brandeis is positively concerned for the extension of social goods. Liberty through law is a central precept in his philosophy, and he stresses one as much as the other. This accounts for his zeal in furthering the rights of labor (as in opposing yellow-dog contracts) and those of the average business man (as in favoring a heavier license fee for chain stores), at the same time that he angers labor leaders by refusing to condone shady union methods. His insistence on human rights against property rights distinguished his activities as a lawyer, and his judicial philosophy of democratic individualism proceeds from a solicitude for that self-fulfilment of every individual which he holds to as the American ideal. "Always and everywhere, the intellectual, moral, and spiritual development of those concerned will remain an essential and the main factor in real betterment." It is this sensitivity which seems salient to the preeminence of a lawyer whose special competence is economics, especially statistical and accounting. Where others have also focused on limiting private-property rights, he has uniquely sought to enhance liberty by extending privacy to the realm of personal relations. Government intervention may and should insure greater equality of opportunity in competition, but it must not encroach upon the "right to be let alone—the most comprehensive of rights and the right most valued by civilized man." His article on The Right to Privacy, written in collaboration forty years ago, actually created a new dimension in the law of torts. So strenuous is his central idealism that he will at times, however, seek to advance against a man's will his own presumed best interests. This may serve to explain his stand in favor of severe prohibition-enforcement measures, so puzzling to the author, as well as his unexpected assumption of Zionist leadership before mounting the bench, of which no mention is made here.

Whether the Wilsonian New Freedom, which he has essentially advocated (the same which Horace Kallen, with due indebtedness, has urgently restated in "Individualism: An American Way of Life") has not run its day instead of being the underlying philosophy of the Roosevelt program, as Mr. Mason contends in his only original thesis, may be seriously considered in the light of most recent developments. For a crucial instance it might be remembered that Brandeis, the "people's attorney," early conceived an inveterate distrust of large corporations as incapable of efficient administration and dehumanizing in their absentee control. (Vide as exhibits of prophecy Insull, Wiggin, the Van Sweringens, et al.) Hence he has been peculiarly anxious for the protection of the small entrepreneur, who, it seems clear, is suffering the gravest difficulties in meeting the demands of the Blue Eagle.

The book, by an assistant professor of politics at Princeton, has an even academic adequacy adapted to the interests of the general reader.

BERYL HAROLD LEVY

Shorter Notices

Upsurge. By Robert Gessner. Farrar and Rinehart. $1.

Whatever else this book may be, it is not a poem or a series of poems. It is a statement, but it is not a program. Mr. Gessner begins and ends his "poem" with the American "depression bastards." Meantime he reviews the desperate condition of youth in England, Germany, France. He attacks the society which makes of itself and for its youth a hell. All this is done in a kind of free verse or oratorical prose. The "oratory" is rather of the soapbox variety. But Mr. Gessner has not the language of a street speaker. He does not know the slang. He obviously means to identify himself with the people whose outcry he voices, but he does not know their language. The intention of "Upsurge" is obvious. Certainly the author wishes to move to action. The only question is whether such very obvious propaganda in verse moves to anything at all except astonishment. Today good soapbox speaking is needed, and is entirely purposeful. But "Upsurge" is a hybrid both in form and in subject matter.

The Aesthetics of William Hazlitt. By Elisabeth Schneider. University of Pennsylvania Press. $2.

The present century has seen a broadening and deepening of interest in the character and writings of William Hazlitt, a new interest evinced not only by the market for an edition of his works (still in course of publication) that is "complete" and by a judicious and successful biography but also by numerous critical studies and at least three volumes of selected essays. In general, however, the old view, represented by Saintsbury, has held the field, that Hazlitt's general pronouncements upon literature and the fine arts are less valuable and less stimulating than his particular criticisms of individual authors and their works. There was room for a critical study which should set these two departments of his writings in their right relation one to another and give a fairer evaluation of his philosophic and aesthetic theories. This need has now been very competently filled by Elisabeth Schneider in her monograph, which is described in its subtitle as "A Study of the Philosophic Basis of His Criticism." Miss Schneider's little book is itself so thoroughly condensed that it is not possible to offer a review of it in the form of a more succinct summary. It must suffice therefore to say that she examines Hazlitt's theoretical generalizations in the light of eighteenth-century critical theory, of the likenesses and contrasts between his views and those of Coleridge, of his partial understanding—an understanding that came to him not only at second band but somewhat perverted by interpreters of Platonic leanings—of the critical philosophy of Kant, and of his other miscellaneous reading in English and foreign literature. She demonstrates forcefully that his indebtedness to Coleridge has been generally much overestimated. She shows also that the charge of "ignorance" which has traditionally been brought against him (notably by Saintsbury) is grossly exaggerated, though for this Hazlitt was himself somewhat to blame because of the candor of some of his own admissions of lack of knowledge. His philosophic pluralism is related to the catholicity of his tastes. The degree to which, and the points at which, he anticipates subsequent developments of aesthetic theory are clearly indicated. A carefully compiled list, based on all available evidence, of Hazlitt's reading in the fields of philosophy, aesthetics, and criticism is of much value. An index would have enhanced the usefulness of a monograph which is excellent of its austere kind.

The New Party Politics. By A. N. Holcombe. W. W. Norton and Company. $1.75.

Professor Holcombe, one of the foremost students of American politics, presents here a concise analysis of the present trend of party politics in the United States. With the relative decline of agriculture and rise of industry, he reports, agrarianism is passing and urban politics is taking its place. Henceforth parties or factions will be based not on sectional interests but on class divisions. Therefore it is essential that we understand something of the way in which classes are likely to divide for the purpose of expressing themselves at the polls. Discussing the prospects of a proletarian dictatorship, Professor Holcombe frankly admits that "the American proletariat, as estimated by Bukharin's method, comprises a clear majority of the American people." Yet he feels that, given competent leadership, the broad middle class best represents the true interests of the country. A middle-class government might not be the most perfect conceivable, but in Professor Holcombe's judgment, as in Aristotle's, it would be "the safest." He examines the function of the middle class and offers suggestions for a program whereby it might take over and hold political power. He does not make the mistake of confusing the economic interests of the middle class with the program of the fascists, for he sees clearly that fascism is an upper-class device for perpetuating its own control of the state. If this book has no other value, it is certainly to be commended for attempting to show the petty bourgeoisie that if they are to be saved at all, it will only be by their own efforts and not by following blindly a demagogic Hitler or a blustering Mussolini.

The Poetry of Gerard Manley Hopkins. By E. E. Phare. The Macmillan Company. $2.75.

Anyone interested in Hopkins's poetry will wish to read this brilliant analysis of his poetic imagery. Miss Phare draws comparisons between Hopkins's poetry and Crashaw's, shows how Hopkins may be said to have learned from Wordsworth, relates, in other words, the most original poet of the nineteenth century to other poets whom he may have read. She is forced, however, chiefly to interpret his work as that of a poet's in isolation. So little is really known of Hopkins's life that any critic must turn to the texts of his poems in order to understand him. No one else has made so complete or so sensitive an analysis of these texts as has Miss Phare. Her account of Hopkins's imagery, language, syntax is most convincing. She proves Hopkins to be that rare type of poet who uses every awareness he has in his art. She shows that he never denied his complete sensuousness, that he disciplined this until it became part of his religious vision. Miss Phare employs admirably the method of interpreting the poetic process through its actual objective product. Imagery will, if carefully and correctly analyzed, indicate both a poet's methods and his philosophy.

George Eliot. By Ann Fremantle. Great Lives Series. The Macmillan Company. 75 cents.

In the effort to avoid eulogy Miss Fremantle tends to disparage unduly the breadth and individuality of George Eliot's mind and the power and originality of her writing. It was her intelligence and tenacity and honesty that enabled her to overcome the personal handicap of her uncomeliness and the obstacles that Victorian society put in the path of an ambitious woman. Her insistence upon being called Mrs. Lewes, though she made no effort to hide the nature of her union with George Lewes (who had a legal wife living at the time), may seem pretentious to us today, but it is just such brave and self-sacrificing challenges that have made modern social freedom possible. But for her grudging attitude Miss Fremantle's brief biography is readable and illuminating.

Architecture

1933: Looking Forward at Chicago

ARCHITECTURALLY, 1933 was the year of the Chicago Fair; not much else. And a turning-point was marked. just because the turn had already been made. Not that "modern" was born at Chicago, any more than "classic" was born there at the Columbian Exposition in 1893, but that "modern" has now gained its popular acceptance. An entire previous generation was concerned with "reproductions." Now "modern" goes alongside, and tomorrow it will forge ahead. Twenty-two million tickets were issued to its first large demonstration at Chicago; moreover this was "not a motion picture," and the people liked it.

Some such consolation is needed by the exacting observer for his own hope deferred. The fair was a poor eye-rack. It was jazz. This aspect of it has already been commented upon. The forms were chaos, and the color was camouflage. True to jazz, the fair was best at night. Darkness dissolved the jarring zigzag silhouettes, while floodlights and neon tubes aerialized the colors. The forecast was fulfilled that was made in The Nation of January 14, 1931, under the title The Bright Lights. The fair was a sweet and crooning architectural blues.

Now jazz is a substitute. If it knew how, it would be something better than jazz. So our interest lies less in the achievement than in the aim. However limited their imagination, these architects meant to accept their times. They were consciously looking forward, as against the men of 1893, whose organization was better but who looked back. So it came about that the Century of Progress opened its doors, by however small a crack, to the forty years that have elapsed since the show of their predecessors closed down. These forty years were eventful, particularly in science, to which the fair was appropriately dedicated. We may see their effect, giving meaning even to the absurdities of the fair. Thus the color, for example, would never have been so bright had there not been a new attitude toward the buildings. They could be bright because they were built for only a day. This was correct, however bad the execution. If I build a house for "posterity," then it shall be stone gray, with everything done to hurry up the moss, or it shall be washed down a neutral white. But my clothes, designed for only a year, may have more color; and a masquerade costume for a single night—. The fair accepted the fact that it was ephemeral. This was a signal event. You can find no textbook of the nineteenth century that considers architecture, even in plaster, as anything else than just short of eternal. But we are now to build lighter, cheaper, sufficient for the day. Our houses are not to stand in the way of our children, or even of ourselves later when the community needs the land or when we want—and could have—something better for that time. There must be no temptation later on to convert plaster into stone, as was done with the Fine Arts Building of 1893, and to foist it as a “beautiful thing” on a museum director for his use at just the moment when it is most hopelessly out of date, fit not for a museum but only for a museum piece. The butterfly is every bit as beautiful as the rock, and is a better butterfly.

Being frankly temporary, the fair structures were necessarily light. To eclectic architects like those in charge of the fair, the idea of lightness, to be sure, comes hard. These people were raised on “monuments.” At the fair, for example, there was one big curiosity, the Chrysler Building. At first glance it was a Greek-cross arrangement of very handsome rectangular solid slabs—the architecture, as you understand, of “monumental mass.” This mass was most carefully modeled, sliced thin, and painted classical white. And then, when you approached nearer, you saw that it was not the building at all. The real building was peeping out from between the pylon’s knees. And this real building, neat and clean, had a circumference that was all plate glass!

Being ephemeral and lightly built, the fair could be planned as a part of a continuous process, not as a “finished” thing. I mean that the planning itself made provision for a next succeeding phase. The materials were such that they could be salvaged when the community needed the land again for other purposes and the buildings were torn down. The idea may not sound like much, but think what it might have meant to us today! Chicago and New York, planned for eternity, are both obsolete. What would one not give to be able to move whole sections of them bodily away! Frozen music, frozen assets, frozen life. Architecture has been the favorite art of those who made men slaves. Mobility and impermanence are its emancipation.

Few noticed that a related fluidity was working its way into the very layout of the fair. Superficially the long roads and ramps about which the fair was grouped had about as orderly an arrangement as the firehose at a fire. Yet at least they were not square or otherwise geometrical courts. The Columbian Exposition was. It had a “Court of Honor.” Now the peculiarity of any such court is that it is self-contained, and your movements are determined by the space. You change your position from point to point, and you admire the vistas that turn on axis after axis. Entrances and exits are a mere accessory or even a nuisance, mere gaps in an otherwise perfect enclosure or mere holes in a wall. But today it is the movement, the traffic, the transportation, that is determining. The arrangement of the space itself is determined by your movements. And this was rudimentarily present in the long roads and crossed ramps of the fair, which were literally streamlined to the crowds. They conformed to the flow. It was a difference analogous to the difference between Aristotelean physics and Newtonian. In the one, objects are at rest unless interfered with. In the other, being at rest is only a particular state in a general condition of motion. It is a widening and slowing of the river, a pause in the symphony, an open terrace along the road. The modern man is less a Ulysses who returns from his journeys to a bedpost rooted in the ground than an Arab pitching his tent, at home wherever he stops along the way. At the fair, to be sure, the execution was confused and halting. No ruling categories can be clearly grasped by an eclectic.

Still, the effect of flow in the layout was reinforced by its presence in some of the buildings. Only the General Exhibitions Building was at all articulate, guiding you over a sort of crankshaft path, which included vertical slopes as well as horizontal turns. But the intention was there; the idea was announced. It needs now only a first-class imagination.

And here we might leave the fair. As an accomplishment, not much. A pain in color over a medley of chizzle-chuzzle forms. A masquerade of jazzed palaces and pylons. And yet, as against the fair of 1893, a better promise for the succeeding decades. As against axes, courts, and vistas, an evolving incipient roadtown. Wasteful mass yields to economical lightness; sluggish permanence to mobility and improvement. These are not all the architectural virtues, and indeed they entail the sacrifice of other contrary ones; but they furnish a unique opportunity of our own.

In one respect the architects badly erred. Their own movements lacked economy. They need not have had for their central feature a tower by a Frenchman in the manner of a Dutchman after American ideas exported circa 1903. Frank Lloyd Wright is doing better work today, and different. Those ideas of mobility, lightness, gaiety, growth, for which our fair architects were only reaching and striving, have by him long been thought upon and worked with, and achieved. The politics of the architects kept him out. I suppose, though, that Paul Whiteman might actually think himself the superior of Toscanini, and not every Michelangelo can appeal to a pope.

DOUGLAS HASKELL

Drama

“The Sickness of Today”

EVERY critic of Eugene O'Neill has of necessity pointed out that his plays are full of violent deeds and blasphemous opinions. For some reason, however, it has been less often remarked that they are also heavy with a sense of sin and that it is, after all, less the violence itself than this attitude toward it which is responsible for the peculiar flavor of his work. No one has been more thoroughly uncomfortable in our famous Waste Land or has taken less pleasure in boasting a membership in the legion of the damned. Quite plainly he is, by temperament at least, a man of faith, and the driving force behind his plays has always been a will to believe. Sometimes it has broken out into a half-articulate affirmation; sometimes it has been almost completely engulfed in doubt. But behind every fable has been implicit a search for what the author, speaking in his own person, has called some substitute “for the surviving primitive religious instinct,” some cure “for the sickness of today.”

Now official religion has always maintained that no such “substitute” can exist. Theoretically at least it merely waits for the sinner to discover the fact for himself and to return at last to that God whom he cannot, finally, do without. It is also accustomed to point with pride to those cases where the method has worked, and Mr. O'Neill can hardly be surprised if it claims him now. Quite possibly he will protest that “Days Without End” (Henry Miller Theater) is a play, not a confession; that his story of a rebel who returns to the bosom of the church says no more than that some men can thus cut the knot which he is still struggling to untie. Yet the fact remains that there is obviously much of himself in the hero, and that the whole process of surrender is described with sympathetic understanding. He was born a Roman Catholic, and his church has every reason to believe that he is closer to it now than he has ever been since the time when, like his new hero, he broke away.

As for the play as a play, it is only very partially successful. One must assume, I think, that it was deeply felt, but the deepest feelings do not, unfortunately, always receive the most adequate expression, and the fable suffers from the fact that it can hardly mean much to those who are not themselves half prepared to join the hero in his leap. No one can doubt that such conversions do take place, that the difficulties which had previously seemed insuperable do sometimes simply fade away. But conversion is also a subjective phenomenon—something hard for a spectator to follow for the simple reason that he cannot, as an outsider, very well understand why the objections which seemed so valid before have become irrelevant now. The gesture is merely a gesture, and for the uninitiated the story remains only a pious tale too familiar to take on the new significance which, for the author, it must have acquired.

John Loving had lost his faith because his prayers did not save the lives of his parents. He had passed through various cynicisms and various social faiths until he found peace at last in his love for his pure and beautiful wife. His evil nature had not, however, really died, and almost against his will he becomes guilty of a casual infidelity with a woman whom he despises. Conscience will not let him rest; he makes a veiled confession, and when he realizes that his sin is about to deprive him of the woman he loves he is brought once more face to face with the emptiness of a world where there is nothing in which he can believe. Now in his darkest hour he throws himself at the foot of a cross; the wife returns from the threshold of death and—that is all. One difficulty is that Mr. O'Neill has not solved the notoriously hard problem of making virtue attractive, and that the pure woman appears only as a dull perfection. Another and more serious one is that the fable seems hardly relevant to any discussion of that "sickness of today" which always before has concerned him so deeply. We may grant that this sickness involves a loss of faith and a sense of sin; but the faith we lack is something much more inclusive than the kind of faith we lose when our prayers are not answered, and a casual adultery will hardly stand for the most characteristic of our sins. It would seem, in other words, that the symbols which Mr. O'Neill has chosen are hardly suitable to his theme unless, indeed, he does not mean them as symbols at all and is talking quite simply of sin as the theologian defines it and of faith as it is understood by the priest. The sickness which is here finally cured is much simpler than the one he has so often diagnosed. This is not a substitute for "the primitive religious impulse," but merely an illustration of how that primitive impulse itself can work. Hence if the play does not mean that he is at least contemplating surrender to an old faith rather than to a new one, it is difficult to see how it can mean anything at all.

The Theater Guild has produced the play with its usual loving care, and Earle Larrimore—who gives perhaps the best performance of his career—is admirable as the hero. It must also be confessed that after a pedestrian and very unpromising first act "Days Without End" again demonstrates the extraordinary ingenuity with which its author can turn the most unpromising material into good theater. Nevertheless, the fact remains that it is one of the least successful of Mr. O'Neill's mature productions. If it indicates a change in his whole attitude, then it may be remembered as announcing a series of definitely and perhaps more satisfactory Christian plays. If, on the other hand, it is to be understood as continuing with new symbols his characteristic theme, it must be described as merely a minor work.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Those who took the "Ziegfeld Follies" with great seriousness will doubtless complain that the new series begun by Billie Burke at the Winter Garden resembles the original "Follies" only in name. Nevertheless the new production is a good show in its own right and it gives Fannie Brice an opportunity to be funny in a very unrefined manner.

P. M.

2nd Printing!

SEX HABITS

A VITAL FACTOR IN WELL-BEING

By A. Buschke, M.D. and F. Jacobsohn, M.D.

Specializing Physicians to the Great Continental Rudolf-Virchow Hospital

Foreword by Gerard L. Moench, M.D.

Associate Professor of Gynecology, New York Post-graduate Hospital, Columbia University

SUBJECTS EMBRACED

THE SEX ORGANS (Male, Female)
SEX INTERCOURSE (Analysis, Nature, Methods, Frequency)
SEX DIFFICULTIES (Adjustment, Technique)
MARRIAGE (Sex Aspects, Instruction)
VALUE OF REGULAR SEX INTERCOURSE
SEX HYGIENE (Precautions, Directions)
THE SEX IMPULSE (Contrasted: In Men, In Women)
SEX VARIATION (Physical, Psychological)
VARYING SEX PRACTICES
SEXUAL SHORTCOMINGS (Impotence, Frigidity, Sterility, etc.)
SEX DANGERS (Coitus Interruptus, reservatus; etc.)
SEX ABNORMALITIES (Perversion, Sadism, Masochism, Fetishism, Exhibitionism, Homosexuality, Hermaphroditism, etc.)
REPRODUCTION, FERTILIZATION, HEREDITY, EUGENICS

THIRTY ILLUSTRATIONS

THE SEX ORGANS OF MEN (4 plates,* 15 illustrations)
THE SEX ORGANS OF WOMEN (3 plates,* 6 illustrations)
THE PROCESS OF REPRODUCTION (1 plate,* 3 illustrations)
FERTILIZATION AND DEVELOPMENT (1 plate,* 2 illustrations)
DEVELOPMENT BEFORE BIRTH (2 plates,* 4 illustrations)

* Full-page.

"I believe it is not exaggerating to say that disturbances of the sexual apparatus cause more mental anguish and emotional upsets, aside from physical suffering, than any other lesions."

—Gerard L. Moench, M.D.

Eleven full pages of photographs.

PRESS COMMENTS*

"... the most and most practical views of sexology and sexual hygiene that can be found. A clear conception of the male and female reproductive organs can be obtained. The description is accompanied by a set of beautiful photographs of the various organs. A new set could not be found in any anatomy book..."

—Glasgow University Publication

"... gives them facts essential to a correct understanding of sex... a very scientific account... and has the added advantage of being illustrated."

—Medical Times (London)

"Drs. Buschke and Jacobsohn have collaborated on a work which is frank, fearless and sensible. The whole problem of the sex instinct is surveyed concisely and sagaciously."

—Montreal

"The structure and function of the reproductive organs are clearly set out... Facts... are faced and reasons are given."

—The Lancet (London)

* Reviews of the English edition before American publication.

Price $2.50 (postage 15c extra)

EMERSON BOOKS, INC., 333 SIXTH AVE., N. Y. C.

Films

Garbo and Screen Acting

IT would be pleasant if it were possible to say with any degree of honesty that in the picture which marks her return to the screen Miss Garbo adds something new and unexpected to the impression of her that already exists in our imaginations. But, unfortunately, "Queen Christina" (Astor) is no better than the majority of films in which it was her lot to appear before her temporary retirement. In one respect at least, it is considerably worse—the direction against which Miss Garbo has to struggle this time is by Rouben Mamoulian. As far as one can remember, she was never before made to appear positively grotesque, as she is made to appear in one scene in the present film, a scene which bears the indubitable marks of Mr. Mamoulian's directorial fancy. It begins, this particular sequence, with a close-up of Miss Garbo lying supine on the floor of a bedroom in a country inn. John Gilbert, as the Spanish envoy with whom she has passed the night, is by her side, and for some time the action consists in nothing more harmless than the dangling of a huge and probably symbolical bunch of grapes above Miss Garbo's lips. Then, separating herself from her lover, the disguised queen rises to her feet, and with an almost methodical thoroughness begins to caress every object in the room—the table tops, the bric-a-brac, the bedposts, and finally of course the bolster. Naturally, after this has gone on for several minutes, Mr. Gilbert, left among his pillows on the floor, is compelled to ask—and in that voice whose pitch is unique even among former silent-screen actors: "What are you doing?" Needless to say, Mr. Mamoulian supplies an explanation, as he invariably does after such subtle effects; but the pseudo-poetic lines which S. N. Behrman provides for Miss Garbo are not enough to prevent a robust snicker from running through a large section of the audience.

As long as Miss Garbo is exhibited in such inappropriate and badly directed roles, it is of course impossible to come to any judgment as to her ability as an actress on the talking screen. But the suspicion increases that she will never be so effective, either as performer or symbol, as she was in the old silent medium. Like Chaplin, Lillian Gish, and a number of others, she had built up for herself a style of acting which depended for its special forcefulness on economy rather than variety of means. She belonged, that is to say, to the panto-mimic tradition of screen acting, the essence of whose quality consisted in the almost hieroglyphic simplification of action and emotion. And since she belonged to this tradition by temperament as well as accident, the change to the broader and more effusive methods of naturalistic stage acting was for her particularly difficult. If Miss Garbo compared so badly with Pauline Lord in "Anna Christie" or with Doris Keane in "Romance," it must be remembered that everything in her personality as well as in her training was opposed to the excessively histrionic technique for which the roles in these plays were designed. It must be remembered with what undeniable effect she managed to create her earlier silent roles in "Torrent," in the screen version of Michael Arlen's "Green Hat," and in the fantastic abridgment of "Anna Karenina" which was called, tout simple, "Love." The real explanation for her failure in the so-called big moments in "Green Hat" and the present film is that she is not, and probably never will be, a good histrionic actress. But this is not so much a criticism of Miss Garbo, who can hardly be expected to adjust her style and the personality which has dictated it to every advance in mechanical invention, as it is a criticism of the present talking film, which has not yet learned to reconcile the best of the old with the best of the new. The chief reason that Miss Garbo is so disappointing in "Queen Christina" is that the picture itself is not what it should be, namely, a picture.

Francis Lederer, with years of the best stage experience and training behind him, illustrates, on the other hand, in his first American picture the dangers of a too great display of histrionic ability in a screen role requiring very little of any sort of ability. "Man of Two Worlds" (Radio City Music Hall), which uses the background and many of the sex angles of "Eskimo," is of course an unfortunate undertaking all around; but it required an ineptitude amounting almost to genius to cast this young Czech actor, whose gift is for a wholesale spontaneity of physical energy, as a member of what is reputedly the most lethargic race on earth.

It would be pressing distinctions too far to find in "Enemies of Progress," the new Soviet film at the Acme, examples of the third type of screen acting—what is usually called the "natural." As it happens, the actor who plays Ataman Annenkov, the Cossack captain with whose predatory raids in Siberia after the revolution the story deals, was borrowed from the Moscow Art Theater, and as a result the acting is all too clearly in the stage tradition. For variety of background, rapidity of movement, and neatness of development, however, the film as a whole can be recommended as one of the best that has come out of Russia in a long time.

WILLIAM TROY

Read LENIN on the

● RUSSIAN REVOLUTION

The Revolution of 1917 Toward the Seizure of Power
2 volumes, $6 2 volumes, $5

● WORLD WAR The Imperialist War $3.50

● MARXIST PHILOSOPHY

Materialism and Empirio-Criticism $3.00

The only authorized translations, with biographical explanatory notes and related documents. Free catalog on request.

INTERNATIONAL PUBLISHERS, 381 Fourth Ave., N. Y. C.

Next week in The Nation
The Birth Control Conference
by Stella Hanau

Did You Listen to
THE NATION'S RADIOTORIAL BOARD
over WEVD on January 17?

Did you note that the sessions of this board have been changed to every other Wednesday at 8 p.m. over WEVD? The next date will be January 31.

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	113
EDITORIALS:
Cuba and the New Deal	116
A Tariff Revolution?	117
When Mothers Die It's News	118
ISSUES AND MEN. THE PRESIDENT'S DISARMAMENT OP- PORTUNITY. By Oswald Garrison Villard	119
LUXURY IN THE U. S. S. R. By Louis Fischer	120
THE DOLLAR: A POLITICAL TOY. By Henry Hazlitt	122
HITLER DISSOLVES THE FASCIST UNIONS. By Ludwig Lore	124
WHAT PRICE TALL BUILDINGS? By Oliver Whitwell Wilson	126
THE POWER INDUSTRY GOES NRA. By Jerome Count	128
THE BIRTH-CONTROL CONFERENCE. By Stella Hanau	129
THE INTELLIGENT TRAVELER. By John Rothschild	131
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter	132
CORRESPONDENCE	132
FINANCE. WALL STREET PLAYS 'POSSUM. By Peter Hel- moop Noyes	133
BOOKS AND DRAMA:
Winter Revery. By Sara Bard Field	134
Wanted: An Attitude. By Horace Gregory	134
Objet d'Art. By Florence Codman	134
Johnson's England. By Joseph Wood Krutch	135
Europe Before the War. By G. P. Gooch	136
The Southwest and Its People. By Mary Austin	137
Shorter Notices	137
The Dance: The Persistence of Ballet. By Lincoln Kirstein	138
Drama: Two Strange Plays. By Joseph Wood Krutch	140
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE	140

BOARD OF EDITORS

ERNEST GRUENING FRED A. KIRCHWEY
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
MAURITZ A. HALLGREN MARGARET MARSHALL
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; in Canada, $5.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. British Agent, Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, W. C. 1, England.

WHEN the Tugwell-Copeland bill is threshed out on the floors of Congress, where will the publishers' lobby stand? Amusingly enough, it is just possible that when the roll is called, the publishers will have become so desperate that they will actually support the bill which Generalissimo C. C. Parlin of the Curtis Publishing Company and his food, drug, and patent-medicine allies have spent many months and plenty of expense accounts in fighting. For it is becoming increasingly clear that the publishers, by going along with the hysterical ballyhoo of Frank (Cascarets) Blair, Huston (Feenamint) Thompson, and Thomas (Crazy Crystals) Love, are finding themselves hoist by their own petard. The Parlin lobby has badly frightened advertisers who would not be affected by the Tugwell-Copeland bill. They are holding up contracts, so that the Saturday Evening Post, the Ladies' Home Journal, the Country Gentleman, and other mass publications are undernourished and unhappy. The publishers, allied with the food and drug interests, have prepared their own bill, the chief author being Charles Wesley Dunn, representing the Associated Grocery Manufacturers of America and the American Pharmaceutical Manufacturers' Association. A bill drawn by Dr. James H. Beal, representing the National Drug Trade Conference, has already been introduced. The patent-medicine buccaneers haven't been doing so well. J. Bruce Kremer is now an ex-National Democratic Committee member, and back of that "ex" is a sad story. In brief, when it got out that Mr. Kremer was representing simultaneously the people of Montana and the Drug Institute, Mr. Kremer found that he had stepped on a political banana peel. The Tugwell-Copeland bill has only about two teeth left, but both of them bite, and it can probably be passed if the consumer is heard from loudly and frequently. Write or telegraph. Do it now. Send no money. The papers probably won't do a thing for you, but the United States mails are still yours.

WE DO NOT SEE why the Federal Coordinator of Transportation, Joseph B. Eastman, should have gone to the trouble of outlining a plan for government ownership of railways so long as he was not ready to recommend its adoption at this time. Nor can we understand his argument that government ownership is not now desirable because it would involve large and unpredictable expenditures. Does he not realize that the country has rarely been so ready to indorse large and unpredictable expenditures as at present? Does he not know his Administration? For our part, even though government ownership as Mr. Eastman proposes it might be something of a gamble, we would sooner see the nation acquire the railroads in return for its money than sink millions in them as loans without obtaining control. For the present Mr. Eastman asks for few changes except the power to compel consolidations instead of merely to recommend them. A year ago financial circles were predicting the necessity of government acquisition of the railroads in order to prevent default on their bonds in such proportions as to carry the savings banks under. Since then the financial position of the railroads has improved somewhat, although their ultimate fate, of course, hinges on the strength of the recovery program. Whatever the wisdom of Mr. Eastman's recommendations, we agree with his prediction that if government ownership comes it will only be because private enterprise can no longer carry on. That has been the history of all government ownership in this country—federal, State, or municipal. Private ownership holds on as long as there is a possible chance to squeeze a penny out of an enterprise. When it is hopelessly bankrupt, the public is allowed to take it over. This has the double advantage of preserving private profits as long as possible and discrediting public ownership by permitting it only when it must function at a loss.

THE ADMINISTRATION of President Roosevelt, the nation, and the people of New York State are to be congratulated on the forthcoming retirement of James A. Farley from his chairmanship of the Democratic National Committee and of the Democratic State Committee. The Farley influence has been distinctly detrimental to the achievement of the New Deal. Mr. Farley is the spoilsman extraordinary of the Roosevelt Administration, and his political sagacity, since March 4, has materialized in placing in important positions deserving Democrats regardless of competence, but with a special regard for the date of their adherence to the Roosevelt candidacy. Almost without exception, his appointments have been atrocious. His culminating injury to the Administration came when he managed to stampede his chief into assenting to the McKee candidacy in New York, the only result of which was to prevent the Fusionists from making a clean sweep. Mr. Farley is a typical boss of the old school, who as such has no place in an Administration that purports to be progressive and enlightened. Mayor LaGuardia has pointed out the obvious absurdity of having government dominated by, and its business transactions conducted through, a hierarchy of bosses, district leaders, and the like who are not elected by the people but have arrogated to themselves the perquisites and power of government.

WHEN THE PLANS for the Civil Works Administration were projected early in November, all sorts of promises were made that would evidently be difficult to fulfil. There was available $600,000,000 to finance the project; 4,000,000 persons were to be put to work by December 15; minimum wages were to range from forty to fifty cents an hour, but much higher wages were to be paid for skilled labor. A student in elementary arithmetic could have proved that the prevailing wage, with the funds available, could not exceed the minimum of fifty cents for the northern and eastern sections of the country, and that, even so, it would be difficult to make the funds last until February 15. Now it is announced that the funds will not last, and instructions have already been issued to cut hours and to fill no more jobs.

PRESSED for an explanation of why it was necessary to cut CWA wages and hours, Harry L. Hopkins, Federal Relief Administrator, declared that there had been an "original bad guess" about the size of pay rolls and about average pay. Mr. Hopkins said he had estimated the average weekly pay roll at $12, although how he figured that amount as payment for a thirty-hour week at fifty cents an hour is difficult to explain. But whatever the reason, funds are about gone. On January 18 CWA employees were put on a fifteen-hour week in small and rural communities and a twenty-four-hour week in cities of 2,500 or more population. In addition, instructions have been issued to drop CWA workers from the pay rolls at the rate of 500,000 a week, beginning February 15, to make the whole project end by May 1, $350,000,000 to be made available in the meanwhile from the emergency funds included in the budget. In New York City about 140,000 persons are employed under the CWA. In addition, 200,000 are registered for jobs which do not exist. It is plain that something drastic should be done to extend the employment-relief program and to bring it up to the needs of the people who are out of work. President Roosevelt, when asked for additional funds for Civil Works relief, announced himself as unwilling to include extra appropriations in his budget, and declared that the project must end by May 1 as proposed. Out of our budget of ten billion dollars for the next fiscal year large sums are evidently planned for relief of some sort. But it is not encouraging to have the whole matter left so vague and so uncertain. The Civil Works administrators plainly do not know where more money is coming from. The persons at work at from $7.50 a week up do not know what weekly pay check will be their last. Billions of dollars have been asked by Mr. Roosevelt for the RFC. If there are other billions, or even hundreds of millions, that are earmarked for relief, the country cannot be told too soon, in the plainest possible language, just how, for whom, and when the money will be spent.

ANNOUNCEMENT of the new German labor code can hardly have caused surprise in other countries. It was to be expected that the Hitlerites would "crack down" on the workers with all the force at their command. Nevertheless, the harshness of the terms of this "law for the organization of national labor" is such as to take one's breath. All the liberal labor laws and the splendid system of labor courts, built up over a period of years through the efforts of the trade-union movement, are abolished. The worker is stripped of all freedom of action. The right of collective bargaining is denied him. He may not join with his fellows in striking against an unfair employer or against low wages or poor working conditions. He may not join an independent union or even the shop council established in the business which employs him unless he is considered "nationally reliable." This council, moreover, is completely under the control of the employer or "leader" of the business. The leader is given full right to fix wages and working conditions, although the council may by a majority vote take an appeal to a state labor trustee if it feels it has a grievance. But since the council is made up of hand-picked employees, and since the labor trustee will be an official of the state which has drawn up these rigid regulations, it can hardly be supposed that this right of appeal will have any value for the average employee. The code is replete with glowing phrases designed to convey the impression that it is a genuinely socialistic measure. Actually, of course, it saddles upon the German worker all the hardships which his Russian colleague has been enduring, without giving him or even promising him any of the benefits of socialism.

MENACING as the Japanese militarists were when they held power unchallenged by public or press, they have become much more dangerous to the peace of the Far East with the recent reawakening of liberal and moderate sentiment in Japan. While they dominated Japanese political life and had public opinion almost solidly behind them, they had little need for propaganda or saber-rattling. In the last few months, however, the moderate element has taken on fresh courage, partly as the result of President Roosevelt's order withdrawing the Atlantic fleet from Pacific waters and partly because former Ambassador Debuchi and other diplomats and business men returning home from America have brought assurances that the United States is not even thinking of war with Japan. This has had a marked effect on many Japanese people. Indeed, so strong has the anti-militarist current become that the militarists feel they must resort to vigorous tactics in order to hold the public in line. In consequence the popular magazines and a section of the press have been flooded with articles, some of them signed by the highest navy and army officers, intended to re-create suspicion of America and Russia and to arouse the war passions of the Japanese people. On the one hand, the American navy is pictured as an ever-present menace to world peace in general and to the Japanese islands in particular. On the other, the Japanese are reminded that Vladivostok is only 400 miles away by air; a bombing expedition could quickly wipe out the more important Japanese cities. It is suggested that it might be well to start a preventive war against Russia before this tragedy occurs. Given moral encouragement, the moderate element may yet triumph over the militarists. But such encouragement, on the part of the United States, requires that its public officials exercise the utmost tact and discretion; and the requisite discretion does not consist in the blatant demands for "a navy second to none" that have lately been pouring from the mouths of our Swansons, Brittons, Vinsons, and Admiral Standleys. The resignation of General Araki as Minister of War will apparently make no difference in Japanese policy, since General Hayashi, announced as his successor, is a militarist of the same school.

WHAT HAPPENS to labor in a period of industrial depression is set forth in figures lately published by the Department of Commerce on the loss of income sustained in this country from 1929 to 1932, inclusive. The total of income produced and distributed to individuals dropped from 81 billion dollars in 1929 to 49 billion in 1932, or about 40 per cent. But in this period the loss in wages was 60 per cent in those industries in which it was possible to segregate that item, while the decrease in income on property was 30 per cent. In other words, the industrial worker—with nothing to say about the conduct of the enterprise to which he gives his labor—nevertheless suffers more severely from its mismanagement than those who are financially interested in it and responsible for its direction. Doubtless in good time we shall learn the same in regard to the financial inflation with which it is now proposed to liquidate the depression. In so far as prices rise, they will soar more and sooner than wages and salaries, and will in effect be a sales tax falling mostly on the low-paid workers, as the most numerous class in the community. Thus both coming and going the poor man gets it in the pocket-book, while politicians and promoters make him smile and pretend that he likes it.

THE BATTLE against the avarice of the sugar-beet trust in the West has become so hot that some hope of victory for the forces of justice and decency seems to be rising. Throughout the whole sugar-beet country growers are in open revolt against the Great Western and its subsidiaries, to which they have so long been meek and humble lieges. Both the Mountain States Beet Growers' Association of Colorado and the Nonstock Cooperative Beet Growers' Association of Nebraska have recently demanded equality of profit with the sugar company, threatening a one-year production moratorium if the company refuses the demand. Even more significant was the action of the United States Beet Sugar Association in Salt Lake City on January 10, when it declared for the complete elimination of child labor in the beet fields. This organization of manufacturers has for its president W. D. Lippitt, president of the Great Western, which efficiently dominates the membership. Evidently the public clamor for common decency on the part of the sugar trust has begun to have results, but it would be unwise to be too optimistic about the outcome yet. The Great Western has many times proved itself to be a slippery customer. Much credit for the present hopeful outlook is due to Senator Edward P. Costigan of Colorado, whose influence has been on the side of humanity and justice. Senator Costigan is the sponsor of a bill in Congress, backed by Secretary Wallace, to amend the farm act to include sugar as a basic commodity and provide for a possible downward revision of tariff rates. The sugar trust, heretofore bitterly and outspokenly opposed to such legislation, has apparently begun to develop a faint heart for further battle. No action on the Costigan bill was taken by the Beet Sugar Association at the meeting in Salt Lake City.

THE NEW WALK-OUT of 30,000 insurgent miners in the Pennsylvania hard-coal fields is another thorn in the much-lacerated side of the National Labor Board, and it is all the more painful because the miners blame the board itself for their present difficulties. The strikers are members of the United Anthracite Miners' Union of Pennsylvania, which for two years has been at odds with the conservative policies of the United Mine Workers of America, their leader, John L. Lewis, and the American Federation of Labor. They ask only recognition of their own union, and in this cause went on strike last November. There followed three weeks of bloody warfare, which was halted when the National Labor Board agreed to investigate conditions in the anthracite region. But the investigation was carried on by the Anthracite Conciliation Board, made up of representatives of the operators and the old-line union, with the new union frozen out. The rebel miners called the findings of the inquiry a whitewash and walked out again, renewing their request for recognition. In the pending peace negotiations they are naturally at a decided disadvantage. The situation, it would seem, is an ideal one to reveal just what, if any, are the rights of independent or radical unions under the National Industrial Recovery Act.

IN ORDER to keep in line with modern enterprise The Nation is obliged to blow its own horn occasionally, and it feels specially inclined to emit a blast in connection with the practices of companies selling "guaranteed" mortgages which New York newspapers have been making public, as revealed in an official inquiry recently begun. When the New York State Superintendent of Insurance testified the other day that four of the larger mortgage companies had paid dividends right through the depression years of 1931 and 1932, although they stopped payments of interest and principal to mortgage-holders on January 1 of the latter year, the testimony was considered worthy of the front page. Nor does The Nation quarrel with this estimate. It merely wants to remind a forgetful world that it presented these facts in its issue of May 17 last in an article by Benedict A. Leerburger. The article brought out also that the Lawyers' Mortgage Company, the New York Title and Mortgage Company, and the Bond and Mortgage Guaranty Company increased their salary rolls in 1931 over those in 1930. The Bond and Mortgage Guaranty Company paid a dividend of 25 per cent in 1930 and one of 19 per cent in 1931. The other three of the "big four" were not far behind in their largess to stockholders while failing signally to protect their investors. Banks, insurance companies, "guaranteed" mortgage houses—our most "respectable" and "conservative" financiers—all took part in picking the public's pockets in those grand-extravaganza days when the pickings were good.

Cuba and the New Deal

THE rapid march of events in Cuba records the resignation of President Ramon Grau San Martin, the forty-eight-hour presidency of a member of his Cabinet, Carlos Hevia, and the selection as interim President of Colonel Carlos Mendieta. By the time these words reach the majority of Nation readers Mendieta will probably have been recognized by the Roosevelt Administration. Sumner Welles succeeded until the end in preventing recognition of Grau San Martin. Despite this non-recognition, which carried with it the non-recognition of nearly all the other nations of the world, served as a constant incitement to every hostile and self-seeking force in Cuba, delayed the much-needed program of reconstruction, and intensified the economic collapse, the Grau regime lasted for nearly four and a half months. It was an extraordinary achievement—an achievement in self-government. It was likewise a demonstration of the strong social-revolutionary sentiment in Cuba which furnished the support for Grau—the Cuban masses were in large measure his following. It furnished conclusive evidence of the fatuousness of the Administration's Cuban policy. It revealed how gravely the wise, larger Latin American policy conceived by President Roosevelt and Secretary Hull and efficiently materialized by the latter at Montevideo may be impaired by a single truculent subordinate.

The Nation maintained from the start that the Roosevelt Administration should have recognized the Grau regime promptly, even as it automatically recognized the Céspedes regime which Ambassador Welles played so important a part in installing. Apart from the specific instance in Cuba, The Nation believes that our whole recognition policy in Latin America should be scrapped, and that de facto governments should not be required to win the approval of the United States ambassador or minister at the post, or of some underling in the Latin American division of the State Department. To date, this policy has got us into no end of trouble and created only ill-will. The Mexican policy under the so-called Estrada doctrine, in which recognition automatically takes place after changes of regime, is far more sensible. As matters now stand, the Welles policy in Cuba has created a tremendous amount of anti-American feeling and has naturally inculcated the conviction that our Cuban policy continues to be what it always has been—one of meddling in order to establish the particular type of government which the State Department desires. That is a tragic and unfortunate belief, for the purpose of President Roosevelt and Secretary Hull is really much better. To their credit let it be restated that they have refused to send in marines and have pledged themselves before the world not to intervene militarily in Cuba. Unfortunately the destinies of the United States and Cuba are so closely linked that the United States holds the whip hand without military intervention. The fate of Grau San Martin is the concrete evidence thereof. Hevia, who represented a continuation of the Grau San Martin policies, was similarly a victim.

Washington cannot well do other than recognize Mendieta. The situation is already far more complex and far more anarchic, if that is possible, than it was four and a half months ago when Grau San Martin came into office. Mendieta is an old-line politician, not too bright. The best thing that can be said is that he is honest, which means a good deal in the case of a Cuban politician of the old regime. His Cabinet, which includes representatives of the A. B. C., of the Menocalistas (followers of former President Mario Menocal), of the Marianistas (followers of Miguel Mariano Gómez, son of former President Gómez), and several men not particularly associated with any one group, contains some able men. It is, however, essentially the same kind of government as that of Céspedes. It leaves out the students, who have played so important a part in the government for the last four months, and it leaves out the left wings generally—those groups who understand that Cuba requires more than a political change. The A. B. C., whatever may have been its original orientation and the present divergences within its ranks, comes closer to representing a fascist movement today than anything else. Fascism and old-guardism are conspicuous in the new line-up. It has the support of the American colony in Havana, whose real desire, of course, is annexation. It is warmly indorsed by Orestes Ferrara, Machado's Secretary of State, now in exile. One important element distinguishes the support of the Mendieta Government from that of Céspedes. The Mendieta Government has at this moment the pledged support of Colonel Fulgencio Batista—who indeed was the implement with which Grau and Hevia were successively deposed and Mendieta established. When, as a sergeant, Batista led the revolt of the rank and file of the Machado army against its officers and joined with the students to overthrow the Céspedes Government, one of the most potent arguments, especially directed at liberal opinion in the United States, emanating from our embassy at Havana, was that the United States could not well recognize a government largely supported by the military. Now the fact that Mendieta has the support of this same Batista is cited in justification of his recognition. To contrast the insurmountable tests and standards we presented to President Grau and the ready recognition we accord to Colonel Mendieta is to disclose the inconsistency, the absurdity, and the personal bias which have characterized our Cuban policy. The only way in which those past errors can be rectified and a New Deal really brought to Cuba is to proceed henceforth with a frank, vigorous, and generous policy which will include prompt announcement of:

1. Our abandonment of the Platt Amendment without reservations.

2. Negotiation of a new reciprocal agreement which will give Cuba a certain preferential arrangement in the matter of sugar quotas and duties. (This arrangement, while benefiting Cuba, will also permit its restoration in an American market and need not be set down as pure altruism.)

3. Active and disinterested cooperation of the United States with the Cuban government in relieving distress and in bringing about economic reconstruction.

It is fortunate that Secretary Hull is back to take personal charge of affairs. The Nation wishes here to record its unqualified praise for the masterful way in which he conducted himself at Montevideo. He achieved there far more than even the most optimistic had a right to expect. The Administration had greatly handicapped him with its Cuban and Haitian policies and its original prohibition of the discussion of economic matters. At the opening of the conference, in an atmosphere of skepticism, defeatism, and distrust of the United States—the cumulative legacy of our past Latin American policy—Secretary Hull's task looked nearly hopeless. That he succeeded in reversing this attitude, that he instilled for the first time a genuine trust and confidence in the purposes of the United States, that he substituted good-will for hostility, was no slight achievement. But it should not be forgotten that the Latin American took at their full value what were really pledges for the future, such as Secretary Hull's plea that the Administration be judged by its acts rather than its utterances. For that reason the Cuban policy henceforth will be of the greatest importance. It will be regarded as one of the acid tests of our sincerity. It will have to be a policy totally different in spirit and attitude from the personal, intriguing, manipulating, and domineering policy of recent years and, unfortunately, also of recent months.

A Tariff Revolution?

AN extraordinarily far-reaching and revolutionary plan of dealing with the industries of the United States in relation to our tariffs and foreign trade has been prepared for the President. It emanates from a group of advisers termed the Executive Commercial Policy Committee. The chairman of this committee, Francis B. Sayre, declares that the outline of the plan already published in numerous newspapers is not the final document and that a number of changes have been made in it. None the less, certain phases of the memorandum are in accord with the tariff policy of the President so far as it has emerged from darkness at Montevideo and elsewhere. Primarily, the object is to give the President almost complete power over the tariffs, even to the extent of permitting him to declare that certain industries do not need and shall not have protection. The purpose is twofold: to place the tariffs in the hands of the President as a weapon with which to obtain trade bargains, concessions, and agreements from foreign countries, and to insure a long-term commercial policy. The memorandum points out that such a policy was urged by the Secretary of Agriculture in his speech of November 14. Mr. Wallace declared at that time that the country is now compelled to choose whether it will sanction retention of our present foreign markets and their increase, or abandon foreign trade altogether, or discover some possible middle course. In other words, what is at hand is an attempt to make the country face its commercial future, decide what course it will pursue, and then adjust not only our foreign relations and foreign trade to this policy, but also relate to it the necessary domestic readjustments. Secretary Wallace declared that this might mean the withdrawal from agricultural purposes of no less than 50,000,000 acres of land and the assignment of the population to other industries.

Primarily, the plan as thus far outlined requires the classification of all the industries of the United States into six grades, in accordance with their economic suitability to the country, their value for national defense, their general social utility, the number of their employees and the amount of capital involved, their geographical distribution, the alternative sources of foreign goods for the goods they create, and finally "the mutual dependence, for proper operation, of each industry on others." In Grade A would be placed industries the products of which normally are largely exported. In Grade B would be put industries which on the whole have shown the power to sustain themselves against foreign competition without much assistance, employ large numbers, and turn out satisfactory products at reasonable prices. In Grade C would come industries important primarily in relation to national defense. In Grade D would appear industries that have not shown themselves as well suited to our economic environment as those in A and B. In Grade E would be placed industries which "are, on the whole, a burden because they possess so weak an economic basis or because they have exhausted their basis," and with them would be ranked certain luxury trades now so highly protected as to lead to the total exclusion of foreign competition. Finally, in Grade F would be put commodities for the production of which the country is totally unsuited, such as bananas, coffee, tea, and rubber. It is explained that care must be taken to make it clear that "no immediate tariff adjustment is in contemplation," which does not seem to comport with Mr. Hull's pronouncement at Montevideo. Each of the grades is, of course, to be studied as to the tariffs it needs and the conditions under which it is to be conducted.

Obviously this plan involves a radical break with the past. If the principles outlined above are adopted by the President and by Congress, there will be placed in the President's hands a tremendous power over American industry. It will be possible for him to pass the death sentence upon weak and struggling enterprises and to regulate the profits of those remaining, precisely as in the past Congress has made the government a partner in all protected enterprises and undertaken to insure their profits. The arguments for this change are plain. It would put an end to the sale of tariff favors by political parties in return for campaign contributions. It would end the terrific pressure upon Congress by vested interests and local considerations. It would doubtless put an end to a considerable amount of corruption, but on the other hand, it would transfer to the President and to the Tariff Commission that pressure from which Congress has suffered. This may, however, be more or less eliminated if the country can establish a given and unchangeable policy for a number of years. Whether that can be done in view of the ever-changing economic conditions of the world, and within the United States itself, is open to question. The tariff has always been in politics and it will be difficult to remove it for long. At least it is gratifying to record that the old emotional tariff slogans are not to be found in this memorandum. We hear nothing about the full dinner pail or competition by pauper labor or the maintenance of the "high standard" of American living. It contains a concrete proposal to deal with the tariffs, as long as we still continue them, in a generally scientific way in accord with national economic planning.

Whether Congress will assent to yield its power over tariffs remains to be seen. Of course the Executive has had the power to make changes in the tariffs on the recommendation of the Tariff Commission established by President Wilson in 1917. But in practice the commission has disappointed its friends and justified its critics in that it has been little else than a tool of the protected industries and not a safeguard against extortionate prices. It is only just to add, however, that the chief reason for its innocuous desuetude lies in the course pursued by the three Republican Presidents who succeeded Mr. Wilson rather than in any special weakness in the commission theory. But with conditions of tariff-making as they have been and with the sale of tariff favors the established custom of the Republican Party, no other outcome was possible. The Commercial Policy Committee believes that the enormous amount of knowledge and statistics acquired by the Tariff Commission during all these years will be of great value in the stupendous task of cataloguing and grading all the industries of this vast country. While we cannot yield our belief that the world would profit enormously by heavy lateral tariff reductions or far-reaching reciprocity agreements, we cannot withhold our gratitude that this study, whether one approves of its details or not, bears the earmarks of an earnest effort to mitigate what has been in many respects the outstanding folly and scandal of our economic life.

When Mothers Die It's News

WHEN more than 300 newspapers in thirty-nine States of the Union pick up a story sent out from New York City, it is safe to say that it is a matter of acute and outstanding public interest. This was the surprising response to the recent report of the New York Academy of Medicine on the question of maternal mortality. It will be remembered that the report studied 2,000 maternal deaths in New York City over a period of two years, and found two-thirds of them to have been preventable. The sequel to these figures was brought out in the discussion, on January 18, sponsored by the New York Maternity Center Association, in which the question was, in effect: Here is this report. What shall we do about it?

Representatives of the medical, nursing, and public-health fields presented their ideas of the best way of dealing with what is a crucial problem in American vital statistics. It was to be expected that the list of remedies would be long and varied. They ranged from reform in the medical schools—where, except in the few first-class institutions in the country, there is no provision for special training in obstetrics—to the education of women in the dangers of easier and shorter labor in childbirth. More and better midwives was the suggestion offered by Mary Beard, associate director of the Rockefeller Foundation; better control of hospitals was the plan offered by Thomas S. McLane, president of the Children's Welfare Foundation. Mr. McLane, incidentally, made the astonishing statement that of 110 proprietary hospitals in New York City, controlled at present only by means of the license issued them by the Department of Hospitals, only three met the standards imposed by the College of Physicians and Surgeons. Several speakers were in favor of a certified list not only of hospitals qualified to give obstetrical service but of physicians qualified to perform it. It was the general feeling that the public must be educated in the knowledge of what constitutes proper maternal care, both prenatal and at delivery, and must then be enabled to find out where such care is available.

Although the maternal-mortality report received such widespread attention from all parts of the country, it must be remembered that New York City presents a situation peculiar to itself. Probably the best care in the country is available there, and it is a tribute to the vitality of American women that the maternal-mortality figures for the country at large are less than 1 per cent higher than they are in New York City. It is evident that in a small rural community, for example, where the only available doctor is a general practitioner who is overworked, underpaid, and perhaps not too thoroughly trained in the first place, the problems of adequate medical care and possible education of the community are much more acute than in a metropolitan area with first-class hospitals and innumerable opportunities for education in public health. If the matter be viewed as a national problem, therefore, it is evident that, although there is a definite responsibility devolving on public-health agencies to obtain nation-wide publicity, the responsibility is equally heavy on the medical profession to insist that adequate training in obstetrics is given to medical students before graduation and that after graduation some method of examination and certification be devised to insure that no physician engages in the practice of obstetrics without the necessary skill for simple cases and the knowledge of his own limitations, so that he may consult more experienced physicians when emergencies arise.

It is one of the curiosities of modern medicine that such reforms, which would seem axiomatic on their face, should be necessary. No general practitioner would attempt to perform an operation on the brain of one of his patients; he would turn the case over to a specialist. But in obstetrics an inexperienced operator will not hesitate to perform a Caesarean section, and more than that, will presume to decide when and if it should be performed.

It must not be forgotten, however, that one of the gravest difficulties in the way of providing and obtaining adequate medical care in childbirth is an economic one. The doctor claims that he is not adequately paid for his obstetrical work; he knows that he should spend a number of hours in prenatal examination and analysis; he knows that he must be prepared to give more hours of attention during labor and for post-partum care. It is estimated that the average obstetrical case requires thirty hours of the doctor's time, and for that he is paid an average fee of not more than $50—probably less than that. Moreover, for medical schools to institute special courses in obstetrical work will take money. To provide adequate hospitalization takes money also. Dr. Louis I. Dublin declared at the Maternity Center meeting that the public should be prepared to pay for better care than it is now getting, either through taxation to provide funds for city hospitals or directly in the form of larger medical fees. The public, of course, is convinced that it pays at present every cent it can afford, and more, for medical care. The answer points directly to some form of socialized medicine. But before we get it, we may continue to wonder at the strange state of mind which has persisted in considering childbirth not as a bodily crisis requiring expert diagnosis, prognosis, and therapy, but as a natural function which more or less takes care of itself.

Issues and Men

The President's Disarmament Opportunity

THE President has won deserved applause for his return to the question of peace and disarmament in his address at the Woodrow Wilson dinner of December 28. He then made the daring and wise proposal that the nations insure peace by pledging themselves to abolish offensive armaments and never to cross the boundaries of their neighbor states. If this program were followed, the whole aspect of the world would change. It would certainly be a test of the sincerity of the tiresome assertions by statesmen everywhere that they seek only the defense of their countries. If you listen to them, you can only wonder how it is that any wars ever take place. On the other hand, the military men employed by these gentlemen are always saying that the truest defense is a quick and overwhelming offense—a theory that Theodore Roosevelt was always harping upon. If President Roosevelt should ask the nations of the world to meet in convention and reinforce the Kellogg-Briand Pact by pledging themselves to his two latest proposals, we should certainly be able to find out whether the countries that are so certain—like our own—that they never, never are aggressors in international strife are genuine in their professions or not.

Now when the President made that speech he was perfectly aware that the Disarmament Conference at Geneva has had before it the major aspects of the proposal to discard offensive weapons which he mentioned. For in Geneva the effort has been to outlaw all bombing planes, poisonous gases, heavy artillery, and tanks. Plainly Geneva offers the opportunity to achieve one of the President's objectives. But, it may be said, the Geneva conference is dead, Germany has withdrawn from it, so why waste any more time upon it? The answer is that the Disarmament Conference is not dead, and that the withdrawal of Germany, largely due to internal political considerations, may as a matter of fact make it easier to negotiate with that country than if its delegates were at Geneva working in the open and closely watched by the excited public sentiment at home which Hitler has created and which, some people think, is now beginning to be a little worrisome and out of hand. Certainly there is every evidence that negotiations are still going on. The press reports direct communication between France and Germany. Whether the next step is achieved by direct negotiations or through the conference, the simple fact is that something has got to be done about the German demands and the general question of disarmament unless Europe is to drift aimlessly while Germany proceeds to arm in defiance of the Allies and the Treaty of Versailles. It may be an impasse at the moment, but the way out has got to be found unless everybody is to sit down and resign himself to the coming of the next war.

Here lies the President's great opportunity. Now would be the psychological moment for him to come to the front with a definite proposal for the solution of the Franco-German problem of the moment and with definite concrete suggestions concerning what the United States is willing to do. I am well aware that the Disarmament Conference is dealing with land armaments, but I would have the President bring in naval armaments as well without waiting for the next naval conference, now scheduled for 1935. I would have him take a leaf out of Secretary Hughes's book and electrify Geneva, as Mr. Hughes electrified the Washington Conference for the Limitation of Armaments by the practicality of his proposals. I would have him announce that he was recommending to Congress immediately the decrease by one-third of the United States army and the mustering out of 50 per cent of our reserve officers as evidence of our good faith, and that he was willing to stop the building of new ships and to accept the Hoover proposal for decreasing existing naval forces by one-third upon a similar agreement to act by England, Japan, France, and Italy, provided, furthermore, that France and Germany accepted a compromise proposal offered by the President to end the existing deadlock between those two countries.

It would be an enormous advantage if the initiative came from the United States, for that would save the face of the French and make it much less possible for Hitler to convince his people that the result was brought about by his aggressive stand against the Allies and his withdrawal from the Disarmament Conference, by which he frightened the French into a compromise arrangement concerning German rearmament. As for the exact form of the proposal, that would not be difficult to arrive at. I believe that the President and Norman Davis could very quickly work it out. My reason for this is that the Germans and French have twice been on the very verge of agreement, once just before the Tardieu Government fell and spoiled things, and again when the Germans withdrew from the conference. If they were so near to a satisfactory working plan then, they could hardly decline to accept one now, unless Hitler is determined to bring upon his country the hostility of all other nations.

While no one else is in such a strategic position to do this as the United States, it should be our policy first to ask Great Britain to join with us in this offer to Germany and France. But if for one reason or another England refused, we could and should go it alone. I believe that this offers a certain way, perhaps the only immediate way, out of the deadlock. Such a move, even if it were only partially successful as far as disarmament is concerned, would give a marvelous uplift to all Europe. Indeed, it would change its whole psychology, which is now rapidly drifting toward a state of mind which makes everybody speculate how soon another conflict will come. It would be a vital contribution toward economic recovery, for it would restore confidence in a sane future, and without confidence there can be no progress toward a genuine rehabilitation of Europe and our own country.

Arnold Garrison Killam

Luxury in the U. S. S. R.

By LOUIS FISCHER

Moscow, January 3

IN Germany "the use of machinery has been forbidden in certain trades," writes a highly recommended contributor to the New Statesman and Nation. Mussolini enacted a law in January, 1933, whereby "the erection of new, or the extension of existing, plants may only be undertaken with the sanction of the government." The Roosevelt Administration, says the New York correspondent of the London Times, "intends to see that no increase in productive machinery of the great corporations shall be made without its specific approval." This is the reply to Professor T. E. Gregory ("Gold, Unemployment, and Capitalism") and to other apologists of the capitalist system who ask whether a planned economy does not retard progress. Yes, it does—under capitalism. The bourgeoisie submits to government direction when it needs government subsidies, and that is in time of crisis. A crisis registers the expansion of plant beyond the capacity of the population to absorb the plant's products. The government therefore uses the power its subsidies give it to check capitalism's natural instincts toward expansion. The more far-reaching the government's "plan," the more complete is the resulting stoppage of industrial advance.

One of the chief objections of industrialists to inflation is that it induces factory construction. Inflation may serve as a temporary and illusory stimulation of economic activity; by enlarging industrial capacity, however, it prepares the ground for another slump. Since a depression registers the failure of consumption to keep pace with production, there are two cures for a depression: increase consumption or reduce production. Planning under capitalism is conceived first of all as a means of reducing the productive capacity of the nation.

Soviet planning does the very opposite. The primary purpose of the first Five-Year Plan (1929-32) was to build new cities, industries, factories, hydroelectric power stations, railroads—in a word, to expand the U. S. S. R.'s productive capacity. At a tremendous cost of money, health, nerves, and life, it has achieved that purpose.

More than 1,500 Soviet factories were built during the four years and three months of the first Five-Year Plan period. In the same period the Bolsheviks constructed thirty-three "giant" blast furnaces and sixty-three open-hearth furnaces. The production of electric energy rose from 5,003,000 kilowatt-hours at the start of the first Piatiletka to 13,100,000 kilowatt-hours on January 1, 1933, when it ended. The Soviet coal industry was using 60 pneumatic pick-hammers on October 1, 1928, and 5,220 on January 1, 1933. About 1,000,000 spindles were introduced into the Soviet textile industry between 1928 and 1933. Of the 2,700 sawmill frames working in the U. S. S. R. in 1933, 1,000 were erected during the period of the plan, doubling the output capacity of the industry. The area under grain cultivation was increased during the first Piatiletka by 7,500,000 hectares, and that under technical crops—cotton, flax, and so forth—by the same amount. These figures, the Bolsheviks like to say, are the "music of socialism." Similar performances could be cited in literally every branch of Soviet industry.

Not only have old Russian industries been expanded; wholly new industries have been created. No automobiles or tractors were produced in Russia before the revolution. But in the first nine months of 1933 three new automobile plants manufactured 35,327 passenger cars and trucks, and three factories built since 1928 turned out 54,624 tractors. A whole new chemical industry has sprung up. New mineral and metal deposits have been discovered and placed under exploitation. Between 1914 and 1933 the urban population of Russia rose from 25,000,000 to 39,000,000, an increase that includes towns which simply did not exist a few years ago even in tiny settlements but which are now booming industrial centers. Soviet planning, obviously, does not retard progress. It stimulates progress. The progress indicated above is continuing at a rapid pace under the second Five-Year Plan.

A planned society, says Professor Gregory—and with him many others—"is one based on the principle of force." This is the anti-planners' second argument. It is a naive argument. All governments are based on force. The question is only of the degree of force, who administers it, and for what purpose. Donald R. Richberg, chief counsel of the American NRA, in discussing this problem recently before the Cleveland Bar Association, said quite correctly: "Practices which definitely destroy the economic security of great masses of people are clearly destructive of their liberty."

For what benefits it a man if he retains the ballot but has no job and no bread? Does freedom include the right to be unemployed and to be sent into the trenches? Force which eliminates oppressors and exploiters, creates work and prosperity, and guarantees progress and economic security will not be resented by the great masses of people. With the growing interference of the state in industry, the liberties of individuals are being circumscribed in every country in the world. The United States government is even insisting on the reduction of salaries in private business corporations. Tariffs, taxes, and laws are forms of force. Control of currency is a most powerful weapon in the hands of the state. No one can properly object to planning because it is based on the principle of force. The real issue is: Force, to what end?

Must the force and centralization which make planning possible eliminate the consumer's free choice? The assertion that it must is often encountered in the literature of the anti-planners. They contend that the government's compulsive weapons would be used to standardize life; that citizens would have to eat, drink, dress, and live as the authorities wished them to. Here the experience of the Soviet Union is instructive.

In the first three years after the Bolshevik Revolution the government was faced with the trying task of repelling the armed invader, and no attention could be paid to the consumer's tastes. Between 1921 and about 1927 the New Economic Policy gave appreciable freedom to private capitalists who produced for a market and attempted to meet individual wishes. But in the production of most commodities the role of the government was paramount. After 1929 it became practically monopolistic. During all those years the goods famine was grievous. During the first Five-Year Plan it became extremely painful: people were ready to buy anything no matter what the quality. And since most citizens could not buy what they wanted, many Russians, especially young Communists and pro-Soviet intellectuals, affected an indifference to worldly needs and "superficialities" by arguing that fine clothes, for instance, were bourgeois. Girls wore ugly men's caps when nothing prettier was available, and to comfort themselves decided that caps were "Bolshevik." All this sprang in part from prerevolutionary traditions. Hatred of the bourgeoisie inspired hatred of everything that pertained to the bourgeoisie. Simple clothes, simple living were protests against the finery and pleasures of the wealthy. Simple living, moreover, conduced to concentration on revolutionary activities. Self was submerged in the struggle for the liberation of the class. Sparta was trump.

During all those hard years, however, the state endeavored to beautify life. The opera, the ballet, and many theaters displayed a dazzling richness of scene and costume incomparably greater than elsewhere in the world. Parks of culture and rest were established throughout the country to provide sensible recreation and civilized leisure. Around new factories were refreshing flower beds, to which workers always pointed with pride. Palms and rubber plants were the inevitable decorations of public communal kitchens equipped with the most modern imported machinery. Sports and games played in new, magnificent stadiums afforded recreation for millions. But individuals, though thankful for these favors, thirsted for more intimate beauty. The social amenities first made available to them by the Soviet government merely whetted their appetites for more color, light, and softness in their personal life.

The NEP was dead, and the despised, detested Nepmen, or parvenu capitalists, disappeared in 1927-28. A generation appeared that had not known capitalism and that had been too far removed socially from NEP capitalists to be infected by them. Capitalism had become too unreal to warrant a protest against it in the shape of Spartanism. People wanted pleasure for its own sake. Comforts and luxuries were hard to get during the five years of sacrifice between 1928 and 1933. But for that very reason men and women sought and yearned for them all the more. Toward the end of the first Five-Year Plan one could discern a tremendous popular striving for relaxation and brightness. When a theater director showed on the stage how the decadent bourgeoisie of the West was "rotting" in fox-trot cafes, people went because they liked to hear fox trots and to see well-dressed women. A foreign fashion magazine was a prize and still is. What would a woman not give for a French beret! Those who could manage it got gramophones and records from abroad. From the polkas and folk dances of the park of culture and rest to the weekly "five-o'clock tea and dance" at the Metropole or National Hotel is but one short step. In the beginning jazz was underground—in the homes of the influential. But soon it burst into its officially recognized own. Visiting radicals are sometimes shocked by the confetti, toy balloons, tightly packed public dance floors, and jazz orchestras. We associate these things with Western social phenomena which are disgusting. But is there anything inherently objectionable in them?

Women like to dress well, and men like women to dress well, as Soviet women who neglected this biological truism have now discovered to their hurt. Even during the worst years of the goods' shortage, patent-leather shoes and silk stockings appeared in far-off villages. A good Russian dress-maker can today get any price for her services. An article in the Pravda recently praised a concert singer who appeared at a workers' club in a silk dress and elegant shoes. Clothing factories have been organizing popular fashion shows, and only those dresses, underwear, and suits selected by the public as best may be manufactured by the factories and shops. The government has ordered the textile industry to turn out thinner satins and finer silks. Even cotton goods must be of better grade. "Peasant women refuse to wear coarse prints," says a Moscow daily. Izvestia objects to "ugly, untalented designs which do not satisfy the aesthetic tastes of the consumer." The women of a North Caucasus kolhoz recently wrote an open letter to Stalin. They demanded goods that "would make the soul rejoice."

About two years ago, in the darkest days of the first Five-Year Plan, the Academia Publishing Company began to issue a great many exquisite editions of the classics: "The Arabian Nights," Dante, Homer, "Don Quixote," "Gulliver's Travels," and so on. These books are very expensive but worthy of the most fastidious collector's taste, and thousands of Soviet citizens now frantically scour the bookstores for them. Most of the volumes are sold within the country on advance subscriptions.

A worker in a new ball-bearing factory in Moscow is quoted approvingly by the Pravda. He wants all his furniture to be oaken and executed in one style, he said at a conference on proletarian living conditions. Another worker said: "I have learned to love music, and attend the opera with especial joy. I like 'Carmen' most." "Carmen" was the general favorite of the meeting.

Far from regimenting life and eliminating the consumer's choice, the Bolsheviks, now that the volume of goods and the availability of cultural institutions make it possible, are encouraging the widest range of individual appetites. In a recent Pravda article significantly entitled The Return of Venus, dealing with the beautification and enrichment of Soviet life, Valeria Gerasimova says: "The struggle for human individuality, the struggle for the all-sided, free, and powerful development of all of that individuality's abilities, talents, and potentialities, the struggle for the true dignity and real beauty of man—that is the struggle which irresistibly attracts the builders of socialism." The Bolsheviks always believed in individualism provided it did not benefit a few and damage the community as a whole. They always favored freedom provided it did not mean the freedom for the few to become rich and powerful at the expense of the many. If there was any standardization of living conditions in the Soviet Union it was the standardization of poverty which the poor of all lands know so well. But as soon as the hard-earned dividends of the first plan appeared earlier this year in the shape of more and better commodities, the tendency was all away from sameness and from superficial grayness. Every observer in Moscow notes the marked improvement in the general aspect of the city, in the clothes of the people, and in the displays in store windows. Shops sell wares that Russians never knew, wares of striking excellence and taste. Good quality is good business. The better the shoes, coats, blankets which the government produces, the more the national economy gains.

But a nation can live without electric irons, electric kettles, beautiful satins, high-heeled slippers, fancy fur coats, gramophones, musical instruments, pianos, modern bathroom fixtures, silk stockings, and the hundred and one other articles that are being introduced into the Soviet market. If planning eliminates the consumer's free choice, why does not Soviet planning eliminate these dispensable commodities? The answer is of course that the Bolsheviks want the population of the Soviet Union to enjoy a maximum of comforts and luxuries. But this is subjective. The compelling reason is that the success of socialist economy is predicated on an uninterrupted expansion of industrial plant. And production will increase faster if the individual producer's incentive is stimulated by the knowledge that he can spend all he earns on desirable and attractive goods. "Socialist competition," shock brigades, and other devices whereby the government sought to raise output by appealing to social ideals represent the passing phase when goods were scarce. The call to conscience remains, but the chief emphasis now is on concrete compensation in the form of consumers' commodities. The greater the variety and the better the quality of goods, the harder men and women will work. Some people will steal. If Soviet economics were to check the consumer's free choice, Soviet economy would stagnate. All this conforms with the principle that the Bolsheviks do not object to personal initiative or to personal wealth. They object to the conversion of personal wealth into private capital, because they are convinced that socialism guarantees progress and individual well-being more effectively than does private capitalism.

The Dollar: A Political Toy

By HENRY HAZLITT

NEARLY two years ago the present writer published two articles in The Nation (issues of March 30 and April 6, 1932) advocating the devaluation of the dollar as a desperate step to meet a desperate emergency. The amount of devaluation suggested was approximately one-third. At that time such a step was nowhere being seriously discussed, and the proposal seemed even to myself to be academic and remote from possible political adoption. Moreover, even apart from this, I felt at the time certain misgivings about the advocacy of such a measure. For to arouse interest in any form of currency change in a time of depression is only too easy, as all our history shows; and it seemed to me that once public attention was turned in this direction, more necessary readjustments, which came closer to removing the causes of the depression, would be slighted. Two measures which seemed to me fundamental, and without the incidental dangers of devaluation, were the scaling down of tariffs and a friendly and realistic readjustment of the war debts. "These two measures," I wrote, "should in any case be taken first. If in themselves they should bring about sufficient revival, devaluation could be avoided; and if devaluation were resorted to without them, it might prove in the end abortive, for after the initial recovery" the lack of more fundamental readjustments "could only bring another period of strangulation."

This consideration was not the only one which prevented me from pressing the idea of devaluation with vigor. There was also the practical consideration that though an intelligent and "scientific" devaluation was theoretically possible, it would be utopian to expect such a devaluation from practical politicians; for practical politicians, given even the greatest sincerity and good intentions, have never understood money, and if they are told that they can tinker with it in one way they will proceed to tinker with it in twenty. Writing on the subject nearly a year later, in Common Sense of February 16, 1933, while the Hoover Administration was still upon us, I pointed to the fact that in neither Great Britain nor Japan had there been any rise of internal prices at all proportionate to the depreciation of the currencies:

These disappointing price adjustments [I wrote] are the result of several factors. Chief among them, I believe, is that no definite new gold value has yet been fixed for either currency. It has therefore become the football of speculation, fluctuating from day to day, creating a general atmosphere of uncertainty, and tending still further to choke the currents of foreign trade. Unfortunately, if we have inflation at all in this country, this is the kind we are overwhelmingly likely to get—inflation by default, the inflation of drift, inflation without plan or understanding.

I apologize for these lengthy self-quotations, but I make them because they establish something more substantial than the hollow satisfaction of having been right. They help to answer those who maintain that devaluation does not raise prices, and who, in supposed confirmation of this, point out triumphantly that while the dollar has now depreciated 40 per cent since last February, the general price level has risen only 20 per cent in that time. These quotations indicate that at least a few of the advocates of devaluation have always recognized the difference between devaluation and mere depreciation, between certainty and uncertainty, between being on a gold basis and being off it, and that such advocates never expected depreciation and uncertainty to bring the results they expected from devaluation and certainty.

In the nine months since we abandoned the gold basis, the demoralizing effects of currency uncertainty have become obvious to an increasingly wide circle of observers. When President Roosevelt announced his new gold policy on January 15, therefore, many of these persons hailed it with satisfaction, chiefly on the ground that it put an end to this uncertainty. I cannot myself take this optimistic view. For though the President's new statement removes some uncertainties, it leaves many others; and some of the certainties it does give us are hardly reassuring. Let us consider a few of its implications in turn:

1. The seizure of all the gold in the Federal Reserve banks. No one questions that the government, representing as it does the people as a whole, is entitled to all the windfall profits of devaluation. The soundest course would have been for the government to take these, and use them to pay off its excessive debt to the reserve system. Instead of seizing merely the profits, the government is seizing all the gold, the physical gold itself, and planning to pay off nothing to the reserve banks. Wholly apart from the question of constitutionality, this is a dangerous act. From a monetary standpoint, it is worse than unnecessary. It will tend to hurt confidence further rather than to restore it. It puts the gold supply in political hands, and increases and indefinitely prolongs the temptation to play with it and tinker with it. At the World Bank it is pointed out that the world-wide trend of sentiment among monetary experts has been toward freeing monetary systems and central banks from political control; in no important country except Russia does the government still own the gold reserve.

2. There appears to have been an abandonment on the part of the President of at least the commodity-dollar idea, but this abandonment is by no means clear cut. However desirable the commodity dollar may be as an ideal, it is a practical impossibility because (a) if adopted by the United States acting alone it would perpetuate fluctuations in exchange rates, so continuing to demoralize foreign trade, and (b) even if adopted in world collaboration it would allow international speculators to trade with impunity against the government and lead to constant and disastrous raids on the gold supply. What the President seems to have in mind now is a sort of half-hearted compromise between a commodity dollar and a flat devaluation. This hybrid plan merely lacks the theoretical charm of the first and the practical advantages of the second. It continues the present uncertainty with regard to the value of the dollar, at least within a 20 per cent range, and it continues the uncertainty regarding the ultimate date of gold convertibility.

3. If a flat devaluation is ultimately made, the proposed rate is dangerously low. Such conservative authorities on money as Professor E. W. Kemmerer and B. M. Anderson, Jr., who now reluctantly accept devaluation, believe that we should devalue at approximately 65 per cent of the old parity rather than at 60 or 50 per cent; and though both regard even this figure as a political rather than an economic necessity, I incline to believe, on economic grounds, that the figure is about right. Professor Kemmerer points out that, even if we assume no tendency for prices to rise in any case as a result of the return of normal confidence and as a result of the decreased world demand for gold brought about by devaluation, a 60-cent gold dollar would ultimately mean a general price level 56 per cent higher than now and 21 per cent higher even than it was in the so-called "normal" year 1926; while a 50-cent dollar would mean a general price level ultimately 86 per cent higher than now and about 45 per cent higher than in 1926. It need not be pointed out how adverse the effect of this would be on labor, in view of the historic tendency of wage advances to lag behind price advances. For purely monetary reasons, it is true, it is better to have a devaluation that is somewhat too great rather than one that is somewhat too small, to reduce the danger of ever needing a second devaluation, but even when this is allowed for, as well as the strong political pressure of the farming elements, 40 per cent ought to be regarded as the maximum devaluation rather than as the minimum.

4. The President in his January 15 message incidentally remarked: "The practice of transferring gold from one individual to another or from the government to an individual within a nation is not only unnecessary but is in every way undesirable. The transfer of gold in bulk is essential only for the payment of international trade balances." This belief is erroneous, and ought to be abandoned. Such a policy would permit foreigners, but not Americans, to protect themselves in times of monetary danger. It would mean that foreign speculators could pull out our gold, but not American speculators. In actual practice, it would not even protect the American gold supply. Americans who feared the stability of the currency, or who wanted to hoard, would simply act through foreign agents. As a matter of fact, continuous and free convertibility, both at home and abroad, acts in the long run as a protection rather than a danger to a currency. The loss of gold is a danger signal against credit and other monetary excesses, and in all but periods of the most violent upheaval leads to a curbing of such excesses in time rather than to an abandonment of the gold basis.

5. "Because of world uncertainties, I do not believe it desirable in the public interest that an exact value for the dollar be now fixed." This is not only President Roosevelt's policy; it is the policy of Great Britain and of every other nation now on a paper basis. The fundamental fallacy of that policy is that it creates and prolongs the very uncertainties that it fears. It is true that no one can tell precisely how any given percentage of devaluation will affect the general price level. The forces at work are too complex, and they are elusive because they are basically psychological. But in so far as this uncertainty exists, it will be just as great a year or two years or three years from now as it is today. A level can be fixed only in accordance with probabilities and reasonable suppositions. One can merely say that, other things being equal, the price level will vary inversely as the gold content of the monetary unit in terms of which prices are fixed.

6. The $2,000,000,000 stabilization fund, though it follows the example of Great Britain, is at bottom unnecessary. The common assumption that de facto stabilization must precede de jure stabilization is completely mistaken. The simple truth is that de jure stabilization is easier, less cumbersome, and less expensive than an attempt at de facto stabilization without it.

In sum, the way to stabilize is to stabilize. The way to devalue is to devalue. It would give a tremendous lift to world confidence if Great Britain and the United States agreed to return to gold convertibility at the same time, each fixing its own rate, incidentally attempting, merely for convenience of calculation, to have the two currencies bear round relationships to each other instead of the former cumbersome $4.86656. We should not worry about trying to under-devalue the British for the sake of foreign trade. The real advantages of such competitive under-devaluation would be negligible and temporary at best; most of such alleged advantages are illusory. It would be folly enough to start a "currency war" even if the gains of victory were real; it is insane to contemplate one when the gains even of the victor would be practically non-existent, wholly apart from the certainty of tariff reprisals.

Hitler Dissolves the Fascist Unions

By LUDWIG LORE

IN the clamor over the persecution of the German Jew and the expatriation of the German intellectual, elements which comprise less than 5 per cent of the country's population, German labor and the fate of its trade-union organizations have received surprisingly little attention outside of Germany. Yet the National Socialist labor program and its development in the Third Reich are of much greater and much more lasting significance. The dictatorship's attitude toward labor is fundamental to fascism, while the suppression of the Jew and the intellectual is a superficial outgrowth and incidental to Germany's momentary national needs.

To the American who scans his own labor horizon with an interested eye, the influence of this new growth in Italy and Germany on the labor unions in his own country should be a matter of some concern. The mass influx of hitherto unorganized elements into existing unions and the influence that these workers—for the most part unskilled and poorly paid—will exert in the American labor movement will endow its organizations with new potentialities. Furthermore, the emphasis placed by capital on company unionism under the New Deal may well lead to a more sympathetic attitude toward the fascist brand of employer-dominated labor organization.

Dr. Robert Ley, the leader of Germany's National Labor Front, expressed the conflict between class-conscious and acquiescent labor unionism concretely on May 3 of last year, one day after the occupation of all trade-union headquarters, the arrest of all trade-union officials, and their replacement by Nazi functionaries had made the "coordination" of the country's labor organizations an accomplished fact. "When once we have freed the German labor unions from the evil influence of the Marxist class-struggle idea, they will be in a position to defend the interests of German labor more emphatically and more effectively than ever before." Several weeks later, Walter Schuhmann, appointed by Hitler to direct the "coordinated" white-collar workers' unions, proclaimed that "the trade union is the economic representative of the worker in industry and must be preserved intact and independent of the interference of National Socialist shop units."

The fall of the curtain on Germany's independent trade unions was not decided on without serious controversy in the Nazi ranks. Göring, Frick, and others favored the immediate and unequivocal destruction of the trade-union offices, while the Nazi leaders from the great industrial centers for a time insisted or pretended to insist on the retention of the trade unions and their headquarters as bulwarks of fascist labor. Thousands believed what Goebbels had promised in the Berlin street-car strike of September, 1932—that "a new National Socialist leadership would make the employing class feel the weight of its fist, would not, like the Marxists, back down before them." But the May Day that followed Hitler's accession to power showed the National Socialist labor program in a different light.

Official arbitrators (Treuhänder der Arbeit) were appointed and given full and authoritative control over all matters concerning labor and working conditions. That they were recruited chiefly from among corporation lawyers clearly reveals the purpose of their appointment. The trade unions became mere discussion clubs. They lost the right to strike, to make contracts, to function generally as independent bodies. "Only the enemies of our revolution," announced Dr. Ley, "can be interested in stoppages, strikes, lockouts, and similar things. Oppose them wherever they raise their head, be on your guard, work for the unimpeded growth of our industries, for the success, for the victory, for the greatness of our Germany and our people."

What was the caliber of the men who replaced the "Marxist chairwarmers" of the old trade unions? There was Colonel von Gilsa for instance, formerly general director of a steel plant, who now received "honorary appointment" as secretary of the Steel and Iron Workers' Union with full authority over the finances of the organization. The largest trade-union federation, the Metallarbeiter-Verband, with 500,000 members, was placed under the control of three S. A. Nazis—Heinz Lothar Beck, twenty-six years old, Johannes Müller, twenty-eight, and Richard Hasse, thirty-two, none of whom had ever worked in the metal industry or had ever been connected with any other industrial enterprise. Their sole claim to the posts lay in their faithful service in the Nazi ranks.

An order issued last June by the director of the Organization Bureau of the Labor Front will illustrate the brutality with which the new regime wreaked vengeance on deposed trade-union officials:

The directors of the General Federation of German Workers will submit to me not later than the end of this week a list of all leading Marxists in the trade unions whose names will be included by me on a "List of the Despised." This list, which will probably contain several thousand names, will be sent to all ministries, labor bureaus, employers' organizations, and all other interested persons and organizations directly connected with German industry, to the end that it may become impossible for these elements to secure employment of any kind. No false sentimentality shall prevent the directors of trade unions from submitting the names of these despicable scoundrels. Only those may be omitted who, having held unimportant office, were probably led astray or acted under pressure from their superiors. Heil Hitler! [Signed] MUCHOW.

In his pamphlet "Ministersessel oder Revolution" Otto Strasser, at present a refugee in Prague, leader of the "Schwarze Front," that Nazi secession movement which really believed in the socialist program of the Nazi Party, quotes a telling utterance made by Hitler in the course of a conversation in May, 1930:

We have an example that we may safely follow—Italian fascism. Just as in that country, our own National Socialist state will find employers and workers side by side with equal privileges and rights, under the direction of a powerful state which will render the final verdict in all differences so that industrial strife no longer menaces the life of the nation.

But just as in Italy, events in Germany failed to follow the straight and narrow path of Nazi theory. Mass organizations, especially when they are based on the material interests of their members, develop their own logic and make their own laws. Mussolini, after his march on Rome, retained the trade-union formations and placed them under the direction of tried and trusted Fascist leaders. For a time all went well enough—until in 1928 the trade unions rebelled against Fascist industrial and social policies and put the supremacy of Mussolini to a severe test. Only the ruthlessness of the Duce, who at once removed from their posts Rossini and many others among his most intimate friends, carried the day for fascism in that critical period. National Socialist Germany found itself face to face with a similar situation in its fascized unions. Despite propaganda and terror the old trade-union leaders retained much of their influence over the membership. The superior knowledge and experience of these trained men and women and the confidence they had won in years of work shoulder to shoulder with the rank and file could not be wiped out by a single stroke of the pen. Discussion in union meetings, even when it turned not on political but on practical questions of the workers' livelihood, had a habit of moving in uncomfortably critical directions that sorely taxed the untried abilities of the Nazi directors. Threats and warnings were of no avail and the Nazi leaders were forced to apply more drastic measures. In a meeting of the Leipzig printing trades several typesetters dared to laugh at a particularly stupid and bombastic speech by the Nazi Commissar. They were expelled at once for "conduct unbecoming a member of a trade-union organization." In Essen three members of a section of the Metal Workers' Union were arrested and interned in a concentration camp for scoffing remarks during the course of a meeting. In Breslau a wood worker forgot his duties as a German worker and failed to greet the Nazi official with a "Heil, Hitler!" He was expelled and sent to jail for four months. Such instances could be multiplied a thousand fold. But in spite of these terroristic methods the unions continued to be a fruitful field for Marxist propaganda. An incessant flood of leading questions could so thoroughly disorganize a meeting that its use as a basis for the propagation of fascist ideas and the formation of a new front became nil. For these reasons the unions had to be suppressed lest they undermine the proud structure of National Socialist supremacy. Hitler profited by Mussolini's experience. He did not wait for a crisis, but wiped out the organizations which gave his enemies so many opportunities for anti-fascist agitation.

After the November 12 election with its "demonstration of the German people for Hitler," the government believed that the moment for the destruction of the trade-union remnants had arrived. Trade-union and employer organizations were ordered dissolved—why employers' anti-union associations when the government so whole-heartedly assumes their functions? The Labor Front, in which formerly manual workers, white-collar workers, and employers had been separately organized, was reconstructed. The existing distinctions were wiped out and replaced by a vertical structure in which all persons connected with the industrial life of the nation, from the unskilled worker to the employer, hold individual membership. Withdrawal—that is, the non-payment of dues—is penalized with unemployment, the "person thus withdrawing from membership in the Labor Front losing all claim to state or municipal support." An announcement by Dr. Ley, dated January 14, says:

Citizens of the Reich who do not yet belong to the German Labor Front are more urgently than ever called upon to join its ranks. Workers, salaried employees, and employers belong together. Having recognized this fundamental need in our new social order—the need of bringing together workers and employers in the country, in our industries, and in our population—we must begin with the Labor Front as a matter of course. We cannot preach what we do not practice.

It is characteristic of Nazi methods that the National Socialist functionaries who had briefly exercised nominal control over the coordinated labor unions were given the status of civil-service employees with full pension rights.

With the dissolution of the trade unions the last hope of the German worker for an organ within the Third Reich through which he might conceivably express his needs and problems disappeared. A proclamation issued late in November and signed by three Cabinet ministers and Dr. Ley outlines the aims and functions of the Labor Front:

It is the will of our leader Adolf Hitler that the German Labor Front shall not decide on the material problems of the worker's daily existence, nor shall it concern itself with the conflicting interests of individuals in the economic process. For the regulation of conditions of labor, forms will presently be created which will give to the leader and his staff in every plant the position and functions that a National Socialist conception prescribes.

The exalted aim of the Labor Front is the education of all Germans who participate in our industrial life, for the National Socialist state and to a National Socialist conception. It aims particularly to train those best fitted to exert a directive influence in the branches of our social institutions, our labor courts, and our social services. It will strive to make the social honor of the leader of industry (the employer) and that of his following (the employees) a driving force for a new social and economic order.

Yet there was never a time when the German worker needed the protection of a strong labor union more sorely than now. Hitler's fight against unemployment has been a pathetic failure. Franz Seldte, Reich Minister of Labor, in a memorandum issued in the beginning of December "for the exclusive information of official and semi-official organs" of the government provides us with interesting material on the "status of the German labor struggle." According to this document the changes that have taken place in the German labor market are along two lines. For purely financial reasons a large number of persons formerly drawing unemployment benefits have been deprived of this public support under the more stringent regulations introduced by the new regime. This has so reduced the sums paid out that the unemployment-insurance fund showed a surplus of approximately 228,000,000 marks in the period from April to September, 1933.

Deprived of their unemployment benefits, these men and women no longer report at the local labor offices and after a few months are dropped from the lists and disappear from labor statistics. Add to them the tens of thousands of Jews and Marxists permanently removed from Germany's economic life and expelled for the "honor of the fatherland" from the ranks of those entitled to support, and the number of unemployed again appears reduced. The elimination of thousands of women from the labor market, particularly in the commercial fields, and their replacement by unemployed men has further cut down the number of persons officially recognized as "out of work."

But the greatest reduction in figures for the unemployed has been achieved by the simple expedient of turning recipients of unemployed benefits into recipients of public-relief jobs. According to the report of the Minister of Labor the "number of men thus employed is considerable. Official employment figures issued at the end of September, 1933, show 232,000 on public emergency work, 165,000 on reclamation and agricultural work, 64,000 on relief work, 234,000 in the voluntary labor camps—together, in round numbers, 700,000 persons who without the direct assistance of the state would probably have been found on the list of the unemployed."

Compare these figures with those of the pre-Hitler period. In 1932, the year of the greatest depression, 5,102,750 persons registered as unemployed during the month of September. In the same month of 1933, 4,549,222 were officially reported as out of work, representing a reduction of about 550,000 as compared with the previous year. But the figures of the Labor Ministry quoted above prove that this reduction is a sham and a delusion. The 700,000 relief workers, most of whom receive only housing, clothes, and food, and a pittance for their labor, cannot be classed as regularly employed wage workers. List them where they rightly belong, as out of work, and they would more than offset the apparent reduction in the Reich labor report. Moreover, it should not be overlooked that these unpaid men and women, far from representing a healthier economic condition in the Reich, a cranking up of its industrial life, and a faster tempo in the industrial machine, are actually a millstone around its neck, contributing nothing toward an uplift in the home market.

In their misrepresentation of existing conditions, the artful dodgers in the Hitler Government can count on the services of an enslaved press; it would have been difficult, however, to close the eyes of trade unionists to the true state of affairs, still more difficult to enforce their silence. The labor-union movement was the last remaining vestige of social consciousness in the land of the Hitlerites. With its destruction, the new regime relieved itself of all moral responsibility toward the working class.

What Price Tall Buildings?

By OLIVER WHITWELL WILSON

AN elderly lady was examining the drawings of some new buildings that it was proposed to erect in London near her residence. The site could be seen from her window through the trees of the park. Eventually she rejected the plans. The buildings were too tall. "They will spoil my view."

Queen Victoria, in setting this precedent, little realized, perhaps, the significance of her decision; but London has ever since steadily rejected the idea of high buildings. Nine stories, with an occasional exception, are the allowable limit. As a result, London's skyline is very much the same as it was on the day Sir Christopher Wren died. This conservatism of Londoners has often been ridiculed in this country. Yet a small item which appeared recently in the New York press may mean that we shall have to revamp our ideas on tall buildings.

In an inconspicuous paragraph printed amid a maze of announcements issued by the National Recovery Administration, Robert D. Kohn, an architect chosen to assist the government in its recovery program, was quoted as saying that in housing which was to be financed by the National Recovery Administration five stories would be the limit of height for walk-ups and perhaps six stories for elevator apartments, and the average would be three stories. Independently, the New York Regional Plan Association has condemned as unwise any and all rebuilding schemes for the Chrystie-Forsythe site, a property consisting of several narrow strips of land on the lower East Side of Manhattan which were cleared some years ago of disreputable slum tenements. In announcing its decision, the Regional Plan Association stated that proposed developments of this type were not in accord with the best interests of the city. In order to obtain enough income to make housing on that site selfliquidating, the promoters had been considering twelve-story buildings.

It is interesting to recall that many years ago, when New York zoning was first talked of, an advisory committee of which Electus D. Litchfield, an architect, was a prominent member developed the principle of the maximum bulk. This would have limited the total allowable cubic contents of a building on a site to x times the area of that site. X was to be a variable constant depending upon the zone in question. This proviso was kept out of the zoning law by shortsighted speculators who brought pressure to bear upon the city politicians. In its place the existing rule of x times the street width measured from the street center was adopted. This develops a building into a square box with a pyramidal or wedge-shaped top. It is the reason for the present setback style. But it would not have been bad if another joker had not been put in: a tower might be built on 25 per cent of the site. This tower might go up to the moon if it could be so constructed. Thus bulk was allowed to go on forever, irrespective of any considerations of neighborhood, public policy, or economic value. It was hoped that such a tower would pay if it were normally 75 per cent or even 70 per cent occupied. No thought was given to the effect on surrounding property of such concentration of floor area or to the resultant drain of tenants away from that property. It is not surprising, then, for us to read that August Heckscher is suing Rockefeller Center for $10,000,000 for damage done to neighboring property.

New York at that time led the country in an orgy of building skyscrapers. Towers shot up overnight to greater and greater heights. There was the spectacle of one which had its spire constructed inside the building and then had this spike hoisted up to an altitude that beat all others. But there are now several which rise to greater heights than that one reached by its ingenious trick. In order to obtain suitable sites for these large developments, many old buildings, even some which had by no means outlasted their usefulness, were razed to make place for new construction. Tenants were forced to move, often at great expense. In certain sections of Manhattan office space for rent increased daily. It was a great bubble while it lasted.

There was another disastrous result. The city fathers found a valid excuse for doubling in ten years the city's assessed valuation. This doubled the city's borrowing power, and the taxpayers are now paying through the nose for a debt which takes over 30 per cent of the city's income in carrying charges, interest payments, and amortization.

Then the bubble burst. Five tall buildings on Forty-second Street not only got into difficulties themselves, but damaged all other values on the street. The largest, the Lincoln Building, had to be sold at public auction three years after its completion. Another building still under construction has been forced to cut its original rental rates in half in order to attract tenants in any quantity; one building in this group has more office space than any other building in the whole city. How this project will ever bring financial profit is a question all are asking. The law of diminishing returns seems rarely to have been taken into account. This point of view was presented to one promoter. He became interested, and studied the particular project that he had in mind from that angle. He found that every story over the forty-fifth became progressively a greater economic drain on the possible profits. It may well be asked whether the advertising value of an eighty-story building can offset this steady financial drain.

The reaction has now set in. The city's tax delinquency is $310,000,000, of which $215,000,000 is deemed collectible. The inflated values that have been set upon property are believed by competent estimators to be 30 per cent too high. From being the soundest of assets mortgages have become a drug in the market, and mortgage money is almost unobtainable.

Perhaps Queen Victoria was a better judge of real-estate policy than the promoters believed at the time. Perhaps she gave expression to a universal sentiment when she objected to her view being shut off by taller buildings. In New York there are few views. The skyscrapers are magnificent when seen from the river. But what an economic folly it is, that many workers should have to use electric light at high noon. The shadow of the tallest building in the world cuts off the sun from many buildings for many hours each day. In summer its influence is felt for many blocks, in winter for a mile or more!

Height has created the same problems in residential regions. Inflated land values brought forth an orgy of apartments which filled all the space that the laws permitted for such structures. These have been well called "super-slums." It will not be forgotten how the apartment hotel was used as an excuse to increase the allowable cubage at the ultimate expense of decent living. Many of these buildings are renting at greatly reduced rates, many are almost empty. That even six-story tenements are not desirable is proved by the astounding figures that have been brought to light by the federal censuses. Over 1,000 persons emigrate from Manhattan every week, most of them to lower buildings, light and air, sunshine and green lawns. And there is no longer unlimited immigration to fill the vacancies thus left.

There could not be a more definite proof of the trend of the times than the spectacle of a "taxpayer" on the site of the old Belmont Hotel, which was killed by competition, or of a twelve-story building, quite modern, being replaced by a two-story taxpayer on Madison Avenue in the fashionable Fifty-seventh Street area. Real-estate operators are at their wits' end, taxpayers are defaulting, and buildings are deteriorating through non-occupancy. One hotel overlooking Central Park has actually never removed the dust sheets which still shroud in perpetual gloom several floors of suites. Although there can be little sympathy for those who overpromoted the building boom, such stagnation must be prevented in the future.

There are two necessary steps to take. First, there must be a drastic revision of the zoning sections of the building code. Second, stringent bulk-cubage limitations that were worked out some years ago must be put in force. But in order that these may be effective, consideration will have to be given to existing structures that exceed such limitations. Each block which includes these buildings will have to be averaged in such a way that any new building will not exceed the 100 per cent total allowable for that block. In other words, where tall buildings exist, new buildings in the same block must be low. In this way some of the present evil will be rectified, and as property values are at a low ebb, no one will be hurt by such restrictions. They will permit a general readjustment of property values, and will also tend to protect existing investments in tall buildings against further adjacent destructive competition. Such a limitation will affect not only business buildings, but also tall apartment buildings in which only the ultimate physical development of a particular property has been achieved. Studies by such experts as Henry Wright, Albert Mayer, Eugene Klaber, and Clarence S. Stein seem to prove that from three to four and a half stories is the economical height for residential-group buildings. By keeping housing to this limit, as Robert D. Kohn has proposed, congestion will be kept to a minimum.

The preceding suggestion is a practical solution of the problem, but another point of view will make its advantages still clearer. There is an evident and growing need for proper and adequate public appreciation of city and regional planning. Until this is developed, public opinion will not be strong enough to combat independent shortsighted speculation. Such appreciation will remove the bandages that have blinded the many private investors who lost millions in real estate. So-called mortgage bonds of a prominent chain of large hotels to three times their value, and inflated value at that, could not have been unloaded on a public with an understanding of what planning really is. These investors would have realized that the insertion of "participating" and other such terms took the gold out of these mortgages and turned them into dross. Is it any wonder that most hotels, financed in such a fashion, are in difficulties?

Our City of the Future will not necessarily, then, be a super-Babylonian dream of impossible buildings which crowd human beings together in as small an area as possible. Apart from the potent economic and social objections, tall buildings do "spoil the view" for those of us who have to work and live in their shade.

The Power Industry Goes NRA

By JEROME COUNT

CONJECTURE has failed to explain why the power industry did not refuse to submit a "code of fair competition" to a hostile federal Administration. Early in the NRA era this industry declared that it would "stand on the Constitution." Several weeks before the industry actually submitted a code, the Edison Electric Institute bewailed this invasion into the sacred province of State regulation and insisted that a code would mean the irremediable loss of its legal rights. Such a code would be an unwarranted intrusion of federal regulation into intrastate business. It was argued that unfair "competition" could not possibly need regulation in a non-competitive industry.

Nevertheless, after an unexplained change of front and the submission of a code a revealing commentary appeared in the Public Utility Fortnightly:

It now develops that some utilities are cheering for the NRA for projecting itself into the picture just when it seemed as if the whole country were demanding drastic slashes in utility rates. . . . With the federal government openly striving to raise prices of other commodities, the least that the utilities might expect of the Blue Eagle would be some relief from the increased pressure of rate reductions. If that relief is forthcoming, code costs would be a cheap price to pay to get rid of the rate-reduction bugaboo.

It is true that State utility commissions had been showing signs of yielding to public pressure and many rate reductions appeared to be in sight. But hardly had the utilities consented to the blanket code, when a new barrier was thrust between consumers and reduced rates. Increased labor costs under the NRA, according to the utilities, made it impossible to maintain pay rolls and employment and reduce rates at the same time. Many State commissions, just then considering reducing rates, were faced with a new problem. The New York Public Service Commission, for example, allowed $4,000,000 per annum for increased costs under the NRA. However, when public hearings were held upon the proposed permanent code, it came out that increased costs would be no more than nominal.

Minimum wages offered by the industry are below the subsistence level. In opposing the inclusion of public plants under the code, one municipal representative said that "they [the municipal plants] would be ashamed to have their names attached to a code establishing such low wages" as were proposed by the private companies. Wages submitted by the Edison Institute are as low as $9.60 a week and hours run as high as forty-eight a week. According to the institute, it is the public which will not stand for high wages or a shorter week. At all code hearings it is usual for industry to anticipate the demands of labor by a tearful reference to the sad state of balance sheets and the awful toll of the depression on the profit ledger. Deficits are usually featured, but at the utility hearings not a passed dividend was even suggested. Labor met this challenge. The Brotherhood of Edison Employees of America proved that the power industry emerged from the depression—in the words of the industry itself—"practically uninjured." It showed that the dividend payments of this industry in 1932 had increased by $155,500,000 over 1927. Surplus and reserves also rose by a tidy $800,000,000. It was also shown that more than 2,000,000 additional customers were supporting the electric industry in an extraordinary state of prosperity. Meanwhile, in 1932 pay rolls had declined from the peak by $75,000,000 a year.

When the code submitted by the Edison Institute was examined, it was found to contain no fewer than sixty-seven exemptions enabling employers to escape from increased pay rolls. Not satisfied with an abnormally low labor cost, compared with other industries, the electric industry planned to limit the operation of the code to an uncertain and insignificant fraction of employees. Thus wages in general were to be left at the old low levels while the industry pleaded increased labor costs to block rate reductions. By the confession of the Edison Institute itself, the increased cost of minimum wages to the entire industry under the code is less than $\frac{1}{3}$ of 1 per cent of former pay rolls. Upon wholly unreliable and inaccurate data, however, the industry contended that costs would be raised more than 10 per cent as a result of the maximum-hour provisions of the code—a forty- to forty-eight-hour week, with numerous exceptions.

The insistence of the private companies that municipal plants should be covered by the code proved embarrassing. It was shown that the municipals maintained far better wages and working conditions than the private companies. In some cases, it was disclosed, municipal plants pay $33\frac{1}{3}$ per cent higher wages than competing private companies. Municipal representatives complained, in fact, that if they were brought under the code it would tend to lower the wages they paid.

The habit of imperiously dictating terms to labor found expression in the grossly inadequate provisions of the proposed code. Unorganized for half a century, the industry has had a free hand with its 200,000 employees. Not long ago Donald Richberg, speaking of the power industry, said: "We find here an industry dominated by an un-American labor policy, denying the historic freedom of American life to its employees, and at best subjecting them to a degrading sort of paternalism." This "degrading paternalism" has taken many forms. One type is the enforced insurance schemes to which employees must subscribe their quota or suffer the displeasure of "straw bosses" or even loss of employment. Subscriptions to highly speculative stock issues of the employers at peak prices is another form of paternalism of which the industry boasts. Contributions are demanded to all manner of "charity drives." Vigorous promotion of customer stock-ownership is insisted upon. Appliance, "load-building," and profit-saving safety campaigns are only several of the daily incidents of utility employment. Power employees are probably the most harassed and coerced group of workers in the country.

Along with these practices utility companies openly foster political propaganda among their employees and customers. A concentrated drive is even now being made to enlist every one of the 200,000 utility workers as "willing subordinates"—I use the industry's own phrase—in a coordinated nation-wide effort to "build political fences" against rate reductions, municipal ownership, taxes, and every fancied grievance. The spirit of the old N. E. L. A. is not dead—it has merely learned to wear the immaculate shirt-front of the Edison Institute.

The NRA has given added impetus to this "degrading paternalism." Mutual benefit, social, and insurance societies have been hastily converted into company unions by many electric systems. Discarded and discredited "employee representation" plans have been hurriedly revived by others, and new ones have been foisted, ready made, upon unorganized and helpless employees. It is estimated that private power companies are spending no less than $1,000,000 a year on company-union plans—all charged to operating expenses, thereby making the consumer an unwilling and unsuspecting supporter of these frauds upon the collective-bargaining provisions of the NRA.

Surreptitious and open intimidation against genuine union activities exists in the power industry, despite Blue Eagle agreements. Employees have been forced to relinquish local-union charters; they have received subtle hints to consult company officials if they feel the "need of organization"; they are gently reminded that they may but are not required to organize for collective bargaining. Active organizers have been discharged for reasons of "economy," "efficiency," and trivial breaches of petty regulations. "Brotherhood busters" have openly boasted of their appointment by company officials. Employees in stand-by plants are intimidated by threats of shut-down, although these plants are still included in the companies' property for rate-making purposes. No conceivable device has been overlooked in the concerted plan to stifle interest in union activity. When the Brotherhood of Edison Employees of America opposed the company-union plan of the New York Edison system, 33,000 employees were informed through company channels that the brotherhood was trying to block collective bargaining. When, despite terrorization, employees are inclined to organize, their leaders are tempted with better jobs and increased wages—only to be victimized when union organization has been frustrated by the deception. Of about twenty company unions in the industry, not one appeared at Washington to oppose the niggardly code submitted by the Edison Institute. The chairman of one of these "unions" naively confessed that the president of his company would represent the members of his union before the NRA.

Electric sales now approach the peak level and it is expected that revenues will increase by $150,000,000 in the year 1934. Technological unemployment will continue, however, and under the proposed code hardly 4,000 out of 50,000 unemployed will receive jobs. The intentions of the industry, expressed by its proposed code, are clear. This code would leave employment substantially unaffected and yet serve as an obstructive device against rate reductions. Neither collective bargaining, increased purchasing power, nor substantial re-employment would be achieved by it. Finally, and of primary importance to the private companies, the code would be for them the first step toward acquiring some measure of influence over publicly owned systems.

The Birth-Control Conference

By STELLA HANAU

Washington, January 19

THE American Conference on Birth Control and National Recovery, held in Washington on January 15, 16, and 17, was marked throughout by an earnest and scientific spirit and a total absence of jingoism. Six hundred delegates, including distinguished specialists in the fields of medicine, sociology, biology, and social work, scrutinized the subject from every angle. They discussed the relation of birth control to national and international problems, to federal relief, public health, sex mores, maternal mortality; they appraised contraceptive methods, not hesitating to point out flaws, viewed present clinical facilities, and laid plans in orderly, concrete, and efficient manner for speeding up birth-control work and furthering scientific research.

Margaret Sanger, president of the National Committee on Federal Legislation for Birth Control and organizer of the conference, opened the proceedings with a plea for the "forgotten woman" and for the support of the bill now pending, which is designed to liberalize the federal law governing the sending through the mails of contraceptive information and supplies. From that moment until the final meeting on the evening of January 17, when a resolution was adopted urging that federal relief workers be instructed to refer the unemployed to existing birth-control clinics, the facts in themselves built up the case for birth control.

The relation of birth control to present national and international problems was ably brought out at the early sessions. Population is already affected by birth control. It remains to study how and when to control population intelligently. Warren S. Thompson, director of the Scripps Foundation for Research in Population Problems, using Japan as an apt illustration, showed that population pressure is inevitably a disturber of world peace. But war brings only temporary easement. Man must learn to adjust his numbers; population growth must come under conscious control.

Government cognizance of the conference entered at this point in the person of Mordecai Ezekiel, economic adviser to the Secretary of Agriculture. Dr. Ezekiel predicted that the population of the United States will become stable within the next few decades, and suggested that now was the time to encourage more children from the upper economic strata and fewer from the lower. Caustic exception was taken to such arbitrary division into classes; the conference was not without its currents of radicalism.

Criticism of the existing order, academically phrased, was presented in a paper on National Economic Planning by Professor Joseph J. Spengler of the University of Arizona. He pointed out two methods of national planning in which natural, artificial, and human resources may be coordinated: through the capitalistic price system and through the action of a supreme economic council. The present system—if we abolish dishonesty in business, if we make the nation statistically introspective, if we set up permanent relief for the victims of the system through unemployment insurance, public works, and national barter corporations—will prepare the way for a planned and classless society if and when political evolution pushes us in that direction.

Passing from the general to the particular, LeRoy E. Bowman called for the immediate assumption by the community of an active, extensive, and aggressive program of birth control if we are to escape fascism.

The trend toward fascism or a socialized state may be judged, among other evidences [he said], by the measures taken by the government on birth control. If it is a cruel, senseless, socially abortive effort, such as that of Hitler and Mussolini, to induce the propagation of many and therefore necessarily poorly trained human beings, it will be fascism we will face. If it be a community effort to control the growth of society in its own best interests by fostering the spreading of knowledge that will give to parents the control they need over their own and their children's destinies, then it will most probably be a step toward a desirable cooperative commonwealth. For a community that controls itself is a democracy; a rapidly growing mass is apt to be merely fair prey for the exploitation of a dictator and a controlling few. It is therefore far more than mere contraceptive education that becomes the responsibility of the community; it is also the greater obligation to show every parent in America the social implications of the size of the family in a poverty-stricken world and in a changing social order.

The demand that birth control be linked with government relief was emphatically made by Dr. James H. S. Bossard of the University of Pennsylvania, who said:

We are now carrying on the biggest relief job in the history of the world. To finance this job we have utilized private philanthropy, apparently to the limit; we have drawn more than liberally upon current public incomes; and we are discounting the future through the creation of a huge bonded indebtedness. If this relief job is to be a mere doling out of aid, it means that we have learned nothing since the later days of the Roman emperors, who similarly fed and amused the populace at public expense. If, at a time when we are carrying on relief between three and four million families, we are going to deny and to legally forbid these families the use of agencies and methods which will permit them sanely to control their reproduction in the light of their present circumstances, then we are rejecting the philosophy underlying man's ascent from the jungle. To deny to self-respecting families in distress the right to self-determination in the sacred function of bringing new life into the world seems just about inconceivable.

The medical sessions and round tables brought the discussion even closer to actuality. It was agreed that birth control is a medical problem which should be handled by physicians. Present methods were evaluated, and demonstrated by models, slides, and movies. The effects of pregnancy on the pituitary and thyroid glands and the need of an interval of at least one, preferably two, summers between pregnancies was pointed out by Dr. Walter Timme, endocrine specialist. The so-called safe-period method, permitted by the Catholic church, was explained and rejected as too uncertain for general use.

Dr. Fred J. Taussig stated that conservative estimates place the number of abortions in the United States at 811,000 a year, with 17,000 resultant deaths. He believes that 80 per cent of this number might be prevented through birth-control instruction. That 13,000 lives might be saved each year if women knew how to prevent instead of terminate undesired pregnancies is food for thought.

Dr. Prentiss Willson, president of the Medical Society of the District of Columbia, presided over the medical sessions, and with commendable candor scored the lag of medicine in recognizing social needs. At the last meeting of the American Medical Association, Dr. Barton Cook Hirst, chairman of the section on Obstetrics and Gynecology, listed birth control as one of the four major problems in gynecology. At the same meeting a resolution asking that a committee be appointed to study the subject was defeated. Thus the American Medical Association placed itself on record as refusing to study one of the four major problems affecting the women of America.

The lack of standardization of commercial contraceptives, due in part to the failure of the medical profession to take hold of the problem and in part to the confusion and restrictions of the law, was shown in reports on research work carried on by Dr. Cecil I. B. Voge for the National Committee on Maternal Health and by Dr. Helen Holt of Margaret Sanger's Birth Control Clinical Research Bureau. Dr. Voge has investigated some five hundred products over the last five years, and Dr. Holt has recently completed a special test of thirty-three spermicides now on the market. Of these, 19 per cent showed defects in vital mechanical functioning, and 4 per cent proved totally inadequate. A resolution was adopted urging that a central research office be established to carry on laboratory tests of all products, and that no commercial contraceptives should be used by clinics until they have been passed by some such group. The Research Committee of the New York clinic, headed by Dr. Hannah M. Stone, is already functioning in this capacity and has done excellent pioneer work.

A comprehensive exhibition of historical material—clinical reports, mechanical devices from all parts of the world, samples of commercial advertising folders, maps, and charts—was one of the chief points of interest of the conference. Dr. Norman E. Himes exhibited a unique collection, tracing the history of birth control in print. It included Margaret Sanger's famous "Family Limitation," which fired the first shot in the birth-control war, in many editions and many languages; the June, 1914, issue of the Woman Rebel; the first number of the Birth Control Review; and a photostat of the earliest mention of birth control in the Egyptian Petri Papyrus of 1350 B.C. A large chart summarized the results of an inquiry into the work of clinics, carried out by Dr. Hannah M. Stone, medical director of the Clinical Research Bureau. In reply to a questionnaire of June, 1933, eighty-seven clinics, showing a total of 110,844 patients cared for, listed methods used and indicated research in new and simpler techniques. Present methods were reported as from 95 to 98 per cent successful.

Whatever the fate of the birth-control bill, which was given a hearing before the House Judiciary Committee on January 18 and 19, the conference has performed an invaluable service in summing up the present status of the movement, in showing the relation of birth control to economic and social problems, in charting the progressive trend of medicine in this important field.

The Intelligent Traveler

By JOHN ROTHSCCHILD

FOR the second season this column offers advice to Nation readers. It will inform them of events abroad which might otherwise escape them in their travels. It will present essential facts about little-known places and little-known facts about well-known places. It will report travel services and projects of which the traveler should take account in laying his plans. It will point out ways of saving money. Related facts will be gathered from widely scattered sources, a function which the traveler is rarely able to perform for himself.

The column will be edited solely with reference to the traveler's interests. It will be in line with the growing movement for consumer-education.

CRUISING

A West Indies cruise is a restful, sunny winter holiday which takes little time, is comparatively inexpensive, and provides as complete a change of local color as if you went half around the world. Nearly every transatlantic steamship line sends boats to the Caribbean during the winter and spring. Where you go depends upon how much time and money you have to spend. Bermuda, the Bahama Islands, Havana, Jamaica, Barbados, Trinidad, all are lying in their warm southern waters waiting to be visited. A typical twelve-day trip on the Mauretania takes you to Trinidad, La Guaira, Curaçao, Colon, and Nassau and costs $170. First-class accommodations on the best boats average between $12 and $15 a day.

Coastwise boats are smaller and less swanky but are well equipped and often have been built especially for the tropics. They are more like boats and less like hotels. Rates on the United Fruit Line average $8 or $9 a day. Cruises start from Boston, Baltimore, Philadelphia, and New Orleans, as well as from New York and West Coast ports. From Canada and from the port of Boston the Canadian National Steamship Line offers West Indies cruises at a little less than $8 a day. Its "vagabond" cruises from Halifax on freight boats accommodating twenty passengers cost less than $5 a day. The Standard Fruit and Steamship Company runs boats from New York to Santiago, Cuba, and Spanish Honduras, and to Jamaica and Spanish Honduras for thirteen-day cruises at about $7 a day. Furness Bermuda Line boats make twenty-three-day cruises at an average of $6 a day. With this general outline of the possibilities in your mind, consult your purse and travel agent for a few days or weeks of recreation in the sun.

MEXICO AND CUBA

Winter is the ideal time to become acquainted with ancient, vivid Mexico. The rainy season is just over now, the dust is settled for months to come, and everything has come into bloom. Many native fiestas and the important religious ceremonies connected with Lent and Easter will soon begin. Your winter visit may include your own exploration of the ruined civilizations of Yucatan—where it is too steamy and hot in summer even for archaeologists. Ward Line boats, which have a round-trip rate to Mexico City of $160, stop at Havana and at the port of Progreso in Yucatan, where you can stop over until the next boat a week later, doing the ruins thoroughly. If you prefer to view the ruined temples from the air, you can fly from Mexico City over the route that Lindbergh charted, in one of the daily planes of the Pan-American Airways.

Besides the pleasant and inexpensive boat trip from New York, you can go by steamer and return by rail through northern Mexico and the Southwest on a Ward Line circle tour which costs $180. If you live in the Middle West and must go by train, the Missouri Pacific operates the Sunshine Special from St. Louis, a crack train which reaches Mexico City in sixty-one hours. A twenty-three-day excursion costs $79.75 in fare; a ticket good for six months costs $20 more.

For flying enthusiasts the Pan-American Airways operates planes from many airports. The trip from Miami to Mexico City is popular. It takes less than two days, counting an overnight stop, and costs $153 one way. From Brownsville, Texas, the rate is $61—Mexico City is only five hours away by air.

The old cities of Mazatlan and Manzanillo, which D. H. Lawrence liked best of all Mexico, can be reached by a Grace Line cabin boat through the Panama Canal for as little as $150, one way. The steamer ticket's destination is California, but since it is good for one year, you may stop off as long as you like in the coast cities.

For years there have been rumors of how cheaply and comfortably one can live in Mexico "if one finds the right place." Finding the right place has been a matter of luck until recently. Now you may consult the Personal Travel Service conducted by Enrique Aguirre, who was formerly representative in Mexico of the Committee on Cultural Relations with Latin America. Señor Aguirre can find you charming accommodations and good food in semi-private places that resemble French pensions, which will cost as little as a hundred pesos a month—or about $30. You may enlist his help in planning what to see in Mexico, and since he is a writer and lecturer himself, his suggestions are likely to interest the Intelligent Traveler. Señor Aguirre can be found at the American Bookstore in Mexico City.

A most helpful source of advance information about Mexico is the Committee on Cultural Relations with Latin America. Its address is 112 East Nineteenth Street, New York.

"The Seminar in Cuba" under the auspices of the Committee on Cultural Relations with Latin America, will be held in Havana from March 8 to March 14. It is the first of these valuable seminars to concern itself exclusively with Cuba, although the third of the Caribbean series. The plan of the Mexican seminar, which has proved so fruitful in international understanding, will be followed in Cuba—formal lectures by Cuban and American leaders and close round-table discussions. The American faculty will include Dr. Chester Lloyd Jones, of the University of Wisconsin, Elizabeth Wallace, of the University of Chicago, and Hubert C. Herring, executive director of the Committee on Cultural Relations with Latin America. The party will be limited to between thirty-five and fifty members, and will sail on the Morro Castle on March 4. All expenses are included in the price of $218.

In the Driftway

WHAT may well turn out to be the book of the season is offered in a circular which deserves quoting. The book is the "New Dictionary of Thoughts" and it contains 20,000 of the "best thoughts on important and interesting subjects."

Both a stepping-stone and arch support to literary attainment. . . . Put punch and power into your speech, articles, advertisements, stories, sermons; add charm to conversation by quoting the gems of all literature, which makes you a leader in culture and influence. .

At present most communication, spoken or written, is conducted by means of clichés. This is likely to be true, the profound thinkers will tell you if they get a chance, in an age when all the old values are worn out and no new ones have been established. To shift from clichés to quotations might be refreshing provided an attempt were made to keep both quotations and sources varied. The shift might even be educational if the rules required quotation marks and a knowledge of sources. Such rules would have prevented, for instance, the public amazement of the reviewer who commented upon T. S. Eliot's great diversity of rhythm, and cited as an example of one mode the mellifluous line, "Sweet Thames, run softly till I end my song."

.

THIS marvelous dictionary is especially commended to editors, and "like a bolt from the blue" came the reflection that it would be of inestimable value to the Drifter's colleagues, the editors of The Nation, in those hours just before press time when the news persists in pouring in. Suppose, for instance, that President Roosevelt has announced that henceforth marines will not be landed in any Latin American country. For the editor thoroughly familiarized with these 700 pages and 20,000 thoughts it would be a matter of minutes to compose the following rousing editorial:

Apparently the "Colossus of the North" intends no more to "chase brave employment with a naked sword throughout the world." Mr. Roosevelt might well be called the 'great corrector of enormous times.' But, alas, "Hell is paved with good intentions." "We grant, although he had much wit, he was very shy of using it" and unfortunately we cannot "take the will for the deed." "Justice," Mr. Roosevelt, "is truth in action." "The manly part is to do with might and main what you can do." knowing that "the reward of a thing well done is to have done it."

And incidentally, if the editors need a "snapper" with which to end their sometimes unfavorable comment on public men, the Drifter suggests the following: "All your better deeds shall be in water writ, but this in marble."

.

IN order to help the cause of conversation by quotation the Drifter urges his readers to write their plays, novels, articles, and poems in the new medium—especially poems; and he will give a prize of one slightly used but excellently preserved quotation suitable for almost all occasions to the person who can give correctly the sources used in the paragraph above.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

The Youth Conference Again

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

It seems to me that Selden Rodman's article Youth Meets in Washington, printed in your issue of January 17, gives an entirely false impression of what happened at the National Conference of Students in Politics. I attended the conference as a neutral observer, and what I saw bore a very slight resemblance indeed to what Mr. Rodman reports.

The conference was called by a self-appointed executive committee, and that committee continued to rule to the end. It imposed on the discussion certain arbitrary restrictions which seemed to me and to many others both unwise and unnecessary. But what is of greater significance, it called the conference in the United States Chamber of Commerce building, and in order to obtain the use of that building it gave its pledge that no resolutions would be drawn and no program passed. This fact was not announced to the conference until the course of the discussion compelled the announcement.

But since the conference had already signified its desire to have a program, the chairman suggested a means of evading the promise to the building management, and his suggestion was adopted by a show of hands. It was that the executive committee be instructed to draw up a résumé of the sense of the meeting. Persons in the group who wished to protest were not permitted to speak, and no opportunity was given to elect a new committee from the body of the conference. The chairman's suggestion was adopted by a conference which had not been allowed to hear any discussion of it. When, on the following day, the committee read its résumé and then promptly adjourned the conference without permitting discussion or putting it to a vote, certain N. S. L. men protested, I think quite justly, and there was a tense minute when violence seemed imminent—perpetrated, paradoxically enough, by the Socialist delegates in their frantic efforts to silence a protesting Communist.

But just when emotion was running at its highest, there entered the room an emissary from President Roosevelt, bearing greetings and fatherly blessings. The meeting was called to order, and all protesters politely stopped speaking. The conference broke up with every outward sign of peace.

In all this I can see no grounds for reproaching the N. S. L. Its delegates seemed to me to observe all the niceties of gentlemanly behavior; they certainly had every reason to feel resentful at the treatment they received from the committee. In this case I am afraid it was the L. I. D. and Mr. Rodman who attempted to "capture" the meeting, and not the N. S. L.

New York, January 11

VARIAN FRY

In Memory of "Marse Henry"

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

December 22, 1933, marked the twelfth anniversary of the death of Colonel Henry Watterson, who, if alive today, would have rejoiced at the repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment, and who would have been saddened by the recrudescence of lynchings. "The public," said The Nation of August 17, 1918, "ought never to forget his [Henry Watterson's] steadfast, life-long opposition to protective tariffs, his brave resistance to Ku Kluxism when it was perilous to denounce it, and his outspoken warnings against the government of America by imperialists, militarists, and great business interests entrenched through special privilege—warnings never so much in order as today when the menace of Prussianism is upon us. . . ." If we substitute the word Hitlerism for Prussianism, the editorial statement of The Nation is brought up to date.

Upon this occasion of the anniversary of "Marse Henry's" death, we can turn profitably to the writings of one who in his day formulated constructive, far-reaching social and political programs and urged them unceasingly.

New York, December 30

LOUIS MARDER

Finance

Wall Street Plays 'Possum

THE large brokers who dictate the policies of the Stock Exchange have at last been brought to the realization that expediency requires them to lay off pools for the time being. They have been led to adopt this policy of self-denial by the growing public demand for stringent regulation of the stock markets and by the mounting evidence that the Administration was apparently prepared to demand legislation establishing such control. The stupid bungling which allowed the petty operation in Atlas Tack to explode in a burst of unfavorable publicity just prior to the convening of a hostile Congress was the final spur.

The present market illustrates the extent of the Street's self-sacrifice. When the President's proposed monetary legislation was announced, the market was prepared for a substantial rise. While the measure gave some encouragement to the bond market it was interpreted as particularly stimulating to stock equities. Prices responded with the expected rise. Also many of the standard business indexes on which speculation is based have been showing moderate improvement, and outside buying has returned to the Exchange in greater volume than at any time since last July.

But for probably the first time in its history Wall Street has so far failed to respond to these inviting opportunities with the usual large-scale pool operations. Some large pools in the process of organization have been persuaded to withhold their operations and in others, where opportunities for pool manipulation normally would be enticing, there have been no takers pending a more favorable trend in public and governmental opinion. While the daily volume of transactions on the Exchange has mounted to around three million shares, informed opinion in Wall Street is that prevailing conditions would permit a much larger volume of trading if unrestricted pool operations, such as existed as recently as last July, were resumed. The difference between three- and four-million-share days and five-, six-, and seven-million-share days is what makes the pool so dear to Wall Street's heart.

The present situation is without precedent in the recent attempts of the Exchange to expand control over its members. For years the authorities of the Exchange stoutly denied the possibility of large-scale manipulation of stock prices. Not until last August was the Exchange compelled to admit that undesirable activities might occasionally break out. But the metaphysical line of separation which the Exchange draws between "legitimate" and "undesirable" pools automatically bars it from interfering formally with the large pool characteristic of the usual market operation. Consequently, the absence of important manipulation in the present market, whether at the suggestion of the Exchange or through caution on the part of operators, is a product of expediency rather than of internal regulation.

There appears to be a significant relationship between this unusual willingness of brokers to forgo immediate profits and a pronounced shift in sentiment in Wall Street on the outlook for federal regulation. During November and December, when it was subject to continual attacks through the revelations in Washington, Wall Street was resigned to the prospect of federal control of one type or another and was devoting all its energies to making that type as innocuous as possible. At the present time the Street is taking a much more optimistic view of its status in Washington. The feeling is prevalent that federal legislation either will be postponed until some indefinite future date or will be of a nature unlikely seriously to embarrass Wall Street activities.

At any rate, the Exchange has been careful to avoid publicizing the present absence of pool operations. In contrast to past attempts at "reform," when harmless measures were widely advertised while the essential practices of the market continued unchecked, the Exchange in this instance has concentrated public attention on steps taken to tighten restrictions on the financial practices of companies listed on its board. Although of value in themselves, these measures are quite apart from the present question of internal regulation. The frantic haste with which President Whitney recently repudiated newspaper articles on an impending propaganda campaign by the Exchange is symptomatic of its anxiety to avoid the appearance of influencing public opinion at a time when its whole effort is in reality toward that goal. Pools have been mentioned only in the Exchange's official whitewash of the manipulation in alcohol stocks last year and in its admission, at the Atlas Tack hearings, that the use of questionnaires on pool operations, which proved so barren of result in that instance, would be expanded in the future. An error of strategy obviously would be committed if the Exchange were to go on record against pool operations as a whole, since a commitment now might prove highly embarrassing if a resumption of these activities should become feasible at some future time.

PETER HELMOOP NOYES

THE PUPPET-SHOW ON THE POTOMAC By RUFUS DART II

Who are the puppets in Washington? Who the puppet-masters? Who writes the speeches our statesmen deliver? What goes on at Cabinet and other meetings? Who controls the social rackets? How much does it cost to get a daughter presented at court? By a man who was assistant to a member of the Cabinet in three administrations. $2.50

KAPOOT By CARVETH WELLS

Don't form any opinion about Russia today until you have read this striking and widely popular book by one of the world's foremost travelers.

Fifth large edition. $2.50

BIRTH CONTROL IN PRACTICE

By MARIE E. KOPP, Ph. D.

A statistical study of 10,000 Case Histories of the Birth Control Clinical Research Bureau. Margaret Sanger, Director.

The most complete and scientific book on birth control. It presents in direct, readable English the facts derived from ten years of social and medical study. The greatest survey ever made by a committee of the most distinguished scientists in the country. $3.75

Robert M. McBride & Co.

4 W. 12th St., N.Y.

Books and Drama

Winter Revery

By SARA BARD FIELD

Now let the garden sleep.
Bank the red coals of your impatience
Under the ash of prunings and raked leaves
And swing your eager glance
By the late-rising, early-setting sun's
Short and remoter arc. This is no hour to sweep
The quiet self-sufficient dark with flame.
Earth has forgotten fire, to light indifferent grown.
Night and the North alone attend her now.
Colder than ocean, cold as stone her blood,
Her pulses slow in long, libational rhythms.
Therefore if you would haunt the leafless paths,
Ally, not alien, go in winter's way:
Not one superfluous candle in your eyes,
Nor heat of haste searing the ground with footprints.
Rather in shoes heavy with gathered snow
Or padded with thick cling of sodden leaves,
Your breath a cloud of chilly vapor,
Drift through the barren quiet like a sleepy mist
That coldly mingles with an austere dream.

Wanted: An Attitude

PERHAPS nothing seems more out of fashion than a book that was read by everyone ten years ago; in one sense it seems more ancient than a Victorian novel and infinitely more outmoded than a hearty survivor from the eighteenth century. So much for such best-sellers as "Black Oxen," which is now superseded by "The Good Earth" and "Anthony Adverse," but what of those items that we regarded as literature, that were as necessary to our education as a grasp of the binomial theorem or the demonstrations of Euclid? Not to read Edward Carpenter's "Love's Coming of Age," Shaw's "Unsocial Socialist," Anatole France's "The Queen Pedauque," and Flaubert's "Temptation of St. Anthony" was a confession of indifference to the best in contemporary culture; these were the means of self-education by which one created a standard for further reading and a discussion of "modern" problems.

These very titles, however, are among those dropped by the Modern Library for 1934 publication; obviously they are omitted because they no longer sell even as reprints in moderately priced editions. It is hard to say that this omission proves anything concerning a rise in public taste, or that the substitution of "The Good Earth" and "God's Little Acre" indicates the reverse. Nor does it mean that the continued popularity of "Das Kapital" on the Modern Library list proves that half of America is about to vote the Communist ticket in the next election. Yet it does show, I think, that public taste has turned a sharp corner and that our notions of what is good to read have undergone a definite change.

The Modern Library, as I have seen it, has always represented a shrewd compromise between the current bestseller and the book that was likely to educate the public in what it wanted to know. It is perhaps the only successful example in America of publishing books directly for the consumer, of giving him at a cut rate books that he wishes to read and own. All other successful publishing ventures have another purpose in mind, that is to say, they advertise and market books so as to make them attractive as gifts. Therefore the Modern Library has a special function and as an index of popular thinking has specific relevance.

The omission of such important items as "Love's Coming of Age" and "The Unsocial Socialist" does not indicate that we have wearied of sex or economics, but that we have shifted our attitude toward two vital subjects. Ten years ago we were happy and, perhaps, excited to know that a frank discussion of sexual experience was possible in print. A knowledge of that experience by means of the printed page was considered essential to general education; such knowledge and the free discussion of it were the mark of sophistication, but it was not essential to have a fixed attitude concerning it. To know the jargon of the experience was quite enough, and if one could pass from Carpenter to Freud a victory was gained. In fiction Anatole France represented the ease with which a minor sexual episode might be treated, and open discussion of the subject could take on lighter aspects. Something of the same sophistication was demanded in the matter of economics; the attractive element in Shaw's Fabianism lay in his ability to write about economics in the form of novels, prefaces, or plays. Again there was no necessity to make up one's mind concerning socialism; it was enough to know that economic forces existed, that they interfered with our love affairs and the quality of the food we ate for dinner.

Today it is no longer possible to drift happily upon a stream of such broadness and indecision. If we are inclined to speak of sexual experience at all, our position concerning it becomes more important than the mere fact that we have read about it; and if we speak of economics we are likely to think of such forces in absolute terms, involving problems of right and wrong. Even our notions of free speech are becoming modified to suit our temper, the choice of subject is now given a moral aspect, and for approval of our changing habits we witness a revival of nineteenth-century virtue in "Little Women," reread fragments of Karl Marx, and respond to the Biblical intonations heard again in the earnest, heavily stylized prose of "The Good Earth."

HORACE GREGORY

Objet d'Art

Work of Art. By Sinclair Lewis. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

THE division of Mr. Lewis's work into satires and biographical romances has been obvious ever since the publication of "Arrowsmith." What is becoming apparent through his most recent novels is that there is a distinction of another kind gradually separating these two classifications, a distinction of quality. The books in the latter group are not Mr. Lewis's most successful works, and "Work of Art," another biographical romance, is the poorest of these.

The chronicle of Myron Weagle's life as a hotel man is related with all Mr. Lewis's usual care in documentation and editing. The value and scope of an apprenticeship begun in adolescence as a handy boy in a small, old-fashioned rural hotel and continued through the successive stages of bell-hop, cook, night clerk, clerk, manager, and vice-president of a hotel chain are fully demonstrated by sufficient examples. The requirements of a good bartender are made as clear as the distinction between running commercial houses in the nineties with either legitimate or shady traffic and the management of pasteboard contraptions for the St. Louis Exposition and Florida resorts where the bar is more important than the beds. There is an accurate indication of the day New York lobbies lost their gilt, and the potato penholder in places like the American House in Black Thread Center, Connecticut, was supplanted by gunshot. The influence of certain lady guests on a hotel-keeper's life is explicit; and Myron's marriage to a good girl from his home town is made inevitable.

But too many pages of "Work of Art" read like either a trade manual or a trade report, and too few read like a novel. Toward the end of the book the material does cease for a few chapters to bear the imprint of undigested research and becomes enlivened fiction. While the Perfect Inn is being built and destroyed Myron reaches human stature, and the use of extracts from his diary gives a needed, intensified impetus to the narrative. Yet at the end the story weakens again, and no amount of admiration for Myron's taste in cooking or conviction of Kansas's great need for such an art could arouse enthusiasm for the tale or the telling of it.

The biography suffers principally because none of Mr. Lewis's major talents are put at Myron's disposal. There are only the feeblest hints of an ability to evoke through the experiences of one character a huge social panorama. J. Hector Warlock, old Elphinstone, and Herbert Lammkin are barely perceptible from Mr. Lewis's stock of generalizations on the people a young hotel-keeper may meet, and in the precincts of kitchen, office, and front desk Myron finds no vivid world. Absent also is any full evidence of Mr. Lewis's extraordinary gift for dialogue, dialogue that at one and the same time creates, differentiates, and appraises characters, dialogue of the most literal and animated vernacular, surprising in its accuracy and fitness. Compared to the conversation of Mr. Schmaltz and his friend Mr. Babbitt, J. Hector's poker game and Mrs. Koreball's cocktail party sound like bad recording. Nor by tabulation and exposition has Mr. Lewis substituted a better method for making characters. The result is that no figure stands out here like Carol or Arrowsmith. None displays that especially adroit talent by which the author has made an individual and a type under the same identity. Myron is too often only synonymous with a John Doe who is following every course offered in a trade-school catalogue. When, three-quarters of the way through the book, he emerges an honor to his calling, well-trained and devoid of hokum, Mr. Lewis himself seems to realize that so far the career has hidden the man, and he sends him off about his more individual business—to the Perfect Inn, failure, and a quiet retreat in Kansas.

This, unfortunately, is as close to Myron, the man, as one gets, and still more unfortunately it is not close enough to make us accept him as the poet his creator would have him. He is, certainly, compared to Ora and salvation-by-Hollywood a restful figure, and his sober singleness of purpose and calm adaptability are sympathetic traits, but as he is left with these as the chief assets of his personality he does not make a deep impression. He is not canonized by either ridicule or romance. The sense of quest which Mr. Lewis in his other biographies has put in place of satire, the feeling that the sport is worth the candle, is precisely what he has omitted in "Work of Art."

FLORENCE CODMAN

Johnson's England

Johnson's England. Edited by A. S. Turberville. Oxford University Press. Two Volumes. $14.

The Poems of Charles Churchill. Edited by James Laver. The King's Printers' Editions. The Viking Press. Two Volumes. $12.50.

THE less one knows about the eighteenth century, the more convenient it is as a symbol. For that very reason some of the persons who refer to it most often will probably resist the invitation to read the two handsome and authoritative volumes edited by Professor Turberville and packed with detailed information. If, on the other hand, anyone really wants to know how, where, and under what conditions the Englishman of the period lived, there is probably no better way of finding out. G. M. Trevelyan contributes the general chapter on history, Osbert Sitwell and Mary Barton that on taste; but there are also twenty-five others by various hands which pretty well cover the physical, intellectual, and artistic life of the time. The amount of specific information is enormous; the generalizations relatively few and cautious. No one pretends that anything can be "summed up" in a phrase or an illustration, and the reader is likely to come away with the conviction that the eighteenth century, like every other time in human history, was, in the familiar phrase, "an age of contradictions and an age of change."

At one time or another most of us have been guilty of referring to what sometimes seems to be the orderly homogeneous culture attributed to Johnson and his contemporaries. Looking back, it often seems that the literary man especially was fortunate in having a clearly delimited field, and that an especial kind of perfection was possible then for the very reason that there was so little tendency to transcend the accepted bounds. We think of the writer as happily cultivating his garden while we are perpetually busy with the almost hopeless task of clearing the limitless wilderness of newly discovered facts and newly explored sensibilities. But in so far as the conception is true at all, the fact is due more to the attitude of the writer than to any lack of what we call progress in the various departments of human activity. Many men did, like Dr. Johnson, tend to regard the classical themes and the classical attitudes as the only ones with which a man of culture was bound to be familiar. Though Johnson, for example, amused himself with chemical experiments and though he did not, as Chesterfield did, warn his disciples against frittering away their time on natural curiosities, he certainly would have regarded science as a kind of knowledge infinitely less important than knowledge of Vergil. In other words, the cultivated man did not feel the same obligation which the cultivated man of today feels toward all the movements of thought; and some of the most characteristic writing of the period retains that Augustan flavor possible only to a literature of which the subject matter is narrowly defined. But that does not mean that there was anything static about the age as a whole. Important discoveries were being made in science, revolutionary political ideas filled the air, and, to take a single illustration, the growth of good roads was changing both the physical appearance of the country and the habits of the people.

One of the great virtues of the work under consideration is that it nowhere overemphasizes those figures or those characteristics which are responsible for the usual conception of the period, but launches forth into a detailed examination of the schools, the houses, the inns, the theaters, and the parks, and concerns itself no less with religion, science, politics, and economics than with literature. The result is fatal to any tendency to think of the century in simple terms, but it is also to make it seem spiritually less remote. Johnson's contemporaries were certainly not living in a fixed or stable world. Except for certain literary purposes, they probably did not even think that they were.

As for Charles Churchill, whose works are elaborately edited and handsomely printed, with an extensive biographical study by James Laver, he is doubtless best remembered by Johnson's famous and just remark about the crab tree which could produce nothing but crabs though it deserved praise for at least bearing a large crop of them. Mr. Laver provides an excellent account of Churchill's far from edifying career, which might, indeed, be taken as an extended illustration of the less attractive side of eighteenth-century literary life. After beginning as a clergyman because he did not know how else to make a living, Churchill went to London, achieved an enormous success as a writer of something between literature and libel, formed an intimacy with Wilkes, and died of hard living less than four years after the beginning of his prosperity. Exemplifying the eighteenth century at very nearly its most brutal and most corrupt, his poems are what one might expect from such a mind and such a life. The famous Rosciad is certainly the best, but all are marked by vigor which approaches savagery and reckless satire which seems always upon the point of degenerating into mere scurrility. Yet Churchill is, after all, the last in the great line of eighteenth-century couplet writers. In the hands of the respectable poets, except for Cowper, the form had lost all fire. Churchill recaptured something of the fire, though certainly nothing of the polish, of Pope.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Europe Before the War

Fifty Years of Europe. By J. A. Spender. Frederick A. Stokes Company. $5.

IT would be difficult to overpraise Mr. Spender's survey of European history from 1871 to 1914. It ranks with Fay's volumes on "The Origins of the War" and with Brandenburg's masterly treatise "From Bismarck to the World War"; and it is desirable that French and German translations should appear as soon as possible. For the author is not only a patriotic Englishman but a good European, not only a great journalist but a historian and a judge. He has known many of the statesmen whose work he describes, and on British policy he speaks with the authority of an intimate friend of Grey. He is also quite at home in the vast ocean of official publications, as well as in the biographies and apologies of the protagonists. He is a master of arrangement, and his lucidity makes complicated issues plain. He never raises his voice, but we are none the less conscious throughout of his warm human interest in the peace and happiness of mankind.

It is a commonplace today that the causes of the World War must be sought not in the last five weeks of peace but in the decades that went before. The best starting-point is undoubtedly the creation of the German Empire, which ushered in the system that perished in 1914. Its main author was Bismarck; its main feature was the division of the Powers into rival groups; its cardinal doctrine was the supremacy of force. Mr. Spender tells the story of power-politics at its height, leading, as it was bound to lead, to a catastrophe. All the Powers played the perilous game with varying success. Bismarck, the greatest of experts, performed miracles of diplomatic skill; but his occasional habit of bludgeoning his opponents was a psychological blunder, and his treatment of defeated France was a costly mistake. "The main weakness of his policy," says Mr. Spender with perfect truth, "lay in its foundations. The idea of finding security for one nation in the permanent subjection and outlawry of another was in the long run doomed to failure." The policy of keeping France in quarantine was breaking down while the Iron Chancellor was still at the helm, and after his fall in 1890 it speedily collapsed. The first hundred pages are on the Bismarckian system and the Bismarckian era, and they are one of the best portions of the book.

When Bismarck was gone, his forceful methods were carried on by successors who lacked his skill and abandoned his saving principle of limited liability. "Holstein, the Kaiser, and Bülow were a trio of incomprehensibles to British statesmen: Holstein burrowing like a mole, Bülow performing on a tight-rope, and the Kaiser dancing about between the two, now currying favor with us as our best friend, now stabbing us in the back, and always improving the occasion to point the eternal moral that Germany was helpless without a big fleet." Of their mistakes in alienating England by the Flottenpolitik, and forcing England and France into an unwritten alliance, Mr. Spender writes with just severity. But he never for a moment falls back into the foolish and facile generalization current during the war and later that Germany was the one black sheep in a relatively well-behaved flock. It is one of the merits of the book that the author recognizes the immense and ever-increasing significance of Vienna in the last years of peace; he agrees with the majority of the experts that under Bülow and Bethmann Austria was the rider and Germany the horse. For the naval rivalry with England and the recurring disputes with France over Morocco called the Triple Entente into being and left the Kaiser with no alternative but to cling closely to his only dependable ally. At the very end of his long term of office Bülow began to realize the danger of the Flottenpolitik; but it was too late. The political morality of Germany was no worse than that of most of the other Powers, but her mistakes were numerous and irrevocable. In Mr. Spender's opinion French diplomacy was the most skilful, while the British record wins the prize for candor and rectitude.

The ultimate cause of the war was not the misdeeds of this or that country or statesman but "the system by which the nations dealt with one another in these years, and its total incompatibility with the good life desired by the vast majority of human beings." The last phase of the disintegration of an anarchical Europe is dated by Mr. Spender from the annexation of Bosnia in 1908, which divided the Continent sharply into two hostile groups, reopened the Eastern question, and was followed by the Tripoli and Balkan wars. The Agadir crisis of 1911 was a terrifying interlude in the West, but from 1908 onwards the main anxieties were found in the East. Mr. Spender emphasizes the importance of Conrad and his unceasing demand for preventive wars against hostile Serbia and disloyal Italy before Russia regained her fighting strength. The aged Francis Joseph desired to close his eyes in peace, but Berchtold was gradually won over to a policy of action. He was encouraged by a historic conversation with the Kaiser, in October, 1913, shortly after the conclusion of the Balkan wars. In speaking of the possibility that Serbia might resist the demands of Austria the Kaiser declared: "You may rest assured that I stand beside you and am ready to draw the sword whenever your initiative makes it necessary." Austria could count absolutely and completely upon him. Whatever came from the Vienna Foreign Office was a command for him.

Such words were enough to make Bismarck turn in his grave, for in creating the Dual Alliance in 1879 he desired to prevent and not to provoke a war with Russia. Berchtold had now the blank check in his pocket, and he could cash it whenever he liked. Russia was rapidly regaining her strength, and her encouragement of pan-Serb aspirations was becoming scandalously notorious. The Sarajevo murders provided the pretext; but Mr. Spender believes that in any case Austria would have struck out before very long. A life-and-death struggle with Russia was regarded in both countries as virtually inevitable, and according to the bad old rules of the game it seemed best to fight while there was still a chance of victory. The volume ends with an argument that Grey did all that man could do to avert the catastrophe, and that when his efforts failed we had no choice but to enter the war. The moral of the tragic story is that the old cynical system of power-politics led inevitably to war, and that unless we trample it under our feet it will do so again.

G. P. GOOCH

The Southwest and Its People

Mesa Land. By Anna Wilmarth Ickes. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.

MESA LAND" is a book many people have been waiting for these several years. Most of the material in it has been handled elsewhere, and more than once, but nowhere has it all been so thoroughly collected, sifted, and compacted into uniformity. At no time has the average reader been able to get through the country, described competently, with less than three to five volumes. "Mesa Land" is that country which is contained between the Rio Grande and the Rio Colorado east and west, the high knot of the Rockies on the north and the Mexican border on the south—a land of vast flat levels and knife-cut gorges, a land of explicit, unrivaled topographies and distinctive alien cultures. And incidentally, of the most unique and dramatic histories.

Mrs. Ickes begins her account of it with a chain of tinkling incident, color, and form—cave dwellings, ruined pueblos, racketing rivers, camel herds, tribal ceremonies—and so drops into the history of its various peoples, from the long walk of Cabeza de Vaca to the latest artistic invasion. It includes scamped but reliable accounts of the investigations of Fray Marco de Niza, adequate mention of Coronado, of Espejo, of De Sosa and the town he ran away with, of the founding of Santa Fé by Oñate, the rebellion of Popé, and the final reconquest by De Vargas, and enough of modern mention to carry the story of Santa Fé down to the present hour with intelligence and, for so short an account, with great clearness. Mrs. Ickes does not, however, begin her history of the Indians with the oldest tribes; rather, indeed, with the youngest, the Navajo, who came into the country not much ahead of the Spaniard and goes far to outstrip him in bids for our attention. The Navajos not only have increased their numbers more rapidly than any existing tribe, but have also outstripped all the others in the manner in which they have taken on the white man's salient trait of material progress and made of themselves another of the contributive peoples in the great American medley. Mrs. Ickes gives a complete and enlightening account of the Navajo and his ways, but she does not go very deeply into his psychology and so fails to be prophetic as to the final outcome of his singularly successful struggle with the white environment.

The author of "Mesa Land" goes more deeply into the past of the Pueblo groups, and more descriptively into the living constitution of the Pueblo peoples. Her account of the dead cities is interesting and more complete than is usual in a book of this character, and her discourse on the living pueblos includes a page diagram of tribal and linguistic relationships which should prove helpful to the tourist first venturing in that singular melange of primitive peoples. The general account of these people is more explicit and has none of the popular errors that characterize most accounts of the Southwestern groups. More attention is given to the older groups, the Zuñi and Hopi peoples. There are careful accounts of the social organization of these singular and slowly disappearing tribes, in particular, the Shaliko and the Stick Race of the Zuñi and the Snake Dance of the Hopi. These are followed by shorter accounts of the Rio Grande Pueblos, carefully particularized.

The volume closes with a note on the snake and the eagle as these appear in the universal lore of the Southwestern tribes, including an interpretative note on their relationship to natural phenomena, such as the track of the lightning and the fecundating powers of storm and rain. At all points the book is thoroughly reliable, and the author at no point exceeds her knowledge in her interpretations. It gives rise to the question whether the wife of any other Cabinet official could write so soundly on any of the subjects that come under her husband's control. This is the most important and faithfully written guidebook of the region described that has yet come under the reviewer's notice.

MARY AUSTIN

Shorter Notices

L'Affaire Jones. By Hillel Bernstein. Frederick A. Stokes Company. $2.50.

Like his hero, Mr. Bernstein is a "grand ami de la France" who has been slightly disconcerted by the Frenchman's habit of introducing Verdun and la patrie into conversations where, to the non-Gallic mind, they do not seem to belong. His reply is a rollicking satirical farce about a young man who came to Paris to write a cookbook, soon found himself imprisoned as a dangerous spy, and fell in love with a woman to whom the crime passionnel had become a habit. While not exactly esoteric, the book will probably be most amusing to those who know something of the manners of the concierge and the garçon; to such it is certain to afford a great many chuckles. Soglow contributes a jacket and end pieces beautifully in the spirit of the satire.

Nature and Nurture. By Lancelot Hogben. London: Williams and Norgate. 6s. 6d.

In striking contrast to the glib distortions of history and biology by eugenists who ascribe the rise and fall of civilizations to the permutations of human heredity, Dr. Hogben, who is professor of social biology at the University of London, recognizes the sharp demarcation between cultural and biological inheritance and conceives the study of human genetics in terms of medical research. Outspoken on the limitations of present knowledge of human heredity, he is none the less sanguine that it will soon be possible to construct a chromosome map of the human species—a project which would have been regarded as fantastic a few years ago and may still be a premature expectation. As many as thirty incurable diseases are, however, now known to be determined by genes whose existence is established by quantitative agreement with the requirements of Mendel's laws. This does not lead the author to the formulation of rash generalizations and eugenic panaceas in terms of heredity. On the contrary, in his extremely able discussion of nature and nurture he stresses the fact that the same gene may be responsible for many and various manifestations, depending upon the kind of environment in which its development occurs, and that the effect of a gene depends on all other genes with which it is combined. He declares, opposing the vociferous eugenists, that simple primary amentia is a sociological not a clinical category; that the prevalence of mental defects is less of a menace to the survival of culture than the selfishness, apathy, and prejudice which prevent intellectually gifted people from understanding the character of the present economic crisis. The major part of the book deals in a highly statistical manner with the application and limitation of the principle of random mating, with consanguineous parentage and the theory of inbreeding, and with a genetical analysis of familial diseases: it is thus a rich

□ JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH says □

AH, WILDERNESS! Guild Theater. O'Neill's nostalgic comedy about a youth who discovers love and poetry together. Made doubly effective by the performance of George M. Cohan.

AS THOUSANDS CHEER. Music Box. The best musical review of the year with Clifton Webb, Leslie Adams, Helen Broderick, and Marilyn Miller in a series of acid but amusing sketches.

BIG HEARTED HERBERT. Biltmore Theater. J. C. Nugent and Elisabeth Risdon in a broad but funny farce about the taming of a self-made man.

COME OF AGE. Maxine Elliott's Theater. Reviewed in this issue.

DAYS WITHOUT END. Henry Miller's Theater. O'Neill's latest and much discussed play which may or may not prove that he is ready for conversion to the Catholic Church. Splendidly produced and acted, but not likely to seem very significant to those not religiously inclined.

HER MASTER'S VOICE. Plymouth Theater. First-rate specimen of Clare Kummer's very special kind of wit with Roland Young and Laura Hope Crews.

MARY OF SCOTLAND. Alvin Theater. Helen Hayes and Philip Merivale give fine performances in Maxwell Anderson's play. The biggest dramatic hit of the moment but one which left me a little cold.

MEN IN WHITE. Broadhurst Theater. Fine teamwork on the part of the members of the Group Theater helps to make this play about a young doctor one of the things which must not be missed.

PEACE ON EARTH. Civic Repertory Theater. Propaganda play about the next war, in which the workers strike and a young college professor gets framed for murder. Drawing special but enthusiastic audiences which evidently do not agree with me that the play is quite uninspired.

SHE LOVES ME NOT. Morosco Theater. Mad doings at Princeton which involve the efforts of some high-minded students to rescue a not too innocent maiden in distress. Much the funniest farce of the year.

THE FIRST APPLE. Ritz Theater. Irene Purcell contributes much charm to a fragile but amusing comedy about—first apples.

THE GREEN BAY TREE. Cort Theater. Absorbing psychological drama about a young man who cannot give up luxury for love. Shares with "Men in White" the first place on the list of dramas.

THE PURSUIT OF HAPPINESS. Avon Theater. Spicy and more or less historical comedy about a young Austrian who finds bundling one of the pleasantest of the new freedoms in Revolutionary New England.

THE LAKE. Avon Theater. Katharine Hepburn in an English tragedy which came highly recommended. Neither the play nor the star quite up to expectations.

TOBACCO ROAD. 48th Street Theater. Superb performance by Henry Hull in a grotesquely humorous play about total depravity exhibited by the poor whites of Georgia. Dramatized from a novel by Erskine Caldwell and not likely to be forgotten even by those who find it a little too strong for their stomachs.

fare reserved for initiated specialists. Finally, after a skilful critique and refutation of Fisher's attempt to show the unimportance of nurture in the determination of stature, he warns of the danger of concealing assumptions which have no factual basis behind an impressive façade of flawless algebra, an admonition which has particular pertinence when applied to the work of the biometricians.

George Washington Himself. By John C. Fitzpatrick. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $3.50.

This book is a defense of George Washington from the imputations of all previous biographers. As one reads it, one feels that Dr. Fitzpatrick should not have bothered his mind quite so much with the criticisms of Washington which other writers have made. Dr. Fitzpatrick has a tremendous veneration for George Washington, and he succeeds in winning the reader over to an interpretation of Washington as a person of quiet charm and of great force. More than that could not be accomplished for any hero, and it is a pity that Dr. Fitzpatrick did not concentrate more on his own portrait instead of harping so much on those of others who, he feels, were less accurate and less appreciative. The George Washington whom Dr. Fitzpatrick portrays would never have bothered so much with biographical critics as his defender does. Occasionally Dr. Fitzpatrick commits the error of those he condemns by drawing from a document an unwarranted conclusion which he would like it to justify, but he is too much of a scholar to do this without qualification. Another flaw in his book is his intense hatred of Great Britain and the British which he may have tried to hide, but without success. It does not make us trust his book to find his impartiality sometimes put to rout by his prejudices. Congress, Massachusetts generally, and the Adams family particularly are among Dr. Fitzpatrick's dislikes, and he makes very little effort to interpret or even to understand the point of view of any of Washington's opponents or even of those who differed from him only slightly. He prefers to assume that Congress, John Adams, and Thomas Jefferson were devices of the devil manufactured for the purpose of plaguing his hero, Washington.

The Dance

The Persistence of Ballet

WACHTANG CHABUKANI and his partner, Vecheslova, made a surprising debut at Carnegie Hall. These initial Soviet artists were accorded a welcome as stormily enthusiastic and as innocently confused as their own dances. An audience dedicated to the cordial purpose of a bright red welcome did not allow the curious obsolescence of what was seen on the stage to deter their bravos for a second. And they were quite right. Such dancing, that is, such dance-training, such physical education, has not been seen in New York since 1916. Chabukani can do anything the mind of an imaginative choreographer could design. It is a great pity no such choreographer was forthcoming to use those unstaggered great leaps, those flattening turns, and above all the huge side jump, when he landed on one long length of knee and leg as easily as air. Lunacharsky was firm about preserving the indigenous forms of art that were the Soviets' inheritance from the Empire. The wonderful Russian training for ballet is healthily intact. The Russians are still, without a doubt, the greatest dancers in the Western world.

But this conservation of a school without any interest in its aesthetic use is sad. Ballet in modern Russia is not even

The Next Session of
THE NATION'S RADIOTORIAL BOARD
over Station W.E.V.D.

will take place on Wednesday, Jan. 31, at 8 P.M.

Members of the Board are

Elmer Davis	Algernon Lee
Morris L. Ernst	Bishop Francis J. McConnell
Arthur Garfield Hays	Norman Thomas
Harry W. Laidler	Walter White

and the Editors of THE NATION

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

the old ballet of thirty years ago, the long miracle of Petipa's variations before Fokine's dawn. It is a new kind of taste, now a Soviet chic, of which Chabukani generously partakes. Bumptious, with a vocabulary of gesture as limited as an acrobat's, fresh, naive as a night-club dancer, his numbers were well calculated to give pleasure to the simple masses of the new democracy. The old despots created a taste of such rich perfection, such lavish reference, that they paid for it with their lives. Factory workers, soldiers, and peasants have passed upon these later dances and found them perfect. The only standards to which they testify are perfect technique and good clean fun. But Russia is safe. The "art" end of it will come in time. With such instruments as Chabukani a new Russian ballet is more than possible; it is inevitable. The only question is the interval of time.

In this interval the white Russian refugees in Paris have been taking care of the "art" end of it. And often one is inclined to wish they had not. The Monte Carlo Ballet has been having an equivocal success in New York. This has been absent-mindedly attributed to the frank remarks of our most distinguished dance critic, John Martin of the New York Times. Mr. Martin needs no defense from anyone. His rich information and love of dancing have kept a large, eager public expectant for dancing. No, the Monte Carlo Ballet has not repeated its huge London success for good reasons, not for bad ones.

In the first place, it is a company of an interregnum. The old stars of the Diaghileff company, the backbone of this organization, work too hard. Nine times a week is ruinous for anyone. The younger members are uneven. The troupe is without any real spirit save a commercial one. Its finest male dancer, Yurek Shablevsky, is effaced in the corps de ballet. A feeling of insecurity, uneasiness, and distrust pervades even the stage. The repertory is not entirely interesting. Of some historical interest are the numbers taken from the Diaghileff repertory. But this brings up a serious question as to the wisdom of repeating masterpieces without the equivalent dancers of their original creation. "Petrushka" without Nijinsky and Karsavina is not unthinkable, but on second sight, there is a blur, a paler impression, and one unfairly blames the program for an impossible lack of excellence. "Igor" was well danced even in front of the faded scenery, and "Les Sylphides," in spite of the fact that the company has no first-rate male dancer in the classical line, it is always a privilege to see again.

It was a major error on the part of the management to imagine that a New York audience was backward. While we have not seen much ballet lately, so much painting and music have come our way from Paris in the last ten years that the addition of some dancing is not necessarily an alleviation. "Les Presages" failed, not because it was not understood, but because its nightmare tastelessness was understood too well. "The Beach" had little success, not because it was so daring, but because it was an antique of 1933. New York is a far less snobbish audience than Paris, and though not yet as fanatic as London for dancing, it has often the healthy unimpressed accuracy of the pages of Variety. The Monte Carlo Ballet has one crippling lack—a guiding hand, a correlating force, a restraining taste, an energy behind it dominated by a passion for dancing. Perhaps Diaghileff lost his dominance in the last years, but it is something to think on that the only trace of policy in the only ballet company in the Western Hemisphere comes from Diaghileff five years after his death. Such a momentum as he started twenty-five years ago does not easily slow down.

The one single popular success was "La Concurrence," with fine danceable music by Auric, costumes as sunny as a parade by Derain, and the touching and witty dances of Georges Balanchine. Ironic, solid, and consecutive, it is the only new ballet so far given here which shows a respect for the given material in terms of what it is possible for the dancers to

□ PLAYS

□ FILMS □

THE THEATRE GUILD presents

EUGENE O'NEILL'S comedy

AH, WILDERNESS!

with GEORGE M. COHAN

GUILD THEATRE Fifty-second Street, West of Broadway
Eves. 8:20—Mats. Thurs. and Sat., 2:20

MAXWELL ANDERSON'S new play

MARY OF SCOTLAND

with

HELEN HAYES PHILIP MERIVALE HELEN MENKEN

ALVIN THEATRE — 52nd Street, West of Broadway —
Eves. 8:20, Mats. Thurs. & Sat., 2:20

EUGENE O'NEILL'S new play

Days Without EndHENRY MILLER's Theater 43 St. E. of B'way—Eves. 8:40
Matinees Thurs. & Sat. 2:40MEN IN WHITEAn experience thrilling and absorbing, genuine and complete.—J. W. KRUTCH, The Nation.BROADHURST THEATRE—44th St. W. of Broadway
Eves. 50c to $2.50. Mats. Wed. & Sat.PEACE & EARTH AN ANTI-WAR PLAYSIDNEY HOWARD: "Real Theater, the like of which is not on Broadway."
HARRY F. WARD: "I am urging everybody to see it immediately."CIVIC REPERTORY THEATRE, 14th St. & 6th Ave.
Lowest HIT in New York 30c to $1.50 Tax Wed. & Sat., 2:45

"The Theatre has unleashed one of its thunderbolts under Jed Harris's direction."

BROOKS ATKINSON—N. Y. Times.
Jed Harris ProductionThe Green Bay Tree*CORT THEATRE, 48th St. E. of B'way
Mats. Wed. and Saturday 2:30Beginning Saturday, Jan. 27—First American Showing
THE FIRST INTERNATIONAL ANTI-WAR FILM"HELL ON EARTH"HENRI BARBUSSE says: "The greatest of all anti-war films"
From the book by Leonhard Frank. Produced in four different countries, spoken in four languages, mainly English.
Featuring WLADIMIR SOKOLOFF, of the Moscow Art Theatre, ERNST BUSCH (now in exile)—Directed by VICTOR TRIVASACME THEATRE 14th ST. and UNION SQ. | Midnight Show Every Saturday
Rendezvous of the Intelligentsia"I WAS A SPY"Beg. Saturday January 27th

with Herbert Marshall, Madeleine Carroll, Conrad Veidt

Ranks with "Henry VIII" Among England's
Foremost Screen AchievementsPLAZA, 58TH STREET E. OF MADISON AVE. | Intelligent Movie
Entertainment in Distinctive Surroundings | Direction
Leo Brecher

do. Balanchine's "Cotillion," strange, acrid, and febrile, will show another side of his wonderful romantic gift.

However moderately the Monte Carlo Ballet is received, the principal thing to consider is that ballet, against the wishes of all dilettante "group dancers" and self-expressers, is not dead. It is very much alive. It is the basis, in the West at least, of stage dancing. It remains the rejectable alternative, like academic anatomy for the sculptor or painter, logic for the philosopher, and finger-exercises for the pianist. Ballet is not something one can dismiss by saying, "I've seen the Monte Carlo Ballet and I don't like ballet." It exists in spite of one's likes or dislikes. The uses to which it is accidentally put are something else again. For this reason it is very satisfactory to know that America at last has the possibility of gaining a complete education in dancing with ballet as a basis and a permanent company as its focus. The School of the American Ballet, under M. Balanchine, offers to any interested person all the perfected materials of a dancer's craft. The school is truly national and in a short time will offer another proof of the vitality of a four-hundred-year-old form.

The ritual of classical dancing is as flexible and effective as the staged ceremonies of a religious utility. The exercises which are its basis are entirely functional—to develop the greatest potential of an extended human silhouette, to release the body into a motion, precise, brilliant, and capable of repetition. It is designed entirely from the point of view of an audience in relation to dancers on the stage. LINCOLN KIRSTEIN

Drama

Two Strange Plays

"COME OF AGE," Clemence Dane's new play at the Maxine Elliott Theater, is based upon an odd and perhaps too elaborate fancy. The author has imagined that the poet Chatterton, regretting his premature suicide, made a bargain with death, and that he was, accordingly, reincarnated as a young man of today in order that he might learn something of "life" before he was compelled to leave it for good. As one might expect, "life" is assumed to be an unhappy affair of the heart, and so the poet, reborn, dies once more after he has suffered disillusion at the hands of a woman.

Judith Anderson plays, with considerable virtuosity, the role of the lady whose affections are genuine though unstable. Stephen Haggard, a young Englishman hitherto unknown to Broadway, also gives a very good account of himself as the hero—even though he is, perhaps, just a shade too romantically young, just a fraction too starry-eyed and tremulous of voice. Yet despite moments of charm and others quite genuinely moving, the play never seems entirely to justify its own pretensions. Everything about it is elaborately artificial. Sometimes the dialogue falls into tripping rhyme, often the action is accompanied by a musical score very pleasing in itself. But one has always the feeling that there ought to be either more matter or less art, and in the absence of the former we get only something a bit too near to mere preciosity. There is little beyond the playwright's word to make us believe that her modern young man is really the poet reincarnated. We see him dead in his eighteenth-century garret and we hear his dialogue with Death. But when he reappears at a cocktail party in modern London he seems to bring very little of his old self with him, and it is not easy to remember that his adventure with a contemporary vamp is supposed to mean more than it seems to mean. Perhaps that, indeed, is the best explanation of the fact that "Come of Age" remains always a little weak. Its story is commonplace at bottom, and neither highly literary writing nor the unconvincing pretext that it is about a great poet can make it seem less thin than it is.

Charles Robinson's "Mahogany Hall" (Bijou Theater) is another curiosity but of a very different sort. One may safely guess that it was written before "Sailor, Beware!" of which Mr. Robinson is coauthor, and one would merely dismiss it with a smile were it not for the fact that it is obviously written with the deadly seriousness of the very young. The theme is the theme of the noble prostitute, but Mr. Robinson's drama goes all the similar plays from "Camille" to "Rain" several better. He asks us to believe not merely in one soiled lily but in a whole bawdy house full of pure if unfortunate girls, and he leaves behind the general impression that the typical tart (the word, used with great bitterness, is his) will be found on close acquaintance to embody all the Victorian virtues. No wonder there is a young man hanging about to abduct little Tangie into respectability, or that Madam has had much difficulty in preserving her personnel intact, for Mahogany Hall is obviously the place where any discerning young man would go to look for a wife. Even the bartender is a kindly soul and the piano-player a starving genius whose plight, one is glad to see, touches the somewhat calloused heart of the proprietress herself. It is not strange that "Sailor, Beware!" should be a successful burlesque if Mr. Robinson can be so funny without even trying. Incidentally, it would be interesting to see Olga Baclanova in a good play. She comes to this one straight out of "Murder at The Vanities."

"Wednesday's Child" (Longacre Theater) ought to be better than it is. It deals with divorce as seen through the eyes of a sensitive child and is written with a sincerity considerably more effective than that of the piece just discussed. Nevertheless, I found it too consistently according to expectations to be profoundly interesting. When a play deals with distressing events, one quite rightly asks a good deal more by way of compensation than one would otherwise demand. "Wednesday's Child" hardly gives enough.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Contributors to This Issue

LOUIS FISCHER is The Nation's Moscow correspondent.

HENRY HAZLITT, formerly associate editor of The Nation, is editor of the American Mercury.

LUDWIG LORE was formerly editor of the New York Volks-Zeitung.

OLIVER WHITWELL WILSON is a New York architect and a member of the City Plan Committee of the City Club.

JEROME COUNT is a member of the New York bar who has frequently represented utility employees.

STELLA HANAU is editor of the Birth Control Review.

JOHN ROTHSCHILD, director of the Open Road, is a confirmed explorer of out-of-the-way Europe.

HORACE GREGORY is the author of "Pilgrim of the Apocalypse. A Critical Study of D. H. Lawrence."

FLORENCE CODMAN is a regular contributor of reviews to The Nation.

G. P. GOOCH, joint editor of the Contemporary Review, is the author of a number of books on the history of modern Europe.

MARY AUSTIN, poet, novelist, and critic, lives at Santa Fé, New Mexico.

LINCOLN KIRSTEIN, one of the editors of Hound and Horn, has written a life of Fokine and collaborated with Madame Nijinsky on a life of her husband.

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	141
EDITORIALS:
The NRA's Fever Chart	144
War Words in the East	145
LaGuardia to Date	146
CARTOON: SOMETHING WRONG WITH THE SET. By Low	147
ISSUES AND MEN. JOSEPH B. EASTMAN, COORDINATOR.
By Oswald Garrison Villard	148
SPAIN: VIVA LA REPUBLICA! By Anita Brenner	149
REVOLUTION IN COLORADO. By Frank Clay Cross	152
CHISELERS AT WORK AND PLAY. By Paul Y. Anderson	154
THE MILK TRUST GETS THE CREAM. By Alexander Kendrick	155
NEW SHAPES FOR AUTOMOBILES. By Douglas Haskell	157
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter	158
CORRESPONDENCE	159
BOOKS, FILMS, DRAMA:
A Night in Late Winter. By Isidor Schneider	161
The Comic Genius of Dickens. By Lionel Trilling	161
Insanity and Heredity. By David Beres	162
Aristocratic Verse. By Eda Lou Walton	162
Palmer Turns State's Evidence. By Oswald Garrison Villard	163
The Survival of Poor-Law Standards. By Paul H. Douglas	163
George Lewes. By Franklin Gary	164
Shorter Notices	164
Films: Toward the Next War. By William Troy	166
Drama: And So to Bed. By Joseph Wood Krutch	167
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE	168

BOARD OF EDITORS

ERNEST GRUENING FREDA KIRCHWEY
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

MAURITZ A. HALLGREN MARGARET MARSHALL
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; in Canada, $5.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. British Agent, Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, W. C. 1, England.

WITH THE PASSAGE of the President's gold bill events are expected to move rapidly toward definite devaluation and the creation of a machine to handle the government's two-billion-dollar stabilization fund. The most pressing problems created by these monetary maneuvers are international. The purpose of the stabilization fund is admittedly to check any appreciation of the dollar on the foreign exchanges, just as the purpose of the British Exchange Equalization Account is to hold down the value of the pound. It is hinted that some effort is even now under way to reach an agreement on dollar-sterling stabilization. It is to be hoped that this is true. If some such step is not taken, and taken promptly, it is hard to see how a disastrous monetary war can be averted. To hold the dollar down to a sixty-cent level, which is apparently the President's intention, will necessitate heavy purchases of gold and foreign currencies, while England presumably will be making every effort by similar means to prevent a result which would produce a pound worth about $5.30. A cheap dollar has obviously a deflationary effect on world prices and one which will be both resisted and resented in Europe. We may expect retaliation through currency depreciation and additional barriers to trade in the form of tariffs and quota restrictions. The only alternative is the prompt negotiation of an agreement with England to stabilize at a level reasonably satisfactory to both. That this will involve some measure of sacrifice on the part of each is not to be doubted. The hope is that both nations will soon see that immediate competitive advantage is not as important as international stability, the restoration of confidence, and an end to the devastating methods of economic warfare now in use between countries that profess friendly political relations.

AFTER MONTHS of inaction Attorney-General Cummings has decided to proceed against the aluminum trust. He has publicly declared his belief that the Mellon-controlled Aluminum Company of America is "a monopoly, at least in the producing field." That it is in fact the most perfect and complete monopoly in the country hardly needs argument. The late Senator Thomas J. Walsh was convinced of this. Upon accepting President Roosevelt's invitation to become Attorney-General, he informed close friends that he would take action at once against the aluminum trust and other monopolies. Nor would he have entered the contest unprepared, for he had devoted months to a study of the Aluminum Company. The Mellon interests doubtless were relieved when Senator Walsh's death was announced. They have shown in recent months by their attitude toward the proposed NRA code for the aluminum industry that they still consider themselves above the government. They would write their own code since no one else had any significant interest in the industry. The NRA was apparently disposed to accept this point of view, and for a time at least was insisting only that the code contain the safeguards for labor set forth in Section 7-a of the Recovery Act. The few independent fabricators in the industry fought back, however, and as a result the code is still in the formative stage. Unhappily, the independents themselves are divided. Those who import their raw materials from abroad do not want to be required to make known their production costs either to their smaller rivals or to the trust. But whatever happens to the aluminum code, it is gratifying to know that the Department of Justice has at last decided to move against the aluminum trust.

THE REPORT of the Administration's interdepartmental committee on the regulation of the security markets is a half-baked offering compounded of public-spirited intentions and some useful recommendations, but devoid of real substance. It opposes incorporation and all direct public regulation or control of the exchanges, but urges that they be licensed by the federal government. Through the power of a Federal Stock Exchange Authority to withhold or revoke these licenses it could indirectly control the methods of exchange operation. But the committee has sidestepped where it should have blazed a new trail. Speculation is the central evil of the security markets, and the unorganized "over-the-counter" markets are almost as large and important as the exchanges. The authors of the report have confined their proposals to the organized exchanges. The tools of speculation—margin buying, short selling, pool operations, and venal publicity, both in and out of the exchanges—call for drastic limitation. The knotty and prickly question is: How can it be accomplished? The members of the committees have confessed inexcusable failure—considering the nature of their assignment—by laying all these problems on the door step of the proposed Federal Authority with only tentative suggestions as to how they should be met. The committee confesses that it “has not found any method of controlling” the unorganized markets. Its report has obviously been hurriedly rigged and launched on the troubled waters of a highly controversial subject with too much sail and too little ballast. It is to be hoped that the forthcoming reports of the Senate Banking Committee and the Twentieth Century Fund, both of which have been digging for facts for many months, will supply the missing weight and serve as the basis for intelligent and vigorous legislative action.

FURTHER CONFIRMATION of our “good neighbor” policy may be found in the recognition by the United States of the republic of El Salvador. In December 1931, its President, Araujo, was replaced by Vice-President Martinez, who has governed the country peaceably since that time. Pursuant to a report made by two State Department representatives, Jefferson Caffery and H. Freeman Matthews, the United States declined to recognize the new government on the ground that its origin had violated Article II of the Central American treaty of 1923, which, instigated by our State Department, sought to withhold recognition of any government born of revolution. That El Salvador had made a specific reservation to Article II, had in fact rejected it, was given no weight. The treaty, which has since been abandoned by both Costa Rica and El Salvador, is a relic of the policy of domination of our smaller neighbors carried on during the presidencies of Taft, Wilson, Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover. Secretary Hull is to be congratulated for throwing it into the discard. Another sign of a new deal for Latin America is the retirement from our foreign service, after relegation to Czecho-Slovakia, of Francis White, for some years head of the Latin American Division of the State Department, later Assistant Secretary of State, and recently an active candidate for the ambassadorship to Cuba. Time recently recorded that “Career-diplomat White . . . expected to be better off in a Manhattan banking house with South American business.” That would seem a logical continuation and culmination of Mr. White’s public service.

OPPOSITION to the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway—as The Nation said in its issue of December 27—is in part, at least, a masked attack by the power interests of New York State. They are afraid that the electric development of the St. Lawrence River, which is part of the project, will break the monopoly upon which they have fattened unless they can maintain their control over distribution. It is too optimistic to say, as some have said, that the completion of the St. Lawrence project would automatically give the northeastern section of the United States a vast new source of cheap power. The Power Authority of the State of New York would be able to develop electricity, but under existing law it could not sell it direct to the consumer and hence could not dictate rates advantageous to him. For several years legislation has been sought at Albany giving municipalities the right to buy and distribute electricity, a power which is essential if rates are to be controlled in the interest of the consumer. The Republican legislators, who their own party leader in the State charges are under the thumb of the utility companies, have repeatedly blocked the needed law. Last year with a small Democratic majority in the State Senate, Governor Lehman hoped to get an enabling bill through, but was betrayed by members of his own party. He has renewed his recommendation to the present session, and every member who fails to support the bill should be held personally responsible as an enemy of the peoples’ interests. Fearing that they cannot indefinitely boss the legislature at Albany, the utility companies have this winter made a flank attack at Washington, where they have tried to defeat the entire waterway project, although concealing their real purpose by basing their opposition nominally on navigational aspects of the scheme. A strong manifestation of public sentiment, both at Washington and Albany, is needed to obtain action of the right sort.

THE NON-AGGRESSION PACT signed by Germany and Poland has more significance than would appear at first glance. While it must be welcomed as a minor step toward stability and peace in Eastern Europe, it also must be recognized as endangering the French system of alliances. The principal allies of France—Poland and the Little Entente states—have maintained the most intimate military and political relations with Paris, for, so long as France remained the strongest military power on the Continent and the outspoken champion of the status quo created by the Treaty of Versailles, these countries naturally felt that their very existence depended upon French support. However, they have few commercial or other economic contacts with France; instead, they move within the German-Austrian-Hungarian economic orbit. If to this attraction of common economic interests should be added the fact that Germany has gained, or is gaining, the upper hand in a military sense, the eastern countries would be tempted as a matter of self-defense to come to terms with Berlin. That the trend in that direction has already started is indicated by the growing strength of the anti-French party in Bucharest, the increasing disposition of the Czecho-Slovakian government to take a more “reasonable” attitude toward the Hitler regime, the renewed talk in Little Entente capitals of the need for rapprochement among all Central and East European states, including Germany, and now by the peace treaty between Poland and Germany, two countries which have been enemies for years. It would be easy to overemphasize the present importance of these various developments, but they do at least show which way the wind is blowing in certain European capitals.

FRENCHMEN may not take politics more seriously than Americans but at least they take them more personally. Probably we are no less sensitive to the corruption of government by business than the French, but we are not given to equally vehement and immediate resentment. Thus Americans are at a loss to understand the agitation in France over the Stavisky revelations. We have had worse political-commercial scandals in this country in recent years—the dealings of Fall with Sinclair and Doheny, for instance—but there have been no riots in consequence. Possibly the strategy of the founding fathers in establishing the national capital apart from the country's metropolis is one reason. Certainly our fixed term of office for elected executives is another. With the ministerial system, as in France, it is not only possible to force out unwanted officials at once, but it is practically necessary to do so if action is to be taken at all. Hence the reason for immediate and vociferous popular demonstrations. Stavisky was a Pole who several years ago was arrested for selling worthless securities. He escaped from the police in a way which led to some suspicion that his captors were not too keen to hold him. Nor did the subsequent failure to apprehend him show much zeal. When the municipal pawnshop at Bayonne failed recently and it turned out that Stavisky, under another name, had been managing it, he was again pursued, but either he committed suicide, as the police say, or, as others charge, he was shot by his captors to hush up further revelations. Anyhow, when Stavisky's dossier was sought for in the Ministry of Justice it was missing, and various officials in and out of the Cabinet were accused of having been too friendly with the swindler. Excitement rose in Paris and riots took place on the boulevards reminiscent of those twenty years ago when, on the eve of the World War, the wife of Joseph Caillaux shot the editor of Le Figaro to suppress impending personal and political disclosures. Premier Chautemps was not involved personally but had to resign in view of the prevailing lack of confidence in the political regime. Fascism has made little apparent headway in France to date, but in moments of public excitement there is always a chance of a sudden shift in opinion or of a coup d'état.

THAT LAWLESSNESS in high places breeds it in low is evident in California, which is now paying dearly for its long-continued imprisonment of Mooney and Billings on fabricated testimony and the recent declaration of its Governor in support of lynching. In the past year California has been quite as ruthless and brutal in denying elementary legal rights to striking workers as Alabama has been in refusing justice to Negroes. Employers and local-government officials have conspired to intimidate, attack, and throw into jail the leaders of various strikes among agricultural laborers, and the fact that the latter have been largely Mexicans, Japanese, and Filipinos has made it easy to practice such violence without serious rebuke from the majority of the citizens of the State. Perhaps the most flagrant instance has been the complete suppression of civil rights in the strike lately called by the Cannery and Agricultural Workers' Industrial Union among the lettuce pickers in the Imperial Valley. Not only has picketing been forcibly prevented but strikers have been clubbed, their property destroyed, their leaders jailed, and even their lawyers kidnapped. A. L. Wirin, attorney for the American Civil Liberties Union, was taken lately from a hotel in Brawley and beaten by a gang of vigilantes and county officials. Mr. Wirin had gone to Brawley to speak at a meeting planned to test the ban against such gatherings. The chief of police had prohibited the meeting but an injunction had been obtained from a federal court forbidding interference with it. Attorney-General Cummings has been asked to direct the federal District Attorney at Los Angeles to investigate the episode, and he cannot be too insistent in pursuing the leaders of this rebellion against national authority among the planters of the Imperial Valley and their sycophants in public office.

WHILE 30,000 STRIKING WORKERS picketed collieries in the hard-coal fields of Pennsylvania, seeking recognition of their independent United Anthracite Miners, the powerful organization which the insurgents have been fighting, the United Mine Workers of America, held its annual meeting at Indianapolis and studiously avoided any mention of the Scranton and Wilkes-Barre difficulties. Several delegates, it is true, went so far as to charge feebly that the rebel union had joined the coal operators in a plot to split the U. M. W., but discussion of the question was indefinitely postponed, and it was indicated that it would be zealously ignored. Meanwhile the strikers proposed an end to their walk-out, on one condition—that their union be granted the same modest rights as the old-line union. Officers of the U. M. W. refused to consider such a proposal and continued their policy of silence. The same attitude has been taken by the operators and the National Labor Board. The members of the independent union, finding their conciliatory efforts ignored, are daily growing more impatient, and violence is increasing. Recently there have been shootings and bombings and widespread disorder. The situation is rapidly approaching a crisis, and the continued non-recognition of from 30,000 to 50,000 miners is certainly not calculated to help.

IT IS NO NEW OBSERVATION that howls against interference in business go up only in those instances in which the government might conceivably make money for the public. A government-owned utility, shout the holding companies, kills private initiative and undermines investments. But we have never heard a business man criticize the Bureau of Standards for its interference in furnishing him with valuable and expert information; we have never heard a newspaper publisher criticize the Post Office for carrying his product at a loss; the Forest Service is practically never criticized for trying to repair some of the devastations of private business; and the Bureau of Mines, since 1910, has been quietly making mines safer for the workers without, so far as we know, a peep out of the mine owners. It is the admirable record of the Bureau of Mines, in fact, which inspires these remarks. The bureau was organized to discover and correct causes of explosions and other accidents in the country's mines. In the four years from 1907 through 1910, in which latter year the bureau was established, 2,123 persons were killed in explosions. From 1929 through 1932 only 714 persons were killed in such accidents, although the tonnage for the second four-year period was almost a million tons higher. Mining accidents in general have decreased from 2,788 per year in the first period to 1,720 in the second. Scott Turner, director, modestly feels that the bureau, through its experiments and its educational work, has had much to do with bringing about this great reduction in mine fatalities. For instance, many explosions are known to have been prevented in mines by the spreading through them of rock-dust, a device tested and recommended by the bureau. In the mining industry, as in many others, private initiative and intense competition have forced low production costs with resulting devastation of human resources. When will the public learn that economically and socially it would be more profitable for the government to prevent the destruction of resources than merely to act as Red Cross nurse in the cruel war for private profits?

The NRA's Fever Chart

FACTS are now sufficiently in hand for the closing weeks of last year so that a measurably accurate chart can be made of the NRA and the allied recovery program for 1933, or for the first seven months of its existence. It is a fever chart with many ups and downs and some not easily explainable developments, but a few prognostications seem already to be possible. First, it may be well to present the record in various respects:

Employment. Estimates of the number of unemployed when Mr. Roosevelt took office on March 4, last, vary from 13,000,000 on the part of the American Federation of Labor to 17,000,000 by the Alexander Hamilton Institute. There was some reduction in unemployment until the last part of 1933, when the tide turned back again slightly. In a summary early this year the A. F. of L. estimated that 1,800,000 persons who were out of work at the beginning of 1933 were reabsorbed in industry during the year. In addition, 4,600,000 found temporary jobs through the Public Works Administration, the Civil Works Administration, or the Civilian Conservation Corps. It is doubtful, though, if any persons in this second category should be regarded as legitimately reemployed. Certainly the expenditures for the CWA and the CCC are outright doles, and at least half the persons cared for were formerly on private or public relief rolls. In any event the A. F. of L. estimates that in November 10,702,000 workers still had no industrial employment. This represents a fifth of the country's normal wage-earning population, and it is evident that nothing satisfactory has been done yet in lessening unemployment, although much has been accomplished toward better relief of the unemployed.

Cost of Living. A great many mistaken ideas about changes in the cost of living have been circulated during the past year owing to confusing it with variations in prices of different sorts. Wholesale prices are not a direct indication of the cost of living, and retail prices are misleading when based on a limited group of the items that comprise the necessities of living for the average person. Probably the best figures on the cost of living are those issued for June and December of each year by the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics. They are based on average budgets for food, clothing, rent, household articles, fuel and light, and other items in thirty-two widely separated cities. Every item except rent increased in 1933, although not as much as many persons suppose. Taking the year 1913 as 100, the cost of living was 132.1 in December, 1932; 128.3 in June, 1933; 135 in December, 1933. This indicates that the cost of living was less last June than in December, 1932, but increased by 5.2 per cent between June and December of 1933. These figures correspond fairly closely with those of the National Industrial Conference Board, which estimates that the cost of living was 2.9 per cent higher in December, 1933, than in the same month of 1932, although it was 22.8 per cent less last December than in December, 1929. After rising steadily for some months, the cost of living declined 0.3 per cent last November and 0.6 per cent in December, indicating a temporary check to increasing prices.

Wages and Hours. The American Federation of Labor estimates that the average working week was shorter by four and a half hours at the end of 1933 than a year before. In regard to wages it says:

In wages there have been definite gains under codes for the lowest-wage groups; but workers of average or higher wages have been forced to a lower living standard. Hourly wage rates average higher by 5½ cents per hour, but in many cases this is not enough to compensate for shorter hours; and in no case is it enough to compensate for higher prices.

Workers' income in our sixteen chief producing and distributing industries averaged $20.53 a week in November, 1932, and $20.56 in November, 1933. Meanwhile, food prices are up 7 per cent and prices of clothing and furnishings are higher by 21 per cent, so that workers' real buying power is considerably lower. Millions who got jobs during the year are better off, but those who had jobs at more than a minimum wage have lost ground.

Mass buying power has gained during the year, partly from reemployment in industry and partly from jobs created by the government through PWA and CWA. Income of all workers in industry is 11.7 per cent higher at this year-end than last, a gain of about $243,000,000 monthly.

PWA pay roll has added $60,000,000 and CWA about $240,000,000, so that workers' total buying power per month is above last year by $543,000,000, or 26.4 per cent.

Farmers' Income. According to the Consumers' Guide of January 12, last, published by the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, the position of farmers improved appreciably in 1933, although not as much as had been hoped. Taking the average between 1910 and 1914 as 100, the prices which farmers paid for what they bought amounted to 101 on February 15, 1933, 117 on November 15, and 118 on December 15. The prices which they received for what they sold came to 49 on February 15, 1933, 71 on November 15, and 68 on December 15. The buying power of farm products was 49 on February 15, 1933, 61 on November 15, and 58 on December 15. This shows some net gain, although with an unfortunate decline toward the end of 1933.

Business Activity. The Federal Reserve agent in New York has estimated a gain in production and trade of 10 per cent in 1933, which is close to other computations. The index of business activity of the Annalist, based on production in leading industries, ranged from 63 in January, 1933, to a low of 58.5 in March, a high of 89.5 in July, and an estimated 69.2 for December.

Construction. During the first four months of 1933 construction declined, falling to the lowest point in twenty-four years in April, when the daily average of contracts was $1,910,000. From then on it rose slowly, and when the Public Works Administration finally began to award contracts it soared so rapidly that it reached a daily average of $10,300,000 in December, a gain of 440 per cent in eight months. Building seems destined to continue, as there is a large amount to be spent between now and next June and a big sum in the 1934-35 federal budget.

As one studies the chart as set forth above, certain hopeful developments toward recovery stand out, while grim resistances are equally plain. Not only has unemployment not been eliminated, but it does not promise to become substantially less and it may grow considerably more. The effort of the NRA to reduce hours while preserving weekly wages puts a premium on more mechanization of industry, as John Strachey pointed out recently in The Nation, and it appears that a large percentage of the country's population will have to be supported indefinitely by means of a federal dole.

President Roosevelt took office not only with the plausible idea that it was desirable to raise the prices of farm products and so help the farmers out of a hole even at the expense of the rest of the community, but he held to the odd belief that it was well to raise all prices and thus, as he imagined, stimulate industry in general. As The Nation has already pointed out, Mr. Roosevelt was extraordinarily fortunate in that in 1933, at least, his hope of a general price rise largely miscarried. The danger remains for the future, though, and is the most obvious rock on which the Roosevelt program may come to grief. So far, the farmer seems to have gained something from higher prices, but the wage and salary worker has lost, except that a larger total of persons has been employed and wages of the lowest-paid workers have to some extent been protected. That is, certain minority groups have been assisted at the expense of the community as a whole.

Probably this is desirable, but in plain language it means that the Roosevelt recovery program is succeeding, and can succeed, only through a reduced standard of living for the country as a whole. The NRA so far is only a modified spread-the-work movement. It is better than the latter in that it has preserved or increased the total earnings of various low-paid workers. It is not so good in that this very effort has made it impossible to spread available work enough to absorb more than a fraction of the unemployed. The fine phrases of six months ago about "increasing the purchasing power of farmers and wage-earners" have been forgotten in a national readjustment in which the workers in general are living in a reduced way in order that the less fortunate among them may be able to live at all. The only considerable redistribution of income that has occurred has been among those who have only a small income to distribute. Nor does any other solution seem likely so long as our recovery program is designed, as now, to save capitalism rather than to eliminate the profit system as a method of conducting industry.

During the first few months of its existence the Roosevelt Administration tried to revive industry by helping it to help itself. This effort virtually collapsed when last autumn it was realized that production was outrunning consumption and prices began to totter through the failure of the public to buy. The Administration has more recently resorted to the pulmotor. It is supporting the unemployed and bolstering up business by direct expenditures from the public funds. So long as this can go on, disaster may be averted, and it is possible that the extra purchasing power distributed may stimulate independent industrial activity. The danger is that vast bond issues, by expanding credit and undermining confidence in repayment, will wreck the currency system and with it the whole recovery program.

War Words in the East

TEMPERS are rising again in the Far East. Statesmen directly or indirectly involved are resorting to barely diplomatic language, which borders on the indiscreet when it does not actually contain menacing warnings. Undisguised preparations for war go on apace.

Immediately concerned are Japan and the Soviet Union, although the United States, Great Britain, and France are, to say the least, looking on with more than passing interest. A few weeks ago Maxim Litvinov, the Foreign Commissar of the Soviet Union, frankly admitted that Russia was actively preparing for war in Siberia. While denying that the Soviet Union would take the offensive, he declared that its military preparations were absolutely essential as a matter of self-defense because the Japanese imperialists were not to be trusted. His statement was followed by a speech delivered before the Diet by the new Japanese Foreign Minister, Koki Hirota. The Japanese, said Hirota, had long desired and long worked for friendly relations with the Soviet Union. But now the Russians had taken a strange new attitude toward Japan. This puzzled the Japanese, who could not understand why the Soviet Union should show such an unfriendly side. Hirota's speech was obviously meant not only to convey a warning to Russia that Japan was prepared to meet any challenge, but also to put the blame on the Russians in the event that fighting broke out on the Manchurian border.

Two leaders of the Russian Communist Party have replied by openly accusing Japan of planning to invade Siberia. Lazarus Kaganovich, second in command, declared that "every imperialist is hypocritical and cunning, and this applies especially to the Japanese imperialists. They are taking advantage of the international situation. They have seized Manchuria, are attempting to take full possession of China, and are dreaming of conquering the Soviet Far East, Siberia, and the world in general." Joseph Stalin entered the fray a few days later with the sweeping declaration that the "imperialist Powers," especially Japan and Germany, would literally take their lives in their hands if they were to start another war. Russia's relations with Japan, he said, "need serious improvement." But, he added with considerable feeling, "we have taken necessary measures to defend ourselves against an attack."

Through all these statements and counter-statements runs another note. The fear of an outbreak in the Far East has now apparently become so real that Japan and Russia are casting about for allies. Both Stalin and Kaganovich stressed the fact that the United States had recognized the Soviet Union, and both spoke warmly of the improvement in Soviet relations with America, France, and the countries of Eastern Europe. Nor did Stalin neglect to mention, as though their aid could be counted on in case of trouble, "the solid friendships with Turkey and Persia and the good relations with Italy." For his part, Hirota made a frank bid for American friendship and declared that Japan was sure it could continue to depend upon the traditional good-will of the great British Empire. Hirota's overture to the United States suggests that the Japanese believe there is more to American recognition of Russia than appears to the naked eye and that they have at last been thoroughly frightened by our gigantic naval-building program.

That this program has been laid down as an answer to Japan's military preparations and with an eye directly on the menacing situation in the Far East can no longer be denied. Even the Administration's supporters in Congress are scarcely at pains to conceal the fact that the naval program is aimed at Japan. But whether the ships are really to be built, or are merely being put on paper with a view to using them as a "big stick" against the Japanese and British at the coming naval conference, is not so clear. In either case the adoption of this program can only add to the suspicion and tension now abroad in the world. With Japan and Russia threatening each other, with British admirals secretly meeting in Singapore "to consider the ominous situation developing in the Pacific area," with the Italian Foreign Office frankly stating that Japan means to go to war, and with a French publicist like Edouard Herriot warning his countrymen of the approaching conflict, it would seem the better part of wisdom for us to proceed as discreetly and cautiously as humanly possible. By planning to build more and ever more warships we are simply causing Far Eastern tempers and suspicions to rise still higher.

LaGuardia to Date

FIORELLO H. LA GUARDIA has been Mayor of New York City for a month. Since he has nearly all of a four-year term of office yet to serve, it is perhaps unfair to begin at this early date to evaluate his administration. Yet in his first month the reform Mayor of New York has accomplished enough to make his election memorable. In the first place he has surrounded himself with appointees of the first order, intelligent, informed, capable. Robert Moses as Park Commissioner, A. A. Berle as City Chamberlain, Paul Blanshard as Commissioner of Accounts, Paul Windels as Corporation Counsel, Austin H. McCormick as Commissioner of Correction, among many others, are sufficient proof that Mr. LaGuardia looked only for fitness for a given job and paid no attention to former political affiliations or loyalties.

Before Commissioner Blanshard was a fortnight in office he had obtained the resignation of one city official on charges of corruption and had preferred charges against another. Fred C. Lemmerer, one of the three commissioners of the Triborough Bridge Authority, resigned when Mr. Blanshard accused him of having accepted a $930 brokerage commission after renting space for the authority's offices. John Stratton O'Leary, another of the commissioners, against whom Mr. Blanshard filed charges of inefficiency and neglect, is fighting the complaint. Mr. Blanshard has also charged the architects of the Rikers Island prison buildings with irregularities and abuses in connection with the construction of these buildings, and has recommended that final payments be suspended until a thorough investigation into the building operations has been made. Corporation Counsel Windels, in the first weeks of his term of office, announced that excessive fees had been paid by the city for condemnation of land for public purposes. He cited a tract of land in the Rockaways under condemnation for Marine Park.

It was assessed at $75,000 and State Supreme Court Justice Marshall handed to the owners a condemnation award of $434,258. Mr. Windels mentioned also the case of one "expert" who had received fees of $273,000 in four years from the city for services in the condemnation of land. The shocking disclosures at Welfare Island, which show the prison to have been completely under the domination of a gang of thugs who lived like princes at the expense of the great majority of the prisoners and with the connivance of the prison officials, provided the next scandal. The market racket, which revealed that tribute was automatically being paid by vendors to racketeers, was another. And every day some new example of curious city financing was discovered to confound the Mayor and his cabinet in their desire to provide a sound and solvent government for the city, as for instance when Controller Cunningham found that some $28,750,000 owed to the city on assessments not only had not been collected but had never even been billed.

Before these disclosures were more than under way, however, the Mayor commenced work on his plans to balance the city budget. His proposal for a bill which would grant him what Governor Lehman, in great alarm, described as "dictatorial powers" is already municipal history, as is his compromise which gave the same powers to himself and the Board of Estimate. Opposition to the second bill came largely from groups representing 140,000 city employees who would be affected by the Mayor's proposals to effect economy in part by a mandatory furlough of from two to four weeks without pay to all city employees receiving salaries of more than $2,000. School teachers, firemen, policemen, and others hurried to Albany to protest that they wanted to see the city's budget balanced—but not at their expense. The Mayor's reply to their complaint that he had promised not to cut city salaries was sharp and to the point. "I found a shipwreck and I am trying to get the city employees into a lifeboat until I can put them on a sound ship." He further prophesied that unless the city employees were willing to take the moderate cut he proposed for them, in the shape of a furlough without pay, they might face payless pay days next fall and might find that $80,000,000 or $100,000,000 of city bonds in their retirement funds would be in danger of default. In short, the Mayor proposed to cut city expenses by eliminating unnecessary jobs and by a temporary and moderate salary reduction. And in spite of campaign promises, which Mr. LaGuardia may have been rash to make, that is evidently what will have to be done in the immediate situation.

As far as New York City is an entity it is easy-going, cynical, hard to arouse to indignation, and harder still to keep aroused. In a wave of disgust it threw out Tammany Hall last November and put into office a Mayor who was pledged to the reform of the city government. Yet now that the reforms have started, Mayor LaGuardia finds that his worst enemy is at least a part of that New York which elected him to save it from the predatory tiger. The frightened city employees, led by Frank J. Prial, defeated for Controller in the last election, are by no means unlikely to find Mr. LaGuardia their best friend when reorganization of city finances takes place. At least, having elected a reform mayor the electorate as a whole would put itself in a ridiculous position if it refused to support him in the reforms which he proposes to make.

DON'T WORRY, SIGNORA.
WHEN I FEENISH YOU WILL BE ABLE TO GET-A MARS.

SOMETHING WRONG WITH THE GET.

© by "The Nation" & International Press. Reproduction in U.S.A. forbidden.

(Copyright in all countries.)

Issues and Men

Joseph B. Eastman, Coordinator

WHO is the Coordinator of the railroads who has just come out with a report to the President declaring that government ownership alone is the ultimate solution of the railroad problem in the United States? Well, for one thing, he is an extremely modest man. Here, for example, is his sketch of himself as contributed to "Who's Who in America":

EASTMAN, Joseph Bartlett, interstate commerce commr.; b. Katonah N. Y., June 26, 1882; s. Rev. John Huse and Lucy (King) E.; B.A. Amherst, 1904, LL.D., 1926. Holder of Amherst fellowship at South End House (social settlement), Boston, 1905; sec. Public Franchise League, Boston, 1906-13; counsel for employees of various street railway companies in wage arbitration cases, 1913-14; member Mass. Public Service Commn., by appt. of Govs. Walsh and McCall, 1915-19; mem. Interstate Commerce Commn. since Feb. 17, 1919. Mem. Psi Upsilon, Phi Beta Kappa. Clubs: Boston City; Cosmos, Racquet (Washington, D.C.). Home: 2266 Cathedral Av. N.W., Washington, D.C.

That is certainly not blowing his own trumpet when one considers that Mr. Eastman has been for years past the outstanding member of the Interstate Commerce Commission, outstanding in his ability, in the courage of his convictions, in the wide range of his views. I was interested to read the other day an article by the financial editor of one of our New York dailies, who is of the opinion that when the New Deal and Joseph B. Eastman get through with the railroads no one will be able to recognize them. That, he said, was the opinion of the leading railroad men themselves. He then quoted them as saying that the trouble with this Mr. Eastman was that he knew more about the railroads of the United States than any other living man!

No one must think from this that Mr. Eastman is a mere fanatic driving away at a certain program in season and out of season, long-haired, visionary, dominating, and ruthless. Far from it. His manner is unassuming, his appearance without those qualities which we usually associate with a domineering personality. As a matter of fact, he is extremely reasonable, and his report to the President that he did not think that this was the time for the government to take over the railroads was characteristic of his reasonableness. For years he has seen no other way out than government ownership. Yet he has never been dogmatic, nor has anyone been able to say definitely just whether he has in mind the appointment of a Secretary of Railroads to run the whole show from Washington, as the army and the navy and the post offices are run, or whether he prefers the plan which he submitted with his report to the President—without, however, claiming authorship of it—which calls for the creation of a corporation managed by five or seven trustees all the stock of which shall be owned by the government.

I have not been moved to call attention to Mr. Eastman because he is exceptional; there are many other public officers who are serving the government with great ability and devotion. He himself answers the question whether it is possible for a government to enlist men of first-class competence and shining integrity without paying them the high salaries offered by private corporations to the men they select for president or vice-president. When I contrast the character and talents of Mr. Eastman with those of some of the men who have been paid a million dollars a year by banks and steel companies, it is to laugh. He is the complete answer to those who have been defending the great annual payments to Wiggin and Mitchell, or to Grace of the Bethlehem Steel Company, on the ground that they were worth it because of their business-getting ability. Mr. Eastman has had the respect and admiration of everyone who has come in contact with him, Democrat or Republican, capitalist, official, or politician. I have no doubt that he could have wangled a fat job for himself from some of the large corporations years ago, and feathered his own nest most richly. He has preferred his small government salary and the privilege of serving his fellow-countrymen, which is delightful proof that the private-profit motive is not essential to the carrying on of a civilized government. And there are many like Mr. Eastman, as I have said. Recently The Nation placed on its Honor Roll for 1933 Consul-General George S. Messersmith and five other public servants of distinction: Frances Perkins, Jerome N. Frank, John Collier, William E. Borah, and William C. Bullitt, all for distinguished service.

When I have traveled abroad lately I have been struck with the enormous improvement in the quality of the men in our diplomatic service as contrasted with those politicians whom I found all over Europe, in northern Africa, and in Turkey in the course of a six months' journey undertaken just after I was graduated from Harvard University. Repeatedly then I felt disgraced by the gauche, ill-mannered, ill-bred, and incompetent men representing our country. In 1931 I covered very much the same ground (without going into Africa), and the change was simply astounding; particularly was this true of the young career men who have entered the diplomatic service during the last ten years prepared to make it a life work. Washington is full of fine men of scientific and intellectual distinction who would honor any government. They bring out clearly how vast are our resources in rich human material, and make it all the more regrettable that cheap politicians who strut their little day and pass from the scene overnight are allowed to manhandle the government services, to starve departments and bureaus that ought never to be pinched, to limit the activities of vitally necessary governmental undertakings while they spend untold millions upon the inefficient and wasteful army and navy—I mean inefficient in organization and expenditure, without reference to their fighting qualities.

Donald Garrison Kellard

Spain: Viva la Republica!

By ANITA BRENNER

I

SEPTEMBER, in Algeciras. A sharp wind blows across the Mediterranean between the Spanish coast and the dark zigzag of Morocco, but it is hot and quiet in Algeciras. Some railroad and dock workers are waiting on the waterfront to load the fast Madrid express. They are wisecracking and eating pears bought at forced bargain with a deaf and mutilated man. Most of the wisecracking is aimed at a spry, leathery little man who it seems nearly killed his woman a couple of days ago. They kid him about it, saying he is so big and brave he will end up in jail yet. A gaunt, angry-looking man with a black silk scarf tied high around his neck says yes, brave men go to jail. The small man jumps after one of the worst jokers; the rest kid them both. A knife flashes in the small one's hand, the other one hops, rubs his leg, the rest interfere, and they all sit down laughing again.

A street piano pulled by a mule drives up, playing the "Marseillaise." The mule is led by a boy about eighteen years old. His hair is all mixed up over his head and he grins as if he had something to celebrate. He passes a small plate around, jingles it, jingles the mule, points to the piano playing the "Marseillaise," grins, and says, "La república, la república," with each jingle. The dock workers all start jingling and laughing and saying, "La república, la república," and the small man points to the grinning boy and laughs. I ask them what is the joke and they say, "Look, he's celebrating the republic!" The boy says he has been doing it since the republic began, he has been all over Spain with his mule playing the "Marseillaise." The workers say: "Take his picture; he's the last man in Spain celebrating the republic. Put his picture in the paper. It's a good joke."

It is nearly three years since they were all singing the "Marseillaise" and shooting off firecrackers and yelling, "Viva la república!" Now the constitutional Cortes has just been dissolved and they have to vote again. Last time they voted they got a republic. Now they'd like to vote to get something else. The gaunt man says: "What did we get out of it anyhow? Maybe wages are higher but there aren't any jobs, so what good does that do? They passed a lot of laws and changed the names of the streets. It was a picnic for the lawyers and the writers. When you vote you just exercise the unworthy privilege of choosing your masters. The only thing is direct action."

A middle-aged man says: "Yes, but the Catholics and the Monarchists have lined up to get the Socialists, and if you don't vote you give the Cavern [the right] a vote. The Cavern is against the workers, and if the workers don't get together we'll have fascism." Another one says: "How can we have fascism? The fascists are everybody who has money. You take, for example, in my town, there are forty people with money and four hundred without. You put forty against four hundred and who wins? We win, of course. We're not little wooden soldiers like the Germans. They can't put that over on us." The gaunt man says: "We can't win by voting. Voting just gives the Socialists jobs.

That's all they want, jobs. And look what they did in Casas Viejas! The only thing is direct action and Libertarian Communism."

II

Casas Viejas is not very far away from Algeciras. On the way you pass bleak yellow fields, and olive groves, and cork groves, and some vineyards. Now and then you see a patch of green like an apron in front of a white house, and you see quite a lot of fat cattle. The few big houses seem to be empty and closed up. In places you also see charred trees and burned fields. Some of them have been burned over to prepare them for plowing and others have been burned by people who set fire to them to destroy the crops. Most of the land around here, as throughout Andalusia, Castile, and Extremadura, is owned in big parcels by people who live in Madrid, Seville, and Paris. They have not occupied the big houses for many years. It was too dangerous. The land is subdivided and rented at prices high enough to cover mortgages and taxes and leave a nice profit. Often the value on which the rent is based is twice as high as the value on which taxes are paid. Rent values became very high during the war, but even so renters were able to subdivide and subrent, pay interest and some cultivation costs, and still make a good profit. Some lands are subrented three and four times over, down the line.

The man who actually cultivates the land has to do it on a pretty narrow margin. He has to be backed by a bank loan, and if he wants a profit he can pay his workers very little. They used to get about two pesetas a day, about twenty-five cents, and some soup made of oil, water, garlic, and tomatoes. They worked only part of the year, altogether not more than two-thirds of it; the rest of the time they got charity or did odd jobs, and their wives worked. They tried to save to cover the off time, so that even when they were working they didn't have enough to eat. Many of them—perhaps all of them—don't know what it is like to eat as much as they want. They could see that the land was rich, and the people who owned it were rich, and the monasteries and convents on it were rich, but they had to measure their rations to live, and sometimes they had to steal a little. The only chance was to leave, go to America, and if they couldn't manage that they listened to speeches and read books and papers about how to get the rich off their backs. It was pretty easy: just kick them out and take the land. Without wealth everybody would be good and love his neighbor. The state was plainly something that supported wealth, so the best thing was to do away with the state.

During the dictatorship of Primo de Rivera the Socialists pushed wage-increase laws, and when the republic was proclaimed, these laws were among the first to be voted. They provided a minimum wage of eight pesetas a day. The farmers weren't getting as much as formerly for their crops, they had loans to cope with, and they got around the law by hiring workers from other regions and from Portugal who would take anything. The Socialists then passed a law called the Ley de Términos Municipales, which provided that no one could employ labor from the "outside" if there were any local unemployed. Since these laws presaged the ruin of many small farmers, the banks withdrew credit.

The farmers and landowners, settling on a policy of sabotage, organized into a league called the Confederación Española de Derechas Agrarias (C. E. D. A.). They turned much of the arable land into pasture, which takes very little labor, and wherever they could they cut down on production, made no repairs, and opposed all the government was doing to advance irrigation, introduce new crops, and intensify agriculture to make up for the larger and larger wastelands. This made a kind of iron ring around most villages and towns, for though they all had formerly owned a certain amount of communal land, it had been stolen during the last twenty years or so. (The procedure was simple: the mayor and his relatives and friends just took pieces. Who knew the records, who would protest, and to whom?)

Casas Viejas was one of the villages besieged by wastelands. The people in this village were all out of work. None of them had any savings and no one offered them any relief. Postal money orders that used to come from relatives in America stopped. They could force the farmers to give them food or work, as some peasants did, or they could steal olives and acorns. People were always being caught—and shot—by the Civil Guard in the dead of night with a basket of acorns. The government said agrarian reform was on the way, on the way, and some lands that had belonged to grandees now belonged to the government; but there was no money to finance collectives or private patches, and nothing happened. In some villages with Communist or Socialist mayors municipal funds were used for small agrarian projects, but the most public funds were saddled with big debts from the Primo de Rivera days, nothing much could be done that way. Besides, the courts checked almost every move.

In Casas Viejas the people were starving a year after they voted for the republic. Men were watching their children die of pneumonia, dysentery, tuberculosis, cramps. The village grocer and the village baker tried to help a little but they were going bankrupt. Casas Viejas had nothing to lose any more; the only way out—since nothing came of the republic—was Libertarian Communism. They waited for the word, and made their plans. One family, known as the Six Fingers family because the head of it was called Six Fingers, led the revolt. They put a red-and-black flag over the courthouse, told the Civil Guard to go away or come and work, and waited to hear from a red-and-black Madrid.

Madrid, the Socialist-Republican government headed by Manuel Azaña, sent a detachment of Assault Guards with machine-guns. The Assault Guard is a kind of national police corps created by the republic. Members are recruited chiefly among veterans of Moroccan campaigns, and Spaniards know what that means. The detachment that went to Casas Viejas thought it was going to fight savages, and somewhere or other it had got the notion that it must "take no prisoners." The Civil Guard in Casas Viejas showed them the Six Fingers house, a straw-thatched hut in a hollow on top of a hill. Six Fingers was barricaded inside with his family. The guardsmen trained a machine-gun on the house and tried to make a sieve of it, but it was too low and the bullets lodged in the thatch. In a house nearby they could feel the thump, sputter, and whine, but they didn't dare look out to see what was happening. The Assault Guards surrounded the Six Fingers house and set fire to it. Only one person, a small girl, escaped. She ran out shrieking, her clothes afire. One man of the Assault Guard who had been dragged inside by the Six Fingers family when he fell wounded or dead near the door was burned up, too. Guardsmen then went through the town, picked out some of the people the Civil Guard led them to, got others who were looking out of their doors, and shot them all. They threw them on the burning house so it would look as if a fighting force, barricaded inside, had perished in battle.

The episode at Casas Viejas created a fine justification for an attack by conservatives on the Republicans and Socialists. The Catholics and Monarchists sent people to the village to get details and pictures; they rewrote and indorsed what the Anarcho-Syndicalists said; they called Azaña and his Cabinet scoundrels, brutes, grafters, fiends. (The great slaughters of the monarchy—Annual, Montjuich, the Socialists mowed down in jail yards in 1917, the reign of terror in Barcelona in 1921, the execution of republicans just before the fall of the monarchy—had not impressed them much. That was Law and Order.) In addition they said the Socialists were all getting rich in office, that Azaña was a loose and malevolent man, and that together they were ruining the national economy. Wasn't there a crisis? Who was to blame but the government, passing disastrous laws? Wasn't there plenty of work under Primo de Rivera, up to 1929?

All this didn't do anything for Casas Viejas except make it famous. The people of the village acquired a dramatic technique. They show you the Six Fingers house, where the machine-guns were placed, the houses of the other victims, and they tell you how Mariquita escaped from the blaze. The Civil Guard watches you closely and keeps tab on whose house you visit and who talks to you. A stool—they whisper it to you—has attached himself to you. You pry yourself loose and in a crowded hut you try to find out how the people of Casas Viejas are living. "Living? We're eating each other," they tell you. One of them shoulders his way into the hut laughing. The joke is that the priest is giving away loaves of bread. And they explain: "See? It's elections. He never did that before." Another says he hears the Cavern is going to pay five pesetas a vote; God knows he needs it, and what difference will it make anyhow, the joke will be on them. Another says: "They're offering jobs. I've never voted but once in my life, that was to bring the republic, and I guess I won't vote again. They used to offer you heaven and now they offer you jobs, but it's the same people and you'll get the job about as you get heaven, when you're dead." This is a joke, everybody laughs. The landlords have their jokes, too. They say: "You wanted a republic? Well, now eat republic. Viva!"

III

In Madrid the political armies are mobilizing. There are posters that show, in graphs, how unemployment has gone up and production down, how the budget has gone up and business down. The posters are labeled "Anti-Marxist Front." The walls are scrawled with swastikas, sickles and scythes, vivas and mueras. Students and workers tear down the anti-Marxist posters and policemen chase them. The Radical Party is in power. It is headed by Alejandro Lerroux, who made himself famous when he was young as an Anarchist orator. He said, "Let us lift the veils of the nuns and make them holy mothers." Alejandro Lerroux is a friend of Juan March, the richest man in Spain. His party has a nucleus of old republicans surrounded by a mass of new ones. In it are all the old politicians who had to stay in the game for a living. Together with the C. E. D. A., they are setting up the old election machinery which was half dismantled by the republic, and meanwhile they have practically suspended the agrarian reform, the lay laws, and some of the labor laws. Under their leadership the government extends to the priesthood its subsidy, which was to have expired, and the transfer of the schools into government hands has been postponed. Cardinal Vidal y Barraquer, who has been quietly keeping in touch with President Alcalá Zamora, has slipped away to Rome on a special passport to negotiate the first steps of a Concordat. And Juan March has walked out of jail.

The Radical Party wants about what the Republican Party in the United States has stood for. Juan March is a combination of Al Capone and Andrew Mellon, and his quarrel with the republic is like their quarrels—over taxes. March was accustomed to having the government do what he wanted, which was to give him the right of way no matter how shady his undertakings. He owns most of the Spanish press. He was in jail charged with smuggling and graft, and while he was there his papers carried on an anti-Azaña, anti-Socialist campaign, making much of Casas Viejas. His business was seriously interfered with, for, after all, the Republican-Socialist bloc was honest.

Throwing out the Republican-Socialists solved a lot of problems: Juan March, the agrarian question, the labor question, the lay laws. So far as March and the C. E. D. A. could see, the constitutional Cortes could be credited with only two good laws: the Ley de Orden Público, which provides for three stages of martial law at the discretion of the Minister of the Interior, and the Ley de Vagos, which says that anybody who cannot show that he has a legitimate income may be preventively jailed, up to ten years, especially if he has ever been in jail. What republican, Socialist, Anarcho-Syndicalist, Communist, of any consequence hasn't?

The Radical Party made a convenient bridge for the C. E. D. A., which wants repeal of all laws affecting the church and repeal of the agrarian laws. The C. E. D. A.-Radical alliance had a powerful ally—the President. To save his soul he dissolved the constitutional Cortes just before the lay laws were to have been enforced. Let elections take care of the rest.

The C. E. D. A. sent out a cautious feeler through its political arm, Acción Popular. This is a heterogeneous organization composed largely of farmers squeezed between the banks and the labor laws; it is backed by the landowners and the church, and contains many devout students and a host of upper-class women. Its leader, Gil Robles, used to be president of the Jesuit youth organization, Los Hijos de San Luis. He is a plump, sallow, smiling man with button eyes, a short nose, fleshy lips, and a dimple in his chin. He attended the Nazi Nürnberg Congress and came back with many ideas, but when he tries the fascist salute it turns into a priestly gesture of invocation. Workers call him "El Sacristán."

Gil Robles announced a preelection concentration in Madrid. Denouncing this as a fascist march on Madrid, the Socialists said they would call a general strike. The Anarcho-Syndicalists and the Communists joined, with the slogan "No Bread and No Trains for the Fascists." Since the strike would have stopped everything in Madrid and started a battle, the concentration was called off. Acción Popular organized its campaign on a house-to-house basis. It had at its disposal fleets of cars in which the halt, the lame, and the blind were tenderly taken to vote by young and devout stalwarts under police protection. The cloisters and the monasteries opened, lifelong vows were suspended on election day, and the homes for the aged, the hospitals, asylums, and sanitariums disgorged into the polling booths. In some sections of Madrid crowds picketed the hospitals. They said the dying were being taken to vote, too. All day long mobs chased vote-buyers and beat them up. Acción Popular agents got lists of the dead in each district, and even the dead voted twice, somehow or other getting their ballots into the coffin-like glass caskets presided over by priests. There were polling places in religious schools, Acción Popular propaganda was prominently displayed within, Acción Popular agents were busy without, and the police stood by watchfully.

IV

The new Cortes opened with the country under martial law, the press censored, the jails bursting with political prisoners, mostly Anarcho-Syndicalists. Three powers won the biggest blocks in the shuffle. The first, the biggest, was obtained by the conservatives (Acción Popular, Monarchists, and other conservatives), the second by the Radicals, the third by the Socialists. Together, Acción Popular and the Radicals can control Parliament, much as the Azaña-Socialist-Republican bloc did before. The C. E. D. A. would rather let the Radical Party have the Cabinet until the people get used to the idea that the C. E. D. A. is republican after all. It announced this after the elections, which split off part of its extreme-right allied wing. Gil Robles cried, "Viva la república!" and said Rome permitted it.

Gil Robles has made two big noisy moves and several quiet ones. The first noisy move was "Viva la república!" The second was a proposal for unemployment relief. His quiet moves, passed by the Cortes, are suspension of the Ley de Términos Municipales, postponement of the lay-law enforcement, and defense of the telephone company's vicious contract. (The I. T. and T. is linked with a national company which dovetails into Jesuit electrical interests.) Robles is busily building up his organization, and the Radical Party, crying "Viva la república," is trying to reorganize the army. His goal, as described to this writer just before the elections, is a "corporative state . . . with centralized executive power and consultative parliamentary powers." He is in favor of labor reform, "without violating the principle of private property." He wants very much to "elevate the culture of the masses," and he thinks it is the duty of the Catholics to persuade the landowners to admit reforms. "We must level things down, though science and culture may suffer for want of protectors."

Whoever stands in the way of this goal, which clearly is fascism pivoting on the church and more specifically on the Jesuit Order, must be destroyed. The first barrier is the Socialist Party. Gil Robles is sure things will work out his way. "My only fear is that things will go too fast. We have to teach the people to look upon Acción Popular as a labor party, not as a Catholic party. And we have to teach our own people, too. Their ideals carry them too far. I am a possibilist. As much as is possible, whenever possible, and we'll get to the ideal state. The ideal state? One which respects the rights of the church and the rights of property; that is what a state is for."

Against Gil Robles—what is there? The dismembered republicans such as Azaña's Acción Republicana; Catalonia, violently republican, anti-church, and anti-centralist; the workers. The first two struggle for a leftist, liberal republic such as the Azaña-Socialist bloc tried to shape. They say that a republic with such a Cortes as the present body is not a republic at all. The workers want social revolution. They look at Germany, they look at Spain, and they see enough parallels to rouse them violently. In their own ranks they see disorganization, confusion, fear splitting a mass of at least 4,000,000 men ready to fight. Behind Gil Robles stand the biggest capitalist in Spain and the Jesuit Order; the richest men are his allies. The republic is a kind of dead body being used as a shield.

Revolution in Colorado

By FRANK CLAY CROSS

Denver, January 24

THE belief is apparently pretty widespread that although in general "America is in no danger of revolution," there are real danger spots, in our present hunger crisis, in the great cities—in New York and Chicago and other places heavily populated with people of foreign birth or recent foreign extraction. No one seems to have given serious consideration to the possibility that trouble might first arise in the wide open spaces and pure air of the West. Yet not one of the six States which have been most impotent in combating the specter of starvation is in a great industrial area, and three of them are west of the Mississippi River. Perhaps a glimpse behind the scenes, a brief recital of a few events which took place in Denver between January 4 and January 20—of which not one word appeared in Denver newspapers—may serve to sharpen the senses of citizens in several other States which are also "in no danger of revolution."

To understand the dramatic and ominous events in Colorado, which so strangely escaped the notice of the press, one must know a little of the history of the Twenty-ninth General Assembly of the State, "the Twiddling Twenty-ninth," which met for the first time in January, 1933. That session dragged through 126 long, weary days without taking any action whatever to provide food for thousands of unfortunate victims of the depression, many of whom were literally starving. One after another, bills to raise relief money were introduced only to be challenged and defeated by one of the most vicious and powerful lobbies that ever disgraced an American State. There were, of course, a few worthy members in the legislature, a few fairly upright, brave, and intelligent men; but most of the lot constituted as craven and stupid a group of lawmakers as ever shamed a people. They were completely cowed by the lobbyists—lobbyists against any increase of the income tax, lobbyists against a sales tax, lobbyists against a special gasoline tax and against a division of the highway fund. No proposal was free from attack. Selfish blocs ruled all the voting. Rumors of intimidation and bribery circulated through the Capitol.

At last, on May 13, the farce ended. In Washington Harry L. Hopkins, Federal Relief Administrator, agreed to set aside until July the government's requirement that the burden of caring for the needy should be shared equally by local, State, and federal agencies. In July the government's contribution to Colorado was cut to less than one-third of what it had been in June—from $234,344.61 to $86,314.14. In August it was cut again to $82,889.38, and in September to $57,393.18. The situation became desperate. On August 2, however, "the Twiddling Twenty-ninth" met in special session, at the summons of Governor Johnson, to tackle the problem of relief once more. This time, as a result of the Governor's heroic efforts, a measure calling for a special automobile tax was passed, but almost before the legislators reached home, two suits had been filed to test the constitutionality of the act. On October 18 a reactionary Supreme Court handed down a four-to-three decision against the tax.

Governor Johnson immediately flew to Washington to supplicate Administrator Hopkins for a continuance of federal relief on the promise that he would call another session of the General Assembly in December. The Administrator took compassion and yielded to his entreaty. The legislative session in December, however, was a degenerate as the two which preceded it—perhaps more so. Again the halls of the Capitol were filled with lobbyists. The weaklings of the General Assembly met every plea for action, every shaft of censure from the churches, the relief agencies, and the labor unions, with plaintive protests that they were unable to break the deadlock. "Why don't you go after the lobbyists?" they whimpered. The sordidness of the situation was almost beyond belief.

Another adjournment! People were starving, but the legislators had to go home for Christmas. In Washington the patience of Administrator Hopkins was now exhausted. On January 1, he announced, all further aid for Colorado from the federal government would be discontinued. Soon afterward the newspapers began to be strangely silent about certain very ominous happenings. Two hunger riots at charity stations were entirely ignored. A government agent was almost killed by a mob of desperate men. The incident received hardly a quarter-column of evasive comment. The tide of revolution was rising.

Except for the work of one man the Centennial State would surely have fallen under a reign of terror in the ten days between Christmas and January 3, when the General Assembly reconvened. This man was Edgar M. Wahlberg, chaplain of the House of Representatives and pastor of Grace Community Church in Denver. Edgar Wahlberg is a small man, thirty-four years old. His church is one of the most effective and best-run welfare centers to be found anywhere in the West. The poorer classes of the city have absolute confidence in the friendship and judgment of the little preacher, in part, perhaps, because they recognize him as a fellow in poverty. His salary from the church is just $1,200 a year, and he does well to get half of it.

Throughout the shameful sessions of the General Assembly, Mr. Wahlberg had fought valiantly to end the deadlock on relief. He had implored the legislators to face the stark realities. He had even prayed before them for action—any action to alleviate the suffering of destitute men and women and hungry children. "O God," he prayed, "make the more intelligent among us strong to lead. Give those who are afraid, courage. Save us from the temptation and sin of selfishness. Make us see the foolishness of dodging the real issue with petty interests and practices." That prayer didn't sit so well with the legislators. They rather disliked to be so frankly presented in the presence of Almighty God. They accused the chaplain of lobbying, and he was lobbying, lobbying with all his might and main, lobbying for his fellow-men.

When "the Twiddling Twenty-ninth" adjourned for Christmas without any action, ominous rumors began to reach the chaplain. The desperate victims of the lawmakers' grim farce had reached the end of endurance. Tense whispers began to pass from hungry mouths to ready ears—plans for wholesale food thefts, riots, and even bloodshed. Quickly the chaplain summoned his strongest counselors among the sufferers. "Wait! Wait!" he urged. "Don't start trouble yet. If you do you'll only add to your own misery. You'll be clubbed and put in jail. Some of you may be killed. Give me one more chance to get action from the State." He knew, however, that it would be unsafe to ask these men to wait longer without some other definite plan ahead. "When the General Assembly meets again on January 3," he said, "you get every man and woman that you can bring together to come to the State House. Leave the rest to me."

On January 3 the halls of the Capitol were thronged with people, milling, shouting, hurling threats. As Wahlberg went among them he saw that his plan had failed to guard against one danger. Communist leaders had seized control of the mob. The chaplain is not a Communist himself, though some of the legislators had charged him with such connections. "My talk isn't communism," he had retorted. "All hungry people talk the same language."

The rioters stormed into the Senate chamber. The senators, panic-stricken, fled before them. The rioters crowded into the lawmakers' seats while the leaders invaded the rostrum. A genuine Communist meeting followed—the first Communist meeting to be held under the dome of any Capitol in the United States. Over in the House chamber old Speaker Twining kept his wits. He quickly faked a recess and invited the leaders of the mob to come forward. While they harangued, the mob in the galleries showered down catcalls and jeers and threats on the frightened representatives who failed to escape from the room.

Such events would seem important enough for some mention in the press, but the only stories which were carried described the affair as if it had been an orderly and routine protest by the unemployed. The Senate was reported to be not in session but engaged in committee meetings. The Denver Post, however, which had previously opposed all bond issues on the part of the city or State, suddenly began to support a million-dollar municipal issue for direct relief in Denver. Yes, in big headlines!

The miscarriage of his first plan did not turn Wahlberg from his determination to forestall further trouble. After the turmoil of January 3, a recurrence of which he managed to prevent the next day, an ominous calm settled down on the Capitol. All the next week, in a tense atmosphere, he worked with the president of the Senate and Speaker Twining on a new scheme to hammer reason into the heads of the stupid legislators. "This situation is dangerous," he warned them. "You've got to get your leaders together to hear about it from people who know the facts." Finally thirteen chosen senators agreed to attend a special meeting on Tuesday morning, January 16, but the House members were too obtuse to listen.

That morning the group of Senate leaders listened aghast to the testimony of men and women whose word they could not doubt. They heard how a crowd of almost 400 desperate men, armed with clubs and other weapons, had met on a vacant lot in the eastern part of the city the previous Sunday at four o'clock in the morning, ready to loot the chain stores for food. Only by a narrow margin had the wiser heads, following the counsel of the chaplain, prevailed upon them to give the lawmakers one more chance. Down on the Platte River bottoms another crowd had been dispersed by similar counsel.

The thirteen senators heard the executive secretary of the Community Chest tell them how his workers were in fear for their lives if some action were not taken at once. Hungry people do not always stop to think who is to blame for their plight. The senators heard stories of almost incredible suffering, of families whose water had been turned off by the city authorities, of mothers who were begging the charities to take their children. Forty thousand people were actually starving to death.

Meanwhile the House members were also beginning to be worried. They came to the conclusion that it might be healthful for them, too, to do a little listening. Consequently they invited the chaplain to bring his witnesses for them to hear the next afternoon. That was Wednesday. On Thursday T. J. Edmunds arrived from Des Moines, Iowa, as an emissary of Administrator Hopkins. On Saturday the General Assembly, now completely cowed, not by the lobbyists but by the hungry mobs, sent a relief bill to Governor Johnson, who signed it at 9:45 Saturday night. It was a compromise bill designed to raise $2,000,000 by adding one cent per gallon to the gasoline tax until August 31, and by taking one-quarter of the highway fund until January 1, 1935. If the Supreme Court lets it stand, perhaps the woes of Colorado are partially solved for a while, but already a suit is threatened by the Rocky Mountain Motorists, Inc.

The next day, Sunday, Mr. Edmunds telephoned Washington. His account of the emergency brought a promise that $500,000 would arrive in Denver Monday morning. Thus may be dispersed for a while the ominous clouds which have hung over Colorado, where, according to the Denver Post, "the sun shines 365 days in the year." For a few months more, hungry mouths will be fed; but what will happen then?

Chiselers at Work and Play

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, January 27

LIVE and learn. The youthful Senator Nye and the elderly Senator Borah have lived through enough in the last ten days to learn that attacks on the NRA are bad political medicine, especially when they conflict with virtually all the known facts. Nye has admitted his mistake already. Borah never admits anything unless compelled to. (While campaigning for Hoover in 1928 he was compelled to admit that he had stated on the Senate floor eleven years earlier that he would not trust the same Hoover with the expenditure of $100,000,000 of public funds.) To speak harshly of these gentlemen gives me some pain, because my relations with them have been uniformly cordial. At one time, indeed, when there was evidence to support his suspicion that Ruth Hanna McCormick's hired thugs were seeking to plant a blonde chorus girl on him in Chicago, Nye asked me to occupy the same room with him. Heaven only knows how many million cubic yards of breath I have expended in the last ten years defending him against the disparaging appraisals of my colleagues, most of whom consider him a complete nitwit, but I have had cause to wonder lately how much of it was wasted. For Borah I have much personal fondness and a profound respect for his unusual abilities. It is regrettable that he lacks a proportionate integrity of purpose and sense of direction. But no man who plays politics with national recovery is entitled to consideration, and that is what Nye and Borah attempted to do. At the very moment when Hugh Johnson was begging both to become members of a Senate committee with sweeping authority to correct any evils it might find in the administration of the National Recovery Act, and on the very day when Nye was thanking Johnson for his frank and gracious offer and giving every intimation that he would accept, he was going quietly to the Federal Trade Commission to stir up trouble for Johnson. It is not necessary to characterize such conduct, and in view of what the young man heard from his constituents he probably will watch his step hereafter. He had better.

FOR Nye the excuse might be made that he didn't know any better, but no such apology will hold in Borah's case. He is far too sound a lawyer to believe that industry could be kept under codes of competition and still be subject to the full operation of the anti-trust laws. The mere act of meeting to adopt a code and set up a code authority would be a flagrant violation of the law as it stood before the Recovery Act suspended its application. Any argument to the contrary is sheer demagoguery or sheer ignorance, and Borah is far from being an ignoramus. Moreover, for the government to induce industries to place themselves under codes in consideration of certain legal immunities, and then to revoke those immunities, would be a colossal act of dishonor. Nye and Borah bleed for the rights of the "little man," but fail to make clear just whom they mean. It should be made abundantly clear. The "little man" for whom they burn is the fellow who objects to paying his employees a minimum of $12 for a fifty-four-hour week, and the "rights" which they would restore to him are those of working them longer and paying them less! Let these two champions of the common people explain that! The case of Carter Glass is somewhat different. He is a perfectly sincere and irascible old party who spends his days fuming because the economy of the General Grant era perversely refuses to return. His place in history would have been safer if he had entered a monastery the day after he delivered his radio campaign speech. Any talk about the NRA conspiring to foster monopoly is nonsense. I hardly think the readers—or even the editors—of The Nation would classify this writer as a friend of monopoly or a tool of Wall Street, but I violate no confidence by saying that Johnson has repeatedly asked me to join his staff and undertake the job of dealing with that very problem. It is a pleasure to report, in passing, that literally thousands of letters are pouring into Washington from persons stating they have canceled their subscriptions to the Chicago Tribune because of its scurrilous attacks on the NRA. This was the sheet which introduced the delectable practice of employing known criminals and racketeers. By every standard of professional decency and public morals, Colonel McCormick has earned the right to retire from the publishing business. I hope the people of Chicago will help him to exercise it.

OUR worst suspicions about the air- and ocean-mail contracts awarded under the Hoover Administration are being confirmed daily before the Black committee, although, in justice to ex-Postmaster-General Walter Brown, it must be conceded that his story about finding the missing official correspondence in his cellar probably has contributed more to the gaiety of the nation than any episode since Hoover's prophecy about grass growing in the streets. But that, together with General Atterbury's description of Brown as "frank, candid, and straightforward," and the filibuster which Dave Reed conducted in the Senate while Brown was awarding an ocean-mail contract to a tight little crew of Pennsylvanians, is virtually the only relief in a putrid spectacle. Aside from all the waste, favoritism, and graft that have been exposed, the situation has an aspect which strikes me as particularly ominous. I apprehend that we are in for a war with Japan, and I anticipate that it may be decided in the air. I am interested in that prospect, if for no other reason than the likelihood that I and my two sons will be in it. What is the condition of our air forces? It ought to be excellent. Since 1926 the government has paid out about $90,000,000 in air-mail subsidies. It was paid on the pretext of encouraging an "infant industry," but most of us knew it was spent for national defense, in the belief that it would promote the development of more efficient planes. In the last few days we have learned that a large part of it went to officers of the National City Bank. It went for the payment of enormous salaries and bonuses, and to enhance stock values. On the strength of an original investment of $460 cash in Pratt and Whitney, engine manufacturers, Fred Rentschler and George Mead have taken salaries, bonuses, and profits totaling more than $18,000,000, and still own stock with a market value of about $3,000,000. Less impressive, but stranger in some respects, is the case of young Charles Deeds, whose father resigned a colonelcy in the army air corps to engage in commercial aviation. In consequence of a $40 investment, this fortunate youth has received about $2,000,000. For approximately one year Pratt and Whitney's principal, if not its only, customers were the army and navy! The fabulous profits which these men reaped were due to the company's uncanny ability to sell engines to the government, and its successor's ability to get lucrative mail contracts. Some interesting indictments are in prospect as this is written. Incidentally, the inquiry has served to focus attention on the choicest pair of New England boobs seen here in a generation. I allude to Senators Austin of Vermont and White of Maine. They don't even know enough to stay away, and their attempts to "cover up" for Brown and his favorites are ludicrously ineffective. You wouldn't catch a Lenroot or a Smoot within two blocks of a hearing that had grown as hot as this one has.

.

THE food and drug lobby has lost none of its boldness, its latest step being to cause the introduction of a "substitute" for the Tugwell-Copeland bill. It is called the Beal bill, and was offered in the house by Loring Black, of Brooklyn—who should be thoroughly ashamed of himself. The bill is a transparent fraud, and would actually weaken the provisions of the miserably inadequate existing law. For criminal prosecutions it would substitute a sort of weak-kneed "cease and desist" practice, with endless rights of appeal and argument. Thus the lofty altruist who advertised and sold horse liniment as a remedy for tuberculosis would be afforded ample opportunity to persuade the Secretary of Agriculture that horse liniment is really a remedy for tuberculosis, and allowed to continue its sale as such while he argued the point. False claims would be prohibited if offered as statements of fact, but not if presented as expressions of opinion! Cosmetics would be banned only when "imminently dangerous." Just how dangerous "imminently dangerous" is, I am not prepared to say. Perhaps fatal—in which case the bill would not apply to an eyelash dye which destroys the eyes. The lobbyists who are out to get Rex Tugwell's scalp for threatening their sacred right to poison for profit don't know the big bad wolf in the White House. They will get the shock of their lives when Roosevelt creates the post of Under Secretary of Agriculture expressly as a reward to Tugwell for his work on the bill. The country editors who send me abusive letters because of my gentle remarks on the subject might save their tempers and my time. I care nothing about the opinions of such vermin. Neither, to digress, am I impressed by Carter Glass's argument that 16,000 private bankers in this country should have been permitted to take a profit of four billion dollars on their gold reserves as the direct result of a change of governmental policy. If anyone has thought of a surer way to precipitate a revolution, he has omitted to mention it.

The Milk Trust Gets the Cream

By ALEXANDER KENDRICK

BLOOD has mingled with milk again, and dairy farmers who were to have been stilled by fair-price provisions in the marketing codes and agreements of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration have once more broken out into insurrection. It is a continuation of last year's revolt and it presages more trouble ahead in the form of price wars and new strikes. In Illinois, Wisconsin, and California the rebellion has been an active, violent one, like those in Iowa and New York State last year; in the East the new uprising has been more restrained but none the less real and dangerous.

The revolt is of two types: first, against the government; and, second, against the powerful distributors, universally characterized by the farmers as the "milk trust." Fundamentally both are the same revolt, for dissatisfaction with the government arises from its condonation of unfair practices carried on by the distributors. But whether against government or distributor, whether in California or Pennsylvania, the reason for agrarian unrest is the same—the AAA marketing agreements simply did not do what they were presumably designed to do. The more outspoken farm leaders charge that this was effected deliberately, by the influence of the distributors.

The Chicago situation, most recent in the public eye, may be taken as generally typical. Belatedly the government has recognized the underlying fault, and in the new codes being formulated both the producer and the consumer will get fairer treatment by a slicing off of both ends of the middleman-distributor's huge profits. But the Chicago disturbances take on an added significance because they have forced the government to abandon its first price-fixing experiment almost before it was really under way. The price was fixed to both producer and consumer, but the retail price was too high and consumption was cut down. At the same time higher farm prices sent production up, a milk surplus was created, more milk was made into butter, and there was a consequent sag in the butter and cheese market, despite purchases made by the Surplus Corporation. Secretary Wallace now considers an experiment of this sort frankly unenforceable, and has said so through his new milk administrator, Jerry H. Mason.

In the first days of the new year, just as in the spring and fall of 1933, Chicago saw roads picketed, trucks dumped, trains halted, blood spilled, and the city's milk supply virtually dried up. This violent action was taken by some 18,000 organized dairy farmers, members of the Pure Milk Association, to protest price-cutting by chiseling dealers, generally chaotic conditions in the industry, and lack of effective control or enforcement. They carried on the strike for five days. Then the government stepped in with threats of punishment for interference with interstate milk shipments, and the hard-hit dairies called a truce. There is to be some change in the farm price, cutting the present rate but setting a fixed figure, while the new retail price will be governed by the market and will be subject to the usual price-cutting fostered by cutthroat competition. This is a blow at the distributor and not at the farmer, and is thus a departure from former attempts at control.

It is generally accepted that the milk farmer is sadly underpaid, in most cases receiving less than the cost of production, but he is less aroused at this than at the wide spread between his price and what the consumer must pay at retail. This spread gives the distributor an enormous profit wholly out of proportion to the value of his bottling and delivering services. Even such a state of affairs could be, as it has been, tolerated if it were not for one salient fact: when retail prices are cut, the farmer's price is cut but the distributor's margin of profit remains the same or even increases. When retail prices are raised, on the other hand, the benefit is usually not passed on to the farmer; the distributor keeps it for himself. In 1929 the average net price to farmers was $2.56 per hundredweight; in 1932 it had shrunk to $1.32, almost half. Retail prices during the same period dropped 37 per cent and the middleman's profits only 18 per cent.

In Chicago last summer a retail price of ten cents per quart was set, and a farm price of $1.75 per hundredweight. The farmers immediately protested that this agreement was unfair, which it patently was. Under threat of further strikes, on November 3 it was amended to give the farmer $2.10. The distributors automatically passed the increase on to the consumer, raising the retail milk price to eleven cents and keeping their own profit margin. Whereupon the consumer not unjustifiably complained, and the milk bootlegger waxed fatter than ever at a retail price of seven cents. The whole agreement was thrown open for review, books of the distributors' and the producers' associations were audited by the government, and after Dr. Clyde L. King had resigned as federal milk administrator, the order to terminate the agreement came from Secretary Wallace, effective on January 1. The original dissension was laid to one serious blunder. The producers who signed the agreement represented the large cooperatives, which make up 75 per cent of the dairy-farm industry. The cooperatives have never protested against the large profits of the distributor for the simple reason that they are in large measure controlled by the large distributors' combines. It is only the independent farmer who has failed to make a living and shown resentment at his predicament.

The Chicago code went into effect on August 1 last, and immediately rode into a sea of trouble. Upon it were to be patterned the New York and Philadelphia codes and codes for the smaller cities, of which eleven have been abrogated and will be replaced. In all these agreements the production clauses were based on the theory that the dairy industry's ills arise from a lamentable surplus of milk, and that the only way to remedy this is to set aside a fixed amount sold by the farmer as "basic" milk and class the remainder of what he produces as "surplus" milk. "Basic" milk was to be used for fluid and drinking purposes, and to be paid for at a proportionately high price. "Surplus" milk was to be used for butter, cheese, and ice cream, and to bring a much smaller price. Unfortunately it was the distributor who was to decide which milk was which, and allot each farmer his fixed proportions of each. Moreover, there was no reason in the world why the distributor could not pay the farmer cheap "surplus" prices for the bulk of his milk, and then sell it as fluid milk at the highest prices.

This plan was so unfair that it has been abandoned for Chicago. The Philadelphia agreement, substantially the same, has also been canceled, as will be the New York agreement not yet completed. It must be understood that the Chicago truce is simply that—a mere stop-gap until the marketing agreements are revised, following public hearings. But farm leaders will attempt to incorporate their past gains in the new code and to obtain AAA enforcement of them. For the first time independent dairies, that is, those not belonging to the Chicago Milk Council, will pay for their milk on a minimum-price basis. These include dairies which refused to sign or abide by the August agreement. Universal licensing of distributors will also be sought.

Similar confusion has prevailed in the New York and Philadelphia areas. Since last year's strikes in New York State for increased farm prices, the producers have been patiently waiting for the completion of the milk-shed marketing agreement which was begun in August. But in the meantime a joint plan for New York and New Jersey, involving reduction of last year's production rate by 20 per cent, an interstate price agreement, and stabilization of the industry by licensing, is scheduled to become effective February 1. In Philadelphia the lines of dissension are more clearly defined. There the fight is against the allegedly monopolistic tendencies of the Interstate Milk Producers' Association, which represents 80 per cent of the marketed milk and is hand in glove with the powerful distributors' organization, the Philadelphia Milk Exchange. The Interstate has some 20,000 members, and the price it accepts is naturally forced upon the smaller farmers.

The Interstate in Philadelphia and the Dairymen's League in New York form the very heart of the milk trust. The former embraces the city of Philadelphia and its suburbs, twenty-four counties in Pennsylvania, eight in New Jersey, eleven in Maryland, three in Delaware, and two in West Virginia. The latter includes all of New York State and parts of Pennsylvania, Ohio, New Jersey, Massachusetts, Vermont, and Connecticut. The two giant corporations banded together at the last session of the Pennsylvania legislature and won exemption from the authority of the new State Milk Control Board. The action of the legislature, incidentally, was universally termed a "sell-out."

At public hearings on the marketing code held last fall in Philadelphia, farmers charged that stock purchases in distributing corporations were forced upon them, allegedly to avert bankruptcy, and that then they were sold out by the milk trust; that the marketing pact was a fraud because it was drawn up by the distributors themselves (Dr. King's misadventures in the AAA tend to support this); and that the distributors even profited by the hauling rates forced upon the farmers. Cited as typical profits were those of the Supplee-Wills-Jones Company, largest dairy in the city. For eight years the average earnings were 25.5 per cent; in 1932 the company earned 20.2 per cent despite adverse economic conditions. The Scott-Powell Company had 20.8 per cent average earnings from 1925 to 1927, the Abbotts Dairy 17 per cent average earnings from 1927 to 1932 inclusive, and the Harbison Dairy 27 per cent average earnings from 1925 to 1932. In 1922 this last company earned 38.2 per cent. It is pointed out that if the farmer had been paid one cent more per quart, the dairy profits would still have been far too great a proportion of the final retail price. The distributor, it was revealed, paid the farmer an average price of from three to four cents a quart for "basic" milk and sold it at eleven cents.

The Philadelphia milk-shed farmers demanded an audit of the Interstate's books, but before this could be done the federal government, by King's order, confiscated them, thus giving rise to further charges of favoritism. However, an independent audit was later conducted and this revealed: (a) that in the sixteen years covered by the books the price to the farmer fell much faster than the commodity index or the retail milk price; (b) that this price was usually less than the cost of production; (c) that meanwhile the distributor's spread increased steadily; and (d) that there was no effort to remedy this situation.

In the original marketing codes and in the proposed new agreements the approach is fundamentally the same. It is assumed that overproduction of milk is the underlying fault and that controlled production is the solution. As an inducement to cutting production, bonuses from processing taxes on dairy products, such as are now in effect on cotton, wheat, corn, hogs, and tobacco, are contemplated to the extent of $30,000,000. Also such proposals as reducing pasturage acreage, decreasing herds, raising butter-fat percentages in dairy products, restriction of domestic production, and importation of oleomargarine and other competitive products are being weighed as means of cutting down the surplus.

Is it necessary to repeat the cliché about overproduction and underconsumption? In Philadelphia the daily consumption of milk is less than half the amount health experts say is necessary for the welfare of children and adults. The real fault has been high retail costs, and although the AAA is attacking the problem from the other end, the result in this instance will presumably be the same. The retail price will go down; the farm price will remain constant.

The farmer sees in the new codes hope for that slight price improvement which is for him the difference between bankruptcy and prosperity. He also sees the end of the milk trust's market monopoly, for the producer and—wonder of wonders—the consumer are to have representation on local administrative agencies. But he may be too optimistic. Lax enforcement or non-enforcement of the codes will lead to price wars and more strikes and violence. If distributors persist in clamoring for fixed retail prices as well as fixed farm prices, the government's only recourse, as Secretary Wallace himself has said, is to put milk on a public-utility basis.

New Shapes for Automobiles

By DOUGLAS HASKELL

THE question is being widely asked whether the new cars with their increased streamlining have not gone too far. The answer is easy: they have not gone far enough. Were the question one of style, then such an answer might well appear dogmatic; and it would have been a question mainly of style—at yesterday's speeds. But with the average cruising speeds of today, to fail to give the car the benefit of everything engineering knows about aerodynamics is to saddle the owner with inexcusable wastes of power and money. My 1930 Ford has a top speed of sixty miles, requiring a horse-power of forty; but the present-day Fords, with a speed of eighty miles, have eighty horse-power too. The speed is increased by a third; the horse-power has to be doubled. Those extra horse-power all go to pushing aside the air.

It is perhaps generally known that higher speeds set up immensely higher resistances. Five hundred of Major Sea-grave's thousand horse-power in his record-breaking run at Miami are reported to have been expended against the air. A table shows the saving in horse-power through streamlining at various speeds:

Miles an hour	Horse-power required
	Average 1933 car	Fully streamlined "Dymaxion"
10	2	2
30	9	6
50	27	13
70	62	25
125	301*	90

(*This figure is disputed. Other estimates put it closer to 200.)

Since large jumps begin to occur between the speeds of thirty and seventy on the table, it is evident that real air-flowing need not even increase the speed to become highly effective. What the customer wants of it is to increase his fuel mileage and relieve his pocket-book. This the present models do, if at all, to so minor a degree that the gain is negligible. How serious their makers are in this direction may be judged by the fact that the sloping rear, which in aerodynamics would be important because it is here that the divided air is eased together again, frequently carries an exposed spare tire, to set up countless eddies and disturbances. Nor is a wedge-shaped hood, however stylish, the sign of streamlining but precisely its reverse, setting up an extra handicap for the laboring motor because of the big vacuum behind the broad back.

A thoroughbred streamlined car does to the standard product of today, even the most advanced, pretty much what the car of today did to the old horseless buggy. It makes you marvel that anything up to date could have been so clumsy. Like the buggy, the best of 1934 is by comparison an aggregate of bumps, nubbins, and skirts. Take a look, for example, at the fenders—how they flounce around the car like the brim of a sombrero! The thoroughbred has no curved dashboard, no polished brass lanterns—excuse me, I mean no hood, no protruding headlights and tire racks, no windshield, no fenders, and no running board. It is all car. All is incorporated into one graceful shape, a continuous line drawn from the nose to the tail, like the form of a whale or an airplane fuselage.

Two people have come out and offered such a model to the public. They are Buckminster Fuller and Starling Burgess. Their "Dymaxion" is mounted like an airplane on three wheels. Resemblance to a plane, let it be noted at once, is incidental and no intrinsic requirement of aerodynamics.

Though the motor of the Dymaxion for the present is a regular Ford motor, it is said to drive the heavier car at thirty miles on a gallon of gasoline. In this model it is mounted at the rear and drives the two wheels in front. The greatest advantage of the rear motor position is that the whole wide front of the car goes to the passengers. They have sumptuous space, particularly since the car, like a bus, extends full width out over the wheels, whose axle is long. This immense gain in space costs nothing in fuel, as we have seen, and very little in the length, which totals nineteen feet against the present average of fifteen. Indeed, such a gain in space converts the car itself into a vehicle different in kind. It becomes a motor Pullman. There is plenty of space for transverse beds. The tourist carries his own private, sheltered camp. And during the day he has the landscape back again that has been taken from him as windows have become mere slits over a high hood and under a low roof. He now once more commands a wide sweep. It is said that drivers will be afraid with no motor in front of them to take the shock of a collision, even though the car arches well forward; but they gain a far better visibility and control to avoid collision altogether.

I have not spoken of the other innovations of the year that deal with devices or gadgets. The reason is that a fundamentally good plan would eliminate most of the gadgets with their clutter, complication, and expense, while the devices, such as individual wheel-springing, would in any case have to be redesigned. Indeed, the whole exasperating complication about the clutch and gear-shift of today is a confession of the fundamental inadequacy of the transmission design. We should have to shift no gears at all. The basic gear-shift system with its three "speeds," or ratios between engine and wheels, was invented in 1885 by the Frenchman Lavassor, and at that time was already apologized for by him. He said it was the best he could do for the moment, although really "barbarous." He was an engineer.

The transmission of the future must be of an automatic type that permits the motor to select its own best "speed" or ratio. It will do for low speeds what air-streaming does for higher ones. The art of designing such a transmission is still experimental, but science is positive on the effect of such a result. E. S. Hall has made the most thorough of several studies. In a paper read before the Metropolitan Section, Society of Automotive Engineers, his conclusion was:

Now that we know that gasoline mileage can be increased more than 150 per cent with no sacrifice whatever in convenience or performance, who has the crust to say, "No one is interested in fuel economy"? It may even be possible to sell the sales department the idea that the public would buy cars capable of doing better than forty miles to a gallon with faster acceleration and top speed, and with a simpler and safer control system, even if new standards of appearance and beauty must be accepted at the same time. All these improvements in performance are clearly within reach by using an engine of half the size now used, in combination with real streamlining, light weight, and the continuously variable transmission properly controlled.

In the Driftway

MOST of his readers, the Drifter makes bold to believe, have heard of Alexander Hamilton. If not, the Drifter will not attempt to enlighten them. But how many have heard of Andrew Hamilton? The Drifter does not see many hands raised. Indeed, he had never heard of A. H. either until the New York County Lawyers' Association unveiled a tablet in his memory the other day. For some time the New York County Lawyers' Association has excited the Drifter's curiosity. It put up a good-looking new building not long ago almost next door to the offices of The Nation. The building has massive front doors, but nobody ever seems to go in or out of them. Perhaps, like a speakeasy, the building has a back door actually used by the membership in coming or going, for lawyers have a passion for indirection.

* * * * *

FROM all accounts, A. H. is worthy of a tablet. He was a distinguished advocate of Philadelphia back in colonial days when we all lived under the King, and in his off time from lawyering he designed Independence Hall, which if any dumb-bell has not heard of he oughter. But A. H. did more for independence than design it a hall. He argued the first great case for freedom of the press in this country, and established rights in that respect half a century before they were defined in the federal Constitution. According to Harry Weinberger, who at the unveiling of the tablet made a fiery and eloquent speech (the Drifter did not hear it but he knows Harry), John Peter Zenger established in 1733 the New York Weekly Journal, in opposition to the colonial government. Like a certain weekly journal of modern times which need not be exactly identified, Zenger's newspaper raised considerable—shall the Drifter say Hades?—and took large chunks of hide off sundry officials. Some of them missed it, being thin skinned, and complaint was made to the Chief Justice that Zenger's newspaper was a disturber of the peace. The grand jury refused an indictment, but the Committee of Council ordered some of Zenger's newspapers to be burned by the common hangman near the pillory of the city. Later Zenger was arrested and held in jail until a second grand jury also refused to indict him. He then expected to be released, but the Attorney-General charged him by information with printing "a false, malicious, seditious, scandalous libel." Two lawyers representing Zenger were disbarred for challenging the jurisdiction of the court. Zenger's friends then besought Andrew Hamilton to undertake the defense. Although eighty years of age, he consented, and argued the case without fee in 1735. The Chief Justice contended that the truth of a libel could not be pleaded as a defense in a criminal action. Hamilton cited British precedent to the contrary and his client was acquitted by the jury.

* * * * *

THE Drifter thinks it is of some significance that a tablet should be unveiled to a friend of free speech in this day when so many assaults are being made upon the principle. At the same time the Drifter feels that the slogan "freedom of speech," like every other slogan, should be re-examined occasionally, lest it come to be a mere shibboleth or a cloak for little-understood abuses. The Drifter agrees with Carl Becker, who in The Nation of January 24 pointed out that the most obvious manifestation of free speech today is the vulgarization and corruption of the public mind by radio, movie, and newspaper in the interest of private profit. The Drifter wonders, too, how much reality there is for the average individual in the principle of free speech today. Difficulties of distribution prevent the consumption of ideas as they do the consumption of merchandise. Freedom of circulation, not merely of utterance, is required to transmit thought, and the channels of transmission are closely held, mostly for commercial purposes. If any reader of the Drifter doubts this, let him try to publicize any idea without the backing of a good many persons or a good deal of money.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

In Defense of Zweig, Mann, and Others

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

So good a case can be made against those German writers who, after the accession of Hitler, betrayed their spiritual trust that it ill becomes Herbert Solow to pick the wrong men and to resort to the half-truths, ambiguities, and dubious reasoning that mark his article, German Writers Say "Yes," in your issue of January 17.

Mr. Solow says that "one thing is clear: an overwhelming majority of writers known as 'pure artists' or as friends of liberalism . . . have accepted 'coordination.' Though safe outside of Germany and enjoying relative ease and comfort, they jumped the minute Hitler cracked the whip in their direction." That's plain enough. Who are they? He names, in praise or blame, twenty-nine living writers of German, Austrian, Czech, and Russian birth: ten of them are conservatives (including Ewers, author of a life of Horst Wessel, and Johst, who is responsible for the play "Schlageter," both advance agents for nationalism), congenital "coordinates." More than a dozen are mentioned with implied approval. Thus his "overwhelming majority" that responded to the whip is represented by Hauptmann (not an exile), Stefan Zweig (Austrian, but not so comfortably "safe outside Germany"), Thomas Mann, and Messrs. Döblin and Schickele.

None can quarrel with the way Mr. Solow disposes of Gerhart Hauptmann, whose tragedy is that he outlived his capacity for great performance. Hauptmann stayed home and did "knuckle under." Let us try to think of him for what he once meant to liberalism, as we try to remember the Clemenceau, not of Versailles, but of the Dreyfus case.

What is Mr. Solow's charge against Zweig, Mann, Schickele, and Döblin? That they withdrew their promise to contribute to Die Sammlung, a German literary monthly edited by Klaus Mann and published in Amsterdam. They had agreed to write for it upon being assured that the magazine would be literary and non-political. The first number appeared and the four withdrew. Mr. Solow disingenuously names some of the mild articles that have found space in Die Sammlung thus far (a very readable magazine, by the way), and allows one to surmise that it had been the editor's intention to produce the magazine on the level of those articles. He implies that at the crack of the German whip after the appearance of Number 1 the writers named backed away from the innocent Sammlung. This magazine, then, is Mr. Solow's touchstone. If an author contributes he is pure; if he withdraws he has "knuckled down" to Hitler. Mr. Solow brushes aside the reasons which the four distinguished men gave—their surprise at the political character of a paper that was to have been devoted solely to literature—and ascribes their defection to fear of Hitler. This of three men who have no hope or intention of going back to Germany and a fourth whose home is in Austria! Nowhere does Mr. Solow intimate that on page 1, number 1, volume 1 of Die Sammlung the editor—in his salutatory—arraigns Germany (very neatly, but yet in contradiction to his promise), saying, in part: "Whoever will take the trouble to follow our magazine will not be permitted to doubt where we, editors and contributors, stand. From the outset it will be clear where our hatred is directed and where we hope we may love."

Far from "knuckling down," Stefan Zweig refused to sign the declaration which the German government requires of authors; hence he faces the suppression of his work of almost thirty years. It was not his participation in Die Sammlung but his refusal to sign the declaration in August (Die Sammlung did not appear until September) that brought about the situation which Mr. Solow misrepresents, doubtless unwittingly. Zweig's letter, which Mr. Solow quotes with such relish, was a private one to the Insel Verlag, which, without permission, turned it over to the Reichsstelle. Perceiving how he would be misunderstood by the Solows of all lands Dr. Zweig made this statement through the Jewish Telegraphic Agency:

To avoid all misinterpretation I wish to explain that the letter in question was addressed by me to the Insel Verlag, who have been my German publishers for more than a quarter of a century, in reply to their express inquiry, but I gave no authorization whatever for its publication, which might suggest an attempt on my part to secure for myself more favorable treatment in Germany.

There is nothing further from my mind than the thought of shutting myself out from the common fate of my comrades and brethren in blood, and I would despise any attempt on my part to surrender my moral independence in return for any advantages whatsoever.

It is true that I have refrained from taking a controversial attitude against present-day Germany, for controversy was never the medium of my artistic expression, but I have not the remotest intention of denying or canceling my attitude, and I declare openly and unambiguously that the fate of my comrades and brethren in blood is obviously a thousand times more important to me than all literature.

Does Mr. Solow still maintain that "Zweig, with his Salzburg estate [house and garden] and fat income from American best-sellers, has knuckled under"? And, knowing the honorable personal career of Dr. Mann and what he has suffered at the hands of the brutal German government, are we to discredit his simple explanation for allowing his book to appear in Germany? And Dr. Döblin, distinguished neurologist whose life was devoted to proletarians in Berlin, is he to be doubted? I happen to know and respect profoundly these three of the four maligned, and it is a safe inference that injustice has similarly been done to Herr Schickele.

New York, January 16

B. W. HUEBSCH

Mr. Solow Thinks Otherwise

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Mr. Huebsch misstates matters of fact. Ignoring Binding and other cases I cited, he says Ewers and Johst are "congenital coordinates." In the past Ewers was known as a liberal; in a preface to Zangwill's "Voice of Jerusalem" he declared undying respect for the liberal Jewish protagonist of national minorities. Johst wrote "Morgenröte—ein Rüpelspiel" ("Red Dawn—A Tough Play"), which pilloried capitalism, war, and love of country. In short, these Nazis once decried coordination with the best of them.

Mr. Huebsch misrepresents my fair characterization of Die Sammlung. I portrayed it neither as milder than it is nor as a touchstone of anti-Hitler irreconcilability. Of course I do not believe all its contributors are "pure." Pure what? But I do believe that those who, at Hitler's behest, retracted promises to contribute, are pure. Pure quitters.

Mr. Huebsch discusses many irrelevant matters. I do not see that one man's Austrian citizenship, a second's Czech parentage, a third's past career (I, too, heard Döblin publicly pledge himself to undying anti-Nazi militancy), or the fact that there is between a fourth and his publisher a difference as to whether a certain letter was private or not, changes the one essential fact.

Indeed, beneath all the verbiage, Mr. Huebsch seems to accept this fact. He seems to say that the four retreating horse-men were justified because Klaus Mann broke a promise not to arraign Germany. Let us assume such a promise was made and broken, although no proof is offered. What does this mean except that they will write only for magazines which do not arraign Hitler Germany—and for German publishing houses bringing out books in praise of it? But is this not the essence of my article? Then what's all the shooting for?

Apparently because of my "interpretation." I said these men jumped when Hitler cracked the whip, while Mr. Huebsch will have it that they discovered a desire to be "non-controversial" even before that. A noble defense indeed! But I quoted and did not try to discredit Thomas Mann's own "simple explanation" that he wanted to avoid the suppression of his next book. And I pointed out that Döblin and Schickele did not quit the Sammlung until their publishers informed them that all its collaborators were to be banned in Germany.

Stefan Zweig's desire to be "non-controversial" also is part of coordination. Previously he was controversial, both as a Jewish nationalist and as Rolland's spokesman. Zweig says his comrades' fate is "important" to him. If he means that he is touched by their misery, I never doubted it. But he will not condemn their tormentors or support Klaus Mann's condemnation by giving the Sammlung even a non-controversial piece. To associate with anti-Hitlerites is politics. But to publish books through a firm whose editorial policy is controlled by Goebbels's Propaganda Ministry—that is pure art! In truth, none of these men has simply quit. They have not abandoned life or letters, as might a really "pure" artist in a sinning world where every action may have implications beyond our vision or control. They have become parts of coordinated German literature, roses as ever, no doubt, but roses in a charnel house.

Perhaps when Mr. Huebsch's firm publishes Zweig's "Erasmus" we will get more about Zweig's motives, refracted through an analysis of the Great Humanist's soul-state when he turned tail after a proto-Nazi reaction had crushed the suffering rebel peasants of Germany. And perhaps Döblin, also published by Mr. Huebsch's house, will give us the neurology of his action in his next book. In the meantime, the objective facts are clear. I do not "relish" them, but I insist on stating them. If Mr. Huebsch wants to forget them, as he proposes to do in Hauptmann's case, his is the privilege. But let him not misrepresent them or obfuscate them.

New York, January 20

HERBERT SOLOW

2nd Printing!

SEX HABITS

A VITAL FACTOR IN WELL-BEING

By A. Buschke, M.D. and F. Jacobsohn, M.D.

Specializing Physicians to the Great Continental Rudolf-Virchow Hospital

Foreword by Gerard L. Moench, M.D.

Associate Professor of Gynecology, New York Post-graduate Hospital, Columbia University

SUBJECTS EMBRACED

THE SEX ORGANS (Male, Female)
SEX INTERCOURSE (Analysis, Nature, Methods, Frequency)
SEX DIFFICULTIES (Adjustment, Technique)
MARRIAGE (Sex Aspects, Instruction)
VALUE OF REGULAR SEX INTERCOURSE
SEX HYGIENE (Precautions, Directions)
THE SEX IMPULSE (Contrasted: in Men, in Women)
SEX VARIATION (Physical, Psychological)
VARYING SEX PRACTICES
SEXUAL SHORTCOMINGS (Impotence, Frigidity, Sterility, etc.)
SEX DANGERS (Coitus interruptus, reservatus; etc.)
SEX ABNORMALITIES (Perversion, Sadism, Masochism, Fetishism, Exhibitionism, Homosexuality, Hermaphroditism, etc.)
REPRODUCTION, FERTILIZATION, HEREDITY, EUGENICS

THIRTY ILLUSTRATIONS

THE SEX ORGANS OF MEN (4 plates,* 15 illustrations)
THE SEX ORGANS OF WOMEN (3 plates,* 11 illustrations)
THE PROCESS OF REPRODUCTION (1 plate,* 1 illustration)
FERTILIZATION AND DEVELOPMENT (1 plate,* 2 illustrations)
DEVELOPMENT BEFORE BIRTH (2 plates,* 4 illustrations)

* Full-page.

"I believe it is not exaggerating to say that disturbances of the sexual apparatus cause more mental anguish and emotional upsets, aside from physical suffering, than any other lesions."

—Gerard L. Moench, M.D.

Eleven full pages
of photographs.

PRESS COMMENTS*

"... the most and most practical views of sexology and sexual hygiene that can be found. A clear conception of the male and female reproductive organs can be obtained. The description is accompanied by a set of beautiful photographs of the various organs. A finer set could not be found in any anatomy book..."

—Glasgow University Publication

"... gives these facts essential to a correct understanding of sex... a very accurate and scientific account... and has the added advantage of being illustrated."

—Medical Times (London)

"Drs. Buschke and Jacobsohn have collaborated on a work which is frank, fearless and sensible. The whole problem of the sex instinct is surveyed concisely and sagaciously."

—Montreal Star

"The structure and function of the reproductive organs are clearly set out... Facts... are faced and given."

—The Lancet (London)

* Reviews of the English edition in the American publication.

Price $2.50 (postage 15c extra)

EMERSON BOOKS, INC., 333 SIXTH AVE., N. Y. C.

Books, Films, Drama

A Night in Late Winter

By ISIDOR SCHNEIDER

The opposite roofs blind half my window;
they leave me four square feet of glass on sky
a lens enough to show infinity;
and in a notch between two housewalls, looking west,
I have a trap to catch the sunset.

Tonight, swollen and luxurious he sinks;
blue darkness, last of his lavish colors, mantles him dreaming, while neat new light is by the unclouded eastern moon laid on.

Tonight, though it's named winter on the calendar,
the mild air has an after winter feel,
a smell of water leaving ice, a live grass smell to deodorant winter alien.

And heavier savors still, less soluble in air, gush upward from the thaws; thick relishes of soil as if, invisibly, earth in sleep has turned its cold side under and brought up the warm.

The Comic Genius of Dickens

Charles Dickens. His Life and Work. By Stephen Leacock.
Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.

At the end of the nineteenth century the intellectuals—influenced by French naturalism and not yet under the spell of Dostoevski, who owed so much to Dickens—dismissed Dickens as naive, provincial, and unrealistic. But this fashion passed, and there are now few readers who do not understand the true nature of Dickens's genius or who would bother to weigh his obvious inability to portray normal reality against his tremendous ability in the creation of the grotesque and comic. Dickens stands for us today with Breughel, Daumier, Cervantes, and the Falstaffian Shakespeare as one of the great comic artists.

As such he is not easy to write about, for great comedy does not yield easily to paraphrase. One can always find the "idea" in a tragedy, but the effect of the great comic conceptions surpasses any idea they may seem to have. This, perhaps, is because great comedy is usually concerned with the physical, which is easier to represent than to discuss; but whatever the reason, one can understand why both Chesterton and Machen (for all their limitations they were the first to point out the true nature of Dickens's genius) talked a great deal about the "mythical" quality of Dickens's best characters. These characters exist so strongly and fully that the two critics felt they must "stand for" something greater and not quite comprehensible—that they were "mythical." But actually the characters "stand for" nothing more than some special human energy, or oddity, or feeling, which has no wider reference than the individual who possesses it.

Dickens's genius for creating such people is, in conjunction with his role of social propagandist, of peculiar interest for the modern writer. Dickens's social views would not, of course, stand the test of the mildest modern liberalism, but in his time and place he was rather admirable—and as practically effective as a novelist can be. One may say in general of his social propaganda that it was successful both aesthetically and practically only when his characters had the "mythical" quality mentioned before, when they had a reality so strong that they seemed like creatures of the earth. When, on the other hand, he dealt in caricature and made his characters represent an idea, he failed both aesthetically and practically; the quality and fate of "Hard Times" with its Gradgrind and Bounderby of Coke-town, cartoons of the British Whig middle class, furnish the obvious example.

Our time is one when, necessarily, ideas about people are more pressing than the personalities of people. A large and very important section of our intellectuals demands, with great justice, that our novels include these ideas about people, that they deal in social propaganda. Yet a large part of this group seems to feel that there is a necessary antagonism between ideas about people and the personality of people, and that the best way the novelist can propagandize is without his chief tool—his perception of personality in all its myriad variations. Thus, in the New Masses of February, 1933, the Communist critic
A. B. Magil chides the excellent Communist novelist Grace Lumpkin for her "objectivity" in character drawing, tells her that she is wrong to attribute any decent feelings to a man who is led to desert his class to be the agent of big business, and that she should deal only in "class portraiture"—that is, in caricature. Mr. Magil's notion of character and the determinants of action are so obviously non-Marxian that one is sure that his view is not shared by the clearer minds of the Communist group, yet his view represents an extreme toward which opinion on this matter seems inevitably to tend. The work of Dickens, in its failure as well as its success, stands as a proof of the limitation which this view sets on the effectiveness of the novelist.

But the making of real people and not mere social units and types is not only a tool of the propagandist-novelist; it is also in itself a social function. Because circumstances force us to think, for the sake of action, of people in the mass, we need not suppose that this has an ultimate social virtue. It is not desirable—no Communist would say it was—for people to be social units. And it is one part of the novelist's function to tell us that they are not—to remind us that people are incredibly different, various, eccentric, and that they should be so. The necessity to think politically in terms of masses has been carried over with illegitimate literalness into art, and the creation of character is vaguely felt to be a sin. Yet it is a real question whether the great revolutionary novel will not come quite close to Dickens's vital practice; certainly it will be far from Mr.
Magil's hysterical theory.

With so much relevance attached to Dickens by present circumstances and movements, it is a pity that his most recent biographer should be Professor Leacock. That this "Life" is almost entirely built of the bricks the monumental Forster provided is no great fault; but it has scarcely a flash of insight or a new emphasis; it is disproportionate, gracelessly written, and repetitious. There are all the old tags about Dickens's inability to draw a gentleman—"an A-1, first-class, all-round gentleman," as Mr. Leacock elegantly puts it. There is a certain amount of misinformation, such as that "in all the records of [Dickens's] comings and goings there are no surreptitious pages"; Ralph Straus shows that there are. The book concludes with a vulgarly violent assertion of the superiority of Dickens over Shakespeare and Milton, and is, on the whole, as poor a monument as Dickens could have.

LIONEL TRILLING

Insanity and Heredity

Heredity and Environment: Studies in the Genesis of Psychological Characteristics. By Gladys C. Schwesinger. The Macmillan Company. $4.

THE man on the street does not question that insanity is inherited; Eugene O'Neill has created a profound tragedy about the tacit assumption that insanity is inherited; Hitler is preparing to make sterile thousands of men and women because his German professors tell him that insanity is inherited. In the face of such unanimity it is perhaps foolhardy to doubt, for surely the evidence behind this massed authority must be as clear and ponderous as that behind the laws of gravity. But those of us who still dare to doubt and who wish to examine the data as well as the conclusions will welcome Miss Schwesinger's book, which she describes as "a reference work on psychological measurement and a summary of studies on the developmental origins of mental characteristics."

Miss Schwesinger begins with a careful description and critique of the numerous tests which have been devised to measure intelligence and personality. These tests are the tools that are used in studies on this subject, and it is paramount to determine their validity. Intelligence tests, she finds, if used properly, are "highly valid and reliable." Less encouraging is her opinion of personality tests, which she believes are of questionable value in their application to eugenics.

Most of the book is composed of a painstaking analysis of the data on intelligence as affected by heredity and environment. This section alone has a bibliography of 229 titles. Studies are divided into two groups: those with similar heredity and varied environment, and those with similar environment and varied heredity. For example, one group of investigators has compared the intelligence of identical twins—signifying identical heredity—who have been reared apart; other studies compare children from widely different backgrounds brought up together in asylums or resident schools. Miss Schwesinger attempts not only to present this mass of data but also to indicate the significance and value of each study. From her skilful analysis she forms the opinion that "the evidence that there are important differences among individuals in hereditary capacity for intelligence, is entirely conclusive." With this we must agree. It is now a truism that all men are not born equal.

What of the role of environment? Its task is to bring out the latent abilities of the individual. Obviously, then, its effects are more potent on the superior individual who has more to be brought to the surface. Miss Schwesinger presents this aspect of the problem with refreshing clarity:

Hence it is really not legitimate to ask: What is the relative importance of heredity and environment? This question belongs in the scrap basket with the type of general conclusions in some of the studies quoted: "It appears that heredity is twice as important as environment in determining intelligence." The new approach would be: Given a stated environment, how much variation will heredity permit for such and such a characteristic (among so and so individuals)? Or, given a stated heredity, how much variation could a given range of environment introduce for such and such a character?

Among the environments studied is the social and economic status. That, on the whole, individuals, both children and adults, from the so-called higher classes have higher I.Q.'s than individuals from the lower classes is a well-established fact. More important is to find the reason for this difference. It is disappointing that in a book which maintains so high a critical standard we should read that this higher intelligence of the "upper socio-economic groups, as compared with groups lower in the socio-economic scale, is to an important extent due to differences in hereditary capacity." The data on which this conclusion is based are mainly statistical and far from convincing. There is not enough space here to discuss in detail this vital question, but it may be emphasized that the use of statistics assumes the unquestionable reliability of the fundamental observations. Certainly in so complex a problem as social and economic status too many unknown and unmeasurable factors are involved for us to jump to so momentous a conclusion as that quoted above, merely on the basis of a few statistical investigations.

To return now to the problem of the heredity of insanity, for which we were seeking scientific support. Miss Schwesinger informs us that she would have been delighted to supply a chapter on the influence of environment in the development of personality (which includes mental illness) but that "unfortunately the factors underlying personality development are as yet so incompletely understood by psychologists, the tools of measurement so inadequate, the research data so meager and insecure, that we did not feel justified in organizing such an analysis." Apparently, whatever may be the basis of this generally accepted idea of the heredity of insanity, it is not a matter of scientific proof.

This is not an easy book to read. Miss Schwesinger has performed a masterly work of scholarship in bringing together the widely scattered works on this subject. Her bibliographies and indexes are exhaustive. Serious students are working against great difficulties to answer the nature-nurture problem. The material is such that their results are often incomplete and unsatisfactory, but they are definite in the direction they indicate. The least we can do, as educators, social workers, physicians, and even statesmen, is to familiarize ourselves with what has been done and to keep our conclusions within the limits of the proved results. Toward this end Miss Schwesinger's book is an invaluable aid.

DAVID BERES

Aristocratic Verse

Now with His Love. Poems. By John Peale Bishop. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

JOHN PEALE BISHOP is a poet of high technical accomplishment, and this book of lyrics and dramatic monologues proves him to be one of those poets to whom form and method are of great importance. It proves, likewise, that he is one of the poets of the "lost generation." One sees here the influence of Wallace Stevens, of E. E. Cummings, even of Edith Sitwell. Nevertheless, Mr. Bishop's art is his own. His tradition is quite evidently aristocratic. He prefers the fine, the delicate, the rare in character or in performance. Several of the poems have to do with the aristocracy of the South. I do not think, however, that one can accuse Mr. Bishop of snobbery. Through these poems runs the realization that, regardless of preference, the time has come when the fine flower of aristocracy is decadent, that terrible though this process may be, aristocracy must now be reinvigorated by contact with more primitive and ignorant classes. The poet may greatly prefer Desdemona to the Moor, but

The ceremony must be found

That will wed Desdemona to the huge Moor.

The poet may find dramatic the beautiful Southern woman who has her slaves brought to her bedside and beaten, but this woman is dying. Mr. Bishop is well aware that the object studied changes as the student changes. Nor can he find any permanent value in anything. He cannot seize upon religion as a solution. But he would not separate ideal love from lust; he would merely have both present in their right proportion.

Mr. Bishop's feeling about human society is that it is, on the whole, very stupid and rather crude. He finds in literature rare people much more exciting than any broad conception of the human race. He shrinks a little from the common herd, but he does not entirely deny them.

So much for the poet's thought. Primarily Mr. Bishop is a lyric poet of considerable rank. His adaptations of Elizabethan rhetoric and turns of phrase to modern psychology are very interesting. Like Cummings he uses the rich and the delicate image to point a modern cynicism. Such are the poems to Fiametta, and to his Late Mistress. In general, Mr. Bishop does not use the conversational rhythms so common to his generation or the effects of direct speech, but rather delicate song rhythms and an Elizabethan poetic language greatly modified, of course, to attain modern emphasis on idea. Often his imagery reminds one of Wallace Stevens, but his musical effects are less subtle. He does not stress disillusionment or mental bewilderment. His appeal is directly to the senses.

EDA LOU WALTON

Palmer Turns State's Evidence

With My Own Eyes. By Frederick Palmer. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $3.50.

FREDERICK PALMER has seen more war than any other American and probably more than any Englishman except Henry W. Nevinnson. Ever since 1897, when he was first a war correspondent in the war between the Greeks and Turks, he has been under fire with remarkable regularity in Cuba, China, the Balkans, the Philippines, and Manchuria, and of course he was in the World War from the beginning to the end, part of the time as chief censor for the A. E. F., a position that he took as a patriotic duty though it irked his very soul. Always, he says, hope has kept him alive—hope that somehow or other the barbarities, the human atrocities he has witnessed all over the globe would come to an end. He was one of those who wanted us in the war, who really hoped we should make the world safe for democracy—until the Peace Conference. As he was leaving the Hotel Crillon after a look at that horrible and disastrous conference, Professor Haskins of Harvard said to him, "Palmer, what are you going to do, now there will be no more wars?" "From what I have seen of the Peace Conference," he replied, "I am convinced that more wars are already in the making." While he ends on the note "I still hope," his bitter disillusionment is everywhere evident.

Mr. Palmer cannot forgive President Wilson for riding in triumph through the streets of the capitals of Europe and never even visiting the Meuse-Argonne to see what the men he had drafted "had endured in defeating the enemy so that he could make peace without victory. . . . Once he was won to counsel with the statesmen instead of the spirit of the soldiers, the statesmen had him." To Mr. Palmer, Lloyd George seems only "the war's playboy," whose god was a "gyrating Janus"; Clemenceau, one "who had no room for idealism in his cosmos"; Orlando, "greedy and grasping." Lord Robert Cecil he characterizes correctly as the strong partisan of the League of Nations who, with "Bible in hand," was "making sure that under the new disguise of colonial rule called a mandate Britain got all the African diamond fields and the oil wells of Mesopotamia." "To read the Covenant of the League," Mr. Palmer writes, "was to break the heart of a practical pacifist." As for Mr. Wilson, Mr. Palmer thinks that he lost because "the strong cards in his hands had turned blank. His power had slipped from his hands. It had been in the manhood, the money, the munitions which the Allies had counted on to help them in the war." But there I think he is wrong. Those cards were still powerful when the conference began. Mr. Palmer forgets how many millions we lent to our Allies after the Armistice and after the conference began—how the French and British armies were disintegrating, and our own too, though they were still the freshest and at that time the most formidable in France. But he is everlastingly right when he says that "a few leaders were on the top of the world; they were drunk with a power whose source they did not understand," and so the world was wrecked instead of saved, and the end of their mischief is not yet.

Mr. Palmer, who successfully labored, with General Pershing's willing cooperation, to keep hate and atrocities out of the American dispatches from the front while the home forces were teaching nothing else, does his share, like Philip Gibbs and others, to undo the war-time atrocity stories. There were no Belgian children's hands cut off, and no German bodies burned to make grease, and no Canadian sergeants crucified to barn doors. Those were merely inventions to increase recruiting—and drive the innocent and stupid Americans into participating in the loss of a World War. Mr. Palmer does not deny that the censors' task is one of suppression and lying and deceit, but it is pleasant to record that he did the minimum himself, and that in this volume he has laid all the cards on the table in the grim determination of his disappointment. He has turned not merely state's evidence, but humanity's evidence.

The World War episodes are only a portion of his book. Mr. Palmer's accounts of his experiences in the Boxer and Philippine campaigns are of real historical worth, and his sketches of the generals with whom he was thrown are illuminating. His is an amazingly varied record.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

The Survival of Poor-Law Standards

The Development of Social Insurance and Minimum-Wage Legislation in Great Britain. By Helen F. Hohman. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.50.

THIS, in my opinion, is the most illuminating study of British social legislation which has appeared in the last twenty years. It gives in the first place an accurate and lucid analysis of the various measures themselves. But more revealing than this is the way in which it shows how the philosophy of the Poor Law of 1834, although apparently discredited, still so largely survives after a century and continues to influence the later acts and their administration. That law, as is well known, was the quintessence of individualism. It was based on the assumption that poverty was due to the personal fault of the poor, and that the government should give as little aid as possible on the most onerous terms in order to stimulate the self-reliance of the submerged. The law therefore provided that relief to the able-bodied poor should be offered only if they gave up their homes and came into the workhouse. The relief given there was in turn supposed to be appreciably less than the lowest standard of living of the unskilled workers. The workhouses were therefore designed to be places of qualified terror which were to deter the workers from committing the crime of being indigent.

The severity of this standard was, to be sure, somewhat abated during the nineteenth century. In some regions the aged were not required to enter the poorhouse and were given meager doles of relief. Furthermore, the poor-law authorities soon discovered that for them to feed, clothe, and shelter those within the workhouse on a lower standard than the lowest outside would generally require them slowly to starve the inmates to death and thus be guilty of legalized manslaughter. It also began to be realized that the poor were not to blame for industrial accidents, cyclical, seasonal, or ~~even~~ chronic unemployment, ill-health, or indigent old age.

Despite the protests of the cold-hearted Charity Organization Society, the rigors of the old poor law as an omnibus measure for treating poverty began therefore to dissolve around the turn of the century. Finally the Liberals under the leadership of Lloyd George put through a program of social insurance and legislation which was designed as the first-line trench against destitution. Unemployment and health-insurance laws were passed, old-age pensions were provided, and trade boards were set up to fix minimum wages in sweated trades. To these the Conservatives added in 1925 assistance for widows with children. These were worthy measures, but to prevent malingering and to promote thrift the scale of benefits provided followed the 1834 principle of less eligibility, and were appreciably less than current rates of earnings and very much below the cost of a minimum approved standard of life. Similarly the minimum rates fixed by the trade boards were also below these minimum living standards. A bottom was, to be sure, placed under human misery but adequate maintenance was not provided. It is small wonder, then, that the workers are not satisfied with these measures of liberal social reform and that the Labor Party has sought to increase the benefits provided. It is also small wonder that there is a growing feeling that if this is all that capitalism can do to protect its workers, then a socialistic reorganization of industry is needed which will really give a living wage to those employed and adequate maintenance to those who, through no fault of their own, are either unable to find work or are industrially incapacitated. The coming century will probably see in England a clash of this concept with the present compromise, and Mrs. Hohman's book is very valuable both in showing the issues involved and in tracing their historical development.

PAUL H. DOUGLAS

George Lewes

George Lewes and George Eliot. A Review of Records. By Anna T. Kitchel. The John Day Company. $2.50.

IN the late spring of 1870, when she was eighteen years old, Mary Arnold was invited to one of the Sunday suppers of Mark Pattison, the Rector of Lincoln College, Oxford. Also present were two eminent Victorians who were visiting the Pattisons. "George Eliot sat at the Rector's right hand," Mary Arnold tells us. "I was opposite her; on my left was George Henry Lewes, to whom I took a prompt and active dislike. He and Mrs. Pattison kept up a lively conversation. . . . George Eliot was in truth entirely occupied in watching or listening to Mr. Lewes."

The impression which Lewes made on Mary Arnold is the impression, I suspect, which many readers of books about George Eliot and of letters and memoirs of the period have formed of him. Mrs. Carlyle called him "the Ape"; Margaret Fuller spoke of his "sparkling shallowness"; and George Meredith dismissed him as a "mercurial little showman." Yet every anecdote testifies, as this one does, to George Eliot's devotion to him. Too often, however, in the glimpses we get of George Eliot's later days, he appears as a superior kind of secretary to the famous woman who was not his wife. Professor Kitchel has now taken a new approach to this "union": she deals with Lewes's early life instead of George Eliot's; and even after they begin their life together, she writes of them rather from Lewes's point of view.

Lewes emerges as a versatile journalist with a vigorous and attractive personality of his own. He was a contributor of articles on literary, philosophical, and scientific subjects to the magazines. He also published several novels and biographies. He wrote a play, acted in it and in others, adapted plays from the French, wrote criticism not only of English but also of French, Spanish, Italian, and German drama. In 1850 Lewes helped to establish a liberal weekly, the Leader, became its literary editor, and even conducted in it an early "column"; later he occupied editorial positions on the Cornhill Magazine and the Fortnightly Review. Like Leigh Hunt in the previous generation he was a liberalizing force in the intellectual life of his time. It is the light which Miss Kitchel throws on Lewes's early career, the life of a busy London journalist in the forties and fifties, that is her chief contribution. Little new light is thrown on George Eliot. The truth is that George Eliot did not lead a very interesting life—that is, externally. Her real life was poured into her novels: "Elle se transvasait goutte à goutte, jusqu'à la lie." What George Eliot needs today is not the "review of records" which Miss Kitchel gives us, nor a biography in the style of M. Maurois, but a critical study of her mind and art.

Miss Kitchel's book would have been more valuable, I think, if she had analyzed the significance of those records. The latter part of her review becomes at times scarcely more than a transcript or summary of records already available in Cross's "Life." One important question, one among many, which I wish Miss Kitchel had taken the opportunity of analyzing is the attitude of Victorian society toward the "union" of Lewes and George Eliot. Miss Kitchel "records," for instance, the visit to the Pattisons which I have already glanced at: "On the twenty-fifth," she writes, "they went for three days to Oxford to visit the Rector of Lincoln and his wife"; but she leaves it at that, not even mentioning the name of the formidable Rector. Yet behind this brief statement lies a wealth of significance. Here, in the first place, is the head of an Oxford college entertaining a woman whom Charles Kingsley referred to as "the infidel esprit fort, who is now G. H. Lewes's concubine." Pattison even invites a young girl of eighteen to meet this woman who is openly living in adultery. But still another kind of significance is to be found in this visit. In the late spring of 1870 George Eliot had just begun "Middlemarch," in which, you will remember, Casaubon, the elderly scholar, has a young and beautiful wife. Now Pattison, as contemporaries were quick to hint, was also an elderly scholar, also with a young and beautiful wife; it is ironical, too, that his greatest work was to be a biography of Isaac Casaubon, the Elizabethan humanist. Though I cannot believe that George Eliot intended her Casaubon as a portrait of Pattison, is it not probable that she was "drinking in" impressions, as Mary Arnold actually pictures her doing on that visit to Oxford, storing them "in that rich, absorbent mind of hers"? If only Miss Kitchel had analyzed such questions as these, her book would have enlarged our understanding of George Eliot as much as it has our understanding of George Lewes.

FRANKLIN GARY

Shorter Notices

Yesterday's Burdens. By Robert M. Coates. The Macaulay Company. $2.

Fantasy is the literary genre which this work most nearly approaches, although much of it recalls the type of autobiographical nature-description that we get in "The Private Papers of Henry Ryecroft" and the essays of Robert Louis Stevenson. Written in a conventional, reiterative, and often quite stereotyped prose, these opening chapters render the mood of sentimental resignation in which the narrator indulges in his idyllic Connecticut retreat. Typical both of the mood and the language is the particular sentence that is chosen as a kind of refrain device throughout: "The days go by in strict procession." Then, with almost no warning, the fantastic element enters in the person of the real hero of the piece, the man Henderson, who is not so much an individual character as he is a sort of composograph portrait of l'homme moyen sensuel of present-day New York. Unfortunately, Henderson is required to be so many different people that in the end he is just no one at all: as a symbol he has not enough delimiting contours to give him an identity for the imagination. Because he is without character, in the original sense of a stamp or mark to distinguish him from the rest of his kind, he hardly succeeds in being anything more than a name. And the style of this latter section, which is a hodge-podge of a half-dozen badly assimilated modern influences, serves to confirm the impression of a fundamentally confused response to the multiplicity of contemporary experience.

Foreign Bonds: An Autopsy. By Max Winkler. Roland Swain Company. $3.50.

The unsavory record of much that has occurred in government financing gains a long-needed historical treatment in this volume by Dr. Max Winkler. Of all persons connected either as participants or observers with the jamboree of foreign financing during the post-war decade, Dr. Winkler has perhaps the best title to the role of Cassandra. Had greater heed been given to his warnings when the high-pressure salesmanship of Wall Street was running wild with foreign bonds, American investors would now be the gainers by many millions of dollars which have since disappeared into foreign treasuries, into the pockets of unscrupulous office-holders, and into the coffers of the underwriters. To those who succumbed to roseate selling circulars Dr. Winkler's detailed account of the credit records of many nations whose bonds were sold here as gilt-edged securities will come as a bitter solace. In fact, Dr. Winkler's research into government financing since the days of the Romans shows that government bonds, although traditionally considered of the highest caliber because of their prima facie backing by all the national resources, are actually secured only by the intangible and frequently non-existent willingness of governments to fulfil past promises, and occasionally by the more realistic desire to maintain a good credit rating as the basis for future borrowing. The recital of unending defaults, arbitrary reductions of principal or interest, and general disregard of obligations demonstrates that in the long run a government can maintain a perfect credit history only by refraining from borrowing. As a fully documented record of government financing, Dr. Winkler's "autopsy" is of great value. As a means of enlightenment for the past and future investor, its general appeal is somewhat narrowed by the mass of technical detail which partly obscures the record of deceit and gullibility that characterized one of the most disastrous eras of modern capitalism.

WHEN YOU GROPE FOR A WORD

Roget's International

THESAURUS

"Words grouped by Ideas"

Complete list of synonyms, antonyms, phrases, slang, etc., in fact everything to help find the right word. The one indispensable book for all writers. A necessary complement of the dictionary.

The only large type edition.

Now $3 a copy.

from CROWELL'S List

THOMAS Y. CROWELL CO.
393 Fourth Avenue, New York

LENIN

by

RALPH FOX

"It should be read by everyone interested in the only dynamic and historically significant movement of our day."

HENRY HART, Scribner's

"You wouldn't expect a sober well-balanced biography of Lenin to come from a man who had worked with the communist party in Russia for three years, but here it is."

HARRY HANSEN, N. Y. World-Telegram

320 pages, $2.00

HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY
251 Madison Ave. New York

□ PLAYS □ FILMS □

THE THEATRE GUILD presents

EUGENE O'NEILL'S comedy

AH, WILDERNESS!

with GEORGE M. COHAN

GUILD THEATRE Fifty-second Street, West of Broadway
Eves. 8:20—Mats. Thurs. and Sat., 2:20

MAXWELL ANDERSON'S new play

MARY OF SCOTLAND

with HELEN HAYES PHILIP MERIVALE HELEN MENKEN

ALVIN THEATRE — 52nd Street, West of Broadway —
Eves. 8:20, Mats. Thurs. & Sat., 2:20

EUGENE O'NEILL'S new play

Days Without End

HENRY MILLER's Theater 43 St. E. of B'way—Pves. 8:40
Matinees Thurs. & Sat. 2:40

MEN IN WHITE

The Group Theatre and Sidney Harmon and James R. Ullman present Sidney Kingsley's play

An experience thrilling and absorbing, genuine and complete.—J. W. KRUTCH, The Nation.

BROADHURST THEATRE—44th St. W. of Broadway
Eves. 50c to $2.50. Mats. Wed. & Sat.

THEATRE UNION'S Stirring Hit

PEACE ON EARTH

CIVIC REPERTORY THEATRE, 14th St. & 4th Ave.
Lowest HIT in New York 30c to $1.50 No Tax
Eves. 8:45. Mats. Wed. & Sat., 2:45

"The Theatre has unleashed one of its thunderbolts under Jed Harris's direction."

BROOKS ATKINSON—N. Y. Times.

Jed Harris Production

The Green Bay Tree

CORT THEATRE, 48th St. E. of B'way
Mats. Wed. and Saturday 2:30

"DISTINGUISHED FILMS IN DISTINCTIVE SURROUNDINGS"

Sat., Sun., & Mon., Feb. 3, 4, 5
"IF I WERE FREE"

Clive Brook — Irene Dunne

Tues. & Wed., Feb. 6, 7
"DINNER AT EIGHT"

Thurs. & Fri., Feb. 8, 9
"THE VINEGAR TREE"

PLAZA 58th STREET, East of Madison Avenue

Sat. to Tues., Feb. 3, 4, 5, 6
MARLENE DIETRICH
"SHANGHAI EXPRESS"

Wed. to Fri., Feb. 7, 8, 9

EDGAR WALLACE'S
"CRIMINAL AT LARGE"

Little CARNEGIE 57th St. E. of 7th Ave.

Direction Leo Brecher

2nd Big Week!—American Premiere
THE GREAT INTERNATIONAL TALKIE!

"HELL ON EARTH"

From the book by Leonhard Frank. Produced in four different countries, spoken in four languages, mainly English.

Featuring WLADIMIR SOKOLOFF, of the Moscow Art Theatre. ERNST BUSCH (now in exile)—Directed by VICTOR TRIVAS

ACME THEATRE 14th ST. and UNION SQ. Midnight Show Every Saturday
Rendezvous of the Intelligentsia

HENRI BARBUSSE
SAYS: "GREATEST OF ALL ANTI-WAR FILMS."

Films

Toward the Next War

IF the question of propaganda in the films recurs with such frequency in this column, it is not because of any special desire to add to the vast confusion that has already accumulated around the general question of the relationship between propaganda and art. In that controversy I have already announced my belief that works of art and works of propaganda are quite different things, with different motives, objects, and characteristics. And all things being equal I should prefer to discuss the films as examples of what they now and then give evidence of aspiring to be, works of art, rather than as illustrations of one or another social or political doctrine. But the truth is that the time has come when the nature of the particular social or political philosophy reflected in a film, as in pretty much everything else nowadays, has such profound effects on its quality in other respects that we cannot for very long ignore this philosophy. The approach to the films as art usually involves for the most part the making of qualitative distinctions within the sphere of technical and aesthetic discussion. This is, and always has been, the proper sphere for the critic of art, in so far as he is a critic of art and not an amateur of social or economic theory. But the sphere of technical and aesthetic discussion is unfortunately not always so independent from other spheres of discussion as the critic, for his convenience, might like it to be. Even the forms of an art are related to the culture out of which it springs—more particularly, to the comparative state of health of that culture. And as long as our culture is in its present unsound condition we shall have to resign ourselves to a corresponding instability of formal structure in every one of the modes through which it attempts to express itself. That "antique symmetry" of which Leonardo wrote in his notebooks, and whose lack he regretted in his own creations, is not for an age of transition and change. It belongs to an age which no longer has to spend its energy in fighting—for what it has or for what it has not. It belongs, that is to say, to an age in which propaganda is no longer necessary, in which the critic is freed to return to his proper sphere. And our own, needless to say, is not such an age.

According to a recent alarming bulletin sent out by the Film and Photo League, for example, we are in for an overwhelming inundation of "war-preparation" films in the near future. Among recent pictures designed to stir up a pro-war spirit in the American public, the bulletin singles out the following: "Midshipman Jack," "Hell and High Water," "Hell Below," "Fledglings," "Son of a Sailor," and "Shanghai Madness." It points out also, what few may realize, that the showing of newsreels of marine, battlefield, and aviation maneuvers is encouraged by the government. Pointing out the marked technological improvement that has occurred in the films since the great anti-Soviet campaign in 1919, the bulletin concludes: "We can be sure that the utilization of the film by the ruling class in this coming period of war preparation will infinitely dwarf . . . their use of the movie in 1919."

It is largely in relation to this melancholy possibility that a picture like the international tour de force "Hell on Earth," which has just opened at the Acme, takes on its significance. Neither as art nor as entertainment will it yield many rewards, but as a piece of propaganda directed against the next capitalistic war it has at least one undeniable virtue. Its method of argument is so simple that even the most dull-witted in any audience will respond to its force. The method is to throw a handful of soldiers of different nationalities into a ruined building in No Man's Land, and show exactly what happens. Of course their common sufferings, interests, and weariness with their lot erase almost instantly whatever differences of language or uniform have at first kept them apart. The German shares his cigarettes with the Frenchman; the Jew, who has been a tailor, mends the German's clothes; and the American Negro, a former entertainer on the European music-hall stage, cheers everybody up with a lively tap-dance. The moral is clear and clean cut. There is nothing to which either a Communist or a pillar of the League of Nations might object. It is perhaps irrelevant, therefore, to complain that everything has been a little too abruptly managed, that this shell-hole camaraderie becomes tiresome and embarrassing after a while. But a greater amount of care would have made this picture interesting also as drama. With the exception of Ernst Busch (who played in "Kameradschaft") as the German and Vladimir Sokolov of the Moscow Art Theater as the Jew, the casting of the five soldiers is weak. Although the dialogue is written in no less than four languages, it does not accomplish very much in any one of them; that in English, at any rate, is quite poor. Nor does the idea of having the American Negro express the international point of view, while it is excellent as an idea, work out very well in fact. As a result of these defects and failures, "Hell on Earth" is not as effective, even as propaganda, as it might be; but unlike most war films it does express a clear and uncompromising attitude toward its subject.

It may be compared, for example, with the British film "I Was a Spy," which is having a certain vogue at the moment with the more exacting sections of the metropolitan audience. Thanks to a smooth though not exceptional technical production and to the suave playing of Madeleine Carroll and Herbert Marshall, this picture has been made to seem much more important than it really is, either as drama or as an exposé of one aspect of the late war. The main situation is the old reliable one of the woman spy who is required to sacrifice both love and virtue for the sake of her country. All that it manages to leave with its audience is an impression of the vast nobility that surrounds the life of a spy. Pathos is directed on the woman, not on the hundreds whom her noble patriotism has brought to death. In other words, it is the kind of picture calculated to make us believe that there is something beautiful and touching about war, after all.

WILLIAM TROY

Drama

And So to Bed

IMPROBABLE as it may seem, the only play of the week which has the slightest chance of enduring until this report is published is a play which deals once more with the pros and cons of marital infidelity as a sport for the leisure class. Even those who have heard dramatic debates upon this subject less often than I have will probably not learn anything new from "No More Ladies" (Booth Theater), but it would be rank ingratitude not to confess that its author, A. E. Thomas, provided a rather amusing evening in a week when amusing evenings were distinctly at a premium. He has not, alas, thought of anything new to say on his well-worn theme, and even his dialogue would probably seem pretty flat if set down coldly on the printed page, but there are nevertheless two reasons why his piece is likely to enjoy a certain success. One of them is that he has imagined a group of pleasantly differentiated types, half-real, half-mythical, and the other that the producer has collected a more than usually lively cast. First honors unquestionably go to Lucile Watson for a delightfully

The second novel in Romains' great modern Comédie Humaine . . .

Men of Good Will II

PASSION'S PILGRIMS

by Jules Romains

A vast prose epic of Paris today.

The first novel in the series, MEN OF GOOD WILL, was universally acclaimed "a powerful, orderly, and mature masterpiece" (in the words of Clifton Fadiman in The New Yorker).

PASSION'S PILGRIMS is as great. Angel Flores says in his review of it in the New York Herald Tribune: "Romains has written and is writing a very serious and profound masterpiece which no cultured person can afford to miss."

Through PASSION'S PILGRIMS runs the sweet, tender tale of a man's effort to recapture a youthful love, side by side with the story of an oil magnate's cynical liaison with his partner's wife, while all about them, in the dreams of idealists and the intrigues of bankers, politicians, and criminals, unrolls the manifold life of the city.

$2.50 at all bookstores

ALFRED · A · KNOPF
730 Fifth Avenue, New York

SOCIAL WORK IN A CHANGING WORLD

The trained social worker is becoming an important factor in the adjustment of the individual, the family and the group in the present changing social order.

SOCIAL WORK AS A PROFESSION

Should be carefully considered by prospective college graduates for both its tangible and intangible values. The Graduate School for Jewish Social Work offers a course of training leading to the Master's and Doctor's degrees in preparation for social work.

For information regarding qualifications for admission, scholarships and fellowships, write to
DR. M. J. KARPFF, Director

The Graduate School

For Jewish
Social Work

71 WEST 47TH STREET, NEW YORK CITY

□ JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH says □

AH, WILDERNESS! Guild Theater. O'Neill's nostalgic comedy about a youth who discovers love and poetry together. Made doubly effective by the performance of George M. Cohan.

BIG HEARTED HERBERT. Biltmore Theater. J. C. Nugent and Elisabeth Risdon in a broad but funny farce about the taming of a self-made man.

COME OF AGE. Maxine Elliott's Theater. Clemence Dane's fantasy about the Poet Chatterton in modern London. Delicate but unsubstantial and with a fine performance by Judith Anderson.

DAYS WITHOUT END. Henry Miller's Theater. O'Neill's latest and much discussed play which may or may not prove that he is ready for conversion to the Catholic Church. Splendidly produced and acted, but not likely to seem very significant to those not religiously inclined.

MARY OF SCOTLAND. Alvin Theater. Helen Hayes and Philip Merivale give fine performances in Maxwell Anderson's play. The biggest dramatic hit of the moment but one which left me a little cold.

MEN IN WHITE. Broadhurst Theater. Fine teamwork on the part of the members of the Group Theater helps to make this play about a young doctor one of the things which must not be missed.

PEACE ON EARTH. Civic Repertory Theater. Propaganda play about the next war, in which the workers strike and a young college professor gets framed for murder. Drawing special but enthusiastic audiences which evidently do not agree with me that the play is quite uninspired.

THE FIRST APPLE. Ethel Barrymore Theater. Irene Purcell contributes much charm to a fragile but amusing comedy about—first apples.

THE GREEN BAY TREE. Cort Theater. Absorbing psychological drama about a young man who cannot give up luxury for love. Shares with "Men in White" the first place on the list of dramas.

THE PURSUIT OF HAPPINESS. Avon Theater. Spicy and more or less historical comedy about a young Austrian who finds bundling one of the pleasantest of the new freedoms in Revolutionary New England.

salty performance as the grandmother who looks like a sweet old lady but knows a hawk from a hand-saw just the same. Second to her is Rex O'Malley as an impudent bystander, and the entire cast, being first rate, so brightens up the proceedings that one frequently forgets how completely stale every situation and every theme really is.

The discouraging thing, however, is the fact that despite ten years of listening and watching I still do not know just where we stand on this all-important matter of adultery. I gather that it is almost universally practiced and that we are all agreed to abandon the more melodramatic attitudes toward it. Nevertheless, the exact status of the diversion remains imperfectly defined, and I can only report a certain tendency on the part of various schools of thought to converge toward a common uncertainty. The conservative has now got around to granting that the erring husband can be forgiven on fairly easy terms, but meanwhile the school which used to celebrate the Splendid Sin has largely disappeared to make way for the sophisticate who announces in the last act that sophistication is not, after all, incompatible with a final surrender to monogamy. The result, unfortunately, is to make the plays of a defender of the conventions like Rachel Crothers almost indistinguishable from those of the most determinedly modern. No one seems willing to affirm either that infidelity is a horrible crime or that it is merely a harmless necessary diversion. Moreover, though this may be highly sensible it is not conducive to drama, and one finds it hardly worth while to see more than four or five plays a year which demonstrate merely that, all things considered, a husband and wife are probably less likely to quarrel if they keep their sex lives fairly simple. I really do not know whether Mr. Thomas is on the side of the angels or not. His libertine hero is a very nice young man with a colorful past who gets into trouble when he falls into his old habits after marriage. The final curtain descends upon his determination to be good in the future, but I am still not quite clear in my mind whether the game is to be considered worth the candle or not. Most plays on the subject seem to leave the discussion exactly where they found it, and my suggestion is that it be quietly dropped until such time as someone has discovered something new to contribute. We know that there is much to be said on both sides and we have heard it all.

Several other plays have either already closed or will be no more by the time this report is published. "John Brown" lasted two days; "And Be My Love," a frequently funny comedy also about adultery, four. The rest I have already forgotten.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Contributors to This Issue

Low is known as "England's greatest cartoonist."

ANITA BRENNER, author of "Idols Behind Altars," has recently returned from a visit to Spain.

FRANK CLAY CROSS is a Western newspaperman, and a writer and lecturer on agricultural subjects.

PAUL Y. ANDERSON is a Washington correspondent of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

ALEXANDER KENDRICK is a Philadelphia newspaperman. DOUGLAS HASKELL contributes articles on various interesting aspects of modern architecture to The Nation and other periodicals.

LIONEL TRILLING is a member of the English department of Columbia University.

PAUL H. DOUGLAS is professor of industrial relations at the University of Chicago.

FRANKLIN GARY is a member of the English department of Princeton University.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXVIII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1934

No. 3580

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	169
EDITORIALS:
Are We Back on Gold?	172
Shameful Economy	173
In Defense of Labor	174
ISSUES AND MEN. OGDEN MILLS ON THE TARIFF. By
Oswald Garrison Villard	175
THE FISCAL FARO GAME. By Henry Raymond Mussey	176
BEGIN HOUSING NOW! By Henry S. Churchill	178
KEEPING HITLER OUT OF AUSTRIA. By John Gunther	180
THE SECOND FIVE-YEAR PLAN. By Louis Fischer	182
THE INTELLIGENT TRAVELER. By John Rothschild	184
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter	185
CORRESPONDENCE	185
MIDWINTER BOOK SECTION
STEPHEN DEDALUS AND JAMES JOYCE. By William Troy	187
THE ARBOR. By Eda Lou Walton	188
TWO CRITICS IN SEARCH OF AN ABSOLUTE. By Horace
Gregory	189
THE USABLE PAST. By Joseph Wood Krutch	191
BOOKS:
Artful Autobiography. By Mark Van Doren	192
Chesterton Introduces Aquinas. By Richard McKeon	192
For Thy Stomach's Sake. H. L. Mencken	193
A Monument to Paris. By Lewis Galantière	193
Young Veteran of the Theater. By John Mason Brown	195
The Failure of Victorianism. By Clara Gruening Stillman	195
The Permanence of Herbs. By Dorothy Van Doren	196
Lucifer Deposed. By Egmont Arens	197
Men and Machines. By Mary McCarthy	198
Shorter Notices	198
Art: Impurity in the Modern Museum. By Anita Brenner	200
Drama: No Miracle. By Joseph Wood Krutch	201
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE	202

BOARD OF EDITORS

ERNEST GRUENING FREDA KIRCHWEY
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
MAURITZ A. HALLGREN MARGARET MARSHALL
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $5.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. British Agent, Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England.

THE FALL of the Chautemps Cabinet in France had more than ordinary significance. Usually a French government resigns because of an adverse vote in the Chamber of Deputies or because of a shift in party alignments, but Premier Chautemps was forced out by the rising tide of popular unrest. Unstable employment, the high cost of living, the hardships of the peasants, the stubborn refusal of the government bureaucracy to submit to salary cuts, the fear of further devaluation of the franc, the succession of financial scandals involving public officials, and many similar factors have caused a wave of protest and revolt such as France has not experienced in years. A good many foreign observers in France think that the country is on the verge of a dictatorship. Indeed, all sections of the French press are either openly predicting a "government of vigorous action" or are clamoring for such a government. In view of these developments it seems incongruous that Edouard Daladier should again be intrusted with the premiership. He tackled the same political and economic problems only a few months ago, with virtually the same party support in the Chamber that he is now depending on and with virtually the same sort of Cabinet, but without success. Daladier seems destined merely to hold the fort until the "government of vigorous action" can be found. One cannot, however, have a dictatorship without a dictator, and no strong man has yet come forward in France.

SO RAPIDLY are events moving in the Far East that one has difficulty in recording them, to say nothing of attempting to evaluate or understand them. The Japanese Minister of the Navy, Admiral Osumi, has announced that whatever happens to the 1935 naval conference Japan intends to build a fleet exceeding the limits laid down in the Washington and London treaties. From Norfolk, Virginia, comes the report that 45,000 tons of Chilean nitrates have been landed there, most of it destined for Russia and Japan. In the Pacific, off the Hawaiian Islands, American air squadrons have been carrying out secret flying tests and "advanced-base operations." In Moscow the president of the Supreme Economic Council has reported that the Soviet Union produced "many more tanks, cannons, and machine-guns in 1933 than in 1932," while the Commissar for War, in a fiery speech warning Japan to keep its hands off Russia, has declared that the Red Army is now more thoroughly mechanized than most of the forces of Western Europe. Meanwhile the Japanese War and Navy departments announced that they were planning to recruit 80,000 young men from impoverished farming villages to work in the munitions factories. Washington dispatches a day or two earlier declared that "the greatest peace-time navy in the country's history was voted today by the House in passing the Vinson Naval Replacement bill. . . . The measure went through without a record vote." Another dispatch from the same city quoted an admiral, a member of the General Board of the navy, as having accused the British and Japanese of promoting anti-preparedness propaganda in the United States. And from Manchuria come reports that Japanese troops are again pursuing "bandits" along the Siberian border, just beyond which the Soviet Union has built powerful defenses, assembled vast military stores, and has an army in readiness.

HAPPILY, not all of the news has been on the side of war. Some of it has dealt with the need for peace and understanding. As a gesture of good-will toward America and under pressure from anti-militarist elements in the Diet, the Japanese authorities have persuaded a retired naval officer to withdraw a provocative novel describing an imaginary war in the Pacific, and have announced that they are drawing up new regulations to put an end to the continuing flood of this sort of propaganda. In the House of Peers a former Foreign Minister, Kenkichi Yoshizawa, an outspoken imperialist in the past, frankly warned the admirals that if they persisted in their mad plans a rupture with the United States "would be inevitable." In both Tokio and Washington there is now being discussed a suggestion that a preliminary Japanese-American naval conference be held in an effort to straighten out the differences between the two countries and so, perhaps, to avert the threatened breakdown of the 1935 conference. Compared with the many events pointing in the opposite direction, these few crumbs of peace news seem meager indeed. Yet they are sufficient to keep alive the hope that good sense and intelligent statesmanship will still save us from that catastrophe in the Far East which has long been forecast and now appears so close.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT has invited the Mendieta administration to open negotiations for the "modification of the permanent treaty between the United States and Cuba, and for a revision of the commercial convention between these two countries." Of the seven articles of the Platt Amendment incorporated in the treaty, Articles IV and VI, relating respectively to the ratification of acts of our military occupation and the title to the Isle of Pines, are obsolete. Article I pledges Cuba never to alienate its independence by treaty with a foreign Power; Article II pledges Cuba not to contract debts without adequate provision for payment; Article III gives the United States the right to intervene to maintain a government adequate for the protection of life, liberty, and property; Article V pledges Cuba's maintenance and extension of sanitary provisions; Article VII grants us coaling stations to be selected by the President of the United States. That right was exercised by the establishment of a United States base at Guantanamo Bay. It is to be hoped that the Roosevelt Administration will reap the full benefit of its obviously enlightened purpose by scrapping the entire Platt Amendment. Articles II and III have been honored chiefly in the breach. We should relinquish the naval base; we have ample adjacent territory of our own in Florida, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands where an equivalent military purpose can be served. It is unnecessary to pledge Cuba to refrain from a compact with any foreign Power which would impair its independence, although clearly such a pledge would be given for the asking. As for the sanitation provisions, their execution depends largely on Cuba's economic condition, and could properly be included in the commercial convention necessary to assure a market for a proportion of the Cuban sugar crop in the United States and to restore the vanished market for American manufactured goods in Cuba.

FRENCH SECURITY and German militarism, the ancient villains of Europe, have broken loose again and threaten to overcome their gentle jailers, the League of Nations and the disarmament conference. Neither the barbed-wire entanglements of Versailles nor the soft words of Locarno having served to assuage the fears of France or the ambitions of Germany, Mussolini now suggests giving Hitler an army of 300,000 if he will return to the League, while Great Britain advances one of Sir John Simon's famous formulas by which France is offered more security and Germany is offered more military strength if only they will come back to Geneva and save the conference! Peace, in other words, is to be saved not by one but by 300,000 hairs of the dog that bit it, not counting Germany's 100,000 "non-military" fascist soldiers. Either by accident or by design the Italian memorandum was released just before the British Foreign Office issued its plan, thereby causing some embarrassment in diplomatic circles. In commenting on the incident the New York Times correspondent wrote: "However,

[it] is not likely to damage the cause of disarmament because it does not seem probable that either memorandum . . . will succeed in saving the Geneva conference." Whether consciously or not, the correspondent here expresses a fast-growing and widespread impression that a disarmament conference is hardly the place to discuss disarmament.

AMONG the other casualties of culture under the Nazi regime in Germany must be listed the decline or extinction of many newspapers once proud and powerful and independent. Offered the choice of suppression or coordination, most of the non-Marxist journals accepted the latter fate. But the result has proved all over again that a newspaper, like a person, must be itself or else it is nothing. The present plight of several "coordinated" publications has been partially revealed through circulation figures published in accordance with a recent law which brought the advertising business under direct control of the Hitler Government. The Berliner Tageblatt, formerly edited by the famous liberal, Theodor Wolff, has shrunk from a circulation of 250,000 to 25,000; another liberal paper, the Berliner Volkszeitung, dropped from 50,000 to 7,000; the popular B.Z., published by Ullstein, went down to 200,000 from 750,000; and the Grüne Post, an Ullstein weekly, from 1,000,000 to 300,000. Even so conservative a newspaper as Hugenberg's Lokalanzeiger sank from 170,000 to 100,000, while the circulation of the Nachtausgabe was halved—dropping from 130,000 to 65,000. In the course of this catastrophic year 1,575 newspapers collapsed altogether through suppression or bankruptcy; today only 1,128 survive out of a former total of 2,703. The official Nazi paper, Völkischer Beobachter, has grown; its circulation is 314,750, now the largest in Germany. Its advertising has grown too, fifteen fold in the Berlin edition, while the advertising revenue of the other newspapers can be guessed by merely looking them over. As a result, the surviving journals are in desperate financial straits. The Münchener Neueste Nachrichten, formerly the largest and most powerful Munich paper, was heavily subsidized last summer in order that it might not cease publication altogether, throwing some five or six thousand persons out of work. This condition is not exceptional nor is it preventable as long as news is limited to official Nazi releases and opinion to official Nazi pronouncements. The German press will discover, if it does not already know it, that freedom of speech is more than a despised liberal principle; it is the only legitimate claim a publication can make upon the attention and interest of the public.

FRANK ADMISSION that certain codes under the National Industrial Recovery Act did in fact result in monopolistic price-fixing was made in a report on February 3 by A. D. Whiteside, NRA division administrator. The complaints, daily more numerous, about price-fixing and its attendant evils which have been made against the NRA—notably by Senators Borah and Nye in Congress—are seen to be not without foundation. And those persons who have considered any criticism of the NRA on these grounds as not only tantamount to high treason but in effect a championship of the sweatshop are evidently the victims of misguided zeal. Mr. Whiteside's report is all the more interesting as he was the chief foe of the Consumers' Advisory Board in its efforts to get before the recent price hearings just the point of view which he has now publicly adopted. The report is the beginning of the general overhauling of all codes which is promised by General Johnson early this spring. It makes several provisions for checks on possible unjustified increases in prices and on the system of pressure exerted by large businesses on small ones to keep prices at a certain level. Mr. Whiteside expressed himself as having been deeply impressed by some of the things he had learned about jacking up prices under the NRA codes. Much of this information has been furnished him by Leon Henderson, recently appointed by General Johnson as his "consumer's assistant." Mr. Henderson mentioned, for example, an increase in the price of woolen goods seven times the amount necessary to cover the increased cost of labor under the code.

THE OLD GUARD not only dies but it surrenders also, as bewildered Pennsylvanians have learned. Senator David Aiken Reed, long the champion of the most reactionary interests in an ultra-reactionary State, has suddenly come out as a standard-bearer for the New Deal—though perhaps a little late. More than that, he now strongly favors a restoration of the slashes in veterans' compensation, which is of interest when it is recalled that as recently as the last session he was the most virulent of all those who fought mere mention of such suggestions. The about-face is comparable with Niagara Falls halting in its course and starting to flow upward, but there is no subtle alchemy of spiritual or ethical change involved. The reason is much simpler than that—Senator Reed is seeking reelection this year, and because Pennsylvania has changed somewhat since last he was a candidate he has on his hands the hardest task since the twelve labors of Hercules. His opponent will be Governor Gifford Pinchot, flying the banner of progressivism, and perhaps a Democratic candidate if Pinchot does not run on two tickets. Pennsylvania is likely to go Democratic from border to border if the last election is any sort of weather vane, and the Senatorial fight, it may confidently be predicted, will be an even warmer and more dramatic one than that of 1926, when Pinchot, Pepper, and Vare engaged in a contest which still provides material for street-corner debates in Philadelphia and Pittsburgh.

AN EPILOGUE to the tragic farce presented by the Colorado General Assembly in its year-long struggle to pass relief legislation while dominated by a vicious and powerful lobby was written late in January when the entire State Relief Committee was dismissed by Federal Relief Administrator Harry L. Hopkins. Both the Denver newspapers joined in a vigorous denunciation of the dismissal as a political strategem, though Mr. Hopkins explained his action on the ground that the committee had appointed one of its own members to direct, for a fat fee, an audit by CWA workers of the city's books. There was, however, probably more than a kernel of truth in the newspaper charge that the dismissal had political significance. It was a forthright victory for the progressive Democrats of the State under the leadership of United States Senator Edward P. Costigan. The committee had been appointed by Governor Johnson, who has chosen to play politics with the Old Guard marching under the leadership of Boss John T. Barnett, Costigan's opponent in the primaries of 1930. As told in The Nation of last week, the Old Guard has dominated State politics, and has pulled against virtually every move in Washington to alleviate human distress in Colorado. The victory of the Costigan group, when set beside recent hopeful developments in the sugar-beet industry, indicates that Colorado, with the help of the national Administration, may be freed from its present political control.

ARE WRITERS CLERKS? Many have been classified as such by the Civil Works Administration, presumably because they can manipulate a pen or typewriter. Some of them object. We don't blame them. Nor would we blame the clerks for objecting either. It is easier—and on the whole juster—to blame the CWA for failing to realize that both writers and clerks have a function but it is not the same. It is a question whether the CWA is well advised to attempt different rates of pay according to occupation, if for no other reason than that it is impossible to discover the "prevailing wage" in many kinds of work. Among writers, for instance, it varies between Park and First avenues—between regular contributors to the Saturday Evening Post and those who land an occasional poem in The Nation! Anyhow we agree with the Unemployed Writers' Association of 146 Macdougall Street, New York City, of which Robert Whitcomb is the organizer, that if the CWA allows artists $34 a week and lets them do their own type of work, it is unfair to classify writers as clerks and pay them $20. Also we agree that it would be better to let them stay at home and work on the Great American Novel (or poem) than to have them fiddle away their time on artificial and useless tasks. We beg to file a minority opinion, though, on the demand that the work of unemployed writers be published at government expense. It is bad enough to have our public buildings daubed over with unemployed art. If in addition we are to be deluged with unemployed literature, the depression will become a holocaust.

WE HAVE LONG HAD our own idea about what would constitute the Perfect Crime. To us it has always seemed that it would not be something fiendish and bloody like the crimes committed in the papers or detective novels but rather something in which the Master Mind exhibited his skill and ingenuity in a harmless, purely artistic fashion. Now, thanks to an obscure item in a daily paper, we discover that it has actually been committed and that the culprit has escaped detection—as of course he should. It seems that a man came into a barber shop with two little boys. He got a shave and also, we hope, all the extra ministrations which barbers are in the habit of suggesting. He then ordered a hair-cut for the children and left, saying that he would return by the time the operation had been completed. An hour later the tonsorialist asked one of the boys when he thought his papa would be back. "Oh," said the child simply, "he's not our papa. He's just a nice man who said he would get us a hair-cut for nothing." So far as the police are concerned the incident is, we believe, considered closed, but we like to think that the man in whose imagination the scheme was born was not really concerned with saving a quarter. Here is a beautiful case of swindling for swindling's sake—plus something else even more admirable. If the heads of the poor little boys really needed attention, then obviously our Master Mind had not only the soul of an artist but a touch of Robin Hood as well.

Are We Back on Gold?

THE first effect of the President's announcement of the 59.06-cent dollar was a widespread expression of approval by bankers and monetary authorities and a vigorous advance in the speculative markets. The speculative rise was in part due to the fact that the rate fixed for the dollar was somewhat lower than that already prevailing on the foreign exchanges, but the reason for the general optimism went deeper than that. The President announced that $35 an ounce would be paid by the Treasury not merely for newly mined American gold, as during the previous gold-buying campaign, but for all gold offered in foreign countries, excluding only that held by American citizens in defiance of the anti-hoarding regulations. Further, and in some respects even more significant, the Secretary of the Treasury announced at the same time that he would also sell gold "for export to foreign central banks whenever our exchange rates with gold-standard countries reach gold-export point." It was held that these two measures in effect returned us to the gold standard; that they made devaluation a fact; that they would end fluctuations in the dollar in terms of other gold-standard currencies.

This interpretation is not, of course, without substantial grounds. The new regulations certainly seem on their face to end most of the previously existing uncertainty. They even make it look as if the President had radically changed his mind since his statement of January 15: "Because of world uncertainties, I do not believe it desirable in the public interest that an exact value for the dollar be now fixed." If this were really so, if the President had finally decided to adopt the 59-cent dollar permanently, optimism regarding the new monetary measures would be in the main warranted.

But it is impossible to overlook the very large element of uncertainty that still remains, and the dangers of it. The President still has the legal right at any time within the next three years to cut the gold content of the dollar further by as much as 15 per cent, and he has given no indication that he will not exercise that power. On the contrary, in his statement to the press explaining the new policy, he remarked explicitly that he "reserves the right . . . to alter or modify the present proclamation as the interest of the United States may seem to require. The authority by later proclamation to accomplish other revaluations of the dollar in terms of gold is contained in the Gold Reserve Act signed on Tuesday." The value of the dollar, in other words, may still be changed, without prior notice, in accordance with the judgment or whim of a single man. This element of uncertainty must still militate against confidence. International speculators, in addition, may still be tempted to sell the dollar short in the hope of anticipating the President's decision to devalue further; and such speculation can only increase the difficulties of maintaining stability.

Apart from these provisions, it is apparently the belief of the Administration that the type of gold standard established by the new regulations is suitable as a permanent policy. That is, the Administration believes not merely that no gold coins should exist, but that gold should be sold or given in exchange for our paper currency only for export to foreign central banks and not to our own citizens. This policy, it is true, is substantially that already followed in the present crisis by the Netherlands, Switzerland, and Belgium; but its value as a permanent policy remains open to grave question. In effect it permits foreigners but not Americans to protect themselves against monetary excesses and dangers at home. Its value in protecting this country's gold supply is questionable. Unless it is adopted as a world gold policy, it still permits individuals in countries without such a policy to hoard gold, and to draw it indirectly through their own central bank from the countries that maintain the restricted gold basis. It is a policy that tries to forget that gold is a commodity and attempts to treat it purely as a symbol. In the long run such a government policy seems likely to encourage hoarding and bootlegging of gold by individuals. It has a further danger also. This is that speculative excesses in any one country may run further before they are checked, because of the tendency of the management of central banks to be polite to each other, to "cooperate" with each other.

THE NEW GOLDFISH.

(Copyright in all countries.)

The new regulations imply also that the American gold standard in future will be merely a gold-bullion standard, and that no more gold coins will be issued. A large number of monetary authorities now believe that the gold-bullion standard is preferable to the full gold standard; it is the type of gold standard prevailing in France, and it seems likely that it is the kind that will be adopted by Great Britain and other countries when they return to gold. Nevertheless, it is questionable that it offers any advantages in the long run over a gold standard that includes the issuance of gold coins. It is, in effect, a rich man's gold standard. As it has operated in France, for example, it permitted Frenchmen with the equivalent of $8,000 or more in cash to draw out gold bars to that value in the run of 1931, but did not permit persons with less than that to draw out gold. Yet it is doubtful that even so it reduced substantially the amount of the gold drainage; for speculators took out gold bars, sawed them up, and sold the pieces at a 5 per cent premium to individuals, while in some villages individuals formed syndicates to draw out gold bars. The extra expense to a government of maintaining gold coins is negligible, as not many of them are used in circulation anyway. The ability to get gold coins on demand, moreover, reduces the desire to get them, and so helps to maintain confidence. No one would see the justice of permitting a bank in times of crisis to allow only its large depositors to withdraw their funds; yet the gold-bullion standard is in effect the national equivalent of this.

These are questions of ultimate policy; what is important to settle now is the next step. By fixing the value of the new dollar so low the President has only added to the troubles of the gold-standard countries, which would have been drained to some extent by the repatriation of American capital in any case. The French gold standard in the next few weeks will be subjected to the severest test it has yet had to confront. If that test is successfully met, the Administration should do what it can to end the world's monetary uncertainties by negotiating at the earliest possible moment with the British government for a joint return to gold at a fixed ratio and permanent levels.

Shameful Economy

THE conditions under which United States foreign-service officers are now compelled to live has become little short of scandalous. Whatever may be the need of retrenchment and economy in the federal budget, Congress ought to grant the approximately $7,500,000 additional appropriation required not only to prevent the demoralization of the service but to permit the few hundreds serving the United States in foreign lands to maintain the barest subsistence level.

The unfortunate plight of these foreign-service officers originates less in the retrenchments which have been applied successively since the beginning of the depression than in the extraordinary increase in their cost of living abroad caused by the depreciation of the dollar. Previous to the present emergency officials in the foreign service, diplomatic and consular, had suffered the following cuts: (1) the 15 per cent cut in the salaries of all government employees—the justification claimed for this cut, namely, that the cost of living had been lowered here, did not apply in many countries where the foreign-service employees affected were stationed; (2) the abolition of all post allowances—special allowances which had long been made for certain posts where unusual conditions required unusual expenditures; (3) the abolition of representation allowances—allowances deemed necessary for the adequate fulfilment of the particular functions or mission with which the official in question was charged; (4) a 65 per cent reduction in allowances for rent, heat, and light of living quarters; (5) suspension of all promotions.

Serious as was the hardship thus inflicted upon foreign-service officers, many of whom had made commitments in the matter of leases and other obligations, it was as nothing to what happened when the United States went off the gold standard last spring. As a result of that act our foreign-service officers, from ambassadors and ministers plenipotentiary to humble clerks and messengers in embassies, legations, and consulates, upon stipends which were modest to begin with, have suffered reductions in income averaging 50 per cent. Anyone who doubts that their plea for a minimum of decent subsistence is valid has but to read their communications presented by Assistant Secretary of State Wilbur J. Carr at the hearing before the subcommittee of the House Committee on Appropriations in December. One learns not only of families separated, children deprived of schooling, service officers and their wives and children compelled to live in sordid and unhealthful quarters with inadequate nourishment, and wives drudging in vain attempt to make both ends meet, but of nervous breakdowns and suicides as a result of the dilemma of these officials.

From the standpoint of elementary decency there can be no justification for the Administration's failure promptly to rectify this state of affairs. But viewed wholly in terms of public interest Washington's callous indifference is lamentably shortsighted. The much-reduced and overworked personnel of the foreign service represents the dignity and the interest of the United States throughout the world. Annually it helps to secure for Americans large sums in trade, paying for itself many times. The present appropriation for the entire foreign service, diplomatic and consular, is barely over $11,000,000. Congress is voting hundreds of millions for naval construction without blinking. The foreign service, which under this Administration may be counted as a valuable force for the prevention of international friction and for the restoration of our shattered foreign trade, costs less than one of the warships which at the present session Congress is cheerfully providing.

It is true that the majority of our ambassadors and a considerable proportion of our ministers have independent means—we should like to see salary appropriations for the more important posts made sufficient so that the selection of men of wealth was not virtually obligatory—but no such opulence prevails among the majority of the 710 officers who, after careful training, have dedicated themselves to service abroad in behalf of their country. Nor does it prevail for the numerous clerks in our ministries and consulates. We realize that after four years of widespread depression one more tale of suffering is apt to fall on unresponsive ears, and that Congress and the Administration are under great pressure from every quarter. But here is a situation which can easily be remedied. Whether or not it is sliced from the excessive naval appropriations, the money should be found at once. It is a ghastly paradox for an Administration dedicated to recovery to subject a group of its own valued and conscientious employees to humiliation, demoralization, and almost to destitution.

In Defense of Labor

THE National Labor Board was originally set up last August, to quote a statement by President Roosevelt at the time, as "a tribunal to pass promptly on any case of hardship or dispute that may arise from interpretation or application of the President's Reemployment Agreement." Since then its authority has been widened to embrace other labor disputes bearing upon the recovery program. At the start the board did settle some controversies, if not always promptly, at any rate to the apparent satisfaction of the disputants. But in recent months the board has been widely criticized by workers, not only for its failure to move promptly, but for its failure to move at all. The workers charge, with complete justification, that the board's dilatory tactics have played into the hands of open-shop employers who wish to prevent their employees from being organized in any way, or, failing that, to herd them into company-controlled unions.

The board's inaction has been ascribed in part to the fact that its powers were vague and uncertain for several months and in part to the character and prejudices of most of its members. On December 19, however, the President issued an executive order clothing the board with legal authority to act as a mediation agency in labor disputes. This order did little to expedite its work. Indeed, though a number of disputes were settled in August and September, not a single major controversy has been adjusted since December 19. This leads one to suspect that the personnel of the board may be largely responsible for its procrastination and ineffectiveness. With one or two exceptions, the members have viewed their duties with almost studied indifference. Nor could anything better have been expected from industrial members who in the past have looked with favor upon company unionism and other devices used by big business in fighting organized labor. Yet it would be wrong to indict these members alone, for the representatives of organized labor have absented themselves from meetings of the board at times when the interests of the workers demanded their attendance.

Two classes of disputes fall within the jurisdiction of the National Labor Board. The first includes disagreements over wages, working conditions, and other matters not directly covered or affected by the Recovery Act. Such questions can be settled by the usual methods, that is, by mediation or arbitration. The second class has to do with complaints arising under Section 7-a of the recovery law. This section supposedly guarantees to the workers the right of collective bargaining and the right to choose their own representatives without interference on the part of their employers. Wage disputes ordinarily involve questions of judgment rather than fact and so are susceptible of adjustment by some method of compromise. But the second class of controversy involves questions of fact alone. The Recovery Act does not say or even imply that the workers must in certain instances be content with a modified form of collective bargaining; it gives them the right of collective bargaining without qualification.

Nor does it permit the employer to resort to coercion as long as he does not go too far; it expressly forbids him to coerce, intimidate, or influence his employees under any circumstances. Here there is no room for compromise, for mediation or arbitration. Here there is room for facts alone, and the facts can always be determined by thorough and impartial investigation. When they show that an employer has violated Section 7-a, he should be punished as specifically required by the law. These disputes do not lie between workers and employers; they lie between employers and the government. In creating a merely mediatory agency to handle such questions the Administration has been setting its own law at defiance.

The President recognized this, to a degree at least, in his executive order of February 1 authorizing the Labor Board not only to intervene in disputes of this kind, but also in effect to enforce the labor provisions of the recovery law. We may doubt, however, the wisdom of leaving this task to a semi-official agency of the character of the National Labor Board. For one thing, the board was established on the theory, as we may judge from the composition of its personnel, that disputes arising under the recovery law can only be adjusted by reconciling the differences between workers and employers. For another, the record of the board is not such as to encourage us to believe that it will really proceed promptly and vigorously against law-breaking industries and corporations.

The Labor Board can well be dispensed with. It was created at a time when it appeared necessary to use a few "big names" and a bit of newspaper ballyhoo to head off a steel strike and other labor disturbances threatening the newborn recovery program. The board's investigation and mediation functions can better be left to the more experienced and dependable Conciliation Service of the Department of Labor, where they properly belong, while in the interest of orderly government, enforcement of the Recovery Act should be lodged with the Department of Justice.

Issues and Men

Ogden Mills on the Tariff

MR. MILLS makes an interesting speech. That one must admit even when one recalls how ludicrously wrong he was in many of his utterances and forecasts when he was Mr. Hoover's Secretary of the Treasury. He delivers his speeches, moreover, in the best House of Commons manner, which is paying him a real compliment, and he clothes his thoughts in excellent language. His address in Topeka on January 29 seems to me by all means the best criticism yet made of the President's policies from the opposition side, and his statement of the duty of the opposition was historically correct and well put.

What interested me most about this speech, however, was Mr. Mills's reference near the end of his address to the tariff problem. He felt compelled to defend himself for making it, and recalled the last words of McKinley before he was assassinated as a justification lest he be charged with party treason. They ought to be on the walls of every Democratic and Republican clubhouse in the country: "A system which provides a mutual exchange of commodities is manifestly essential to the continued and healthful growth of our export trade. We must not repose in the fancied security that we can forever sell everything and buy little or nothing." Referring to our lost foreign markets and the necessity of restoring purchasing power at home and also of promoting "a greater prosperity and a higher standard of living the world over," Mr. Mills correctly declared that "we will have to abandon the present policy of isolation and intense nationalism and to some extent modify recent tariff practices." Precisely. Henry A. Wallace brilliantly illuminated one phase of the situation not long ago when he declared that we must either change our tariff policy or abandon 50,000,000 acres of land and find new employment for the huge population which now makes some kind of a living by tilling them. But that is only one phase of the problem. The plight of our manufacturers is equally grave unless we revise our whole crazy tariff system. That Mr. Mills can see this and speak out for it when he is one of the outstanding members of the high-tariff Republican Party is an extremely encouraging sign; it ought to make President Roosevelt finally decide to take up a question about which he has thus far been extremely vague. The President seems to be without true understanding of the need of the hour and the tariff's relation to national recovery. This is the more remarkable because he has at his elbow one of the greatest tariff experts in America, Secretary Hull.

But when Mr. Mills spoke those fine words about aiding the return of "greater prosperity and a higher standard of living the world over," he betrayed the protectionists and he cannot deny it. For the basic principle of American protection has always been utterly selfish, without the slightest interest in the other fellow across the seas. We have never considered the effect of our tariffs upon other nations. We have frankly said that they might go to hell for all we cared. When we have been told that our tariffs were injuring working people abroad by further depressing their wages and standards of living, ■ their employers sought to decrease costs in order still to sell goods over here, your true Republican has said that the foreigner could starve if he pleased. The protected beet-sugar grower in Colorado is usually rather pleased if you tell him that the tariff on sugar he bought and paid for by campaign contributions and other favors to politicians has brought the Cubans to despair and starvation. He calmly says, "What of it? Nobody is looking after us but ourselves." When Mr. Mills begins to express the humanitarian and economically wise desire to help the rest of the world recover, he is undermining the very foundations of the selfish, nationalistic protective system.

Mr. Mills was also excellent in protesting against the new doctrine of isolation, "autarchy," as it is called. This is the latest panacea—dear little Jimmie Gerard heading a society which has discovered that we can do away with poverty in America by completely isolating ourselves, buying only the essential things we cannot produce, and "cutting loose from the poverty of Europe"! To such as Jimmie, Mr. Mills makes the following complete answer: "A practically completely self-contained and controlled national economy can doubtless be attained, but only at a ■ frightful social cost and by the enforced migration of millions of people from their homes, and an all-around lowering of the standard of living."

It is interesting to note that in a remarkable review of the German economic situation under Hitler which appeared recently in the New Statesman and Nation, of London, the same conclusion is reached—namely, that in the course of some years Hitler could establish autarchy in Germany, but only at a frightful cost and by the steady deterioration of the standard of living of the entire German people. Russia has shown that this can be done in behalf of ■ cause, that millions upon millions of people can go on living at the bare point of sustenance. Germany, if the enthusiasm for Hitler can be kept up, could readily make similar sacrifices. Even we Americans could give up many of our luxuries if we had to do so. But why in heaven's name should the nations cut themselves off from one another? The normal status for the world is trade, full and free. Every barrier preventing the free flow of goods is an injury to innumerable people.

Somehow it is very hard to visualize Ogden Mills ■ leading the Republican Party—his personal unpopularity in New York State alone would seem to forbid that. But none the less he should have his due: he is seeking to lead in a party where leadership is dead, and the manner in which he is doing it is really beyond criticism. It will be interesting to see whether others besides James M. Beck will appear to define the opposition policies which the Republican Party must put forth if it is to continue to exist or have a reason for existing.

Ogden Mills

The Fiscal Faro Game

By HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY

THE President is playing dealer in a giant faro game. The cards he draws from the box are the successive moves in the recovery program, and the stakes appear to be no less than our interests in the existing social order. Cool, daring, resourceful, unperturbed, willing to stake everything on the turn of a card, the dealer for nearly a year now has played a dazzling game. Thus far the cards, by and large, have fallen well for him. Those of us whose tastes do not run to violence and revolution can scarcely avoid suspending our ordinary devotions occasionally and putting up a bootleg petition to Mercury to continue his aid to the bank.

In government finance it is beautifully simple. Recovery, we win; depression, we lose. And if we lose, not all the forces of fiscal piety and economic orthodoxy combined can save us from "uncontrolled" inflation, or from other measures, induced by government necessity, even more distasteful to the dancing dervishes of the orthodox faith. Thus far the President has played his fiscal game superbly. I expect him to continue, and I hope that Mercury will be on his side.

When President Roosevelt took office on March 4 last, he brought to an end a fiscal regime of an ignorance and stupidity almost incredible. I refer to the Treasury policies of Andrew W. Mellon, policies essentially unchanged by Mr. Mellon's much more intelligent successor, Ogden L. Mills. Mr. Roosevelt began with great skill and daring by making a savage slash in government expenditures and by propounding the idea of an extraordinary budget. His huge cut in government spending did many injustices and injured important services, but it stopped the mouths of the National Economy League and those other simple-minded patriots who think that all government spending is an evil per se. It thus opened the door for the enormous spending that the President saw was necessary if the country was to be saved from the possible horrors of social break-up. The extraordinary budget made it possible to do that spending without all the great business executives of the country fainting on the Capitol steps at the specter of an unbalanced budget. For these financial Napoleons, who gaily borrow millions in their own business to be paid out of future earnings, had hitherto maintained in childlike innocence the belief that if in any year of peace cash receipts from taxes do not equal cash outgo of the government, then financial perdition is somehow just around the corner. Of course this is nonsense. Regular revenue must be big enough to meet ordinary expenditures plus interest on the bonds or other obligations issued to meet extraordinary expenditures like those of war or industrial crisis. Further, as every tyro knows, there is everything to be said for the government's incurring deficits—and huge deficits at that—during depression and paying them off during prosperity, in order to stabilize business as far as possible. Only we must have no Andrew W. Mellons at the switch during prosperity to relieve the groaning taxpayer who needs his money to gamble in stocks instead of having it taken away from him for the prosaic purpose of paying off the public debt. The fiscal policy of the New Deal demands a higher standard of intelligence, firmness, and public leadership than that of the Harding-Coolidge-Hoover regime. Thus far it has had it. Of course most of the task is still ahead, but the promise seems good.

The pending tax bill must provide money enough to meet the ordinary expenditures of the government, and in addition to pay the interest on the extraordinary obligations issued for relief and recovery purposes. How much is that? Nobody actually knows; it depends at bottom on the speed of recovery. How long will the CWA, for example, have to last? The whole thing is a matter of expert guesswork, and the President's budget message presents the best guess of the government experts. Happily there is every reason to think that it is an honest message, painting the fiscal picture too dark rather than too bright. The President figures ordinary expenditures for the current fiscal year (ending June 30) at about three billions, and extraordinary ones at nearly seven and a third billions more, against receipts of three and a quarter billions (two hundred millions more than the ordinary expenditures, be it noted). The deficit is thus seven billions. For 1934-35 he estimates ordinary expenditures at two and a half billions, extraordinary at three and a half, and receipts at four billions (a billion and a half above ordinary expenditures), leaving a deficit of two billions. The anticipated increase of the public debt by nine billions in two years will bring the total to thirty-two billions by June 31, 1935. Against it the government will hold as security for loans assets of an estimated book value of five and a half billions—a not unimportant item. Of course there is always a grave danger that extraordinary government expenditures may become ordinary ones; but on the basis of the above showing our tax task is no extraordinarily difficult one, given a reasonable industrial recovery.

Treasury estimates of four billions of receipts under existing legislation in 1934-35 are based on the assumption that the Federal Reserve Board index of industrial production, which has stood at 118, 110, 97, 70, and 67, respectively, during the five fiscal years from 1929 to 1933, is going to reach 81 this year and 98 for 1934-35. The assumption looks reasonable, though of course uncertain. But there are other important facts. The budget estimates take no account of increased revenues amounting to fifty millions hoped for from proposed increases in the taxes on wines and liquors, or of the two hundred million anticipated increase in income taxes to result from changes that the Ways and Means Committee voted on January 24 to recommend. This added quarter-billion alone would pay the interest on six and a quarter billion of emergency bonds at 4 per cent; and as the average interest on the public debt has fallen from 3.57 to 3.35 per cent during the past two fiscal years, it seems not unreasonable to assume that the government can borrow at the rate suggested. Seeing that this year's receipts promise to be a clear two hundred millions more than the year's ordinary expenditures, that the House committee definitely plans to add another quarter-billion to the amount set down by the President as expected for next year, that tax receipts for this year have thus far been better than expected, that the indexes of business activity are pointing definitely upward, and that the recent Treasury offering of a billion dollars in short-time $1\frac{1}{2}$ and $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent notes was subscribed three and a half times over in a day, Mr. Morgenthau has good reason to feel cheerful. The amateurs and professors who have replaced financial statesmen of the towering stature of Andrew W. Mellon and Charles G. Dawes seem to be playing in undeserved good luck.

What are they actually doing about taxation, and what do they need to do? They are, happily, repairing some of the gaps in the income-tax fence, and they need to rebuild it out of concrete, to crown it with barbed wire charged with a million volts of electricity, and to prepare all the cells in federal prisons vacated by prohibition violators for the reception of income-tax lawyers who teach their clients how to break through. During the first seventy-five years of our national existence, the government drew its revenues almost wholly from customs duties. The Civil War brought internal-revenue taxes, and during the half-century down to 1913 whiskey and tobacco taxes shared on a rough basis of equality with the tariff duties in supporting the government. Up to that time, then, people really paid federal taxes roughly in proportion to their consumption of imported goods, whiskey, and tobacco—that is, the great body of ordinary people paid the most of them. The overruling of the Supreme Court by the process of constitutional amendment gave us the income tax in 1913, just in time to make possible the financing of the war. A huge tax structure was swiftly built up. Unavoidably, it was very defective, but temporarily productive. Income and profits taxes, which brought in $125,000,000 in 1916, yielded almost four billion in 1920. Then came the process of revision, directed, most unfortunately, by Mr. Mellon, who was essentially a predatory financier elevated to high political office. What was needed was to make the personal income tax into an effective instrument, not only of revenue, but also of social policy; the two ends are by no means necessarily harmonious. We needed the personal income tax not only as a means of collecting federal taxes from people more or less on the basis of their ability to pay instead of their consumption, but also as a means of leveling off, be it ever so slightly, some of the ridiculous peaks of our income distribution, like the 513 million-dollar incomes in 1929, or the 38 five-million-dollar incomes of the same year. What Mr. Mellon and his advisers actually did was to lower rates for both big and little income-tax payers and the payers of estate taxes, on the theory that taxation must not interfere with the accumulation of capital. That was wrong policy in the golden twenties, and it is wrong policy now, despite the conservative economists. At the same time the Treasury and the Congress between them managed to maintain so many cushions and exemptions—tax-exempt securities, capital-losses provisions, income juggling between husband and wife, and endless other possibilities of legal evasion—that any suggestion of fairness as between various income-tax payers became a joke, and a huge army of income-tax lawyers have made a fat living showing wealthy clients how to avoid legally the payment of taxes they equitably owed. That was wrong policy at any time and place.

What have been the fiscal results? During the last five years of Coolidge prosperity, total government tax receipts were approximately as follows, in millions of dollars:

	Amount	Percentage
Customs duties	$2,904	18
Tobacco and liquor taxes	2,024	12
Other internal revenue taxes	629	3
Corporation income taxes	5,847	35
Total	11,404	68
Personal income taxes	4,615	28
Estate taxes	450	3
Total	5,065	31
Grand Total	$16,469

The corporation income tax is of course a tax on business, and I therefore place it with the first group, comprising taxes which, so far as they are shifted, ultimately rest on individuals according to their consumption of taxed goods. Only the personal income tax and the estate tax are laid theoretically more or less in accordance with the individual's ability to pay. They brought in less than a third of the tax revenue; last year it was only a fifth. The situation was made worse in this particular by the laying of the processing tax on important agricultural products to pay the subsidy to farmers for cutting acreage. A public that valiantly resisted a general sales tax urged upon it by the high priests of the Old Deal joyfully accepted from the prophet of the New Deal a tax bound to be collected for the most part from consumers of flour, cotton cloth, and other goods whose material is subjected to the processing tax. The Treasury hopes, on the basis of existing law, to get $3,800,000,000 in taxes next year, divided as follows:

Customs tax	$ 466,000,000
Internal revenue taxes	1,520,000,000
Processing tax	548,000,000
Income tax	1,265,000,000

If the personal income tax should furnish markedly less than half the total income-tax yield, as it has done for ten years past, and the estate tax should equal its average of the past four years, $48,000,000, then these two together, levied on the basis of ability, might amount to a bit more than $600,000,000, or about one dollar on this basis as against five laid on other bases, notably consumption. There is every reason to be glad that the House committee proposes to revise the law so as to collect some two hundred millions more, largely out of unearned incomes above $5,000.

I believe that there ought to be three clearly defined objectives in federal taxation, all of them connected with the income tax, for that is really the heart of the problem. Expedients like a capital levy, however tolerantly some of us blatherskite thinkers might look on them, are outside the range of practical action except as desperate emergency measures. The income tax is a great fighting issue, with enormous political possibilities for progressive and constructive action. First, then, and fundamental to everything else, the personal income-tax law has got to be made lawyer-proof, so that the government can actually levy and collect from the rich such taxes as are conceived to be in the general public interest. I realize that this is a well-nigh impossible order. I know what it involves in getting rid of tax-exempt securities, in solving the problem of deducting capital losses from taxable income, in coping with such crookedness as was involved in the Mitchell and Wiggin conjugal tax jugglery, in dealing with all the great problems of administration. The amendments proposed by the Ways and Means Committee will help somewhat in important particulars, but there is an immense task to be done before the personal income tax can become a really effective instrument of social policy.

Second, we ought to develop that tax as the primary agency of federal revenue. Disagreeable though it be to assert it, all of us who pay income tax, little and big taxpayers alike, ought to pay more rather than less than we do now. The income tax is now a tax on the well-to-do. Not one family in four ever paid income tax under the low war-time exemptions; in the peak income years of 1928 and 1929 the proportion was not more than one in ten. We who do pay it can well afford to pay more than the one-fifth to one-quarter of the federal taxes that we have contributed in ordinary good years. Great Britain, with a population of 46,000,000, raised $365,000,000, practically half its revenue, from income tax. The married Englishman begins at 12½ per cent on the excess of his income above £175, or £187, 10s. if it be earned income. As soon as the taxable income passes £175 the rate jumps to 25 per cent, and stays there up to £2,000, at which point the surtaxes begin, and the surtaxes bring in a fifth of the whole tax. The Englishman thus pays 12½ per cent of his income from $950 up to $1,725, and 25 per cent above that amount. I realize the differences between the two tax systems, but let the corresponding American, paying this year 4 per cent on the excess of his income above $2,500 and 8 per cent above $6,500, with a small surtax beginning at $6,000—let him consider his mercies and ask himself whether as a matter of equity he may not be getting off too easy by comparison with his less fortunate fellow-citizen who pays no income tax. His real grievance is against the big taxpayers, the Mitchells, the Wiggins, the Morgan partners, and more accurately against the law. That grievance must be removed, as already stated, by improving the law and its administration, which action might make it possible to attain the third desideratum.

That end is to lay personal income taxes at yet more steeply graduated rates, with the definite purpose of finally absorbing all private income above some generous minimum.

The final tax measure of the harassed Hoover Administration pushed surtax rates up to 55 per cent on income above a million dollars, making the total levy on the second million or more 63 per cent. The proposal of the Ways and Means Committee leaves it at exactly the same point. What ails the sturdy advocates of the New Deal? Are they, too, afflicted with Mellonism? Are they afraid of making capital accumulation slacken? Do they not realize that the time to hit the rich taxpayer is when he is down, because that is the only time that he can't hit back more effectively than you hit him?

Why don't they shove up surtax rates at the same time that they push administrative reforms with all their might? Some of us, at least, would view with equanimity surtax rates that rose so fast as to make taxes absorb all income beyond a modest minimum wage of say $100,000, and estate taxes gathering into the public coffers all the wealth that a man had accumulated by industry and thrift in excess of a mere pittance of two or three millions; that might be left to the luckless heirs. And we should expect the captain of industry and the financial wizard to work just as hard for us after we had treated him rough in that way as he did under the Old Deal. Nor should we be disturbed if we found such taxation compelling private industry to rely in some measure on government aid for financing; rather we should think it a good thing. But we should scarcely hope for such a result if we also kept the Securities Act intact requiring promoters to tell the truth and bankers to meet their fiduciary responsibilities; for with some safety for investments we should expect an enormous volume of relatively small savings. What we need now is to apply to the taxation of wealth something of that same daring and imagination that the President has displayed in other fields. Taxation can be made an enormously powerful machine to help effect the profound economic changes on which we are clearly embarked, and which we must all hope to attain peacefully. We cannot use it that way without pitching overboard the economic philosophy of the Mellon regime. The Administration's tax program as thus far revealed affords too little evidence that the captain has yet given orders to jettison that cargo. But he has been a busy man.

Begin Housing Now!

By HENRY S. CHURCHILL

THE time has come to ask, What is the matter with the PWA housing program? Probably no other part of the New Deal seemed to promise so much, or to commence more favorably. Ample funds and authority were provided, and the necessity of the program, both as an emergency measure of reemployment and as a long-time social measure, was generally recognized. It had the earnest support of Mr. Ickes, of Miss Perkins, of the White House itself; and the appointment of the director, Robert D. Kohn, was one of those miracles of selection that occur only occasionally. Moreover, Mr. Kohn was empowered to choose his chief assistants in his own image, free from the devastating influence of Mr. Farley. There seemed to be nothing in the way of success.

Yet the record to date is distressing. Several hundred projects have been presented; a vast amount of preliminary work has been gone through. Municipalities and groups all over the country have lined up behind the program and have put through legislation and organization to comply with the demands of the Housing Division. Promises have been made by Washington, and funds have been earmarked. But except for a few relatively small and scattered projects, none of them really "low rental," and a small part of the Cleveland plan—the first of them all, the "laboratory of housing"—no money has passed, no steam shovels have snorted, no men have been put back to work. Ten months have passed, and failure seems certain. The causes are not so clear. What are they?

In general there would seem to be two principal causes. The first, a cause of delay rather than of failure except as failure was inherent in delay, was the curious one of the over-integrity of the men in control. So desperately determined were they that no hint of graft or of undue profit should soil work approved by them that project after project was held up for microscopic scrutiny and the least taint served to delay and damn. This in itself, under normal conditions, would be of course magnificent; but we were told this was an Emergency, practically a War, and that the primary objective was to build so as to put men back to work. This phase of the program need not be discussed further. It is already dead, a complete failure. I do not mean that honesty alone killed it; the usual and perhaps necessary refusal of the government to share in even the slightest business risk contributed to the result.

It may be said that the government's attitude of suspicion and non-cooperation, however justified in the majority of cases, has served to kill the interest of the honest limited-dividend investor and make him exclaim, "A plague on all your houses!" As a result the government found it necessary to form its own corporation to do its own housing, with and through municipal agencies, which it perhaps naively assumes are more honest than individuals. But the point is that such a policy is, or should be, a complete and clear-cut abandonment of the capitalist-profit system of rent. If the central authority will not allow the "investor" the normal, reasonable "break" which is legitimate under capitalism, it can logically do only one thing—admit that housing is a state function, socialize the entire program by subsidizing the money, and go ahead and build.

If honesty served to delay the emergency program, the delay helped to bring out and emphasize the second cause of the impending collapse of the whole plan. That second cause is that the Housing Division has failed to distinguish between housing and the popular slogan of "slum clearance." In the beginning the emergency program was killed in part by the wavering of policy between slum clearance and building on vacant land, and the long-term program is being strangled by the concentration on slum clearance alone. Every effort has been made to put it across. Mr. Kohn has campaigned long, vigorously, and consistently for it. As disappointment followed disappointment in city after city, the division formed its own corporation to build and operate. Nothing has happened, not even in the city of Washington itself, and in a recent terse telegram Mr. Ickes announced it was all off—for the present at least.

It is easy enough to select the usual scapegoat, the vested real-estate interests. No doubt they can carry their share of blame. But it is also just possible that the real fault lies with those who failed to think the problem through. It is just possible that slum clearance, by itself, is an impossibility—and, moreover, that where clearance is part of a larger program it is the second part, not the first. Housing for the people of the slums must come first. Otherwise, every slum area cleared raises the value of the surrounding slums, and the effort defeats itself. Condemnation and the right of eminent domain are costly, long-winded, and untried in this field; if the choice must be between slum clearance and abandonment of the program, the answer seems already given.

The new program for New York City will go the same way for the same reason, only a stronger one. The PWA is not restricted in its general powers of choice and can utilize outlying or blighted districts if it wishes; the New York bill provides specifically for slum clearance, with only a small option to build on other land. Consequently as a social program to provide decent housing for over half the population, it is still born. As a program for the rescue of slum owners and for the satisfaction of the sentimental social worker, it may have a small measure of success—a small and temporary measure. A few bad blocks will be painfully acquired; the old tenements torn down; new, airy, sanitary buildings built. Who will live in them? They are certain to compete with commercial apartments, as the State Housing Board projects have done. The rents will of necessity be too high for the former occupants of the old slum, who will crowd into the surrounding slums, filling them up. Tax exemption for the new structures will raise the rates on the old; valuations will be higher. They will be more valuable to the owner both actually and potentially; assemblages will be harder, prices higher. As a result nothing comprehensive will be achieved by all the dither of surveys, replannings, recoordinations of streets, transit, parks, relocation of population, and all the rest. Nor will any low-rent homes be provided. The solution of the problem as a social, wisely planned whole is bound to fail because the inception is completely antedated and sentimental.

Build houses, and the slums will clear themselves. There is plenty of cheap land, vacant or potentially blighted, lying close to the centers of the city. Build there, with all the advantages of large-scale planning, for the income of less than $2,000 a year. The Emergency Housing Corporation can do it. If the government is to own the property after, say, forty years, let it reduce the interest rate to 3 per cent and cut out the amortization altogether. Amortization is merely a means of making the tenant pay the owner for the property. Under private ownership that is customary, inevitable, and proper. But if housing is a social matter, subject to the police power of the state—the right of eminent domain—why should not the government finance it as it does other public buildings, through bond issues and taxes? Why, if it is a social question, should the poorest tenants be called on to carry the entire burden unshared by the rest of the population? The buildings can be built for a hundred years' service; and with the convertible construction common to factories, skyscrapers, and small office buildings, obsolescence need not be seriously considered. With such money rates tax exemption would not be necessary, and the municipal burden would be eased. The private owner would not have to fear competition, for public housing would reach a rent level that he could not, even today with government assistance and fairly cheap money, begin to touch.

The slums, drained further of population, would either fall in price to their real value and so become available for large-scale slum clearance, or else would convert themselves upward to other uses, as has happened in Greenwich Village, Sutton Place, and elsewhere. It is likely that in the long run a policy of clearing slums through malnutrition rather than by forcible feeding would inure to the benefit of real estate in general through the arresting of blight, the use of vacant properties, the improvement in the tax situation. But it is doubtful if the real-estate interests will see it that way, having achieved the immediacy of self-interest in the Municipal Housing Authority. Well, let 'em eat cake!

Keeping Hitler Out of Austria

By JOHN GUNTHER

Vienna, January 21

DOLLFUSS, the miniature Canute, still pushes back the Nazi waves. Seemingly in a hopeless position, the little man continues his gritty fight to maintain the independence of Austria. Six months ago my friends thought I was suffering from a mild attack of recklessness when I predicted that Dollfuss would easily see the year through. I would hesitate now to give him another six months so uncompromisingly. But the odds are still slightly in his favor; he is a very adhesive fellow, and he may stick it through.

The Nazi campaign has continued with unabashed and unabated violence. Bombs splatter us. Not many people are injured but the fireworks are a nuisance. They drain confidence from the government. They tempt hooligans to further hooliganism. And the government, I must say, has behaved with appalling lenience. An official communiqué recently regretted the necessity of jailing rebellious Nazis; it mentioned Austria's hope that the Nazi invasion could be handled in a "knightly" spirit. Knightly spirit my eyeball! The only treatment a Nazi understands is a mallet on his head.

"This country," said a rueful friend, new to Vienna, recently, "is the damndest place I've ever seen." Here were Dollfuss and Fey, he pointed out, fighting for their lives and the life of their country. Yet they persist in being gentlemen. After temporizing for some months they finally nabbed and pinched the chief Nazi, Frauenfeld. I do not say that Herr Frauenfeld should have been strung up; I do say that he should have been given more than a few weeks' imprisonment. And he was promptly amnestied at Christmas. Arrested again, in circumstances shortly to be described, he received again a ridiculously light sentence. Thousands of known Nazi agitators are roaming Austria almost immune to arrest. The only victim so far of the new death-penalty decree has been a half-wit peasant arsonist. And President Miklas, the good soul, was so upset at not having exercised clemency for this miscreant that he canceled all engagements—refusing to turn up, for instance, at the official dinner given him by the new American Minister.

The Austrians are, in short, a gentle people. They are given to extreme forms of that casualness known as Schlampererei. They turn the other cheek. They appeal for "knightliness" in dealing with their enemies. Contrast this with the methods of Nazis in Germany to their opponents!

Writing a few months ago I said that Dollfuss faced three great dangers—the apathy of his own people, the strategic difficulty of fighting a civil and an external action at the same time, and the crushing burden of the economic crisis. These dangers remain. Add to them a fourth—treason.

This is the only interpretation one can give to the recent shocking revelation of wholesale defection in the Heimwehr. Frauenfeld was caught negotiating with a German emissary from Berlin and a certain Count Alberti, chief of the Lower Austrian Heimwehr and close friend of Prince Starhemberg, supreme Heimwehr leader and would-be mainstay of the Dollfuss government. Alberti was fired from his post and jailed. Promptly he accused Starhemberg himself of being privy to this anti-Dollfuss treachery. A leader named Kubuczek was appointed to take Alberti's place. We newspapermen cabling the story were stunned; we knew that Kubuczek too was secretly a Nazi sympathizer. A few days later Kubuczek was fired and jailed. So it goes. Sections of the Heimwehr are rotten to the heart. Dollfuss, depending on them, is like a man walking in a marsh. We, most of us, think that Starhemberg—despite Alberti's allegations—is loyal, although a trouble-maker and a weakling; we know that Fey is loyal; but how can Dollfuss and Fey do business if they can't trust their nearest Heimwehr subordinates?

This mess is peculiarly dangerous because it plays directly into the hands of what is apparently the new Nazi plan of campaign. The Germans seem to have given up all thought of frontal attack, that is, invasion across the border. Jules Cambon once wrote: "The Germans do not want a war; all they want are the advantages of victory." Why risk a major European clash now, when Germany is not ready, if Austria can be taken just as easily by guile? Instead of a war or putsch, let the Nazis continue to infiltrate and corrupt the Heimwehr. Let them build up a Heimwehr intrigue behind Dollfuss and stab him in the back. Let there then be a Heimwehr government to succeed him. Some months later let perhaps one Nazi minister enter this government. Then two. Then let there be an election. The Nazis, using their well-known methods, would sweep the country. But it will have been purely an "internal" evolution; the Powers will have no pretext for protest.

Dollfuss and his crowd realize this danger, but they think that Italian support offsets it. They rely above all on foreign help, particularly the help of Mussolini. It is everywhere assumed that Italy would march to Austria's aid in the event of final Nazi encroachment in Austria. Mussolini, the bright boys say, cannot possibly endure strong Germany instead of weak Austria on the Brenner Pass. Mussolini must have a buffer Austria between himself and Germany. Mussolini cannot possibly permit the creation of a Teutonic bloc in Central Europe 72,500,000 strong. And so on. My own notion is that it is highly dangerous to place such reliance on Italian support, and that the position of Italy as Lord High Protector of Austria is distinctly dubious. There are several reasons for this:

1. As pointed out above, the German attack is almost certain to be gradual and devious, not direct, so that it will be extremely difficult for Italy or any other Power to choose an exact moment for intervention. It is not easy to accept the onus of starting a new war without adequate international excuse. The Nazis will do their best to make the Austrian affair a "purely Austrian" issue. The Germans will violate no treaties, give Italy no legal leg to stand on.

2. Italy might easily go to war if Naples, for instance, or Trieste, were seized by some invader. But would Italy fight at some point like Kufstein or Salzburg hundreds of miles from Italian soil, on an issue not directly Italian?

3. Mussolini, no fool, does not want a war this year. Austria is important to him, but not so important as Italy, which conceivably he might lose in the flames of a general European conflagration. Dictators, in fact, seldom enjoy war, however much they shout about it. The reason is obvious: dictators have a healthy fear of a general mobilization which would arm their proletariats.

4. If Mussolini invaded Austria to protect it from Germany, Yugoslavia would probably also invade Austria to protect it from Italy. Which would be a nice mess. A war on two fronts is not exactly what even the wildest Italian chauvinist desires.

5. Italy is, after all, an ally of Germany. It is not impossible that Germany and Italy can reach some compromise on the Austrian problem. Germany might "give" Italy something in return for a free hand in Austria. Mussolini, ally of both Hitler and Dollfuss, could conceivably become a bridge between them.

6. France and Czecho-Slovakia have as much reason as Italy to dread a Gleichschaltung of Austria. If a show-down comes, all three are likely to bicker and delay, waiting for one to pull the other's chestnuts from the fire. Italy, France, and Czecho-Slovakia by no means see eye to eye save on the Austrian problem; there is no binding agreement between them even on Austria; the chances are that none of the three would act decisively until too late.

It may seem from these remarks that the Dollfuss cause is lost. Not so. The Heimwehr treason may turn out to be a help to the government. Dollfuss will purge the Heimwehr, even if he has to put the whole outfit in a concentration camp; he might even throw the Heimwehr out—though this is a remote possibility—and make some sort of working arrangement with the Social Democrats. The powerful diplomatic support of Italy is assured, even if military measures should not be counted on. The Vatican has swung the whole weight of its immense authority behind Dollfuss—and Dollfuss rules a country 97 per cent Roman Catholic. And the Germans continue to behave with masterful stupidity. Consider one item: the 1,000-mark fine imposed on Germans visiting Austria. This was supposed to hurt the Austrian tourist business. It did. But it also helped Austria greatly by keeping out of the country tens of thousands of German visitors who would inevitably have been powerful, because unofficial, pro-German and anti-Austrian propagandists. The German terrorist campaign in several ways defeats itself. It gives Dollfuss a better excuse to maintain his semi-dictatorship, and it serves to back the country, as I think I put it once before, against the wall of its own patriotism.

Dollfuss has, too, a final unused weapon—Otto Hapsburg. There is a good deal of monarchist talk in Vienna these days. Dollfuss, like most Austrian Catholics, is at heart a legitimist, and the chief members of his Cabinet avowedly favor an eventual Hapsburg restoration. Zita and Otto seem to have given up Hungary for the moment and are concentrating all their maneuvers on Austria. Otto would give Austria something permanent to devote itself to. One of Dollfuss's weaknesses is that his program is so negative; he is anti-Nazi but little else. On other points, like opposition to the Socialists, the Nazis with the same policy overwhelm him because their methods are so much stronger; Dollfuss needs something positive, something permanent, like the Crown. I do not mean that a restoration is imminent. But it is not excluded as an eventuality. The Hapsburgs would, of course, choke Hitler sentiment at once.

More immediately, Dollfuss could vastly strengthen his position by an alliance with the Social Democrats. He and they are after all fighting for the same thing—to keep the Nazis out. A coalition has been impossible so far because of the Heimwehr. This week the faint beginnings of a Dollfuss-Otto Bauer flirtation seem to be discernible. Each, in characteristically Austrian fashion, is waiting for the other to open the door. The Socialists must be convinced that the government's plans for a corporative state under the new constitution now being prepared do not imperil the position of trade unions. Dollfuss must be convinced that an alliance would not mean his own suicide.

The Socialists, who are now inclined to regret that they did not call a general strike when there was still time, in March, have been very badly treated. They refrained from opposition to Dollfuss when he was weakest; they tacitly supported him against the Nazis; their reward has been a barrage of petty decrees nibbling at their hard-won achievements, harassing their leaders and newspapers. But the Socialists know full well that Dollfuss has been better for them than Hitler. There is no terror in Austria. Dollfuss has not murdered any Social Democrats yet. And it is ridiculous to say that "Austrian fascism"—which hardly exists—is as bad as Nazi fascism.

People are accusing me of being unwarrantedly pro-Dollfuss. I should like to explain my position, if it matters to anyone. I admire the courage and tenacity of the little man; I deplore his reactionary parochialism. I think it is the greatest of pities that he has alienated those democratic elements in the country who should be his best allies. I should like extremely to see a Social Democratic Austria, if the Social Democrats only had enough guts for government. Dollfuss arose as the only man in the country capable of keeping the Nazis out. And I, personally, take the perhaps mean position that it is better to be suppressed than murdered. For the Nazis to take Austria would be a major European tragedy. Therefore, regretting much in his policy, I support Dollfuss so long as he does his job, the supreme job of saving Austria from Hitler.

Finally, as always, there is the discouraging matter of economics. Austria fights not only the Nazis; it fights the peace treaties. Day by day come tragic items in the news illustrating Austria's poverty. In Vienna, with almost 2,000,000 people, only 800 families are well-to-do enough to have three or more servants. Out of 10,000 travelers on the railways last year, 102 went second class, 5 went first class. There were more than 1,000 suicides in Vienna in 1933, and more than 3,000 attempts at suicide. The peasants cannot sell their wood. Timber is Austria's chief crop, and it does not rot; lying in neat piles before the windows of those who felled the trees, it is a constant and terrible reminder of the poverty of the shrunken country. The national trade-balance deficit is staggering. Austria must import almost twice what it exports. If relief of some sort does not come, collapse is almost sure. The peasants and the poor townsmen have withstood Nazi propaganda this year, but they will turn to anyone who promises them a better time next year. Thus if Austria goes Nazi it will be another item in retribution—another answer of revengeful Germany to the injustices of the Treaty of Versailles.

The Second Five-Year Plan

By LOUIS FISCHER

Moscow, January 15

THE Seventeenth Congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union (January to February, 1934) will stand out in history as the assembly which adopted the second five-year plan. The chorus of jeers and derisive skepticism which greeted the first "Piatiletka" in 1928 is now too distant and unreal to be recalled. Soviet performances between 1928 and 1933 warrant every intelligent observer of world affairs in giving serious study to this second quinquennial program of production and construction, which proposes to make the U. S. S. R. "the most advanced industrial nation in Europe." (The slogan "Overtake and surpass America" has apparently been postponed till the third plan.)

The second Piatiletka embraces 1933, 1934, 1935, 1936, and 1937. It is therefore one-fifth fulfilment and four-fifths blueprint. The emphasis of the plan, as was to have been expected, is on the production of consumers' goods. Light industries will increase their output by an annual average of 21.9 per cent, which is more than the first plan provided for and more than the increase in heavy industry during the second plan. By the end of 1937 every Soviet citizen is promised the possibility of buying two and a half to three times as many manufactured commodities and food articles as he can acquire at present.

The attaining of this goal is put up to the population itself. The first plan gave "security for the morrow." Today the raising of material and cultural levels "depends solely on the quality and quantity of labor expended" by the workers and collectivized peasants. The first plan stressed the manufacture of machines which make machines and which could neither be eaten nor worn. Individual initiative accordingly required some artificial stimulation. Since the Soviet Union registered, nevertheless, such gigantic economic advances in those trying years, the Bolsheviks are fully convinced that now, when every worker will see the results of his toil in a steady improvement of his standard of living, the fulfilment of the second plan is certain.

This assumption enabled the Soviets to draft the new plan on a scale much more ambitious and grandiose than that of the first. The task is truly colossal. On December 31, 1932, at the close of the first plan, Soviet industry had a production capacity of goods worth 43 billion rubles in the more or less stable currency of 1926-27. By 1937 this figure will have risen to 103 billion in the same currency. More than half of the total—55 per cent—will be in the form of consumers' goods. This 55 per cent stands for 54,300,000,000 rubles, which means that if it were divided among, say, 175,000,000 inhabitants—a conservative estimate for 1937—every Soviet citizen would receive manufactured articles worth 308 almost uninflated rubles of 1926-27. This sounds like very little. But if one considers that it goes to men, women, and children, urban and rural population, Muscovites and nomad Kazaks, Polar Samoyeds and semi-civilized Yakuts who scarcely buy anything, the average is high. It is about 280 per cent of the present average. Moreover, the sum of 308 rubles refers only to the output of "the chief branches of industry." It would probably not include such things as pencils, ice skates, or collar buttons. Nor does it take into account local manufactures, which the Bolsheviks unwisely discouraged for a period but which are now called upon to triple their output in the next four years. In addition, the agricultural yield will double. The grain harvest alone is expected to amount to 110,000,000 metric tons in 1937, compared to 89,800,000 tons in 1933 and 60,000,000 in 1932. The value of the technical crops—cotton, flax, and so forth—and of dairy products will more than double. After food, clothing, and household furnishings have been paid for, persons gainfully employed will spend the rest of their income on better housing and amusement facilities, more traveling, vacations, and the like, all of which are envisaged by the second plan.

By 1937 the U. S. S. R. will produce annually 40,000 complicated metal-cutting lathes, 167,000 fifteen-horse-power tractors (73,000 actually produced in 1933), 25,000 agricultural combines, 2,900 locomotives, 200,000 automobiles (50,000 in 1933), 38,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours of electricity, 152,000,000 tons of coal (76,000,000 in 1933, 36,000,000 in 1928), 18,000,000 tons of pig iron (7,250,000 tons in 1933—the Soviet Union has already far outdistanced Great Britain in pig-iron production—3,370,000 in 1928), 19,000,000 tons of steel (6,920,000 tons in 1933, 4,280,000 in 1928), 14,000,000 tons of rolled steel (4,800,000 tons in 1933), 47,000,000 tons of petroleum, 155,000 tons of copper, 43,000,000 cubic meters of timber, and so on.

Even more impressive is the program for new building. Maximum attention will be paid to transport, the weakest link in the Soviet industrial chain. Five thousand kilometers of steam railway will be electrified; 9,500 kilometers will be double-tracked; 8,500 kilometers of sidelines will be laid; 11,000 kilometers of new railroad will be constructed, thus increasing the length of Soviet lines from 83,000 kilometers on January 1, 1933, to 94,000 on January 1, 1938. Work will continue on the 127-kilometer Volga-Moscow canal, an undertaking, according to Valeri Mezhaik, greater in scope and presenting more difficulties than the Panama Canal. Work will commence immediately on the 100-kilometer Volga-Don canal, which will connect the whole of Central Russia with the Black Sea and the Mediterranean. Ships will pass in 1937 from the Arctic Ocean through the heart of Russia to Persia and from Leningrad to Constantinople.

The number of automobiles, today 75,000, will mount to 580,000 by the end of the second Piatiletka, and so that these cars may travel faster, 210,000 kilometers of arterial highways will be built. Also 87,000 kilometers of regular airlines will be established. Finally, to enable man to move within as well as on and above the earth, the Moscow subway, Russia's first, will be completed. Its first trains are scheduled to run on November 7, 1934.

The Ford factory at Nijni Novgorod (history has been needlessly mutilated and the name of the town changed to Gorki) will be expanded to produce 300,000 automobiles instead of the present 100,000. The capacity of the Amo works in Moscow will similarly be enlarged from 50,000 to 80,000 trucks annually. Ufa, the capital of Bashkiria, and Stalingrad will each have a "giant" capable of manufacturing 100,000 three-ton motor lorries a year; Samara a new factory for 25,000 five-ton trucks. Seventy-nine regional hydroelectric power stations are scheduled for construction; 178 new coal mines with an output of 143,000,000 tons annually will be sunk; 4,000 kilometers of oil pipe-lines and a large number of petroleum refineries are included in the second plan. Four big metallurgical plants will be started; also an endless number of units for the production of non-ferrous metals—a 100,000-ton copper enterprise in Kazakhstan, for instance—and chemicals.

Fifteen cotton-goods factories, each containing 200,000 spindles, will be erected, ten of them in Central Asia near the source of supply; twelve woollens factories manufacturing from 8,000,000 to 15,000,000 meters of cloth each; eleven silk mills; and twelve shoe factories with an annual capacity of 100,000,000 pairs. Together with current output this will mean an average of more than one pair per person in twelve months. The end of the plan will likewise see a tremendous array of new factories for sugar, meat, canning, tanning, soap-making, candy, cake.

This second Piatiletka does not really develop the usual mad "Bolshevik" tempo of construction until its latter half—about the middle of 1935. The year 1934 prolongs the relative "lull" of 1933. Scores of big projects begun during the first plan will be finished before the "giants" of the second begin to rise. Thus the building of the new automobile plants and the extension of the old will not be started before 1935. Similarly, most of the new mines will be dug so late in the second plan that they will not yield their full effect until the third—1938-42. In 1934 the government will concentrate its efforts on the canals, railways, and roads, the beginning of three enormous iron and steel mills, a 100,000,000-ruble Institute of Experimental Medicine in Moscow, the Moscow Palace of the Soviets, the great Volga dam at Yaroslav, and above all on plants producing consumers' goods. The period of 1933-34, accordingly, is a "breathing space" characterized by a comparatively smaller capital investment in heavy industry and by the acceleration of light industry; this is so that the population can satisfy its craving for daily necessities, that the ruble can be finally stabilized, and that the country can get its "second wind" for 1935, 1936, and 1937, the assumption being that by 1935 the exchange of commodities between city and village will have been sufficiently regularized to warrant renewed rapid construction without further inflation and without the enormous sacrifices of the first plan. The hope is, too, that if the capitalist world crisis has not abated enough in 1935 to enable the Soviets to obtain credits for the purchase of foreign machinery, then by that time domestic industries will be in a position, albeit with difficulty and a sacrifice of quality, to supply the needed equipment.

This postponement is wise from every point of view. For the chief purpose of this plan is immediately to raise living standards. To insure against even the slightest possibility of a return of unemployment, the second Piatiletka contemplates an increase of 30 per cent in the number of workingmen and employees. Retail prices will undergo a reduction of from 35 to 40 per cent, and real wages will be doubled. Cultural, educational, and social benefits will be increased. The guaranty that these are not merely empty promises lies in the temporary restriction of heavy industrial construction.

A contented population conscious of a steady improvement in living conditions in the finest defense against the success of a foreign attack. The Bolsheviks are aware of this truism. They know, too, that a modern army fights on its factories. And the location of these factories is a matter of tremendous importance. The distribution of the plants provided for under the second plan reveals therefore a great deal that is hidden in the Bolshevik mind. Practically no new heavy industrial construction will be undertaken in Leningrad, Moscow, White Russia, or the Ukraine. After all, Odessa would be a bad place for a locomotive or automobile works. A foreign fleet could easily blow it into smithereens. And Moscow was once captured by Napoleon; a second Bonaparte might do a better job. The Ukraine still has very large natural resources—the untouched Kursk magnetic-iron deposits, for instance—but even its Donetz basin, the Soviets' richest coal field, will be somewhat neglected. In 1932 it produced 75 per cent of the country's coal. In 1937 the percentage will fall to 65 per cent, and the Siberian output will rise correspondingly. In fact, almost all Soviet heavy industrial construction between now and 1937 will be concentrated in the Volga and Ural-Siberian regions, which are more inaccessible to foreign attack. Alone the Ural-Kuznetsk district will swallow one-fourth of the entire capital investment of the second five-year plan, and in 1937 it is expected to produce one-third of the U. S. S. R.'s pig iron, one-fourth of its coal, and one-tenth of its machinery. Of the three new automobile factories, two are on the Volga and one in Siberia. Of the five new railway trunklines, four are in Asia. The Volga is the center of the great electrification scheme of the second Piatiletka. Of course these areas possess vast undeveloped resources and it is statesmanship to exploit them, but it is no accident that the Soviet Government is creating a second metallurgical base and expanding its railway network in Siberia. The central Volga region also connects up with the Far East. Apparently the Bolsheviks do not erase war from their accounts; they feel that history still holds in store for the world a war or two in which the U. S. S. R. might become involved. And while they are not undisturbed about the west, they realize that the greater menace is on their weaker eastern flank.

This being so, the second five-year plan has overlooked one consideration—a human one. The center of gravity of Soviet industry and Soviet population will inevitably shift into Asia—which means incidentally that bolshevism is fulfilling its historic mission of Westernizing the Orient—and hundreds of thousands of workers, engineers, teachers, and professional people will have to settle in or east of the Urals. It is no secret, however, that a citizen of Leningrad or Moscow must be given a million promises before he will consent to move into Siberia, and usually he will go only if he can return after two or three years to his metropolitan apartment, which the government undertakes to keep for him in the meantime. One cannot blame him. Russians do not want to exchange the theaters, libraries, educational facilities, and comforts of a modern city for a bivouac in Siberia. The second plan should have provided for the transformation of Sverdlovsk into a Soviet Chicago and of Stalingrad into a Soviet Detroit with at least as many amenities as the capital or Leningrad offer. To be sure, the new Piatiletko foresees endless housing and municipal projects. There is no emphasis, however, on the establishment of a second industrial capital, and that may prove a serious omission.

The description of the plan as published over the signatures of Premier Molotov and of Kuibishev, the president of the State Planning Commission, ends with a strange contradiction. We were told a year or two ago that the end of the second Piatiletko would see the end of the class society. Now this fiction is repeated. The scheme promises the "liquidation of all capitalist elements and of classes in general." I am ready to believe that all capitalist elements will be finally suppressed. But if the classes are to disappear, why does a closely following paragraph speak of the dictatorship of the proletariat and the need of strengthening it? The dictatorship is necessary only to prevent hostile classes from obstructing the progress to socialism. I incline to the view that the dictatorship of the proletariat will still be with us after 1937. Actual capitalists may not remain, but capitalist psychology will. Above all, and despite the anticipated growth, the rich plenty without which socialism would be a caricature will not yet have been achieved. But if the Bolsheviks carry out the plan—even though they fail to introduce the socialist millennium by 1937—they can well be gratified.

The Intelligent Traveler

By JOHN ROTHSCHILD

THERE are two sorts of travel. Recreation is a legitimate end in itself, and if one prefers to rest and play in another country than one's own and has the means to do it, the world is full of playgrounds. But Americans are beginning to appreciate what, for lack of a more imaginative term, must be identified as "educational travel." Unquestionably we are more concerned with ideas than we used to be. We are no longer isolated provincials, but citizens of the world who feel the necessity of relating our personal activities to those of the world at large.

A person who knows either French or German, who has plenty of time, and who has prepared himself properly usually profits most by traveling alone, unattached to anyone of his own nationality. Most of us have considerable resistance to new relationships, and a fellow-traveler is a counter-magnet which pulls us back to the familiar. The person going on his own must make experiments, risking loss of time and indefiniteness of cost. He can reduce these hazards, however, by the right kind of preparation. A number of cultural organizations stand ready to assist him in rounding out his mental picture of the countries he expects to visit, if he will take the trouble to discover them. Many of them furnish information and contacts gratis as an incidental part of their work; others are membership organizations in which nominal dues are charged for extraordinary services. The following list, while not complete, is suggestive:

For students, the Institute of International Education, 2 West Forty-fifth Street; the National Student Federation, 218 Madison Avenue; the National Student Service, 140 Nassau Street. For information about Russia, the American Russian Institute, 56 West Forty-fifth Street, and the Institute of Pacific Relations, 129 East Fifty-second Street, which also takes the Orient as its special field; for Latin American countries, the Committee on Cultural Relations with Latin America, 112 East Nineteenth Street; for the British Empire, the English-Speaking Union, 19 West Forty-fourth Street; for Scandinavian countries, the American Scandinavian Foundation, 116 East Sixty-fourth Street; for Italy, the Italy America Society, 301 Park Avenue. All addresses are in New York City.

For Europe and Russia there is a completely rounded service given by the Open Road, 56 West Forty-fifth Street. This organization will budget a trip so that the financial uncertainties of setting out alone are appreciably reduced. Through a network of relationships with organizations and key individuals abroad it gives advice, concrete help, and introductions. To take an extreme example: a gastroenterologist wishes to spend next summer in Europe consulting the best authorities and seeing the best clinical work in his field. In each city on his foreign itinerary an Open Road representative helps him get settled, makes appointments with the best men in his field, or if time has been allowed, may even warn him in advance of arrival that the work has been discontinued. Probably in no case will the representative be a gastroenterologist, or even a physician, but he will be the kind of person who knows his city. This may sound elementary, but there has been more than one unhappy instance of a student sent abroad to work with a specialist who no longer taught, or to study a project that had been abandoned. Less important but no less irritating are the difficulties of personal and academic adjustment which hamper the student's work, and which such a service can smooth away.

In pursuing a cultural study—say, modern textile design—the very wealth of material often bewilders and deceives. If given time the Open Road will make a reconnaissance of the field and suggest the places, institutions, and foreign experts that are likely to prove most worth while. The prospective traveler can dig up a good deal of this information for himself if he has the right professional connections, but even so there is much checking to be done. The work best known over here may be inferior to work that has been less widely advertised, or it may have been abandoned or vulgarized, or superseded by something not yet known in America. The Open Road is a membership organization, like most of those listed above. It is non-profit-making and subsidized, but since its work is highly specialized and expensive, the traveler is expected to bear a proportionate cost by becoming a member.

There are conditions under which the traveler gets more from his trip by going with a group. If he decides for reasons of time, or purse, or inexperience, or delight in comradeship to go with a party, he faces a paralyzing array of organized tours from which to choose. The only advice that can be given him is to knock on many doors, and not take the first tour that issues an attractive brochure or advertises a distinguished leader. A group led by the foremost man in the field is an unhappy choice if it is badly managed, too large, carelessly recruited, or excessive in cost. This is the same problem that confronts a student selecting a law school. It must be solved in the same way, by looking for intrinsic values.

The important thing for the person who is seeking to broaden his experience by travel is not on what boat he sails or in which hotel he stops; it is the opportunity afforded him for real understanding of the people and the country he will visit. It is a good general rule that the cheapest and most common means of travel offer the largest return in human values. Recently an authoritative student of economic policy surprised her friends by boarding a day coach for a trip to Mexico City. She admitted its discomforts but said that if she went by Pullman she would miss the plain people. Wagon-lit accommodations all over the world are operated for the benefit of foreigners. You can travel in them with all the comforts of home, hear English spoken, meet your own kind, and remain as untouched and unmoved by your travels as if you had never left home at all.

[This is the second of a series of articles by Mr. Rothchild pointing out to Nation readers interesting and inexpensive ways of travel. The third will be published in the issue of February 28.]

In the Driftway

IT has been possible for the Drifter to accommodate himself to the changing morality of recent years—he is not excessively concerned with morals anyhow—but he has found it difficult to embrace the new economics. He grew up in the belief that thrift was a virtue, that it was not only wise from a personal standpoint but equally beneficial to one's fellows. The man who had a savings account, bought a mortgage, or invested in a Liberty bond was hailed as a good citizen, worthy of public commendation. Now, of course, that view has vanished. The man with money in a bank is a swine—unless the bank has failed—and the holder of a mortgage is a leech who ought to be boiled in oil. The only person who gets any attention from his fellows today is the one who has a mortgage he cannot meet or instalments on a car he cannot pay. The debtor, if not the public's hero, is at least its protegee. He is the man for whom our whole recovery scheme is geared. We devalue the dollar in order to raise prices and enable him to extricate himself from his debts, with never a thought for the man who saved his money or failed to lose his job—out of whose hide the cost must be taken.

* * * * *

WE have gone farther than that. People must be taught henceforth to spend their money, not to save it. Dr. Alvan L. Barach has just made a "psychological study" of the depression for the National Committee for Mental Hygiene, in which he says that the country is in the "sinister grip" of "excessive thrift," which "must be broken." Anyone who has a dollar in a savings bank must feel like a common thief when Dr. Barach inveighs against the "cancerous notion of thrift" and its "throttling influence." There is no course for one whose house is paid for but to jump out the top-story window.

* * * * *

OF course the Drifter has heard that this is not like other depressions. He has been made aware that we are living no longer in an economy of scarcity but in one of surplus. He vaguely comprehends, therefore, that we ought to dissipate this public wealth which we have piled up, as rapidly as possible. But somehow this public wealth doesn't seem in any noticeable way to be in the possession of the public. The surplus the Drifter hears about is not in the homes of those whom he knows—unless his best friends won't tell him. In a dim, dumb way the Drifter surmises that there is a difference between a national surplus and a surplus in the hands of the multitudinous individuals who make up the nation. If the Drifter ever has $10 which the landlord and the grocer aren't both reaching for at once, he will not be tempted to spend it like a drunken sailor for fear of the "cancerous notion of thrift" or its "throttling influence." Nor does the Drifter blame anyone with considerably more than $10 for safeguarding it as long as possible. The Drifter has no exaggerated opinion of the sagacity of his fellow-Americans, but he thinks that despite all the effort to discredit the philosophy of Benjamin Franklin and all the patriotic ballyhoo to "spend now," practically nobody is going to endanger his personal economic security to help the nation get rid of its surplus. Here and there we may find an individual who will cut off his nose to spite his face, but almost nowhere do we encounter one who will cut off his nose to improve the face of that vague wraith known as the nation.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

The Control of Milk Cooperatives

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

In your editorial entitled The Milk Scandal in The Nation for January 10 you state, "The large cooperatives are, of course, controlled by the distributors and share the profits." On what evidence do you base this charge?

It is readily admitted that many of the cooperative associations selling the milk of their members to the profiteering distributors have not been as militant as they might have been in fighting for fair prices for their members. But from several years' rather intimate contact with a number of these cooperatives I believe there are other factors which explain this lack of militancy. The average board of directors of a cooperative association is generally composed of the leading farmers from the territory which it represents. Most of these men have farms of average or better than average size and are middle-aged or older. They are usually rather conservative in their outlook and are fearful of leading their organization into a move which might react unfavorably upon their own economic position and that of their farmer neighbors. They abhor violence and believe that a milk strike inevitably produces violence, and that usually the farmers come out worse off than before they struck. The simple fact of the matter is that at the present time the milk-marketing cooperatives do not have the power to force the dairy trusts to pay fair prices to the farmers, and if they did the consumers would have to provide all the profits.

The milk-marketing cooperatives charge their members brokerage for marketing their milk, and the amount of this brokerage charge is generally limited by vote of the membership; the directors have the power to fix the charge, within this maximum limit, at the amount which they find necessary properly to finance the operations of the cooperative. This brokerage charge is deducted from the milk checks of the members, on written orders signed by them, and is not a share of the "profits" of the distributors. The associations that have had a relatively high brokerage charge, one cent per gallon, have generally served their members economically, in spite of sometimes high-paid officials, have built up substantial capital resources, and have generally been able to drive the best bargains with the dairy trust.

Palisade, N. J., January 14

GORDON H. WARD

[Cooperatives are usually organized on a membership basis with each farmer entitled to a vote in their operation. Many, however, as they have grown, have become stock organizations and assumed most of the faults of corporate control. Recent milk-code hearings have revealed that the proxy system of voting is in general use, and that the board of directors is virtually self-appointed, through stock ownership, while it has also been admitted that the familiar dodge of naming directors and letting them qualify afterward is in wide use. Voting stock has been issued without payment, and in one cooperative, the Interstate Milk Producers' Association, which controls the Philadelphia milk shed, the names of 300 dead men are still accredited with votes. Control, then, is out of the farmers' hands. Yet the cooperative, through market control, continues to frame agreements on the farmers' behalf through what amounts to coercion, since it boasts that the distributors will not recognize any independent producers' organization. These agreements universally favor the distributor, and that has been the farmer's chief dispute with the cooperative. The Interstate failed to ask 22,000 member farmers their sentiments on the now abrogated marketing code, yet signed it for them, whereupon 15,000 of the farmers revolted. Many cooperatives roll up an annual deficit of sizable proportions, despite dues and commission fees, yet pay huge salaries to their officials, liberal traveling expenses, and in some mysterious manner manage to exist—perhaps because their fees are received through the distributor by the check-off system. This is strong evidence of distributor influence. Most damning of all, cooperatives have forced the purchase of stock in distributors' corporations and holding companies upon the farmer under threat of cutting off his market. Cooperative directors have boasted of preventing or breaking strikes in the Chicago area; in New York and western Pennsylvania they have forced member farmers into bankruptcy by abrupt mortgage foreclosures and calling of notes. An audit of the books of the Interstate reveals that in sixteen years, while farm prices were falling more rapidly than the commodity index, and the distributors' spread of profits was increasing, not a single attempt was made to remedy this obviously unfair situation. All this may be due to the conservatism of the cooperative directors. The point is that the farmer, himself a member of the cooperative, emphatically does not think so.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

A Plea for Inflation

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Why should The Nation be liberal on everything but the money question? It is hard to see why progressivism in politics and economics should make an absolute exception as to money. After reading carefully the articles by Villard and Stewart, and the editorial Fatter Prices and Thinner Dollars, one would think that the money question was an absolutely closed book and that all its principles were known and their effect completely charted by experience. As an orthodox anti-inflationist, The Nation makes the circulars sent out by the big banks appear mild.

Now I happen to live in a section of the country where the sentiment is prevailingly for inflation. Senator Norris favors the issuing of greenbacks to pay that portion of the national debt now falling due. This seems a trifle radical to some of us, but when I find The Nation, so "radical" in other things, lined up uncompromisingly with Wall Street on the money question, I can't help being perplexed. When the United States Chamber of Commerce came out against Roosevelt's money policy, Will Rogers spoke for all the West when he said that we knew right then that the President was right.

I think it obvious that a new chapter is being written on money and we are going to accept its findings. It seems to us clear that the iron logic of conditions has forced us to seek a new standard of value and a new level of prices. Spin as many fine theories as we may, by the close of 1932 deflation had done its perfect work and the country was broke. Only a bank moratorium and a strong injection of the adrenalin of an inflationary psychology saved us from going completely over the brink. What is the use of theorizing now about inflation? We are already inflated. Would The Nation have us deflate back to the old standard? In fact, just what does The Nation want? Out here we agree heartily with the President. We do not believe we have to consider deflation as an act of God any more than we have to consider inflation per se an act of the devil. The boast of Mr. Villard that The Nation stood for hard money in the 70's does not at all impress us as a good reason for standing for an undeviating gold standard in 1933. "Time makes ancient good uncouth."

Mr. Roosevelt is trying to give us a 1926 level of prices. If we are ever to pay our debts, we must have a much higher level than the one we now groan under. If The Nation can think of a better plan to this end, why not trot it out, instead of pointing with pride to an ancient attitude and an equally outworn political economy?

Lincoln, Neb., January 20

W. T. DAVIS

R
A
C
I
A
L

A
R
T
S

O
F

L
O
V
E

PRIVATELY PRINTED MATURE READERS AND COLLECTORS OF AMATORY
CURIOSA OF ALL RACES
SEND FOR FREE CATALOGUE OF BOOKS ON SCIENTIFIC SEXUALIA
ANTHROPOLOGICAL ESOTERICA
UNEXPURGATED CLASSICS
EXOTICALLY ILLUSTRATED
MAGICA SEXUALIS
LIMITED EDITIONS

All FALSTAFF scientific and anthropological Books on the Love Relations of Mankind are enthralling and highly informative documents by authorities of international repute. That is why the FALSTAFF list of permanent subscribers reads like a "Who's Who" of America's Sophisticated Intellectual Aristocracy.

FALSTAFF PRESS

Dept. 2-NA, 230 Fifth Ave, New York, N. Y.

Please send me free illustrated catalogs of Amatory Curiosa.

Name.....Age

Address.....

City.....State.....

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

GERTRUDE STEIN'S

greatest work—now in its first popular American edition

THE MAKING OF AMERICANS

In the 17 years of its existence in manuscript and small editions, this great novel has exerted influences far beyond the circle of its few readers. It comes now to the great audience that knows Gertrude Stein's "Autobiography of Alice B. Toklas." Edited, and with an Introduction by Bernard Fay.

416 pages, $3.00

LENIN

by
Ralph Fox

"It should be read by every one interested in the only dynamic and historically significant movement of our day."

—SCRIBNER'S

"The most readable, and perhaps the most authoritative book that we have yet had on the great Russian leader."

—PHILADELPHIA
INQUIRER

$2.00

LENIN

by
Ralph Fox

"The most comprehensive and authoritative book yet issued."

—LEWIS GANNETT

"A sober, well-balanced biography."

—HARRY HANSEN

$2.00

HARCOURT, BRACE & CO.

383 Madison Ave.
New York

J. E. NEALE'S

QUEEN ELIZABETH

The great women ruler fully interpreted at last in this important biography

This first really adequate biography for the general reader is as entertaining and dramatic as the crowded period it so freshly interprets. And it is written by an expert Elizabethan scholar. Its intimate personal history of the queen is set forth against the liveliest account of Shakespeare's England, in all its feuds, tragedies, pageantries and follies. A book-of-the-month choice in England.

402 pages, $3.75

Midwinter Book Section

Stephen Dedalus and James Joyce

By WILLIAM TROY

TO say that undoubtedly the greatest advantage of having "Ulysses" on public sale in this country* is that it enables more people to read the book is not such an obvious statement as it may at first sound. For Joyce's masterpiece, although it has certainly been the most reviled, the most admired, and the most generally discussed work of our generation, has been at the same time one of the least read—in the sense of a patient, conscientious, and thoughtful examination of its contents. Of course there has never been any reason to expect that it should be widely read by the popular reading public: it makes too many demands on the intellect, the sensibility, and the experience of the average reader. Nor will all the efforts to endow it with the fascination of the occult, which seems to be the object behind the many "keys," commentaries, and esoteric interpretations that have appeared, succeed in our enlightened age in earning for it the kind of reputation which the golden book of Vergil enjoyed in the Middle Ages. And even as an intellectual game, a substitute for the crossword puzzle, the book must remain an exercise for more or less superior wits. One does not refer, therefore, either to the so-called plain reader or to his guides in expressing the belief that "Ulysses" has not been as carefully studied as it might have been in the twelve years since its publication. The reference is rather to the number of serious and informed critics all during that period who have concentrated on one or another separate aspect of the work without attempting to weigh for us the meaning or final implications of the work as a whole.

The most common confusion into which the discussion of the work has fallen is the result of the failure to distinguish between Stephen Dedalus, who is one of its three principal characters, and James Joyce, who is its author. It is a confusion that it is not very difficult to understand; for Stephen Dedalus is not only one of the most perfectly realized characters in modern fiction but also the character with whom the modern reader can most easily identify himself. The influence of Joyce on other writers, for example, has been almost exclusively the influence of the character of Stephen Dedalus, and not of the characters of Leopold and Molly Bloom, although these two characters are certainly of equal importance in the structure of his work. In other words, the modern writer, finding in the mental and psychological state of Stephen as rendered by Joyce such a precise duplicate of his own, has been quick to assume that this must also be the permanent mental and psychological state of his creator. It has been too seldom recognized that quite distinct from whatever special interest he may have as the Hamlet de nos jours, Stephen is one character among others in an objectively constructed work of fiction; that he is only a part of a whole, and not the whole itself; and that even whatever development of his character occurs is necessarily subordinate to the total development of the work. Now it need hardly be remarked that if a few of the many imitators of Joyce's style and method had shown some awareness of this fact we should probably have been spared that chaotic and artistically meaningless overflow of sensibility which has passed for fiction in recent years. But the point at present is that the failure to recognize "Ulysses" for what it is—perhaps the most objective work of fiction ever created, a work about which it is impossible to say that it is written in such and such a style, since it is written in as many styles as there are characters and situations to be rendered—is what is most responsible for the habit of ascribing to its author a psychology and point of view which really belong to one of his characters at a certain stage in his development.

This confusion has most recently reasserted itself in the concerted effort on the part of several American critics to bury Joyce, along with the other major writers of his generation, in the interests of a strictly contemporary view of the artist and his relations to the society of his time. According to these critics Joyce is no longer eligible as a "guide" for contemporary writers. Like Baudelaire, Henry James, Sarah Orne Jewett, Hermann Melville, Lewis Carroll, and almost every other writer of the last few centuries whose name comes to mind, Joyce declined to participate in the social and economic struggles of his age, preferring to express the personality which this age had molded in the terms of an obscure and aristocratic art. In Joyce's case the refusal to engage in action, or in that form of action which is called propaganda, was particularly obdurate in view of the unusual opportunities which his country offered. "How much have we lost because Stephen drew back from the revolution that attracted him?" we are asked to contemplate. How much have we lost because he indulged the trinity of personality-vices which an analysis of his temperament reveals—"pride, contempt, ambition"? If we can no longer admire the artist whose work has been motivated by these essentially individualistic vices, it is because our whole notion of the artist's role in society has undergone a profound change. The tradition to which Joyce must be assigned is the nineteenth-century tradition which believed not only that the artist was a privileged member of society, immune from all moral and social responsibility, but also that he was the high priest of a cult or religion—the religion of art. In rejecting this tradition we must reject Joyce—or at least we must reject him if we accept the picture that has just been given, which is the picture drawn for us by the ultra-Marxist wing of recent American criticism.

But it may be that we need not accept such a picture as a true picture of the author of "Ulysses," although as a picture of Stephen Dedalus there is little in it to which we might object. What is not taken into account in such an analysis, of course, is the fact that the "morbid-minded aesthete and embryo philosopher" of the morning, afternoon, and evening of June 16, 1904, is not, and could not be, the author of the mature, harmonious, and extraordinarily robust work of art that is "Ulysses." It takes no account of the important spiritual progression that has taken place in Stephen's consciousness on this momentous day—a progression which reaches its climax in one of the three great moments of inner dramatic crisis in the work.

*"Ulysses." By James Joyce. Random House. $3.50.

For each of the three major characters there is such a moment of intense psychological crisis, marking the most extreme degree of anguish and confusion to which the gradually accumulated conflicts of each of them attain. If Stephen's crisis is the first that is presented to us, it is because his particular conflicts have been raging with intolerable force all day and because the structure requires that it be over with before the theme can be advanced to its resolution. As everyone who has studied the work knows, Stephen's long agony reaches its climax at that moment in the celebrated scene in Bella Cohen's brothel (page 567 in the present edition of the text) when he turns from the women around him, brushes away the persistent ghost of his mother, and screams out the single word "Nothing!"

He lifts his ashplant high with both hands and smashes the chandelier. Time's livid final flame leaps and, in the following darkness, ruin of all space, shattered glass and toppling masonry.

This gesture that Stephen makes marks not only an end but a beginning. It symbolizes his exorcism of the past: the images in which the ideals of race, religion, and education have clothed themselves will never again appear to haunt him. Although he will never be altogether free from "history," history will no longer be the nightmare that it has been for him. Not only has his center of gravity been displaced, as he remarks a little while afterwards, but it will never be the same again. And for this reason we may say that at this moment Stephen Dedalus, as we have known him up to this scene, vanishes from existence, and the author of "Ulysses" is born. Or, if we persist in referring to them as one and the same person, we may say that whatever Stephen Dedalus produces thereafter must come out of a different world, a world of brighter and more tangible human substance, in which the tired ghosts of Aristotle and Aquinas will have to make room for Leopold and Molly Bloom.

For "Ulysses" does not end with that gesture with which Stephen seems to smash to earth not only the chandelier in a Dublin brothel but also the whole unsteady weight of Western European culture that has been bearing down on his brain. He has yet to have his encounter with Leopold Bloom, an encounter that is to lead to his attainment of a new and different state of grace from that he had enjoyed in the far-off days of the "Portrait." He has yet to acquire that richness of perception and understanding which will enable him to write the last glowing pages of Molly Bloom's monologue, with which, finally, the book does come to its end. If we desire to seek the real meaning of Stephen's career, therefore, it is to these last pages that we must turn—not to those sections in which he has traced out his tortured and difficult evolution as an artist, but to his final magnificent reassertion, in the terms of the most objective art, of the ultimate triumph of reality over whatever ideas or systems of ideas the mind may attempt to impose on it.

The last word on the last page of this book of almost eight hundred pages is Molly's word "Yes," and because it is the last word in the book we may feel secure in believing that it is also Joyce's last word as a man and as an artist. To identify Joyce with the backward-moving direction in modern letters, to align him with the party of sterility and death, can only seem, therefore, like a grievous blunder on the part of those interested in the creation of a society which will not perpetuate the conditions that caused Stephen Dedalus to live out his life in "silence, exile, and cunning." For out of his pride and contempt and ambition, Joyce has given us a work which leaves us, at the end, with a still passionate faith and trust in the reality which even societies must keep in mind if they are to survive.

The Arbor

By EDA LOU WALTON

Naught but the vine root gnarled and old,
Branches died out in every way but down,
The arbor barren and the sweet fruit sold
To feast some few within a wintry town.

Twisted and woody in the solid earth,
No other way to reach now save through soil.
Life in the air, the flowering, fruity birth,
This drunkenness has ended in dark toil.

Downward to thrust, down, down to send the thong
Below the ice, below the wormy clay,
Warmth may be there, sap and the earthy strong
Delirium of violence and new day.

Time may be there to conjure and command
Such strength as for the winter will suffice
To fill this wooden vessel and its hand
Groping through shadow and through sacrifice.

Let sky hold arbor like a hollow cave
For winds' last hover and for birds, blind-dropped,
Naked of leaves such structure is a wave
Gone slowly over, and by darkness topped.

Below in passion, having touched such flame
As earth's deep core alone sends up the tap,
The ugly root moves up to mark and name
The new spring's blood and green emblazoned map.

Wild over pasture, town, and towered tomb
The wine will run, old river and dried stream
Carry the flood poured out from earthy womb
Across the dammed embankments of a dream.

The heart out of its stale eternity torn
To shape new arbors tipped against the stars,
Sees a new harvest on the threshold born
Leap purple up the bars;

Arms locked high over head, feet far apart,
All grape-enladen, sweet and strong,
The vine-crowned is the vineyard, and the mart
Arbor and mouth for song!

Two Critics in Search of an Absolute

By HORACE GREGORY

When we consider the situation of the human mind in Nature, its limited plasticity and few channels of communication with the outer world, we need not wonder that we grope for light.—GEORGE SANTAYANA.

I HAVE always considered the subtle distinction between literary critic and writer an unnecessary refinement of both terms. Like the very person of whom he writes my critic should see, read, think, feel, hear—and then make his experience known to all who read him. Nor does it harm the so-called writer if he thinks in terms of the critic, if he takes the time to summarize his own work and pass judgment upon it. He may be wrong but so may the critic, and surely that exercise should give him a renewed sense of his direction. We are now, I think, midway in a new period of criticism, and it is the duty of the critic—if he would be read—to assume the responsibilities of literature, remembering at all times that the changing of ideas into words is a creative exercise. In the past we remember Johnson, Coleridge, Matthew Arnold because they were, whatever else we may think of them, writers. As well as holding opinions they made us feel the importance of what they had to say. When I say “feel” I mean that they convinced us by use of an art that they employed, and even went so far as to develop personal qualities of style and imagination. This may be heresy.

At the risk of incurring the charge of further heresy, I choose my text from George Santayana. From his first book onward he has been continually outmoded, and perhaps that is the very reason that he always returns to us with an air of extraordinary freshness. This opening sentence from his “Poetry and Religion” seems to apply to the kind of criticism we are now reading and to the more intelligent younger critics. After a period of wavering, of liberal enthusiasms, it is good to read men who can make up their minds on any given subject, but the road they walk is so narrow that we are distracted from their objective and resent the grim duty of gaining salvation that awaits us on the high plain.

In theory the performance is of great interest, for literature is involved—as it has always been—in the larger movement. Two critics, R. P. Blackmur and Granville Hicks, know where they are going, yet both are moving away from the very medium that has given them an excuse for being. I mean literature itself, not the theory of art for art’s sake. Their conception of a critic’s part in controversy is one that separates them from their craft: critic is set against writer; writer against critic; and the controversy mounts in flames. Both are products of an academic revival which made itself known at the beginning of this decade, and each is the enemy of the other. What is more, they represent tendencies in contemporary criticism that either transcend or fall below their faults and virtues.

Since Mr. Blackmur is less obvious in his statement of a position, let me quote him first. In the spring of 1930, reviewing I. A. Richards’s “Practical Criticism,” he wrote:

For the rest, after you have read a poem, you must then learn how either to discard it as bad or choose it to be a part of yourself as good. You have only to remember, before the act of choice, that the reading of a good poem is a discipline only less arduous than its writing.

We are to learn first how to read; but note how difficult Mr. Blackmur makes the task, how drearily the classroom windows close around us. We are not to participate (as I believe Mr. Richards urges us to do) but to learn painfully a special method, and there is always the fear of falling asleep before we are done with the first lesson. Mr. Blackmur says: “Such a beginning would be mainly occupied with the collection of data and the discussion of words.”

If I understand Mr. Blackmur correctly, his purpose is to perform an operation on a poem. The patient is stretched full-length upon the table (he need not be a butterfly on a wheel). The skilful antagonist, the surgeon, makes a well-timed incision and draws forth an entrail. Meanwhile the reasons for the patient’s existence are no longer clear. We learn that he once had a lung, a heart, a bladder, and if we care to examine them, we are permitted to see and perhaps touch each vital organ as it drops into a pail. We conclude that the operation was successful but the patient is dead. The surgeon, eager to answer questions from internes, concludes that the creature died of an ulcerated tooth. Traces of bile were found in the blood, and we are assured that the analysis which followed the patient’s death has met the approval of scientific order.

I agree with Mr. Blackmur that there can be but few flaws in his method of classroom procedure, and we are to remember that the title of Mr. Richards’s book is “Practical Criticism,” but let us hear what Mr. Blackmur has to say of Ezra Pound in the winter, 1934, issue of Hound and Horn. The essay is of some length and one must draw a long breath in quoting the following conclusion:

If the uses of language include expression, communication, and the clear exhibition of ideas, Mr. Pound is everywhere a master of his medium so long as the matter in hand is not his own, is translation or paraphrase; everywhere else, whether in putting his translations together or in original material, the language has an air of solipsism and bewildered intent.

What Mr. Blackmur is trying to say is not entirely unclear: briefly, that Mr. Pound’s adaptations from other literatures are better than his original work. The conclusion, however sincere, is not completely satisfactory. Doubts, rather serious doubts, remain to trouble those who have read Pound’s excellent Mauberley poems. The muse of pedagogy is a strange creature and her vision is strained from overwork. The lady is conscientious but myopic. She sees one word, then another, but never more than one word at a time. In “Homage to Propertius” she notes that Pound’s Americanism leaps out from a dull Roman background and that an entire page of poetry is transformed by the word “frigidaire.” Those of us who are interested in literature—and incidentally Ezra Pound—suddenly feel bored, cheated, and slightly out of temper. We feel that we are entitled to something better than a long-winded recital of a process that should have taken place in the critic's mind before he sat down to a typewriter. The classroom windows close again and the reader's mind wanders: Is it snowing outside? Is the lake frozen? Perhaps it is better to grant that Pound is an important poet and then not read him at all.

In contrast to Mr. Blackmur's study we have Granville Hicks's review of American literature since the Civil War. Frankly enough the book is an interpretation, an experiment in Marxian analysis that is now certain to meet with more than a mere casual response. We grant its superiority over Upton Sinclair's "Mammonart," and skimming the pages, we find interest in its plot and its grasp of form. It is neither as verbose nor as awkward as Calverton's study which preceded it; the prospect is stimulating, for the mood of the book is of this hour, and one finds recognition in an expression of discontent with the existing order. The slender framework of historical commentary which binds the book together makes an attractive pattern. We are prepared to agree with Mr. Hicks, are prejudiced in his favor. Yet on page 8 the plan so clearly laid before us becomes incredible.

Melville's problem was real enough, but the terms in which he stated it were irrelevant. This explains in part why "Moby Dick," with all its virtues, is not comparable to the great metaphysical epics of the past, which have made room for all the principal varieties of experience in their eras.

First one wonders what metaphysical epics Mr. Hicks has in mind. Are they Milton's "Paradise Lost" or the "Divine Comedy"? Or in prose is it "Don Quixote"? None seems to fit the definition. Then one travels back to the word "irrelevant" and one begins to believe that Mr. Hicks is in a rush to get "Moby Dick" out of the way. Surely the instrument that Mr. Hicks employs should be made to function here, should be made flexible enough to reveal some aspect of "Moby Dick" that is relevant to the period in which it was written, to the half-century after the Civil War, to our own day. As in the case of Mr. Blackmur one becomes conscious of a steel-riveted formula at work which might well be a small machine the size of a pencil sharpener, to be used before the actual process of criticism is set in motion.

Conscious that Mr. Hicks is preparing an event, one apologizes for the first two chapters of his book. He has much ground to cover in the period preceding and during the Civil War. Then we come to an extended, reasonable, and often just appraisal of William Dean Howells. Until we remember the becalmed, flat surfaces of Howells's prose and recall his profound lack of dramatic instinct, we are half-convinced that Mr. Hicks has made a genuine discovery that merits the first full-length portrait in the book. Are we to believe that Howells's failure to understand the economic forces that aroused his interest is "the principal explanation of Howells's inability to make us feel he is a master"? May I suggest that Howells's failure to dramatize those forces effectively lies somewhat closer to the cause of his failure as a novelist? May I suggest that Dickens, who had perhaps less insight into those forces than Howells, had greater talents as a writer, and was therefore able to make us see and feel the terrifying poverty in the London of his day?

Meanwhile the same blunt instrument that shielded

Howells's dulness pursues Henry James's retreating figure across the Atlantic, then home for a brief visit, and at last hammers him into a grave on British soil. Appended to this is a nervous commentary on Emily Dickinson, concluding with this paragraph:

As Henry James somehow complements Howells, so that, as Emerson once said of Hawthorne and Alcott, the two of them might make one real man, so Emily Dickinson complements Walt Whitman, and the two of them, one feels, might make one poet. Where Whitman was merely expansive Emily Dickinson was intensive, but where she was narrow he was broad. And though she did what she set out to do more effectively than he, just as James wrought more finely than Howells, the future was not with her, nor with James, but with Howells and Whitman. As one weighs the faults and the merits on both sides, one sighs with Emerson, "So many promising youths and never a finished man!"

I would give my right hand to see that poet who is recreated from the head of Emily Dickinson and the clay feet of gray-bearded Whitman, and I would walk far to see the strange composite of James and Howells. I realize that this may seem unfair to Mr. Hicks, but we have only to translate his words into aesthetic terms and a curious hybrid wheels across the page. We are already fast in unbelief of Mr. Hicks's wholly tenable thesis, for I am sure that no Marxian should fear to state boldly his liking for Henry James, an admiration for Shakespeare, an appreciation for Poe—whose influence Mr. Hicks fails to mention. I would say the best is none too good for him.

Other critics, less sympathetic than I to Mr. Hicks's central thesis, have spoken of his short temper as he approaches contemporary literature, of his Indian dance over the deflated reputations of Cabell, Hergesheimer, and Thornton Wilder. Mr. Blackmur believes harsh things of Marxian analysis and using Mr. Hicks as his text says: "That is heresy within heresy; and it would be nothing but privation to follow him."

Even at this the quarrel is not so much a question of critical insight into literature as a disagreement over opposing dogmas. And Mr. Hicks is no less severe with Mr. Blackmur when he writes that his method "resembles the impassioned quibbling of devotees of some game." One can expect no quarter from either camp. I think it is clear that both objectives have already traveled far from literary relevance and that the instruments used by both men are blunted through prolonged abuse.

How, then, can we resolve their problem? Not by reconciliation, for the cleavage is clean, and it is better to have the ground for disagreement clear. I believe, however, that a real solution has always existed; and among the "few channels of communication with the outer world" there still remains the same set of values for critic and poet. If this is platitude I am willing to admit it, but conviction in writing is more than the discovery of a tenable thesis. If it is not, how can we account for the effectiveness of Michael Gold's attack on Thornton Wilder? Mr. Gold's critical logic was bad, so bad that a schoolboy could discover its flaws. A schoolboy could discover that Mr. Gold, like many another who shares his convictions, had gone off the track and left literary criticism far behind. But he would see that Michael Gold had an ability not unlike that of his master, Charles Dickens. He could project a memorable image of a social class and make us believe it existed; and in the case of Thornton Wilder, this is exactly what Mr. Gold did. He made him fit into a special kind of society. It was an act of creation, and we are not concerned here as to how Wilder managed to fall within Mr. Gold's design. The point is that Wilder was thrust into the picture that his creator saw and the image was not soon forgotten. Suddenly this young and popular novelist became another Steerforth, seductive, ridiculous, and a warning to other aspiring young novelists. In short, one of the properties of criticism is imagination, and using this property alone, Mr. Gold succeeded where others failed. He spoke as one writer to another and spoke eloquently and well. I think we will remember Mr. Gold's Wilder as long as "The Bridge of San Luis Rey" remains on our bookshelves. In reading T. S. Eliot's critical essays I am aware that his standards are by no means as consistent, as well-rounded as those in Mr. Blackmur's laboratory. But I am certain that his concern for religious verities in criticism has never overshadowed his position as a writer.

The absolute that Mr. Hicks and Mr. Blackmur seek has been removed by them into a far distance down a narrow road, and again remembering Santayana, "we need not wonder that we grope for light."

The Usable Past

IN Oscar Wilde's day it was still being said that America had no past. Two generations later Van Wyck Brooks was compelled to realize that we were at least two hundred years old, and he varied the complaint. What we lacked, he said, was a usable past, and with brilliant effect he set about to make one for us. Today the trouble seems to be that we have too many pasts and that the proponents of one will have nothing to do with the others.

The first of these pasts is the past so successfully exploited by Lewisohn, Mencken, and Carl Van Doren. In it we observe the American artist gradually freeing himself from the limitations of puritanism and winning in the process a richer life of both thought and feeling. The other—more recently discovered—is the past of Granville Hicks and V. F. Calverton. To them, of course, the villain is not the grim shadow of the Puritan but that coarser brute now generally known as the Spirit of Capitalism, and the meaning of our past is to be found not in the escape from conformity but in the gradual awakening of the social sense. Our progress was slow and uncertain because we were groping in the dark like pagans still ignorant of the Gospel, but Karl Marx was a new Hound of Heaven whom we could not forever elude. Though even today there are still some who flee him "down the nights and down the days," we wist not to evade as he to pursue, and with the relentlessness of the Savior he sings his fierce yet loving song, "All things betray thee who betrayest Me."

Obviously these two pasts are not to be entirely reconciled. The rebel hero of the one is almost Byronic in his individualism; the rebel hero of the other is only a rebel pro tem, and really, though unconsciously, eager to submit his will to the dictatorship of the proletariat. Yet the curious fact remains that Mr. Lewisohn and Mr. Hicks, for example, choose much the same figures to serve as protagonists. Not only can the rise of realism be favorably interpreted in terms of either's thesis, but the two canons are so nearly identical that the list of the American classics remains much the same no matter who draws it up. William Dean Howells cannot hope for more than grudging praise and Emerson is a great man of his day no matter which past he belongs to. Nor can one well help observing that both schools have a good deal of explaining to do when it comes to fitting the unavoidable names into the prearranged pattern, or that some of our great writers lie very uncomfortably in either of the Procrustean beds into which the philosophical historians are compelled to fit them by the process of lopping off or stretching out.

Consider, for example, the case of Thoreau. He was, goodness knows, troublesome enough to the anti-puritans. Though he scorned the church and scorned respectability, there is no concealing the fact that in the crucial matter of sex he was benighted enough. Fortunately he was sufficiently squeamish not to say very much on the subject, but what he did say must seem highly unfortunate to those who would praise him as an apostle of liberty—since this rebel against all other accepted ideas was as prim as a New England spinster in his attitude toward "our baser nature." Yet it can hardly be denied that it is almost equally difficult to present as an apostle of communal living the man who retired to Walden Pond in order that he might be more completely alone. Mr. Hicks, to be sure, labors manfully over the difficulty. He says that the conditions of the time made it necessary that the tendency toward cooperation should manifest itself as extreme individualism, but even after inventing this splendid paradox he prefers to pass over in silence some of his hero's less explainable opinions, and we are left in the dark so far as other obscurities are concerned. We are not, as I remember, told how it can be that even a mere forerunner of communism, even a man whose social sense was able to express itself as anti-social detachment, could have happened to say as he did: "I came into this world, not chiefly to make this a good place to live in, but to live in it, be it good or bad."

To one who confesses himself unashamedly skeptical and frankly eclectic it may possibly occur that neither the system of the anti-puritan nor the system of the Communist is more than a convenient fiction, and that a "usable past" is not something which is discovered but something which is created—chiefly for the purpose of enriching or serving the present. The historian, like the novelist, has certain data at his disposal, and it makes very little difference that the data of the one are supplied by observation and the data of the other by study. His task is to arrange them into a coherent, meaningful pattern, and the result is commonly judged in accordance with the answer we get to two questions: How completely does it convince and how agreeable does it seem to our prejudices and our desires? Moreover, it would be well to remember also that the faith which the historian inspires is not entirely different from that "poetic faith" which is recognized as appropriate to the poem or the novel. The best history, like the best fiction, is probably only very imperfectly true. It is only uncommonly convincing.

Until recently called in question, the past of the anti-puritan was the orthodox one. I happen to believe also that it has the advantage of being less cut and dried, that it seems to encourage for the future a greater variety of attitudes and sensibilities. But of course tomorrow will have none of it if tomorrow turns out to be dominated by "proletarian" thought. The past we believe in is the past which justifies today, and the great writers will inevitably be popularly interpreted in the fashion which makes them seem most convincing as forerunners and prophets. The nineteenth century succeeded in making Shakespeare a Victorian, and the twentieth will have no difficulty in turning Thoreau into a Marxian manqué—if that is what it wants. History, as I am not the first to remark, is written by the survivors.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Books

Artful Autobiography

The Well of Days. By Ivan Bunin. Translated from the Russian by Gleb Struve and Hamish Miles. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

THIS is the first book by Bunin to be published in America since the award to him of the Nobel prize for literature. It appears also to be the opening volume in a series which under the guise of another name, Alexey Alexandrovich Arseniev, will be Bunin's autobiography. Add to this that Bunin is little known in America although he enjoys a certain fame as the author of "The Gentleman from San Francisco," that he is an exile from revolutionary Russia, and that he here attempts a literary form in which his countrymen have conspicuously excelled, and one has every reason to read him with unmitigated curiosity.

He is not half as interesting as he ought to be. Nobel to the contrary, he has a strange, an almost tantalizing lack of strength, though he writes, as they say, beautifully. He writes, that is, with everything needful to him save the power of moving and convincing; so that it begins to seem almost unfair, as one reads on through these pastel pages, to remember that autobiographies have been written in Russian by Tolstoy, Aksakov, and Gorki. Such names annihilate a man of whom the best one can say is that in the original he must possess a very fine style indeed—fine, and therefore untranslatable.

But there must be another reason than his exquisite prose for the failure of the present volume to do what might reasonably have been expected of it, and my guess is this. Bunin has been too conscious of the autobiography as a literary form. His mind, running in fact wholly to form, has invented all sorts of irrelevant and intrusive "beauties" which get in the way of our believing that this is the story of a specific Russian boy who grew up on a specific estate. He has drawn his life—or Alexey's—in delicate outlines, and those outlines are never burst through or obliterated by the pressure of some unconscious truth struggling to express itself. Suavely he makes his first sketch, smilingly he deliberates as to how he shall adorn it here and there, and imperturbably he goes on to shade it in with just the right details. The temptation then is to say that he has used too much art. But actually he has used too little. Art in an autobiographer consists in his seeming to forget all art; Bunin seems to remember nothing else. Certainly he has only the thinnest of minor tales to tell—of a sensitive boy who grew up wondering what the world was about and never, at least by the end of volume one when he is sixteen years old, finding out anything more than that he wants to be a poet, that revolutionary groups are full of shoddy and eccentric people, and that a Grand Duke may have a small, pointed red beard which curls "firmly and beautifully."

Bunin makes it clear in his later pages that he was not the kind of young man who could stomach revolution. Nor need he have been; but he also makes it clear, without of course knowing it, how little energy there was in the artist who turned aside. There was not enough at any rate for him to be able to compose, decades later in Paris, an autobiography which would be anything better than a piece of nostalgic prettiness.

MARK VAN DOREN

Chesterton Introduces Aquinas

Saint Thomas Aquinas. By G. K. Chesterton. Sheed and Ward. $2.

AT the beginning and repeatedly in the course of this short book, prepared "for those who have hardly even heard of St. Thomas Aquinas," Mr. Chesterton protests that so great a subject can scarcely be touched in such brief scope. Consequently, in good Chestertonian fashion, he writes a book which covers everything else as well as Aquinas: Saint Francis and Saint Dominic, Frederick II, Luther, Macaulay, Napoleon, Huxley, Shaw, Wells, and Dean Inge. Indeed, Mr. Chesterton's subject is rather more the present time than the thirteenth century, and yet it would be difficult to think of a source from which a reader who has little knowledge of medieval thought and no sympathy for it could learn to appreciate more quickly the significance of such major movements of that time as the reintroduction of the Aristotelian writings into Europe, the Averroistic controversy, the Manichean heresy. It is true that for all his awakened sympathy the reader would find on examination that he had little precise information from this book concerning the career or ideas of St. Thomas, but he would be wise none the less to approach more learned works through this introduction.

Though Mr. Chesterton protests he is no philosopher, theologian, or scholar, the scholars of the last fifty years who have revived learned interest in the thought of the Middle Ages have placed in his hands the materials for a philosophic and theological apology. The reader who has long heard that the Renaissance broke the bonds of the Middle Ages and discovered Freedom and Reason, Nature and Man, may now learn that the Renaissance is more rightly called a Relapse, that it was an abnegation of reason and common sense, that it was morbid and pessimistic, unscientific, impractical, and authority-ridden. He may learn further that "the great intellectual tradition that comes down to us from Pythagoras and Plato was never interrupted or lost through such trifles as the sack of Rome, the triumph of Attila, or all the barbarian invasions of the Dark Ages," although it was lost after the introduction of printing, the discovery of America, the founding of the Royal Society, and after the enlightenment of the Renaissance and the Modern World. It is even hard to tell whether the point of view is a new one, so good a case does Mr. Chesterton make for his contentions.

Among so many paradoxes, the book itself is the paradox of paradoxes, for the plea which it makes for the wisdom of Thomas is very modern. Mr. Chesterton points out that philosophies since the sixteenth century have started with paradoxes, trusting little to the arguments of reason or the testimony of common sense. He himself is full of devices by which to prepare the mind for the true philosophy, but his persuasion is by parable rather than by argument. Thomas Aquinas required but few pages to develop the specific philosophic arguments that have entered into Mr. Chesterton's 250 pages, and even St. Thomas's simplest arguments have been simplified. To draw attention to the better method and problems of Thomas, Mr. Chesterton uses his modern method on modern problems. It is doubtless justification of his devices that his presentation of Aquinas is sharp and true, though pedantic objection could be raised concerning the accuracy of many of his details, when they are indicated clearly enough to be open to objection. Mr. Chesterton has found a field in which his paradoxes are truer and more effective introduction to a philosophy than are the sober accuracies of scholars.

RICHARD McKEON

For Thy Stomach's Sake

Wines: Their Selection, Care and Service. By Julian Street. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

Wining and Dining with Rhyme and Reason. By D. T. Carlisle and Elizabeth Dunn. Minton, Balch and Company. $1.50.

Bacchus Behave! The Lost Age of Polite Drinking. By Alma Whitaker. Frederick A. Stokes Company. $1.25.

American Wines and How to Make Them. By Philip M. Wagner. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

Notes on a Cellar-Book. By George Saintsbury. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

A CERTAIN melancholy hangs about all these books, save only Mr. Saintsbury's. They are monuments to the fact that a generation has grown up in America which knows no wines save dago red and cider-pop champagne, and not much about them. Thus they must be very elementary. The authors of the first three, for example, explain politely that Rhine-wine bottles have long necks, that it is not sanitary to drink red Burgundy with fish, that wine does not go well with mustard or vinegar (say in hors d'oeuvres or a salad), that it is better not to smoke cigarettes between courses, and that Château Yquem is usually too sweet to be taken with baked beans. They add that it is a bad idea to shake a wine bottle before serving, and that, with an ample supply now assured, most connoisseurs prefer that their glasses be not filled to the brim.

This pedagogy is needed, and deserves applause. A few of the more enlightened dealers in wines seem to be trying to supplement it, but not many. The exchanges that go on in most of the new emporia between untutored customers and even less tutored attendants are really appalling. I was present lately in the great city of New York when one such attendant sold a woman a bottle of very dubious-looking Pontet-Canet as Burgundy! In another place I applied for a bottle of Tokay, and specified that it should be as nearly dry as possible. When I got it home it turned out to be as sweet as a sugar-teat. In Baltimore I actually encountered a female wine clerk who entertained the theory, as it appeared on cross-examination, that dry meant not-wet. Just how she visualized a wine that was not wet I do not know, but such was her notion.

Such professional incompetence, of course, is common in America. It is rare to discover a store whose staff knows the stock. There seems to be a general feeling among counter-jumpers that such knowledge is infra dig., and that any patron who looks for it is anti-social. But in the retail wine trade it must be somehow developed, else the great majority of Americans will conclude that wine-bibbing is overrated, and only a vanity and agony. Such books as those under notice (aided, perhaps, by hints from the more civilized pastors and college professors) raise expectations which the trade, with a few brilliant exceptions, fails to meet. Let its heads look more to the noses and I. Q.'s of its shock troopers, and less to their salesmanship. What is needed is an ample supply of wine clerks who know wine by the actual taste, and have an informed and elegant passion for it.

Mr. Street's book is probably the most useful of the present lot. It goes into elemental details without being patronizing, and exudes a contagious delight in the sacrament of the grape. It describes the provenance and character of the world's salient wines, offers excellent hints on their storage and serving, and concludes with some good lay-outs of luncheons and dinners. Moreover, there is an ample index, which will be a great comfort to the student. The Whitaker and Carlisle-Dunn books are rather more sketchy, but both have merit. Miss Whitaker devotes relatively little space to wine: the rest of her discourse is of lesser beverages. She adds some shrewd advice to both guests and hosts, and pleads eloquently for an abandonment of the barbaric drinking customs which grew up under prohibition.

Mr. Wagner believes that the United States, in the course of time, should produce first-rate wines of its own, and in support of that belief he presents a great mass of erudite and unfamiliar evidence. We have, he shows, many native grapes that are full of pleasant possibilities, and in addition all the principal European stocks are being naturalized. He addresses himself principally, not to the professional vintner, but to the amateur. There is no reason why that amateur, if careful and intelligent, should not make potable wines. The process, though it has its delicacies, is at bottom quite simple, and the equipment needed is not expensive. There was a time when all the hillsides of the United States, at least between the thirty-fifth and forty-fifth parallels, promised to bloom with grapes, but unwise taxation and other legislative follies made them bare. Now, at last, there is some chance that they may blossom again.

Mr. Saintsbury's "Notes on a Cellar-Book" was first published in 1920, when the author was seventy-five. It is an amusing and mellow tome, and promises to outlast all the author's contributions to the science of literary criticism. The present reprint has a brief and unnecessary preface by Owen Wister. Poor Saintsbury, alas, is now an angel.

H. L. MENCKEN

A Monument to Paris

Passion's Pilgrims. By Jules Romains. Translated by Warre B. Wells. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

WITH this volume, containing Books III and IV of the French edition, the American translator finishes the first thousand pages or so of the monumental novel which Jules Romains is writing under the general title "Men of Good Will." In the four "books" now available in English the author has laid the foundations of a literary structure of whose eventual dimensions he tells us only that they will be "considerable." The subject of his work is "life in the twentieth century, our own life as modern men"; the whole will form "one single novel" with "no central character" and no link of relationship between most of the characters; the period is October, 1908, to the present, and we have thus far got only through the closing quarter of the year 1908.

If you have read the first volume of Mr. Knopf's sturdy edition, you have already met the characters who appear in (ugh!) "Passion's Pilgrims." You are acquainted with two families whose names bear the nobiliary particle "de": the Champcenais and the Saint-Papouls. You know that Jerphanion and Jallez are two students in that cradle of French intellectual eminence, the Ecole Normale Supérieure de Paris. (I shall forever curse the translator for calling these Normaliens "collegers": first, because to be a Normalien is really to be something; but also a little because "colleger" is English only when it designates one of the foundation scholars at Eton.)

You have followed the bookbinder, Quinette, on his tortuous path to murder and his more curious route into the service of the police. You have met Clanricard, Laulerque, and others at one of Sampeyre's Wednesday evenings of socialism. You have watched the forceful Haverkamp set up shop as real-estate broker. You have learned by what chance the boy Wazemmes was drawn into Haverkamp's employ and jerked into the arms of Rita, the Lady in the Bus. You have overheard Gurau, the honorable member of the Chamber of Deputies, explaining to his mistress, Germaine Baader, that he was about to launch an attack in the Chamber on the oil trust and that he was in touch with Sammécaud, one of its leaders and a partner of Monsieur de Champcenais; and you have listened while Sammécaud made a declaration of love to his partner's wife.

Well, the succeeding volume deals with pretty much these same people, probing yet deeper into their natures and recounting the progress they make and the disappointments they meet in their struggle toward the fulfilment of their desires. Childhood's Loves the translator calls the first half of this volume, and Eros in Paris the second. (Could one have a worse ear?) What a new view of love in France this instalment will give to American readers! Of seven newly met pairs of lovers, only one—the slimy Quinette and his whimpering cashier—lie together. Jallez and his refound Juliette, Jerphanion and his midinette, Sammécaud and Marie de Champcenais, Allory and his female novelist, the young pimp and little Isabelle Maillecottin, Riccoboni and Germaine Baader—none of these encounters has yet yielded a moment of ecstasy. And who will believe me when I say that there exist two French students of twenty-one years who are virgins; that Sammécaud, a great French business man, does not know how to go about persuading a lady; that Madame de Champcenais, a Parisienne and a femme du monde, stammers and blushes and is not to be had in the course of two separate rendezvous; and that Allory, a critic, a novelist, to outward seeming a man of the world, is mistrustful of his skill at courtship?

It seems right to say, even at this point in Romain's progress, that, considered apart from its merit as a work of art, considered merely as a book about the French, "Men of Good Will" is the most instructive composition that exists on the Frenchman of the Third Republic. It does not yet include such figures as that smug and petulant xenophobe, M. Abel Hermant of the French Academy; or that affable and vigorous I-know-all-about-your-non-French-world M. Pierre Mille (who would really be happier as an Englishman lording it over the empire); or of the pansy aesthetes who in 1908 were still ravished by Reynaldo Hahn's music and Madeleine Lemaire's rose-decorated furniture. I dare prophesy that these last will not figure even in future volumes, for they are not, I should say, of Romain's concern. But as a book about the French, if "Men of Good Will" is compared with, say, any of Gide's novels, any of Morand's stories, what I mean will immediately become clear. France is guided and governed by the middle classes and the instructed offspring of peasants, workers, and petty civil servants; and it is about these that Romain writes.

It seems to me especially from this point of view that the novel is passionately absorbing. It is true that Romain writes of individuals, writes of them from the inside—half this volume is filled with "interior monologue"—brings them to life with an immediacy of vision, sets them going with a promptness of self-impulsion truly astonishing. Not for one moment is the reader impelled to say, "She wouldn't have done that. . . . He wouldn't have thought that. . . . This would not have happened so." These men and women and children whom Romain has brought into being we believe in because they cannot be otherwise. At the same time what grips us is the world of those people, more than the people themselves. Each by each, the several intrigues, whether of love or business, and granted the immense skill and vitality of the author, are not always a matter for surprise. Some new light they do cast upon the life of the individual (as always in a history of failure or of unhappiness, we "recognize" ourselves in the awkward blunderings through life of each of these characters, proving them all to have been detached by Romain from himself, and himself to be of our very stuff). But upon the life of Paris, the life even of a given moment in the history of European man, a most penetrating light is shed.

That this volume deals with love and with a rich variety of human nature, I have already said. But consider what else is here, all of it absorbingly related: the details of the affairs of a trust as well as of a small real-estate business; two clandestine meetings of Socialists to hear a report on socialism in France, Germany, and Italy; the internal life of a great school; the career of a parliamentarian; the domestic life of moderately well-to-do nobility; an evening at the celebrated literary cafe, the Closerie des Lilas; an admirable analysis of Baudelaire; a vicious portrait of a literary critic, painted against the background of his domestic existence; a smart (upper middle class) dinner party; a political rally with the prodigious Jaurès as speaker; an afternoon of a dog; and—such pages on the aspects, the variety, the bustle of the streets of Paris, the carters and *bistrot*s and petty shopkeepers and in general the whole out-of-doors population of Paris, as never until now have been written.

How French, how Parisian, how normalien this book is! It is not only Jallez and Jerphanion who are Normaliens: Haverkamp, setting himself up in business, plans and reflects as an archicube might do, as any son of Descartes might do; the German Socialist, Michels, is dyed with the same stain; the little dog, Macaire, on his afternoon out, felt about the varied temptations of the smells of Paris that "they produced a kind of terror of an intellectual order," and he enjoyed most in his stroll "the element of moderation and regularity there was in the adventure." The very socialism of these Socialists is profoundly French in its exclusively political concern, its concentrated fear of war and total freedom from preoccupation with the economic man. Even the analysis of the moods, visions, and reflections induced by unassuaged physical desire, although conducted with exquisite tenderness and melancholy reminiscence, is marked by the specific Cartesianism of the French mental process. Indeed, American readers might for this same reason like less than they should the great lyrical episode of the book, the idyl of Jallez and Hélène, told retrospectively by Jallez to his friend Jerphanion and told mainly out of doors, in the spirited streets and brightly moist light of a Paris autumn, told in fragments on different occasions so that it runs like a gentle small wind of idealism through the city and the narrative, told with such heart-warming veracity and simplicity that it shines through even this excessively faithful translation.

In a novel of such consequence the translation demands more than ordinary scrutiny. Myself an old stager (retired), I know very well the pitfalls and difficulties of a job like this, and have every professional sympathy: the only "perfect" translations are completely free translations. Warre B. Wells has chosen deliberately to cleave to his text, even to the grammar and syntax, the turns of phrase, the very adjectives employed in the original. I happen to believe that even when one knows French intimately this is a mistake: to translate, for example, rien de tout ça by "nothing of all that," or sonorité de cailloux (meaning plangent) by "sonority of shingle," is simply to write not-English. To my mind the cardinal requisite of a translator is not that he shall know, say, French; if he possesses a broad general culture and can consult a friend or two, a smattering of French will suffice. What is most important is that he take pleasure in writing English, and that a fusion of sensibility and judgment be present to warn him to drop his text when it gets in the way of his English. And if he will write by ear rather than by eye, so to say, he will find his sentences more fluent, his adjectives more fitting, his epithets—the bane of the translator—more forceful and colloquial than they would otherwise be.

The number of actual errors in the present translation is considerable but not unusual. There are a few slips of the pen, the most curious being the use of "Friday" for Thursday twice on page 434.

LEWIS GALANTIERE

Young Veteran of the Theater

At 33. By Eva Le Gallienne. Longmans, Green and Company. $3.50.

FOR many good reasons Eva Le Gallienne has not chosen to follow the example of most actors and wait until the twilight years of her career before writing her autobiography. She has crowded a lifetime of accomplishment into the thirty-three years she covers in her memoirs. And with a vitality that has characterized both her living and her doing, this Little Corporal of the Civic Repertory Theater has set about the task of recording her experiences as a woman and an actress-manager in the fast-moving pages of "At 33."

It is an immensely readable narrative that Miss Le Gallienne has written. If one looks in vain through it for analyses of acting such as are scattered through Colley Cibber's "Apology," or for the flavorsome record of a period such as gave special value to Joseph Jefferson's "Autobiography" and Otis Skinner's "Footlights and Spotlights," or for such profound discussions of first principles as illumined Stanislavsky's "My Life in Art," it must be admitted at once that Miss Le Gallienne's chapters have their decided virtues. They are written with an unction that proves contagious. They are modest, humorous, and honest. They bespeak the cultivation of her mind, the bravery of her spirit, and succeed in capturing vividly the excitement of the long series of theatrical events in which she has played a part and the quality of the various people (Duse, Bernhardt, Constance Collier, Elsie Janis, and the rest) who have figured in her career.

Miss Le Gallienne was a child of three or four when she made her "first violent assertion" that the theater was to be her life. She had been taken to see "The Water Babies" at a matinee, and that night she tearfully announced to her mother that she wanted to be a water baby, that she must be a water baby, that she would be a water baby. As a girl living in Paris she saw Bernhardt in "Sleeping Beauty," and some years later was taken back to meet her after a performance of "Jeanne Dore." When Bernhardt bestowed a rouged kiss upon her, Miss Le Gallienne treasured it so greatly that for several days she refused to wash her face. At fifteen she borrowed a volume of Bernhardt's "Memoirs" and was so enthralled by it that she made a copy of each of its 800 pages in her own vigorous hand; a copy, incidentally, which Sarah one day saw and autographed.

It was while she was visiting the Favershams in England that Constance Collier gave her her first encouragement and told Mrs. Le Gallienne her daughter was old enough to act. She began as an extra in Miss Collier's production of "Monna Vanna," studied at Tree's Academy, made a hit as a cockney slavey in "The Laughter of the Fools," and next determined to try her luck in America.

The theater being what it is, this young Englishwoman found herself cast as a colored maid for her first appearance in New York, and was for a time refused a cockney role because an American manager thought her accent—which had delighted London—was "unconvincing." She appeared for a while with Elsie Janis and her gang; spent two seasons touring with Ethel Barrymore; made a hit in "Not So Long Ago"; achieved stardom in "Liliom" and "The Swan"; insisted upon giving special matinees in the middle of her long runs; acted in French with Madame Simone for a few performances; came under the spell of Duse's art and personality; lived to see the humorous aspects of her production, with Norman-Bel Geddes, of Mercedes de Acosta's "Jehanne d'Arc" in Paris; inaugurated her Ibsen matinees; and finally, in spite of the headshaking of all the Broadway wiseacres, launched upon her gallant adventure in Fourteenth Street.

It is a full, tireless, and valuable life that Miss Le Gallienne has led, and she has recorded it with a spirit worthy of her living. To few people of thirty-three has the theater owed as much. She has believed in it as more than a commercial gamble, sought to give it the importance in the community that is granted to the libraries and the museums, and has succeeded in making it the better by her leadership, her talents, and her energy.

JOHN MASON BROWN

The Failure of Victorianism

The Victorian Aftermath. By Esmé Wingfield-Stratford. William Morrow and Company. $3.50.

THE concluding volume of Esmé Wingfield-Stratford's Victorian trilogy can stand alone. Nevertheless, like the last movement of a symphony, it gains greatly in structural significance and artistic poignancy by being considered in relation to the whole. The preceding volumes, "Those Earnest Victorians" and "The Victorian Sunset," gave us the social and spiritual history of nineteenth-century England. In the third volume we have the aftermath of "a century of progress," appropriately so-called, for the Victorians had placed "progress" in the place of God, and for a time progress seemed justified of its worshipers. The four decades of the mid-century were, in the author's opinion, more fruitful than any similar period in history. England was actually better in 1870 than in 1830. Why is it that this date marks a turning-point away from the solid achievements, the arrogant self-belief, of the Victorian culture to a twilight period of fin de siècle uncertainty, to be followed in the twentieth century by the collapse, perhaps final, of Western civilization? For in these volumes England is the microcosm of the West, the classic country of capitalist development.

The author wishes to be judged as "a story-teller first, a philosopher afterwards. The moral should emerge from the tale." As a story-teller he is excellent. These volumes are "as good as a novel," to use a quaint current phrase. The story is not new to us; the old facts, the old faces emerge. Nevertheless, it brings a new excitement, a more intimate revelation, because of the honesty and skill, the pithy awareness of character, the sensitiveness to implicit drama, the sound integration of factual knowledge with social and personal values. The texture and tempo are adjusted with fugue-like flexibility to the varying content. Some of the chapters are magnificent pieces of writing. Such a one is Marcia Funebre which opens this volume, and Speeding Up, which leaves one in an appreciative state of neurotic exhaustion.

The approach to the Victorians is the very opposite of Stracheyan, for the author, while not blind to their faults, on the whole admires them. They were "earnest," priggish, moralistic, arrogant, lacking in taste and self-criticism, true. But in their earnestness were treasures of concentration, of vitality. They worked hard, they got things done. They believed in big things. But they were confronted by changes so swift and shattering in their magnitude and their unforeseeable consequences that they could not change inwardly with sufficient rapidity to keep up with them. "Environment is the Sphinx," and the nineteenth-century Sphinx presented a new problem every decade, a problem to which it was impossible to know the answer.

The author is less interested in the events than in what happened to the minds and souls of the people who in a comparatively short time witnessed these changes of unprecedented complexity, saw everything change around them—their houses, furniture, clothes, transportation, lighting, their social and economic life—their intellectual moorings swept away, all their traditions challenged. Even their immemorial God was changing into something whose very essence was perpetual change, and all these changes took place with a frightful, nerve-shattering acceleration of tempo. After the first chaos produced by the Industrial Revolution, the "hungry forties," came the opulent fifties and sixties. Everything seemed to be going so splendidly; prosperity seemed to be the law of life. A romantic and generous liberalism represented the general climate of opinion—free trade, democratic ideals of freedom, a belief in perfectibility to be brought about by the "good fairy," science and social legislation. But already there was something else too; Carlyle's fascist views and gospel of work for work's sake showed an unconscious despair of anything worth working for. The empire expanded. At first it seemed a romantic dream, which the old Merlin Disraeli had dreamed and realized. Then it became the white man's burden. Then the white men of different nations tried to grab the burden away from one another. Egotism and fear in a civilization whose dominant conditions were an abnormal monotony of work, an abnormal counter-irritant of noise, jazz, and speed, standardization of thought and feeling through the mass suggestion of the press, the cinema, and other advertising agencies manufacturing artificial hatreds, created a world neurosis in which the natural stupidity of mankind rose to fantastic heights. That "the Devil is an ass" is the author's firm belief, for greed and its concomitant fear, on a national scale, have always spelled ultimate disaster for all concerned. After the Franco-Prussian War the fear began to dominate everything else, and a bitter nationalism took the place of the hopeful, even socialistic liberalism which had a brief renaissance in the eighties. Bismarck and not John Bright was to call the tune; or rather Bismarck's epigone successors, who had his ruthlessness without his genius.

This series might be described as the biography of a period. The historic conditions are always implicit and quite sufficiently explicit, but what we get preeminently is the mysterious pathos, puerility, and utter dumbness of individual reactions in the midst of social problems imperfectly understood, though these reactions have of course a different significance in the reader's perspective. In the face of the modern world humanity seems very much like the enthusiastic and bewildered hero of Stendhal's "Chartreuse de Parme" at the battle of Waterloo.

The story is brilliantly told. But what of the philosophy? It consists simply in this. Individualism is dead, but we still think and feel individualistically, and give lip service to a purely personal morality which we do not bother to live up to. The organism that cannot adapt itself to new conditions must die. Man's conquest of nature has ended in the disruption of a whole social system. A new orientation is needed, spiritual and mental. Can it be achieved? At the end all the questions of the Sphinx merge into one great question, which readers will answer for themselves according to their social creeds. Is there enough intelligence, flexibility, and stamina left for this tremendous task in the creature who has bestowed upon himself the proud title Homo sapiens?

CLARA GRUENING STILLMAN

The Permanence of Herbs

A Modern Herbal. By Mrs. M. Grieve. With an Introduction by the Editor, Mrs. C. F. Leyel. Harcourt, Brace and Company. Two Volumes. $10.

Culinary Herbs and Condiments. By M. Grieve. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

THE first English herbal is a Saxon manuscript, the Leech Book of Bald, dating from the tenth century. And when it was written, its lore of herbs was already deep buried in the mists of antiquity. Already marigolds, sunflowers, peonies, violets, and gilly-flowers were common plants in cottage gardens. Already betony, vervain, yarrow, mugwort, and waybread (plantain) were used for their healing properties, and had been so used for more centuries than any historian has yet discovered.

Mrs. Grieve's is certainly the best modern attempt to assemble the ancient lore of herbs. In her noble two-volume list of herbs, their cultivation, history, and properties, with delicate and accurate illustrations, she has provided all that a modern herbalist could ask and much more than the ordinary gardener could use concerning common garden plants. Both as an encyclopedia and as a rich and fascinating account of folk belief and custom, her book will not be excelled for many years. To the scholarly gardener it is indispensable. To the mere reader who cannot boast a garden of his own it will be a source of wonder and delight.

From her own large herb garden and her larger knowledge of the subject Mrs. Grieve has collected the information for her later little book on culinary herbs. Parsley, dill, fennel, anise, caraway, mint, horehound, marjoram, rosemary, sage are here, their appearance, cultivation, and use. Here are facts which are always interesting and may be useful: six pounds of caraway seed make four ounces of the oil used as an ingredient of alcoholic liquors; 400 to 500 pounds of fresh hyssop are required to make a pound of oil; mint, in the fourteenth century, was used for whitening the teeth; imitation absinthe is made from parsley; thyme was used by the Romans to flavor cheese. Here is folklore: by an old superstition, marigolds raised the spirits and cheered the heart; mint drives away mice; a bouquet of rue was placed on the bench of the dock in front of the judge to protect him from the pestilential infection brought from jail into court by the prisoners; "He that would live for aye must eat sage in May"; in Scotland today a dish of caraway seeds is put on the table to dip buttered bread in, and is called "salt-water jelly." Here, finally, is a store of practical uses for these herbs that have for so long been part of our English heritage. Recipes for dill pickles, fennel sauce, mint vinegar, sage tea; directions for making herb wines: balm, coltsfoot, cowslip, dandelion, parsnip; for peppermint cordial, camomile tea, hop bitters, burdock ale, horehound beer; the uses of mustard, pepper, vinegar, and salt. In short, a book to edify, comfort, and cheer. No part-time gardener can read it in winter without severe nostalgic pains which not one herb, but only the care of a dozen, can cure.

Mandrake or mandragora "was fabled to grow under the gallows of murderers, and it was believed to be death to dig up the root, which was said to utter a shriek and terrible groans on being dug up, which none might hear and live. It was held, therefore, that he who would take up a plant or mandrake should tie a dog to it for that purpose, who drawing it out would certainly perish, as the man would have done had he attempted to dig it up in the ordinary manner." For persons for whom information like the above provides an irresistible fascination, I cannot too highly recommend Mrs. Grieve's books.

DOROTHY VAN DOREN

Lucifer Deposed

Art Young's Inferno. A Journey Through Hell Six Hundred Years After Dante. Drawings and Text by Art Young. Delphic Studios. $5.

ON page 99 of "Art Young's Inferno" is a drawing captioned: "If Dante could see it now!" and the Hell he is looking into looks very much like a modern city on earth. Hades, it seems, has been fraught with change by the "capitalist conquest." Dear old Charon himself, who in the old days could call distinguished sinners by their first names, is out of a job, and in his place is Charon II, snappy young captain of the Styx Navigation Company's handsomely equipped, triple-screw, de luxe passenger ship. With a pang of nostalgia we see Charon's old boat now a museum piece.

Art Young, visiting Hell now for the third time since 1892, reports that the idyllic purgatory of Dante and Doré is no more; instead Hades is rocked by the stretching and heaving of the asbestos dollar. Hell, like the rest of the world, is being Americanized. Even the sign over the main entrance which once read, "All hope abandon, ye who enter here!" has been rotarianized to, "You are now entering Hell. Welcome!"

Majestic Lucifer, Prince of Evil and Rebel of Heaven, has been deposed by a scurvy crew of "Big-Business Organizers and Bankers," men of that "most enterprising, ruthless, and super-acquisitive clan" who conspired to bring Hell up to date. I swear by this book, through the astonished eyes of the beloved Art Young Hell-up-to-date is exceedingly hellish. All the former big, bad wolves of capitalism are living there in gluttonous luxury, and regimentation, system, organization, and efficiency multiply beyond all endurance the tortures of the damned. In a grotto devoted to everlasting sighs, we add our sigh for the good old days when a lost soul could lie down on a grill and sizzle in peace.

Turning the pages, I find the drawings I like best are the ones in which Art has drawn himself, pencil and paper in hand, looking on at the demoniac surge as it beats past him, a naive spirit apart. For so he has been here on earth among us, looking open-eyed, wondering, and puzzled at the complexities, the inconsistencies, the injustices of our mad modern world. Holding fast all through his life to the simple vision of a child, he has questioned our acceptances, compromises, evasions; he has chided our loss of faith in the pristine virtues.

There is not one of us who does not get pretty well jangled and tangled in the contemporary mazes, and we love Art for straightening us out again. His homely humor clears the vapors from our minds. His simplicity gets to the quick of things, as when the United States attorney, trying to fasten sedition on him, asked: "Now, Mr. Young, you have told us a good deal about your beliefs in revolution, and that you believe the American Revolution was justified, but Mr. Young, do you believe in the theory of the class struggle?"

Art looked at him blankly, according to Charles Recht, who reports this incident in the Introduction, and then asked very innocently: "Mr. Barnes, do you believe in measles? [Sotto voce] You don't have to believe in measles if you've got them."

In the span of a lifetime Art Young has seen horse-and-buggy virtues and vices streamlined and speeded up to 250 miles per hour, he has witnessed the building of the devil machines and the unleashing of unholy energies more potent than were ever dreamed of by demons or angels. Super-powered, the world careens ahead faster and faster. If we are to believe Art Young's satire, the faster the funnier. Scarcity in an age of scarcity was only tragic, but scarcity in an age of plenty is just plain funny—the plentier the funnier. As funny as Hoover

Oxford Books on World Affairs

PROBLEMS OF PEACE 8th Series

This is the latest of the valuable books of lectures delivered at Geneva Institute of International Affairs. Disarmament, the gold standard, economics, nationalism, etc. are fully discussed. $2.50

THE EXPERIMENT WITH DEMOCRACY IN CENTRAL EUROPE

By Arnold J. Zurcher

A comparative Survey of the Operation of Democratic Government in post-war Germany and in the Russian and Austro-Hungarian succession states. With maps, Index and Bibliography. $2.50

THE SUEZ CANAL ITS PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE

By Sir Arnold Wilson

From the dramatic purchase by Disraeli to the present, the Suez Canal has been the key to important events in Africa and the Near East. Here is its entire history, with a keen analysis of its policy. Maps and plates. $6.00

SOVIET ECONOMIC POLICY IN THE FAR EAST

Turkey, Persia, Afghanistan, Mongolia, Tana Tuva and Sin Kiang.

By Violet Conolly

A scientifically undertaken survey of Soviet trade with the countries on her eastern borders for whom the Soviets have made exceptions, for political or economic reasons, in the State monopoly of Foreign Trade. $2.25

THE WORLD'S CLASSICS

80 cents per volume

Over 400 of the World's best books. In contrast with the transience of modern literature these volumes are enduring—each one a masterpiece. Pocket size, clear type on excellent paper, blue cloth binding, and gilt lettering, 80 cents each. NEW VOLUMES just added are:

SOME PEOPLE by Harold Nicolson

The lighter side of diplomacy, presented with wit and satire by one of England's most brilliant young journalists and authors.

MODERN ENGLISH CRITICAL ESSAYS Chosen by Phyllis M. Jones

An admirable conspectus of critical essays by Virginia Woolf, T. S. Eliot, Lytton Strachey, Robert Bridges, and other leading writers.

THE SPLENDID FAIRING

by Constance Holme

This novel when first published was awarded the Femina Vie-Heureuse Prize. North West England comes alive with her depth of feeling.

Write for catalogue of complete Series

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS

114 FIFTH AVENUE

NEW YORK

in the White House looking for prosperity around the corner, finally laughed out of office. The chorus of laughter grows as the machines multiply. I like to think that Art Young, who has contributed so many laughs to our souls in torment, will yet live to hear the great belly-laugh of America shaking off its bedevilment.

EGMONT ARENS

Men and Machines

A Modern Tragedy. By Phyllis Bentley. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

IN her new novel Phyllis Bentley joins the professors in an attempt to analyze the failure of the present economic system. Looking at the system, she is struck, perhaps naively, by the fact that it has linked the lives of men more closely than they have ever been linked before. Our industrial society is simply a machine of men; if one cog slips, the machine may fall silent. Thereby each individual gains a terrible importance; his slight errors, his moments of weakness, can be enough to wreck the system. In "A Modern Tragedy" Miss Bentley considers the errors and weaknesses which ruined the textile industry in the town of Hudley, Yorkshire. She is convinced that the greater part of human error springs from fear; until men cast out fear, no system can function. Consequently, she provides each member of her cast of characters with a fear of his own.

The most timorous of all is young Walter Haigh, the son of a traveler for Messrs. Lumb, dyers and finishers. Ridden by a feeling of social inferiority, he enters, half innocently, upon a crooked business deal in order to advance himself in society. Though he goes rapidly to the bad, and shows it in conventional fashion by neglecting his dying father, yet he gains a small worldly success, reaching the peak of his achievement with his marriage to a rich young neurotic. But his partner, the villainous Tasker, business rival of the Lumbs, has in the meantime involved the frightened young man in a gigantic swindle. The discovery of the swindle precipitates tragedy: the mill town's industry is paralyzed, a wealthy and honorable spinner commits suicide, and Walter and Tasker are sent to prison.

Miss Bentley's idea is interesting enough, but her presentation of it is too neatly arranged. Her characters fit all too well into their little pigeonholes. Walter is forever well-meaning but weak; Elaine, his wife, forever unsure of herself; and Tasker forever sinister, except in a last-minute courtroom repentance. Miss Bentley has very little knack for individualizing her people; in describing their emotional reactions she is fond of blanket words like "ecstasy" and "pain" and "delirium." Worst of all, her use of coincidence reminds one of Hardy's lesser novels, where it is played upon to the point of absurdity. Here, a fortuitous illness, a power of attorney, and some very apropos bonds start Walter on his questionable career. Indeed, Miss Bentley allows herself to inherit the worst of Hardy—not only "contrived" situations, but style as well. Her writing is ponderous and Victorian, full of exact and meaningless descriptive passages. Occasionally one feels in her an emotional power strong enough to push through the style, as in her account of a striking mill worker's period of unemployment. But in general her story of the life of the town of Hudley is so muffled in its wrapping of words that it seems to have no relation to the modern world. Miss Bentley made an ironical mistake in calling her book "A Modern Tragedy."

MARY MCCARTHY

A review by John Strachey of Ralph Fox's "Lenin" which was announced for this week has been unavoidably delayed. It will appear in an early issue.

Shorter Notices

Jack Robinson. By George Beaton. The Viking Press. $2.50.

Clues to this ingenious first novel lie not only in the meaning of the quotation from "Saison en Enfer" given on the title-page, but also in the fact that a child lives in two worlds, that both of these are real, and that more often than not the two are one and cannot be separated—a fact which Hollywood in its recent production of "Alice" so painfully forgot, but which George Beaton in what he calls a picaresque novel well recognizes. Jack, who tells his own story, runs away from home at fourteen and his lot throws him among panhandlers, prostitutes, and fanatics in the byways, in the ports, and in the slums of England. He is gone ten years, so he says, yet when he returns his mother is just as she had been and is wondering what has become of his new tweed suit. Most of the book is an arresting rogue's tale with sufficient hints of fantasy and allegory mixed with the truth to give it an uncommon originality. What George Beaton has not learned from Rimbaud is that a valid symbol, even in prose, even in such experiences as Jack has with Lily the prostitute, needs no comment, and if properly done demonstrates its own significance and calls for no further exposition. George Beaton writes well enough to make it sufficiently apparent that Jack is passing through adolescence, "now supernaturally grave, more foot-loose and fancy free than the best tramps," now concerned with faith, or social problems, or love, or despair, and that he completes his metamorphosis under his mother's dull, unseeing eye. His book would, however, have been a better one without the interpolations; yet it is as it stands good enough to create anticipation for the author's second.

Beethoven as He Lived. By Richard Specht. Translated by Alfred Kalisch. Harrison Smith and Robert Haas. $3.

This book comes to us from Vienna, highly recommended, the publisher's jacket says, by Thomas Mann and others. It is a little difficult to see why. It admittedly adds little or nothing to what is already known about Beethoven. Its intention as stated by the author in his preface is "to breathe life into the Beethoven of plaster, or if you wish of marble, and make him a living figure." But surely this is an unnecessary service. Thayer's monumental work, Sullivan's penetrating and sympathetic commentary, Ernest Newman's provocative psychological study, to mention only three works in this field, have given us a Beethoven that is very far from being a figure of plaster or marble. "It is the figure not the work," Professor Specht further declares, which engages his attention, and his book is addressed not to the expert but to the common man. Perhaps no biographer ever set before himself such insurmountable obstacles or so completely failed to surmount them. The attempt to consider the figure of any great creative artist apart from his work is inevitably an unprofitable one and of none is this truer than of Beethoven, who was so completely obsessed by and lost in his work. By far the best passages in the book are those in which the author, a scholarly and discerning music critic, departs from his announced intention and writes, however incidentally, of Beethoven's music. The other half of his intention to make Beethoven's figure comprehensible to the common man, he seeks to achieve by an insistent rehashing of all the grotesque details of Beethoven's personal eccentricities—his uncertain temper, his absent-mindedness, his disorder, even his spitting and his neglected personal appearance. Those details have their place in any authentic and well-rounded portrait, but in Professor Specht's undisciplined use of them they overload the great figure of his subject so that the real majesty of its outline is in danger of being lost, in spite of all his gran-diloquent phrases about it. To derive any real understanding of Beethoven from "the call to greatness which this book is meant to voice" the common man must be endowed with rather uncommon qualities of discernment and patience. In seeking to breathe life into the "plaster figure" Professor Specht has succeeded only in making it into something very like an animated cartoon.

Men Against the Sea. By Charles Nordhoff and James Norman Hall. Little, Brown and Company. $2.

The authors, who will be remembered for their previous book on the H. M. S. Bounty mutiny of 1789, speak with the ring of documentary truth as they get the present venture under way: "Never . . . has a captain performed a feat more remarkable than Mr. Bligh's in navigating a small, open, and unarmed boat [a twenty-three-foot launch, carrying eighteen men] a distance of 3,600 miles, through groups of islands inhabited by ferocious savages, and across a vast uncharted ocean." Their groundwork of fact comprises Bligh's actual journal of those incredible forty-seven days, a knowledge of the region covered, and (the whole matter having been very thoroughly canvassed by the Admiralty) a near acquaintance with the men involved. But fact here, whatever its striking nature, is a mere spring-board, for the book easily qualifies as a novel, even a fine one. It has a compactness that was lacking in "Mutiny on the Bounty," and a manner of telling which may speak for itself:

Drenched, half-drowned, gasping for breath . . . we bailed with the desperation of men who feel the water gaining upon them even as they bail; who feel it cover their feet and rise slowly toward their knees. And it was not sea water that we threw over the side. It was the pure sweet water of clouds . . . and we hurled it from us with bailing scoops, cocoanut shells, the copper pot, with our hats, with our cupped hands, lest this precious fluid which Captain Bligh had, rightly, doled out to us a quarter of a pint at a time, should be our death.

Wedding Song. By David Burnham. The Viking Press. $2.50.

The novel of intrigue is back—in a modern version of course, stripped like a functional façade of all ornament, and showing, like architecture, the smooth, hard, anonymous effect of the machine age. Left over from another day are the revengeful son, the heartless dowager, the wronged wife, the maiden all forlorn, and the moral. Part and parcel of the thirties are the international parasites of the Lido-Venice, the gigolo, the victor not by the sword but by the stock market, and the I-can-be-nastier-harder-and-more-calculating-than-thou attitude called sophistication. Unlike his first novel, in which Mr. Burnham showed his schooling by following Mr. Hemingway's precepts mildly and innocuously, this book derives from many masters, and as in many derivations the masters' art is lost and the technique becomes just so many tricks. There is, for instance, conversation by ellipsis and plot by inference and imitation stream-of-consciousness exposition, all competently done, exciting, and artificial. Yet it is a book to be read by anyone who wishes to see how well a new mode becomes an old face and to note a similarity now closer to Dashiell Hammett than to Hemingway.

Swinburne's Literary Career and Fame. By Clyde K. Hyder. Duke University Press. $3.50.

One of the most interesting methods of studying cultural changes is to trace in full and careful detail the reputation of some single author. In many respects Swinburne offers the fullest opportunity for such a study. The reactions to his early work were violent, and there have been many sharp reversals of opinion since he was first judged. Further, he was very conscious of what his poetry signified; he was at war with a

RUSSIA WITH THE OPEN ROAD

Numbers of students, professional people, and civic leaders will spend this summer in Soviet Russia

BECAUSE

American Russian relations are influencing the world.

Soviet Russia is the one foreign country where travel service rates IN DOLLARS have not been increased.

The Open Road offers special services based on years of experience, resident representation, and friendly relations with key individuals and institutions.

Open Road travelers see most in least time at least cost.

Service to groups and those traveling on their own. Details on application.

The OPEN ROAD

(Russian Travel Dept.)

56 West 45th Street New York
Cooperating with Intourist

Whither Latin America

By FRANK TANNENBAUM
$2.00

"Raises questions of serious interest to all students of the social sciences, and it is particularly important for the student of international relations."

From Foreword by James T. Shotwell.

THOS. Y. CROWELL CO.

NEW YORK

The Best
Abridged Dictionary for home, school and office

Webster's Collegiate

A wealth of constantly needed information instantly available. 106,000 entries, hundreds of new words, 1,268 pages, 1,700 illustrations. New Low Prices. Thin-Paper Edition: Cloth, $3.50; Fabrikoid, $5.00; Leather, $7.00; Limp Pigskin, $7.50. At your bookseller's or from the publishers. Free specimen pages on request.

G. & C. MERRIAM CO.
380 Broadway,
Springfield, Mass.

large and important body of English opinion, and his violent journalism in defense of himself and of his views helped to call forth a flood of denunciation, invective, and parody. He stood as a symbol of liberation to many and as a symbol of anarchy and vice to others. And now, it would seem, when he has little enough to say to most people, it is the delight of the academic critics to defend him. Professor Hyder has done a most thorough job of tracing Swinburne's fame; his notes and bibliography are monuments to his industry and erudition. He has, however, drawn almost no conclusions of general interest; his book reads like an excellent catalogue raisonnée. As such, it contains little for the general reader, but it is useful for the student who wants a cross-cutting of nineteenth-century critical opinion and methods.

Art

Impurity in the Modern Museum

IT is hard to tell whether or not Lee Simonson means to be funny in prefacing the catalogue of the exhibition of theater art now at the Museum of Modern Art in New York with the statement that now that "art has been successfully divorced from use, beauty from subject matter, and the aesthetic emotion disentangled from the extraneous emotions that once created heroes, heavens, and hells," the public had better be warned that stage designing has usually been done by people "content to be necessary craftsmen, who rarely needed as an incentive the conviction that they were producing a work of art or contributing to the development of art history."

There are two kinds of artists, he continues, "art-artists"—quoting ex-Mayor Hylan—and plain ordinary working artists. The first produce pure, the second impure art, the taint consisting in usefulness, subject interesting in itself, the effort to decry, convince, or arouse, or any other stowaway in the berth of pure aesthetic exercise and contemplation. "Designs for the theater," he concludes, "are impure art, now known derogatively in aesthetic circles as applied or decorative art, and are produced by much the same process which today gives us buildings or bridges that also express the taste, the temper, and the culture of an epoch."

This mock-apology for filling the four floors of the Modern Museum with sketches for stage sets and costumes is unnecessary and confusing. Simonson knows well enough that there is not enough difference between the psychology of the "art artist" and the "craft-artist" to make half a point in his argument, carried on by a process of subtle clowning, that stage designers are artists too. Picasso, after all, is not responsible for the esoteric nonsense of dilettante connoisseurs, nor can Matisse be made to answer for the titillated patroness who exclaimed (this writer heard her), "Ah, Master, you have done what no other man has achieved before. . . . This is floating art!"

It seems to this writer that the point to be made, which Simonson mentions casually, is that designs for stage sets and costumes are not usually finished works of art. Designers, he says, "were quite unconcerned as to whether or not the original sketch was worth preserving. Indeed, designs for stage settings were as unimportant to the public which created a demand for them as were the architects' plans for the cathedrals in which the same publics worshiped, or as the shipwrights' models for the galleons that opened new horizons and brought back gold from the Indies." And admitting the historical, documentary, and aesthetic interest that such sketches may eventually have, why get so peevish about the public's obliviousness to the technical preparations for a theatrical spectacle? The artists themselves don't worry much. Picasso told Simonson that he "couldn't be bothered to look for the designs of 'Le Tricorne.'" Derain refused categorically to send any of his ballet designs. They were too unimportant. "And," adds Simonson, "as an art-artist he could be certain they were not art." Well, supposing Joyce were asked to publish his outlines and notes for "Ulysses"?

The show, which includes designs from most of the Western world from the sixteenth century up to the present, is confusing, too, and also fatiguing. The sketches are arranged partly chronologically, partly as works of art following a stylistic development, and partly as instructive contrasts in the handling of the same play. The general public does not get a very clear notion of the history of stage art or a comprehension of the problems involved, and tends to concentrate interest on odd items which either because of date or heightened fantasy seem to stand forth as "curiosa." After a while this writer began to get the feeling that the sketches were almost all alike, and wondered whether they had been chosen to demonstrate some sort of fundamental aesthetic continuity. But theater people are probably spending many absorbed hours with them; while the willing but unlearned are like the Indian drummer who was taken to Carnegie Hall to hear a concert of Bach, Beethoven, Tschaikowsky, and Ravel, and then said, "Very nice, but why do they always play the same piece?"

The Soviet exhibit, which was very much delayed but will probably be on view by the time this is in print, may break the apparent monotony and lighten the gloom which seems to have prevailed in all the theaters of the Western world from the beginning of the modern period. It makes its appearance when the theater ceases to be a thing of and for the aristocracy. The stage abandons marble halls and enchanted gardens, and settings cease to enhance, emphasize, enlarge, and flatter the actor and instead emphasize the smallness, weakness, and overwhelming defenselessness of the human being with whom the "everyman" audience identifies itself. In the very modern designers this mood is a kind of Rockwell Kentian implication of man prostrate in chaos, wandering in vast deserted spaces, and straining to fly into lurid nothingness. Most American designers seem committed to this outlook, except a few of the revolutionary propagandists—Gorelik, Mielziner, Karson—who are tucked away in a small room on the fourth floor. Is propaganda the wrong kind of impurity?

ANITA BRENNER

Drama

No Miracle

THE JOYOUS SEASON," Philip Barry's new play at the Belasco Theater, is not a particularly joyous event.

Preliminary announcements implied that it would reveal a new enthusiasm for the Catholic church on the part of the author, and there was even a suggestion that if taken in conjunction with "Days Without End" it might be considered as evidence of a religious renaissance. Unfortunately, however, that renaissance will now have to wait. Mr. O'Neill's play at least made the heathen rage and may conceivably embody merits not evident to the unbeliever, but "The Joyous Season" can hardly seem better than milk and water to even the most enthusiastic Christian. The cheerful nun who flutters in and then flutters out is a pleasant person, but she is neither sufficient to carry a play nor sufficient to constitute a very telling argument in favor of any church. As drama the piece is not only thin but—to borrow Mr. Coward's word—positively emaciated; as an apology for religion it says the little it has to say with such deprecatory moderation that the whole boils down to no more than the simple statement that faith is not incompatible with cheerfulness and that holiness may possibly be amiable. Arthur Hopkins's direction is sensitive, as it always is, but he so completely catches the spirit of Mr. Barry's pianissimo that everything has become, both literally and figuratively, almost inaudible.

The moral to be drawn from comparing this play with O'Neill's most recent effort is a moral which, I believe, the church itself would not find wholly unacceptable—namely, that spiritual stature is the important thing, and that there is more to be hoped for from a great sinner than from a man who has been too comfortably content with small things. Mr. O'Neill wandered far. He worshiped strange gods and he uttered great blasphemies. Mr. Barry, on the other hand, never said, and probably never thought, anything very highly reprehensible. Most of his previous plays have been a trifle worldly, but so far as I can remember he has never been led into opinions which would indicate any profound rebellion against the teachings of his church, and his sin, if any, was the sin of lightness. He liked smart people and he liked smart sayings. Unholy passions were less dangerous to him than the seduction of an epigram, and hence, though he was usually moral, he was invariably chic, leaving sometimes the impression that he would rather be wrong than unfashionable. Now that he wishes to pay his respects to religion he has no burden to throw down, no sins to hate, and, accordingly, no passionate experience to recount. The result is not what O'Neill called "a modern morality play" but only a sort of pious comedy of manners from which the wit, as possibly unbecoming the subject, has been almost entirely omitted.

One unkind critic compared "The Joyous Season" to "The Passing of the Third Floor Back." In some respects that is unjust because Mr. Barry is certainly not as maudlin as Charles Rann Kennedy. It is also, in a way, gross flattery for the simple reason that "The Passing of the Third Floor Back" was proved by its popularity more effective in its shoddy fashion than Mr. Barry's play is ever likely to be. Nevertheless, the idea behind each is much the same. A spiritual force—here embodied as a shrewd and charming nun—appears unexpectedly in a group of worldly people, and by its mere presence solves the problem of each individual. In this case, however, the author is neither willing to present the situation with bald simplicity nor able to make it psychologically convincing, and the drama merely meanders along until the last few moments, when the audience suddenly realizes that everybody has been transformed without understanding very clearly either the why or the wherefore. Perhaps largely because of a very able performance by Lillian Gish, the nun stands out as a real and rather vivid person blessed with a cheerful faith and quite capable of using a

James Joyce's ULYSSES

"Stands among the dozen greatest literary works of all time."—New Yorker. Five thousand readers a week are discovering this masterpiece anew. Unexpurgated. $3.50.
RANDOM HOUSE, 20 East 57 Street, N. Y.

☐ PLAYS

☐ FILMS

THE THEATRE GUILD presents

EUGENE O'NEILL'S comedy

AH, WILDERNESS!

with GEORGE M. COHAN

GUILD THEATRE Fifty-second Street, West of Broadway
Eves. 8:20—Mats. Thurs. and Sat., 2:20

MAXWELL ANDERSON'S new play

MARY OF SCOTLAND

HELEN HAYES with PHILIP MERIVALE HELEN MENKEN

ALVIN THEATRE — 52nd Street, West of Broadway —
Eves. 8:20—Mats. Thurs. & Sat., 2:20

EUGENE O'NEILL'S new play

Days Without End

HENRY MILLER's Theater 43 St. E. of B'way—Eves. 8:40
Matinees Thurs. & Sat. 2:40

MEN IN WHITE

The Group Theatre and Sidney Harmon and James R. Ullman present Sidney Kingsley's play

An experience thrilling and absorbing, genuine and complete.—J. W. KRUTCH, The Nation.

BROADHURST THEATRE—44th St. W. of Broadway
Eves. 50c to $2.50. Mats. Wed. & Sat.

THEATRE UNION'S Stirring Hit

PEACE ON EARTH

CIVIC REPERTORY THEATRE, 14th St. & 6th Ave.
Lowest HIT in New York 30c to $1.50 No. Eves. 8:45. Mats.
Priced York Tax Wed. & Sat., 2:45

"The Theatre has unleashed one of its thunderbolts under Jed Harris's direction."

BROOKS ATKINSON—N. Y. Times.
Jed Harris Production

The Green Bay Tree

CORT THEATRE, 48th St. E. of B'way
Mats. Wed. and Saturday 2:30

"DISTINGUISHED FILMS IN DISTINCTIVE SURROUNDINGS"
Sat., Sun. & Mon., Feb. 10, 11, 12 Now Playing—Limited Engagement!
"DESIGN FOR LIVING"
Noel Coward & la Ernst Lubitch

Tues. and Wed., Feb. 13, 14
Kay Francis in
"THE HOUSE ON 56th ST."
58th STREET, East of Madison Avenue
PLAZA Little CARNEGIE of 7th Ave.
Direction Leo Brecher

"I WAS A SPY"
with HERBERT MARSHALL
Madeleine Carroll, Conrad Veidt
A Gaumont-British Film Classic

3rd Big Week!—American Premiere
THE GREAT INTERNATIONAL TALKIE!

"HELL ON EARTH"

From the book by Leonhard Frank. Produced in four different countries, spoken in four languages, mainly English.
Featuring WLADIMIR SOKOLOFF, of the Moscow Art Theatre, ERNST BUSCH (now in exile)—Directed by VICTOR TRIVAS

ACME THEATER 14th ST. and UNION SQ. Midnight Show Every Saturday
Rendezvous of the Intelligentsia

SOVIET RUSSIA TODAY

12 sessions

arranged by Lucy G. Branham

Raymond Robins	Smith W. Brookhart	Vera Dean
Alcan Hirsch	A. Manukian	Charles Gill
C. F. Marbut	Marcus Nadler	Walter Polakov
Moissaye Olgin	Charles Stuart	George S. Counts
S. S. Shipman	Heber Harper	Mary van Kleeck
	Victor Yakhontoff

Fridays, 8:20 - 9:50 P.M.

Beginning February 9

Fee for series: $10

Single Admission: $1

NEW SCHOOL for SOCIAL RESEARCH
66 West 12th Street New York

War? Revolution? Fascism? Communism? "AMERICA FACES THE FUTURE"

Symposium at the

NEW SCHOOL FOR SOCIAL RESEARCH

66 West 12th Street, New York City

SATURDAY EVENING, February 10, 8:30 P.M.

S P E A K E R S :

HARRY ELMER BARNES
 MORRIS L. ERNST
 JOHN ERSKINE
 MICHAEL GOLD
 C. HARTLEY GRATTAN
 NORMAN HAPGOOD

HORACE M. KALLEN
 JAY LOVESTONE
 HARRY A. OVERSTREET
 SAMUEL PUTNAM
 LEON SAMSON
 LOUIS WALDMAN

CARL VAN DOREN, Chairman

Tickets 50c in advance, 75c at door

Write or phone

Artists and Writers Dinner Club, Hotel Brevoort
 11 Fifth Ave., N. Y. C. STuyvesant 9-4674

□ JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH says □

AH, WILDERNESS! Guild Theater. O'Neill's nostalgic comedy about a youth who discovers love and poetry together. Made doubly effective by the performance of George M. Cohan.

BIG HEARTED HERBERT. Biltmore Theater. J. C. Nugent and Elisabeth Risdon in a broad but funny farce about the taming of a self-made man.

COME OF AGE. Maxine Elliott's Theater. Clemence Dane's fantasy about the Poet Chatterton in modern London. Delicate but unsubstantial and with a fine performance by Judith Anderson.

DAYS WITHOUT END. Henry Miller's Theater. O'Neill's latest and much discussed play which may or may not prove that he is ready for conversion to the Catholic Church. Splendidly produced and acted, but not likely to seem very significant to those not religiously inclined.

MARY OF SCOTLAND. Alvin Theater. Helen Hayes and Philip Merivale give fine performances in Maxwell Anderson's play. The biggest dramatic hit of the moment but one which left me a little cold.

MEN IN WHITE. Broadhurst Theater. Fine teamwork on the part of the members of the Group Theater helps to make this play about a young doctor one of the things which must not be missed.

PEACE ON EARTH. Civic Repertory Theater. Propaganda play about the next war, in which the workers strike and a young college professor gets framed for murder. Drawing special but enthusiastic audiences which evidently do not agree with me that the play is quite uninspired.

THE FIRST APPLE. Ethel Barrymore Theater. Irene Purcell contributes much charm to a fragile but amusing comedy about—first apples.

THE GREEN BAY TREE. Cort Theater. Absorbing psychological drama about a young man who cannot give up luxury for love. Shares with "Men in White" the first place on the list of dramas.

THE PURSUIT OF HAPPINESS. Avon Theater. Spicy and more or less historical comedy about a young Austrian who finds bundling one of the pleasantest of the new freedoms in Revolutionary New England.

worldly wisdom in the interest of unworldly ends, but the other members of the cast—which includes such able performers as Moffat Johnston, Jane Wyatt, and Eric Dressler—are condemned to remain very dim personages indeed. Once or twice Mr. Barry attempts a pious epigram, as when a young woman complains that she has probably expected too much of marriage, and the nun replies, "Oh, I don't think that is probable. It is hardly possible to expect enough." On such occasions there is suggested a kind of Chestertonian apology for the religious attitude which might form the basis of an interesting play, but most of the time Mr. Barry seems almost afraid to say what he has in mind. Possibly he is not yet quite ready to run the risk of appearing unsophisticated in the eyes of his smart admirers, and virtue seems to embarrass him a bit. What he needs, then, is either less faith or more. Doubtless piety can be cheerful and he might finally succeed in making it seem chic, but those who put themselves on the side of the angels cannot afford to lack confidence. Really Christian apology is never apologetic.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

The musical comedy "All the King's Horses" (Shubert Theater) has a promising plot about a popular movie hero who changed places with his double, an unpopular king of a mythological land. Unfortunately, however, the plot drags, and the result is merely a rather routine affair despite the pleasing presence of Nancy McCord and Betty Starbuck. "American Very Early" (Vanderbilt Theater) is, as the title reveals, a play about what the Elizabethans would have called the "humors" of the antique racket as practiced by two urban innocents who remodel that lovely old farmhouse in Connecticut. It never reaches any very high degree of hilarity.

P. M.

Contributors to This Issue

HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY is professor of economics at Wellesley College.

HENRY S. CHURCHILL is a New York architect who has long been interested in housing problems.

JOHN GUNTHER is the Vienna correspondent of the Chicago Daily News.

LOUIS FISCHER is the Moscow correspondent of The Nation.

JOHN ROTHSCHILD, director of the Open Road, is a professional authority on educational travel in Europe and Russia.

WILLIAM TROY is a member of the English department of Washington Square College, New York University.

EDA LOU WALTON is the author of "Jane Matthew and Other Poems."

HORACE GREGORY is the author of "Pilgrim of the Apocalypse: A Critical Study of D. H. Lawrence," and of several volumes of poetry.

MARK VAN DOREN is the editor of "Autobiography of America" and the author of "Jonathan Gentry."

RICHARD MCKEON is the editor and translator of "Selections from Medieval Philosophers."

H. L. MENCKEN is well known as author and editor.

LEWIS GALANTIERE is the author of "France Is Full of Frenchmen."

JOHN MASON BROWN is the dramatic critic of the New York Evening Post.

CLARA GRUENING STILLMAN is the author of "Samuel Butler."

MARY MCCARTHY contributes reviews to various periodicals.

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	203
EDITORIALS:
Propaganda in Plays	205
France Faces Fascism	206
Mr. Strachey's Views	207
Still the R. O. T. C.	207
Wanted: Less Cotton	208
ISSUES AND MEN. WENDELL PHILLIPS. By Oswald Garrison Villard	209
CARTOON: "BUT WHAT HAVE THEY GOT IN THEIR OTHER HANDS, NANNY?" By Low	210
CAN THE LEAGUE BE SAVED? By Robert Dell	211
WHO'S WHO IN THE DRUG LOBBY. By James Rorty	213
HITLER AND THE FRENCH PRESS. By Emil Lengyel	216
AN ANSWER TO MR. STRACHEY. By P. T. Ellsworth	218
SO THEY FOUND THE BODY. By Paul Y. Anderson	219
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter	221
CORRESPONDENCE	222
BOOKS, FILMS, DRAMA:
Lenin the Man. By John Strachey	224
When Wars End. By Evelyn Scott	225
A Study in Extremes. By V. J. McGill	225
A Novel About the "Trouble." By Mary McCarthy	226
Upton Sinclair's Utopia. By Arthur Warner	226
Palestine: A Summary. By Marvin Lowenthal	227
Shorter Notices	228
Films: Nana: Hollywood Model. By William Troy	228
Drama: Should a Woman Tell? By Joseph Wood Krutch	229
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE	230

BOARD OF EDITORS

ERNEST GRUENING FREDA KIRCHWEY
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
MAURITZ A. HALLGREN MARGARET MARSHALL
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $5.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. British Agent, Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England.

AS WE WRITE these lines Austria's workers are fighting a life-and-death battle with fascism which, in the guise of the Dollfuss Heimwehr, is threatening to choke—and will choke—their labor movement. When the Social Democratic Party gave the signal of opposition, the outcome was already decided. For months past labor had permitted the Heimwehr to capture position after position and had offered no resistance. The national and the state parliaments had ceased to function. The press and the political and industrial institutions of the labor movement had been paralyzed, and state and provincial authorities had been systematically captured by fascism without serious opposition. So well had Austria's celebrated miniature Napoleon laid his plans for the coming coup d'etat that he could travel to Budapest calm in the knowledge that his official representative, Vice-Chancellor Fey, would strike the fatal blow against the Social Democracy. This was done in accordance with approved fascist methods. The Vienna Arbeiterzeitung was suppressed and the national office of the Social Democratic Party was occupied. Against all expectations, the Austrian Social Democracy, numerically the largest party in the country, with an organization that has in its ranks every sixth adult in Vienna and every tenth in the nation, determined to die a hero's death. It decided, in the twelfth hour, not to follow the unresisting example of the party in Germany. It is too early to prophesy what the next weeks in Austria will bring. But the general line is clear: Austria will be "totalized," the last remnants of democracy will disappear, and a fascist government à la Mussolini will establish its dictatorship over the nation. Step by step, Austria will follow in Germany's footsteps, and Anschluss will come, France and Italy notwithstanding. The Germany of Hitler, who has won the support of a large part of the Austrian population, is stronger than any other single Power. The differences between the various groups opposed to his rule are too deep to be bridged for a common front against Nazi Germany. A victorious fascism has raised its flag on what was once one of the strongest citadels of bourgeois democracy.

ALTHOUGH THE ACTION of the federal government in canceling all the air-mail contracts may appear drastic, it is at least refreshing to find an Administration which errs in the direction of too little instead of too much tenderness toward business. It may be argued that not all the air lines are involved in the scandals, of which ugly details have been oozing out lately in Washington, and that no company should be proceeded against until there is evidence that it had its snout in the swill. On this point we are disposed to reserve judgment until we learn what the government has up its sleeve. In any event, with Walter F. Brown, Mr. Hoover's Postmaster-General, trying to hide evidence, and William P. MacCracken, Jr., Mr. Hoover's Assistant Secretary of Commerce, allowing correspondence under subpoena by the Senate to be taken away from his office to be destroyed, it is obvious that the letting of air-mail contracts was done under such shady circumstances as to warrant upsetting the whole procedure on broad grounds of public policy. The air mails have been carried at a huge loss, and it is a question whether any but a few long-distance routes should be continued. The argument for ship subsidies, that an American merchant marine helps our foreign trade, does not hold with air lines, as they do not carry freight, and their passengers are persons who ought to pay for the service on a commercial basis if they have it at all. Meanwhile it is a pity that Charles A. Lindbergh's fingers have had to be burned to pull the aviation companies' chestnuts out of the fire. His motives in writing to the President may have been ever so disinterested, but the public will recall the handsome block of airplane stock which he received as a gift and come to unflattering conclusions.

AIR-MAIL CONTRACTS being what they are, the President has ordered the mail to be carried in army airplanes—including no doubt some of those on which the manufacturers made as much as 100 per cent profit. Ship-mail subsidies have already been shown to have the disinterested purity of a Tammany sewer contract. And when Mr. MacCracken and others are finally induced to tell the full story of what has been going in and out of the filing cabinets of the Post Office Department during the past few years, we shall probably witness a great public movement to revive the pony express. Meanwhile five army officers have testified before a federal grand jury on "allegedly improper methods of contract award under the $10,000,000 army-motorization program," and it is rumored that five indictments are pending—giving the grand jury a perfect score, or one indictment for every witness examined. So much for government contracts, be they made on land, sea, or in the air. Considering the nature and number of the scandals that have broken lately, we can only be grateful for the courage of Secretary Ickes (who has had a little contract trouble himself). He took advantage of a lull between the bursting bombs of two Senate committee hearings to announce that we were rapidly approaching a Utopia of social service and that all abuses would shortly be wiped out. Sic semper Kiwanis!

PUBLIC CONTROL of the security markets is now assured—and far more drastic control than was suggested by the Administration's committee, whose report was criticized for its weakness in these columns two weeks ago. The Fletcher-Rayburn bill now before Congress is designed to give the Federal Trade Commission complete power directly to control and regulate all the operations of the organized exchanges, including such detailed matters as the election of officers, the commissions of members, rules of conduct, and hours of trading. In addition, the bill places under definite legislative ban—not subject to the discretion of the federal authorities—a wide variety of current market practices: excessive margin buying, wash sales, pool operations, pegging of prices, corners, and so on. The bill further requires all corporations whose securities are registered on the exchanges to fulfil a long list of specific requirements as to accounting and the reporting of financial and operating statistics. Their officers, directors, and principal stockholders are required publicly to report their dealings in the securities of their own companies and are forbidden to disclose confidential information, to indulge in fictitious sales of stock, or even to purchase their own shares with the intention of selling them within six months.

IN ITS BROAD PURPOSE and scope this bill should, and will, have the support of the American people, even though in details it is subject to serious criticism. The operations of one of the most important and sensitive mechanisms of our entire financial structure should no longer be left under the unrestricted control of those who can make a profit from its manipulation at the public's expense. However, the report on the securities markets by the Twentieth Century Fund, which was presented to the President the day before the Fletcher bill was introduced, discloses important areas of the field which have been inadequately covered by the bill. For example, in the Fletcher measure regulation of the over-the-counter markets is left to the discretion of the Trade Commission, and corporations whose securities are not listed on the exchanges—including the Ford Motor Company and a host of other important concerns—are left completely out of the web of federal authority. Not only would these gaps allow existing abuses to continue in the unrestricted regions, but they would lure trading out of the exchanges into the over-the-counter markets and create an incentive to avoid listing securities. The Fund's report urges that the same rigid standards be applied to unorganized trading and unlisted companies as to the exchanges and listed concerns.

THE LONG-AWAITED PROGRAM for the control of the sugar industry has been transmitted by President Roosevelt to Congress. The President recommends quotas to limit the production of sugar by the various sugar-producing groups, both domestic and foreign. The domestic quota for the sugar-beet producers is placed at 1,450,000 tons, a decline of 300,000 tons from the amount produced in 1933, but a slight increase over the amount consumed in that year; the Louisiana and Florida cane growers are set a quota of 260,000 tons, 10,000 more than the amount produced in 1933; the Hawaiian and Puerto Rican quotas are substantially the same; the Philippine quota is cut almost 300,000 tons, and to the Cuban producers, whose quota is set at 1,944,000, are given 300,000 tons more than were consumed in 1933. A processing tax is recommended for the sugar industry, but a possible resulting rise in the price to the consumer is offset by a decrease in the tariff to correspond with the amount of the tax. Cuba has contended right along that a quota of considerably more than 2,000,000 tons was necessary for its economic salvation—sugar production in Cuba for 1933 amounted to 2,500,000 tons. President Mendieta described the Cubans as frankly disappointed that they did not receive a higher quota and a real tariff reduction. At the same time it is extremely unlikely that the domestic producers will be pleased by a larger Cuban quota and one for themselves considerably smaller than last year's total. The only trump in the message was the threat from the President that if the present quota system did not work he would be forced to consider putting sugar on the free list. This ought to make the sugar trust behave for a while anyway.

PENNSYLVANIA'S 35,000 insurgent anthracite miners have won the fight for recognition of their independent union and are back at work filling orders more than a month behind schedule. Unfortunately their victory is not as clean-cut as it would seem at first. Their grievance against the coal operators, who are the largest and most powerful in the country, will be heard by an impartial umpire acting with federal authority, and the operators have agreed there shall be no discrimination against the new union. The Anthracite Conciliation Board, composed of three coal operators and three officials of the United Mine Workers, the old-line union, will serve merely in an advisory capacity and not, as originally planned, as a judicial body. But the umpire has intimated that his hearings will have as their chief purpose peace overtures to have the conservative U. M. W. readmit the rebels rather than separate recognition of the dual unions. The leaders of the insurgent movement, expelled by the Lewis steam-roller type of bossism two years ago, will be reinstated, and the opposition movement, left leaderless, will naturally collapse. What the workers themselves will have to say about the situation is another matter. Certainly federal intervention between two unions has won itself no laurels, and has broken a strike which would have been won unconditionally by the miners in a few days.

TWO WARNINGS meriting special attention are to be found in the report of the commission of economists and engineers appointed by Nicholas Murray Butler a year ago to study the question of economic recovery. Doubtless with the monopolistic aspects of the NRA codes in mind, the commission declares that "competitive limitation of output by organized industries" should be avoided. The belief "that a deliberate limitation of output, because it raises prices, helps toward recovery" is termed a dangerous fallacy. In another place the report holds that a price rise which has been artificially stimulated "is not a sign of returning prosperity"; a rise in prices is healthy only when it actually reflects growing demand. While these two points are so obvious that they hardly need argument, they have not been receiving the attention in Washington that they deserve. It is only by producing goods, that is, by creating new wealth, that we can hope to prosper. If these goods tend to pile up in certain quarters while large sections of the population have to do without, that is not the fault of production but of distribution. The unequal distribution cannot be corrected by limiting production, for though that course may reduce stored surpluses and so raise prices and incidentally profit margins, it will still leave vast numbers of persons without their share of goods and without purchasing power. Nor can a price rise brought about by any other artificial means effect a more equitable distribution of goods, for purchasing power in terms of wages and salaries is bound to lag behind. Even if wages are increased at the same rate as prices, there will obviously be no net gain in purchasing power. The answer, of course, is that wage-income must on the whole go up faster than the price level. The Administration has not ignored the question of wage-income altogether, but has lately been disposed to subordinate it to raising prices. The emphasis should be just the other way round.

ABOUT A MONTH AGO New Yorkers were requested not to give any more money to street beggars, whose numbers have steadily increased during the past year or so, and the police were ordered to bring any persons found begging on the streets into court for examination and possible help. Of 370 such persons brought into night court from January 2 to January 24, 150 were found to be suffering from some disease—40 of these from venereal disease in an acute stage—110 were chronic alcoholics, 25 were chronic drug addicts of long standing, and many others were found to be more recently addicted to drugs. A large percentage of the men were habitual mendicants, one having a record of fifty-six arrests for vagrancy. Nearly half of them were over forty years of age, but 10 per cent were boys under twenty one. It is obvious that these men, free to roam the streets, sleep in public places, make use of public washrooms, and otherwise make direct contact with the population, constitute a serious menace to health. It is even more apparent that the community cannot fail to recognize its responsibility not only for general health but for the care of these particular unfortunates. The nickels and dimes which they may pick up from passers-by will hardly keep them in the liquor or drugs that they crave; such casual alms do nothing for the treatment of disease or the prevention of serious malnutrition. The New York newspapers on January 13 published a list of welfare agencies to which street beggars could be referred. But the public would direct them to such places with more confidence if a little more were known about the attention that they might be expected to receive. While we have an economic system which permits the existence of men such as these, we must at least insist that they be cared for.

Propaganda in Plays

WHEN the pacifist drama "Peace on Earth" opened at the Civic Repertory Theater it was roundly damned by nearly all the leading dramatic critics—including The Nation's. It has found, nevertheless, a considerable audience, and those who like to argue that the professional critic is an incompetent fellow will be pleased both with this particular case of his disagreement with a sizable public and also with what appears to be another equally striking instance. Eugene O'Neill's "Days Without End" was almost as intensely disliked by most of the reviewers, and yet it too appears to be finding a body of enthusiastic spectators.

The critic may reply in his own defense that in both these cases the public which likes the plays is a highly specialized one, that it is composed in the one case of enthusiastic left-wing pacifists and in the other of equally enthusiastic Roman Catholics. He may argue even that persons who have very particular reasons to be pleased with what a play says or seems to say are the last ones likely to judge justly either its artistic merits or its real effectiveness as propaganda.

It seems to us that a play or a novel may possibly be of service to a social or philosophic idea in one or more of three quite separate ways. In the first place, it may be genuinely exploratory in the sense of seeking to discover and present new aspects of a subject. In the second place, it may aim to convince by argument those not already convinced; and, finally, it may, like the typical political rally, which does not exist primarily either to present new arguments or to convince members of the opposing party, seek merely to sustain or intensify the enthusiasm of the convinced partisan. Neither the second nor the third of these possible aims can be called a genuinely artistic aim, but both are perfectly legitimate methods of propaganda.

To us it appears that neither "Peace on Earth" nor "Days Without End" is likely to be very effective as argument, or actually to make many converts to pacifism or the church. Alike in this, the two plays differ widely from each other in other respects. Mr. O'Neill's drama is exploratory. It does seem to present pretty directly a recent emotional experience and to be concerned chiefly with dramatizing the more or less novel aspects of that experience. On the other hand, "Peace on Earth" seems based largely upon the accepted arguments. It is entirely impersonal, and it presents no aspect of its subject which can be called genuinely new, or even unfamiliar. Its effectiveness, therefore, depends almost entirely upon its power to heighten the enthusiasm of those who have already accepted its point of view. It is analogous to a political rally or a patriotic song.

Perhaps it would be well if those who write plays or novels with a purpose would decide definitely and in the beginning to what extent they hope to be effective in each of the three ways we have suggested as possible. Certainly "Peace on Earth" would be even more effective than it is if the purely perfunctory arguments were removed entirely and the play presented quite frankly from the point of view of those to whom the arguments had become unnecessary. As they stand, they will convince no one not already convinced and they slow up the action.

France Faces Fascism

FEBRUARY 6, 1934, may become a significant date in French history. The current year may bring a change in government, if not as important as that of 1789, comparable at least to that of 1815, 1830, 1848, and 1871. This is not to say that fascism, as it exists in Italy and Germany, has seized the reins in France or is immediately likely to do so. So far as can be discerned, there is no leader and no organization for such a change at the moment, and an even greater resistance exists in the hostility of the French temper to a dictatorial regime. At the same time it is safe to predict that parliamentary government as it has flourished in the Third Republic will not return to France. Already plans are under discussion for restricting the powers of the Chamber of Deputies and increasing those of the President of the republic and the Cabinet. As somebody has playfully put it, the King of England reigns but doesn't rule, the President of the United States rules but doesn't reign, while the President of France neither rules nor reigns.

Gaston Doumergue, the unaggressive and democratic head of the coalition Cabinet, known among his friends as "Little Gaston," is not a fascist. But though the former President and present Premier of France is not the stuff that dictators are made of, his Cabinet is strongly Right, containing the nationalistic André Tardieu—who because of his fishy and predatory face has gained the nickname "Pike"—and a considerable number of those who served under him when he was Prime Minister. Nor is there assurance that the Premier or the Cabinet as now constituted will last any time. The Premier himself and three others of his Cabinet are over seventy years old, while the average age is estimated at fifty-eight, which seems hardly in keeping with the youthfulness of most of those in the recent street demonstrations in Paris.

Considerable shifts in the Cabinet are likely, even if nominally it continues in power, and it is in these probable changes that fascism raises itself as a more definite and dangerous possibility than hitherto. For the moment the new regime, like the Roosevelt Administration, is likely to seek its ends through the pressure of public sentiment rather than frank force, but events—especially abroad—may compel a change of policy in Paris much sooner than in Washington. Nor should it be forgotten that the uprisings which culminated in the shooting of demonstrators on February 6 were overwhelmingly Right in character, and it was not until the Daladier Government had been forced out that labor and radical elements staged their protests against what they regarded as fascist tactics. It is an exaggeration to say of those early and most serious disturbances, as did the Socialist newspaper Le Populaire, that they were "prepared with method by fascist formations" and constituted an "armed plot against the republican regime." There were as many colors of shirts on the streets of Paris on February 6 as there are hues in the rainbow. The only considerable group with a definite objective was Léon Daudet's royalists, and of all conceivable eventualities in France the restoration of a monarchy is the least likely.

Yet the crowds which participated in the demonstrations leading to the fall of the Daladier Government were predominantly conservative, not to say reactionary, in sentiment. They represented an upsurge against the impotence and knavery of their government, baffled by the economic crisis and discredited by the ramifications of the Stavisky swindle. Actually, the dissatisfaction, as in other industrialized states, is due to the exploitation of the average man by a political machine run in the interest of profit-making business. But as usual the masses cannot see that deep. Their protest is directed against the most vocal and publicly conducted government function, which happens, paradoxically, to be their own closest expression—that is, the popularly elected legislature. In the United States, where there has been a growing clamor against the ways of Congress, Mr. Roosevelt rightly interpreted his great vote as a mandate to ride rough shod over Congress, if necessary, toward his ends. In France the formation of a non-party coalition Cabinet is taken by its members as a popular demand to restrict parliamentary government. Whatever the variations of fascism in different countries, it has at least one fundamental and common characteristic—contempt for popularly elected legislative bodies. Of course this sentiment is fanned faithfully by the press and other bell-hops of business, but it is by no means so much the conscious creation of the great industrialists as many radicals believe. Business men in France, as in the United States, are less gods than bewildered office boys, with too much in their pockets and too little in their heads.

Perhaps the most articulate and sinister immediate demand of the opposition to Daladier, before and since his fall, has been that for the reinstatement of Jean Chiappe, formerly head of the Paris police. Daladier, in his short term in office, summarily dismissed Chiappe, as he richly deserved. He is a policeman-politician—meaning nine-tenths politician to one-tenth policeman—who acquired through his job a château, a racing stable, and a lot of crooked cronies. Among his pals is New York's own ex-Mayor Walker. More important, Chiappe appeared publicly with Stavisky when the police were supposed to be trying to arrest the swindler. Although Stavisky was posing then under another name, his identity can hardly have been unknown to the police chief. There is a maze of financial skulduggery behind Chiappe. In the orderly and impressive general strike of labor and radical organizations on February 12 marchers chanted a demand for his imprisonment, and what the new government does with him will be a straw in the wind.

Meanwhile the outside world will be more alive to the new government's attitude toward Germany. The presence of Tardieu and Barthou in the directorate of four which is to handle foreign affairs—the other two men are Herriot and the Premier himself—suggests a stiffer policy toward the Reich. Probably this is in line with the temper of most Frenchmen, although Jules Sauerwein of Le Soir is with better vision advocating a politico-economic rapprochement, and would have France act as an arbiter in the effort of England, Russia, and Italy to keep German influence from spreading in Central and Eastern Europe.

Mr. Strachey's Views

WE are glad to publish in this issue the thoughtful criticism by Professor P. T. Ellsworth of the three articles by John Strachey recently printed in these pages. What particularly interests us in Professor Ellsworth's analysis is his failure to attack the roots of Mr. Strachey's argument, although he successfully lops off several branches of illogic. Mr. Strachey's chief contention was that the various devices of the recovery program tend to accentuate the very characteristics of capitalism which are responsible for recurrent crises such as the present one. Over-expansion of credit, the trend toward monopoly, rapid mechanization—all these are being stimulated by the Roosevelt program, yet they were among the accepted causes of disaster. Why, then, asks Mr. Strachey, are we not breeding more disaster? Professor Ellsworth succeeds, we think, in demonstrating certain fallacies in this reasoning. He points out, or rather he quotes Mr. Keynes as pointing out, that while an expansion of credit may act as a dangerous stimulant during a period of increasing business, it may have a restorative effect when applied in the low stages of depression. But does this effectively dispose of Mr. Strachey's fundamental fears? If credit is pumped into a declining market, either it fails to take effect, merely creating new debts and more depression, or it starts a recovery that may get out of hand and become a boom. But Professor Ellsworth agrees that during a boom expansion of credit may have dangerous effects. At what point, after the upturn, does the danger arise? We suggest that one danger-point is reached when the government begins to make loans to business. Government credit extended to railroads and banks, which are closely regulated and supervised by public authority, is questionable enough, but direct advances to manufacturing concerns, such as are now said to be contemplated in Washington, are charged with qualities that may become explosive. To use taxpayers' money to bolster up private companies for the sake of future profits is not only dubious economics but dangerous politics as well. It is far better to put money directly into the pockets of consumers—through wages or through doles—and let business expand as the capacity to buy increases. Although this process, too, is a form of expansion and conceals many seeds of future trouble, it has the advantage of working from below up, creating purchasing power first and letting profits follow upon increased demand, rather than subsidizing profits and hoping that purchasing power will tag along behind. Mr. Strachey may have failed to buttress sufficiently his case against credit inflation, but we believe it is a good case.

And how about monopoly? Professor Ellsworth sharply attacks Mr. Strachey for asserting that the tendency toward monopoly works to destroy the middle-class market—upon which recovery depends. Even when monopolies crowd out smaller enterprises, he asserts, the former "small capitalist and his assistants more often than not become not members of the proletariat but retainers of the new combination or recipients of its dividends," and ". . . as consumers they may be even more effective." They may, and yet every day we read of the bitter complaints pouring in upon the NRA from independent producers, not bought out but forced out of business by combinations and monopolistic agreements which have developed under the NRA. Indeed, a chief attack upon the Recovery Administration centers upon just this destructive tendency. The further limitation of the market through "oppression of consumers at large"—by which we take it he means increased prices—the professor admits.

In regard to the growth of mechanization and consequent increased unemployment, Mr. Strachey's critic largely supports his views. But to combat these effects of mechanization he proposes the dubious expedient of longer hours and lower wages—a conclusion we are sure Mr. Strachey would not support. Rather he—and we—would insist that the government enforce its minimum-wage regulations, set shorter working hours, let unions be free to fight for better standards above the minimums, and encourage mechanical improvements. If men are thrown out of work as a result, it is up to the government to employ or feed them until industry gets on the move and begins to reabsorb them. If this fails to happen, still shorter hours should be introduced. Any branches of industry which cannot survive these measures as profit-making concerns should be turned into public corporations and run at full tilt on a broad program of reemployment and the widest distribution of the nation's goods. This, to be sure, would mean in considerable measure the end of the present system. But would anyone urge an alternative which involved starvation wages and a permanently deflated national economy?

Still the R. O. T. C.

IN the last few months the Reserve Officers' Training Corps has taken three steps forward and one large, handsome step back in its march toward compulsory military training in the colleges. In Ohio State University, where the question has for years been a lively one, with students agitating for voluntary as opposed to compulsory military drill, and faculty and trustees firmly set against such craven, unpatriotic notions, seven young men were dismissed for their refusal, because of conscientious scruples, to attend the course in military training. Two conscientious objectors to military training were suspended last fall from the University of California at Los Angeles. After a fruitless appeal to the university authorities, court action was undertaken in behalf of the two students, but the California Supreme Court refused their plea for reinstatement, citing as precedent the Coale case in Maryland.

The latter was the first in the series of steps referred to above, but probably the most important. Ennis Coale and Wayne Lees were suspended in 1932 from the University of Maryland because of their refusal to enrol in the military unit there. They appealed to the Board of Regents and to Governor Ritchie with no result, and they then proceeded to take their case to the courts. After a favorable decision in the Baltimore Superior Court, the Maryland Court of Appeals reversed the lower court's findings. The case was then appealed to the United States Supreme Court, which dismissed it for "want of a substantial federal question." Since all R. O. T. C. units, including the one at the University of Maryland, are controlled by the War Department and maintained for the training of reserve officers in the national army, the want of federal jurisdiction is at least open to question. Moreover, the federal Constitution has ordinarily been thought to contain protective guaranties to conscientious objectors to military service. It is evident, however, that the Coale case will continue to serve as a precedent in questions of objection to the R. O. T. C., and attempts should be made to set up contrary precedents wherever possible.

As an admirable step in the direction of a more lenient attitude toward military training, the action recently taken at De Pauw University may be cited. On January 23 the Board of Trustees voted, thirty-three to two, to request the War Department to withdraw the R. O. T. C. from the De Pauw curriculum at the end of the present school year. Thus ends a nine-year fight to abolish military drill carried on by students and faculty with the unceasing help of G. Bromley Oxnam, president of the university. President Oxnam has of course been subjected to the sharpest criticism, and has even been the recipient of threats from the War Department for his unpatriotic attitude, but he has persevered, and the trustees' action is the result. The most interesting thing about the De Pauw situation is that evidently military training is not even to be retained as an optional course. In defense of this position, the trustees declare that when military training has been optional, attendance at the course has declined so sharply that even a voluntary course has not seemed justified. In Wisconsin, where military training was made optional in 1923, attendance declined 62 per cent in five years; at City College in New York City, where the change was made in 1926, enrolment fell from 2,054 to 851 in 1931; at Northwestern, of a male undergraduate body of 1,600, only 120 were taking military drill in 1927. It would seem, therefore, that the majority of students will not take military drill unless they are forced to. And at a time when responsible statesmen, from the President of the United States down, are talking about peace, it is highly unbecoming for such coercion to come from a presumably educational institution.

Wanted: Less Cotton

THE farm-relief program of the present Administration has cost at least $800,000,000 to date. The Administration has nothing extensive to show for this outlay, although it must be admitted that certain features of the farm program were not expected to show positive results before 1934 or 1935. Reduction of wheat acreage, for example, began with this year's winter and spring crop. Nevertheless, the meagerness of definite gains has proved discouraging to the Administration. This is especially true with regard to the scheme adopted for relieving the cotton grower. While the Administration has not yet plainly said so, it has virtually confessed, by turning to consideration of other methods, that its cotton-control program has failed. When the farmers were induced to take ten million acres out of production, they naturally plowed under the poorest plants in the less fertile sections of their fields. By thus leaving the better-producing plants to be harvested, they brought about an inevitable increase in the yield per plant and per acre. In addition, many of the farmers used the direct grants and cash loans they received from the government to buy extra fertilizer, which, of course, also increased the yield. As a result, though the total acreage harvested was reduced about 25 per cent, the 1933 crop was equal to that of the year before when no control was exercised.

Several substitutes for the present control plan are now under consideration. The Bankhead bill, awaiting action in the Senate, would limit the ginning of cotton to a total of 9,000,000 bales in any one year. The President and Secretary Wallace favor this plan, but Senator Bankhead recognizes that it may be impossible to limit production to the figure proposed. Despite the control measures taken, the 1933 output amounted to more than 13,000,000 bales. Thus, if any surplus is produced, it is likely that the growers will seek to bootleg their surplus into commercial channels rather than destroy it. This inevitably would defeat the purpose of the Bankhead plan, which is to hold up the price structure by limiting output. The Alabama Senator believes this might be remedied by licensing private ginners to take over the surplus and keep it out of the market. The additional cotton thus ginned would be applied to the quota of the following year. But any reduction in the quota of new cotton to be ginned would tend to leave a still larger surplus for that year. In the end, unless actual production were rigidly restricted by law or persuasion, the Bankhead plan would undoubtedly break down. Nor is the suggestion that prices be held up by keeping a certain percentage of the crop off the market likely to prove workable. The Hoover Farm Board tried something of the sort in connection with both cotton and grains, but without success. On the contrary, the mere knowledge that such a surplus store was in existence was enough to depress prices, for every trader feared that it would eventually be dumped upon the market.

Some groups in Washington look with favor upon a scheme for limiting output by assigning a production quota to each farmer and placing a heavy tax, perhaps five cents a pound, on the cotton he raises in excess of his quota. Of course, the tax could hardly be levied unless the farmer offered his surplus cotton for sale. It was first suggested that the cotton growers be licensed, the idea presumably being that those planters who persistently raised and sought to market more cotton than their permits called for should have their licenses revoked and their right to raise any cotton at all withdrawn. The President, however, expressed doubts as to the legality of any such arrangement. Granting that the farm problem can be solved by control of production, the tax scheme is probably the most workable and equitable of the proposals thus far advanced to that end. But it also has its limitations and weaknesses. The farmer with a surplus on his hands would be tempted to dispose of it by surreptitious methods. To prevent such bootlegging the most rigid control would have to be exercised not only over brokers who buy directly from the planters but over all ginners and processors of cotton. The tax scheme would represent a complete reversal of the farm policies followed by the last three or four administrations in Washington. Hitherto it has been considered necessary to relieve the farmers by loans—of which something like $2,300,000,000 are now outstanding—or by subsidies in one form or another. The suggestion that the farmer now be penalized for producing more than the market will consume strikes a new note. It would unquestionably take a great deal of political courage for the Roosevelt Administration to put such a plan into effect.

Issues and Men

Wendell Phillips

THIS month marks the fiftieth anniversary of the death of Wendell Phillips. Chauncey M. Depew, who himself made more dinner addresses than any other American—though John H. Finley is now pressing Mr. Depew's record hard—once said that he had heard all the leading orators for a period of more than sixty years, including Webster, Clay, and Lincoln, and that to his mind Phillips was the greatest of them all. Certainly this Bostonian had much in his favor. His eloquence was great. He had a splendid appearance, a beautiful voice. His was the culture of Harvard and Boston's Back Bay. An aristocrat to his finger tips, he was also a great democrat who cheerfully sacrificed family position, a high standing at the bar, a great political career, his Harvard associations, and an unsurpassed social position when he took up the cause of the slave.

William Lloyd Garrison declared that Wendell Phillips made the greatest sacrifices of all the Abolitionists in joining the ranks of those hated, despised, and feared trouble-makers whose offense was solely that they desired to put an end to the purchase and sale on the auction block of American men, women, and children. Garrison was, as Lowell described him, "poor, unlettered, and obscure" when he took up the cause of the slaves. Most of his early followers were similarly obscure, or belonged to the genus crank. Later many others of social importance and personal charm joined the ranks. But none paid the price that his appeals for freedom cost Wendell Phillips. I have not yet found any evidence that he was aware of it, or that he dwelt upon his losses in following the dictates of his conscience. He just went ahead, saw his old friends fall away from him, saw his university turn its back upon him—it never forgave him as long as he lived, not even when he was laid away in the historic old churchyard on Tremont Street, next to the Park Street church. He had taken the case for humanity, accepted a retainer, and that was all there was to that. Mobbing came as a matter of course. Why not? He was not dragged by a mob through the streets of Boston with a rope around his waist like Garrison, but that was a mere accident. Those who thus laid hands on Garrison were men of broadcloth, Phillips's own kind, and they must have felt particularly outraged because Phillips was a traitor to his class and refused to be silenced by their hostility and their ostracism.

As an orator he had complete control of his audiences. There might be interrupters; their wits could not compete with his. It was the fashion in his day to make long and abstruse orations. It was the custom, also, to embellish a speech with flowery passages, and to make far-reaching prophecies. Thus Wendell Phillips declared that the colored liberator of Haiti, Toussaint L'Ouverture, was greater than Washington and would be remembered when Washington was forgotten. He had the weakness of the reformer, who feels passionately and who easily finds the word to denounce and to castigate. None the less, few could resist his charm and his eloquence.

I have been moved to record this man of a bygone generation, and to make this interlude in my weekly discussions of current problems, not merely because of its being the fiftieth anniversary of the month that saw the traffic of Tremont Street stopped while they laid him away near men who had devoted their lives to the struggle for independence, when there came to acclaim him many who years before would cheerfully have ridden him out of town on a rail. I wish to recall him because of a recent cult which has found its expression in denouncing the Abolitionists and charging them not only with the sole responsibility for the Civil War but with all the errors and misdeeds of Reconstruction. Just as one group of biographers has been exposing the nakedness of so many of our great men of the past, so this new school of historical writers has seen nothing to praise in the Abolitionists. What was the offense of these men and women? It was telling the truth about a monstrous human institution that no living American, North or South, would today wish to see restored, and making no compromise, political or moral, with the advocates of that accursed system. Because it was accursed and bloody and revolting and barbarous, they applied the proper terms to it and used the fitting adjectives. Because those adjectives were virile and vehement and often vituperative, they are charged with having alone aroused the passions of the country so that it finally went to war. Nothing could be more superficial than this reasoning. It was the direful institution itself which brought on the war, for it was idle to expect that all men could look upon its horrors, its indecencies, and the injury that it was doing to the United States and keep silent. If it had not been vile it could not have been successfully attacked. There had to be men to speak out. If there had not been Phillipses and Frederick Douglasses and Birneys and Sumners and Garrisons, others must have appeared. It was idle to expect men who felt as deeply as these did to use polite parlor conversation in dealing with this brutal and inhuman institution. That they aroused passion is true, but the Civil War came not because of that but because of the land hunger of the South, the Kansas and Nebraska struggle, the follies of politicians, and the final sudden recognition that the country could not survive half slave and half free.

When slavery was finished many Abolitionists laid aside their pens and gave up the platform. But Wendell Phillips was enlisted for life. He was one of the first to discover a labor movement in the United States and to champion it. As he had discovered the economic background of slavery, so he discovered the economic reasons for many of our social ills, and against them he warred until the end of his days. Today his patriotism is beyond question, his readiness to sacrifice all he possessed to fight the battle of others beyond aspersion.

Wendell Phillips

Copyright by The Nation and Inter-Europa Press. Reproduction in the United States forbidden.

"We need men of action such as they have in Italy and Germany who are leading their countries triumphantly out of the slump.....blah... blah.....blah.....blah.....blah....."

"- BUT WHAT HAVE THEY GOT IN THEIR OTHER HANDS, NANNY ?"

Can the League Be Saved?

By ROBERT DELL

Geneva, December 31, 1933

THE year that ends today has been the most critical in the short history of the League of Nations, which held its first Assembly at Geneva just thirteen years ago. On March 27 the Japanese government gave the requisite two years' notice of its intention to withdraw from the League, in consequence of the unanimous adoption by the Assembly on February 24 of a report on the conflict between China and Japan which was accepted by China and rejected by Japan. The League capitulated to Japan and the report is a dead letter. This was a serious blow to the prestige and influence of the League. A second blow was the failure of the World Economic and Monetary Conference, held in London in the summer, for which the government of the United States was chiefly responsible. The third blow and the worst of all was the failure of the Disarmament Conference, which passed through a series of crises during the year, culminating on October 14 in Germany's notice of withdrawal from the conference and the League. It was not the withdrawal of Germany that injured the League—had it been met in the right way it would have injured only Germany—but the helplessness and poltroonery of the other Great Powers, which, although they had previously agreed on a policy, were thrown into confusion. After vainly trying to agree on the course to be adopted in regard to Germany, they escaped from the deadlock by falling back on "diplomatic conversations" between Germany and each of the other Powers, and on November 22 the Steering Committee of the conference agreed without discussion to adjourn until January the meeting of the General Commission fixed for December 4, in order to give time for these conversations. The president, Arthur Henderson, was left to fix the exact date in January at which the General Commission should meet, which was to be during or after the session of the League Council, which begins on January 15.

To pretend that these events have not discredited the League of Nations and destroyed most of the little influence it possessed would be not optimism but imbecility. The reputation of the League is not saved by its success in settling the dispute between Colombia and Peru or by the probability that its action will be successful in the dispute between Bolivia and Paraguay. Nor is it saved by the effective work done in the matter of limiting the manufacture and regulating the distribution of narcotic drugs, useful as that work no doubt is. The primary purpose for which the League exists is that of maintaining peace and order in the world, and it fails in that purpose if it succeeds in settling only minor disputes in which no Great Power is directly or indirectly involved, and allows the Great Powers to do as they please and defy the League with impunity. It will be no consolation to the survivors of the next war, standing amid the ruins of European civilization, to know that the League of Nations succeeded in diminishing the number of opium smokers.

Encouraged by the success of the Japanese and of Hitler, Mussolini had his little hit at the League. A few weeks ago the Fascist Grand Council adopted a resolution declaring that Italy could not remain in the League unless the Covenant were radically amended. The sense in which it was to be amended was made clear by the Fascist press. The League was to be put under the control of a junta of the Great Powers, that is to say, suppressed for all practical purposes. This impudent proposal justifies those of us who said last March that the Four-Power Pact was intended by Mussolini to be a substitute for the League of Nations, at any rate so far as Europe was concerned. The resolution of the Fascist Grand Council would normally have been followed by a formal proposal on the part of Italy for the amendment of the Covenant, but we now hear that there is no intention of making any such proposal. Evidently Mussolini was merely flying a kite. Whether or not he will carry the matter any farther depends on the British and the French.

Discredited and impotent as the League is, there is no reason why it should not survive and even become stronger than it has yet been. The League of Nations is a piece of machinery and the way in which it works depends on the machinists, that is to say, in practice, on the governments of the Great Powers, which alone are responsible for its failure. The British government has the greatest responsibility of all. It prevented any action against Japan and it has wrecked, one after the other, every promising proposal made at the Disarmament Conference, including the Hoover plan, without making any proposal of its own except MacDonald's draft convention, which was mainly a convention for the immediate and almost complete disarmament of Germany on land. Had the Germans had the sense to accept the draft convention at once as it stood, on condition that it should not be amended, as they finally did when it was too late, it would have been a bad day for Europe. The truth is that Ramsay MacDonald dislikes the League of Nations as much as Mussolini and Hitler do, and he jumped at the opportunity given by Mussolini's proposal of the Four-Power Pact to get rid of the League in practice and put Europe under a directorate of four Great Powers, a new Holy Alliance. It is even possible that he instigated Mussolini to make the proposal. On the one hand, MacDonald hates France and regards the "Small Powers" as nuisances, and on the other, his political evolution, if so it can be called, is bringing him nearer and nearer to fascism and Hitlerism. He has the spirit of a dictator without any of the qualities necessary to dictatorship, for he has a foggy mind and lacks both courage and decision, and his vanity is so colossal that every question is for him a personal question. He is an international calamity, as I said in 1924, when he was Prime Minister in the first Labor Cabinet. It is a misfortune to the world that at this critical moment England should have such a Prime Minister as MacDonald and such a Foreign Secretary as Sir John Simon. The result of their disjointed efforts—for they are at daggers drawn—is that the British government is distrusted all over Europe.

The French government has made blunder after blunder through lack of courage and independence. It has allowed itself to be dominated by the British government to such a point that France is in danger of losing all her allies and then being isolated by England, Germany, and Italy. The tardy recognition of that fact seems at last to have caused a change in Paris, thanks largely to Herriot's influence, and there seems to be some chance that the French government will now have a policy of its own. It was a blunder on the part of France to have anything to do with the Four-Power Pact. It was a blunder to join in the "friendly representations" to Hitler about Austria, which enabled that gentleman, with Mussolini's encouragement, to inflict a humiliating rebuff on the governments of the two greatest European Powers. Hitler's success in that matter undoubtedly encouraged him to further audacities, which have been successful. The French government made the greatest blunder of all when it consented to join in the "direct conversations" with Germany after the German government left Geneva in October. The obvious reply to the German departure was to ask the Council of the League for an inquiry into German armaments under Article 213 of the Treaty of Versailles. Had the French had the courage to take that course, the British government would not have dared at that moment to oppose it. Italy could not have prevented an inquiry, for the case is one in which unanimity is not required and the Council can decide by a majority. Probably Hitler would have refused to allow an inquiry, and it would then have been necessary to resort to "sanctions"; but they will have to be resorted to some day if European civilization is to be saved. The alternative is a war a few years hence. Better an economic blockade of Germany or even a military occupation now than a war in which European civilization will perish. It would perish even if the other nations were ready to give Hitler all he wants and thus avoid war, for the Nazi movement is a frontal attack on Western civilization. It aims deliberately at a return to the Dark Ages. The Nazi regime is Al Capone and the Ku Klux Klan in power.

The French government has one excuse—namely, that, except for a few cases such as that of an inquiry into German armaments, unanimity is required for all decisions of the Council or Assembly of the League. It is the rule of unanimity that paralyzes the League and is the fundamental cause of its failure. It is not surprising that the League has done so little. What is surprising is that it has done anything at all. People say that the League is nothing but an international debating society. What else could be expected? Would a parliament be anything but a national debating society if all its decisions had to be unanimous? One parliament in history, that of old Poland, had the system of the liberum veto and the results were very unsatisfactory. The League of Nations will never be effective until the rule of unanimity is done away with.

The suppression of this rule would, however, involve a fundamental change in the character of the League. The rule is the logical consequence of the fact that the League is based on the principle of national sovereignty, and that is the fundamental vice in its constitution, which doomed it to impotence from its birth. National sovereignty is incompatible with the existence of any society of nations, just as individual sovereignty would make any society of individuals impossible. National sovereignty, as the Belgian Senator Lafontaine said at one of the early Assemblies of the League, means the right to make war, and how can war be abolished so long as nations claim that right? National sovereignty means that every nation claims the right in the last resource to do whatever it pleases in what it believes to be its own interest, without regard to the interests of other nations and of the world community as a whole. What would become of a society in which every individual had the right to do exactly as he pleased regardless of the rights and interests of others? Individual liberty, in my opinion, comes before everything else, and the consequences of its suppression in the countries where it has been suppressed have convinced me more than ever of its necessity. But in an organized society individual liberty cannot be absolute and must be limited by the rights and liberties of others. What is true of individuals is equally true of nations. National sovereignty means international anarchy. Evidently, if the League could make decisions binding on all its members by a majority—say, a two-thirds' majority—vote, the system of one-nation-one-vote would have to go. So long as decisions have to be unanimous and Costa Rica or Panama can, at any rate theoretically, hold up the whole League, it would make no difference if some nations had more than one vote. If, however, decisions could be made by a majority, it would be as absurd to give Costa Rica or Panama the same voice in them as England or France as to give a village the same representation in Congress as New York. Plural voting would become necessary.

It would be idle to pretend that the present attitude of the Great Powers makes this necessary change in the constitution of the League of Nations likely in the near future. France and Russia alone among them have hitherto shown any inclination to renounce national sovereignty and to sacrifice national egoism to the general interest. France has made at Geneva one proposal after another that involves the abandonment of national sovereignty, and has always had the other Great Powers, except Russia, against her. There are no worse sticklers for national sovereignty than England and the United States and no countries whose policy is more egotistical and narrowly nationalist. The British dominions are as bad. And public opinion in these countries is even worse than are the governments. In the days of men like Charles James Fox and Richard Cobden, when England was an oligarchy, the international spirit predominated among English Whigs and then among English Liberals. It has been killed by democracy and in particular by woman suffrage, which is now destroying the young Spanish republic after having been one of the chief factors in the advent of Hitler to power in Germany. The nationalist reaction in England has culminated in the return to protectionism and in the abominable treatment of foreigners landing at English Channel ports unless they are traveling first class. France, Holland, Czecho-Slovakia, and Poland threw open their frontiers to German refugees. England closed hers.

The rule of unanimity has enabled England to paralyze the League by obstructing, for reasons dictated by a narrow nationalism, any application of the articles of the Covenant involving sanctions. It is to be hoped that the United States will not come into the League so long as that rule exists, for the inclusion of another Great Power unwilling to intervene in any dispute in which its own interests are not involved would make matters still worse. I once thought that the League could dispense with sanctions. Experience has shown me that I was wrong. The idea that we can dispense with force in international relations in present conditions is a delusion. What we have to do is to use it collectively against any nation that attempts to resort to it individually. On that point the French have been right all along. Force does not necessarily mean armed intervention. An economic blockade is a formidable use of force.

The nations of the world have to choose between peace and national sovereignty. They cannot have both. By signing the Kellogg Pact they have renounced on paper the right to make war, which is an essential attribute of national sovereignty, but the Kellogg Pact without sanctions behind it will be as ineffective as the League of Nations has been made by the fact that in practice the rule of unanimity prevents the sanctions provided for in the Covenant from ever being applied. Peace and order can be obtained in the international sphere only in the same way ■ in the national sphere, namely, by the subordination of national governments to a supra-national authority representing the community of nations. The ideal is the suppression of all armed forces except those under the control of the supra-national authority, and this ideal could be realized at once, as France has proposed, so far as air forces are concerned, provided that civil aviation were internationalized. Pending its complete realization, the nations must undertake to put their respective forces at the disposal of the supra-national authority when called upon to do so. It is a reform in this sense that the League of Nations needs, and it alone will enable the League to fulfil the purpose for which it was created.

Who's Who in the Drug Lobby

By JAMES RORTY

THERE are no interested, profit-motivated lobbyists at Washington; only patriots, crusaders, guardians of our most sacred institutions, saviors of humanity. If you doubt this, read the transcript of the public hearings held December 7 and 8 in Washington on the Tugwell-Copeland food and drug bill, which is one of the most fascinating and dramatic documents the Government Printing Office has ever issued. If, after that, you are still cynical, you should read the mail the President, General Johnson, and Postmaster Farley are getting these days from the patriotic medicine men, vitamin men, and cosmeticians whose sole concern is the welfare of the present Administration and the NRA. The names of these correspondents cannot be divulged, but here are a few samples of their style:

With yourself and every other loyal citizen of the United States endeavoring to assist in the relief of unemployment, it would seem that any type of legislation that would retard the recovery of business would be unfortunate at this time. Therefore, House bill 6110 and the Copeland bill should be given serious consideration as their effect upon an enterprise with an annual output of over $2,000,000 would be serious indeed. . . .

We have no objections to regulation but . . . here is no ordinary regulator measure of the industry. Here is ■ bill known as the Tugwell bill . . . that openly demands that the Secretary of Agriculture in enforcement of regulations be final and absolute and without appeal to the courts. . . . Now I'm no disgruntled manufacturer writing you; I'm quite well able to take care of myself and have been doing it in this business for many, many years. . . .

Practically all the worth-while factors in proprietary cosmetic, drug, food, and advertising industries are in accord that these Tugwell measures are impossible of amendment and should be withdrawn. . . .

I have recently been impressed with the danger to the Administration that is resulting from the agitation created by what is known ■ the Tugwell bill. . . .

There are four main points to note about this huge correspondence, of which only a few typical examples have been excerpted: (1) that the names of most of the ready letter-writer firms are already familiar through notices of judgment issued by the Food and Drug Administration at the termination of cases brought under the present inadequate law, in Post Office fraud order or in the Federal Trade Commission cease-and-desist orders; (2) that the writers invoke the principle of "recovery" as opposed to "reform" in order to defend businesses which in most cases are demonstrably a danger and a burden to both the public health and the public pocket-book; (3) that they do not hesitate to misrepresent both the nature and effects of the bill, as for example by asserting that Administration action would not be subject to court review although such review would be easily available to defendants under both the original bill and the present revised Copeland bill; (4) that the writers, by implication, threaten the Administration with a political headache and political defeat, regardless of the merit of the issues involved.

The nature and methods of this lobby can best be understood by examining the following "Who's Who" of the leading lobbyists. A complete list is as impossible as would be any attempt to estimate the expenditure, undoubtedly huge, of the proprietary drug, food, and advertising lobby to date.

FRANK (CASCARETS) BLAIR. Mr. Blair represents the Proprietary Association, the chief fraternal order of the patent-medicine group, but even closer to his heart, one suspects, is Sterling Products. This firm manufactures Fletcher's Castoria, Midol, Caldwell's Syrup and Pepsin, and Cascarets, a chocolate-covered trade phenolphthalein and cascara laxative recently seized by the Food and Drug Administration. The Proprietary Association and Mr. Blair, plus the National Drug Conference, are backing the Black bill, written by Dr. James H. Beal, chairman of the board of trustees of the United States Pharmacopoeia. The Black-Beal bill would further weaken even the present inadequate law, make seizures practically impossible, and permit nostrum-makers to get away with murder in their advertising. In short, it is a sheer fake.

HONORABLE THOMAS B. (CRAZY CRYSTALS) LOVE. Mr. Love, a former Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, is attorney for the Crazy Water Company of Mineral Wells, Texas, manufacturers of Crazy Crystals, a prominent exhibit last summer in the Food and Drug Administration's well-known "Chamber of Horrors." At the December hearings Mr. Love said, "No harm has ever resulted, or is likely to result, from the misrepresentation of the remedial or therapeutic effect of naturally produced mineral waters," which is a brazen enough falsification. Two kinds of harm result from such misrepresentation—harm to the health of the victim who takes a dose of horse physic under the illusion that a dose of salts is good for what ails him; harm to the victim's pocket-book because he paid about five times as much for that dose of salts as it was worth.

H. M. (OVALTINE) BLACKETT. Mr. Blackett is president of Blackett-Sample-Hummert, a Chicago advertising agency. His pet account is Ovaltine, that mysterious "Swiss" drink which puts you to "sleep without drugs" and performs such miracles with underweight children, nursing mothers, busy workers, and old people. "Food and drug advertising," Mr. Blackett writes to magazine and newspaper publishers, "is different from other classification. It must actually sell the product. It must put up a strong selling story—strong enough to actually move the goods off the dealers' shelves." More briefly, Mr. Blackett believes it would be impossible to sell a "chocolate-flavored, dried malt extract containing a small quantity of dried milk and egg" for what it really is—at least for a dollar a can.

WILLIAM P. (JACOBS' LADDER) JACOBS. Mr. Jacobs is president of "Jacobs' Religious List," which would appear to represent the alliance of the fundamentalist business and the proprietary-medicine business. As a publishers' representative of the "official organs of the leading white denominations of the South and Southeast," he offers a combined weekly circulation of 300,317 to the God-fearing manufacturers of Miller's Snake Oil (makes rheumatic sufferers jump out of bed and run back to work), kidney medicines, rejuvenators ("Would you like to again enjoy life?"), contraceptives (presumably for an equally holy purpose), reducing agents, and hair-growers. Mr. Jacobs is secretary and general manager of the Institute of Medicine Manufacturers; he is, in fact, a member of the old Southern patent-medicine aristocracy. His father, J. F. Jacobs, was author of a profound treatise on "The Economic Necessity and the Moral Validity of the Prepared Medicine Business."

J. HOUSTON GOUDISS. Mr. Goudiss appears to be the missing link in the menagerie of medicine men, vitamin men, and ad men who crowd the big tent of the Washington lobby and do Chautauqua work in the field. On November 16 last he appeared before the convention of the New York State Federation of Women's Clubs, donned the mantle of the late Dr. Harvey W. Wiley, and begged his hearers to oppose the Tugwell bill. He said in part:

So far as I am known to the American public, I am known as a crusader for the better health of our people. . . . Early in my career I came under the benign influence of the late Dr. Harvey W. Wiley. I was privileged to support him in his work . . . Were Dr. Wiley alive today, I am sure that he would be standing here instead of me. And if I presume to wear his mantle, it is because I feel that the great urgency of the situation calls upon me to do so. . . . When I was first informed that our Congress was ready to consider a new pure food and drugs law . . . I was exultant. . . . Later when I read the proposed law . . . my heart fell with foreboding. I recognized it as only another over-zealous measure like our unhappy Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Act. . . . The Tugwell bill is fraught with danger. . . .

About that Harvey W. Wiley mantle—the widow of Dr. Wiley, in the course of an eloquent plea for the Tugwell bill at the December hearing, said: "I have never heard Dr. Wiley mention Mr. C. Houston Goudiss, and inquiry at the Department of Agriculture discloses the fact that no correspondence between Dr. Wiley and Mr. Goudiss between 1905 and 1911, when Dr. Wiley resigned, is on file."

And now about Mr. Goudiss himself: He publishes the Forecast, a monthly magazine full of vitamin chatter not unrelated to Mr. Goudiss's activities as broadcaster over Station WOR for various and sundry food products. He is author of "Eating Vitamins" and other books—also of a signed advertisement for Phillips' Milk of Magnesia. His Elmira speech was promptly sent out as a press release by the Proprietary Association, and recently he has been fighting the Tugwell bill over the radio.

The organizational set-up of the drug men, the food men, the medicine men, and the ad men is almost as complicated as that of the Insull holding companies. At the top sits the High Council of the Drug Institute, an association of associations, formed originally to fight the cut-rate drug-stores. The Proprietary Association, the Institute of Medicine Manufacturers, and the United Medicine Manufacturers, all have booths in this big tent. The last-named organization is right out in the open, whooping, yelling, and rattling the wampum belt. The Food and Drug Administration knows them well, and the public would know them better if this department of government were authorized by law to publicize its files. Here are a few of the most eminent and vocal patriots and purity gospellers:

PRESIDENT J. M. (TOMA TABLETS) EWING. Toma tablets are innocuously labeled, but advertised for stomach ulcers. The advertising clause of the Copeland bill is what is worrying Mr. Ewing.

VICE-PRESIDENT I. R. (HEALTH QUESTIONS ANSWERED) BLACKBURN. Mr. Clinton Robb, the legal magician for the U. M. M. A., fixed up the labels of the Blackburn products, which rejoice in a string of notices of judgment. These products are sold through an advertising column headed "Health Questions Answered." You write to Dr. Theodore Beck, who answers the questions in this column, and the good doctor informs you that one or more of the Blackburn products is good for what ails you. It's as simple as that.

VICE-PRESIDENT GEORGE REESE is at present slightly handicapped in selling venereal-disease remedies by the seizure by the Food and Drug Administration a month ago of one of his nostrums—not the first action of this kind, judging by the notices of judgment against this firm.

VICE-PRESIDENT EARL E. (SYL-VETTE) RUNNER can boast a dozen or more notices of judgment against his many products, the most prominent of which, Syl-vette, was seized only a short time ago. This "reducing agent" is a cocoa-sugar beverage that keeps your stomach from feeling too empty while a diet does the slenderizing.

D. A. (GALLSTONES) LUNDY, of the Board of Managers of the U. M. M. A., advertises: "Gallstones. Don't operate. You make a bad condition worse. Treat the cause in a sensible, painless, inexpensive way at home." But, alas, the proposed new law forbids the advertising of any drug for gallstones, declaring the disease to be one for which self-medication is especially dangerous. Perhaps this explains

Mr. Lundy's fervid letters to Senators demanding the dismissal and prosecution of Chief Campbell of the Food and Drug Administration on the ground that the latter has been improperly spending the federal government's money for propaganda.

WILLIAM M. (NUE-OVO) KRAUSE, of the membership committee of the U. M. M. A. Mr. Krause's Research Laboratories, Inc., of Portland, Oregon, labeled Nue-Ovo as a cure for rheumatism until 1929 when the Food and Drug Administration seized the product and forced a change of the label. Nue-Ovo is still widely advertised in the West as a cure for rheumatism and arthritis.

KENNETH (VOGUE POWDER) MUIR, of the Board of Managers of the U. M. M. A. When Mr. Muir's Vogue Antiseptic Powder was seized in 1930, it was being recommended not only for genito-urinary affections of men and women but also in the treatment of diphtheria.

T. S. (RENTON'S HYDROCINE TABLETS) STRONG, of the Board of Managers of the U. M. M. A., is a partner in Strong, Cobb and Company of Cleveland, pharmaceutical chemists who manufacture products for other concerns. There are notices of judgment against venereal-disease remedies and a contraceptive manufactured by them. This firm also makes Renton's Hydrocine Tablets, a cinchophen product sold for rheumatism to which, according to the American Medical Association, many deaths have been directly traced.

C. C. (KOW-KARE) PARLIN. For months now C. C. Parlin, research director of the Curtis Publishing Company, has been mobilizing and directing the heterogeneous but impassioned hosts of purity gospelers that have been fighting the Tugwell bill. Mr. Parlin is a statistician, a highbrow, and no end respectable. Moreover, he represents, indirectly at least, the Ladies' Home Journal and the Country Gentleman. In their February issues both of these Curtis properties published editorials, written in language strikingly similar to Mr. Parlin's recent speeches and signed writings, to the effect that in their advertising pages they had struggled to be pure—well, pure enough—and that the new bill was just painting the lily.

How pure is pure? The February issue of the Country Gentleman contains advertisements of several products which would be subject to prophylactic treatment if an effective law against misleading advertising were passed. The February issue of the Ladies' Home Journal, which says that for more than a generation it has "exercised what we consider to be proper supervision over all copy offered for our pages," contains advertisements of at least eight products whose claims would require modification if the proposed bill became law. The Ladies' Home Journal's "pure-enough" list includes Pepsodent, Fleischman's Yeast, Ovaltine, Listerine, Vapex, Musterole, Vicks Vapo Rub, and Pond's creams. In addition to some of the foregoing, the Country Gentleman stands back of advertisements of Ipana, Toxite, Sergeant's Dog Medicines, Bag Balm, and Kow-Kare. Concerning the last-named product, the fact-minded veterinary of the Food and Drug Administration comments as follows:

This used to be sold as Kow-Kure, which purported to be a remedy for contagious abortion, until trouble threatened with the Pure Food and Drug Administration. No drug or combination of drugs has any remedial value in treating contagious abortion. The danger of these nostrums is that the farmer relies upon them.

There is one obvious lack in the foregoing list of purity gospelers. It includes no women. We therefore hasten to present Gertrude B. Lane, editor of the Woman's Home Companion. In opposing the Tugwell bill Miss Lane spoke in part as follows:

I admit quite frankly that my selfish interests are involved. I have spent thirty years of my life in building up a magazine which I have tried to make of real service to the women of America, and I have invested all my savings in the company which publishes this magazine. The magazine business and the newspapers, rightly or wrongly, have been made possible through national advertising. Great industries have been developed and millions of people employed.

Right, Miss Lane. And this is how Carolyn F. Ulrich, chief of the Periodicals Division of the New York Public Library, in a letter to the New Republic, describes this great woman's-magazine industry:

Are not these magazines really mediums for salesmanship, almost trade journals? Of the first importance in these magazines is the advertising. The subject matter comes second. The advertisements pay for the producing of the magazine. The subject matter, aside from a few sentimental stories, covers those interests that belong to woman's sphere. There, also, the purpose is to foster buying for the home and the child. The entire plan of these magazines is based on the man's interest in its commercial success.

This judgment cannot lightly be dismissed, for it is expert opinion. But as it happens, another woman, Miss Winifred Raushenbush, has recently completed an analysis of fourteen mass and class periodicals. She permits me to quote the following analysis of the January, 1934, issue of the Woman's Home Companion:

When the potential reader spends ten cents for the Woman's Home Companion, she gets ninety pages of reading matter and illustrations, 55 per cent of which is devoted to selling. Thirty-eight per cent of the space in the Companion is advertisements; in addition the editors devote 11 per cent of the space to pushing advertised products and 4 per cent to pushing subscriptions to the magazine. Forty-one per cent of the advertisements appeal to motivations based on fear, sex, or emulation. The appeal to fear occupies more space than the appeal to sex or emulation.

In the Woman's Home Companion's "index of products advertised" the statement is made that "the appearance in Woman's Home Companion is a specific warranty of the product advertised and of the integrity of the house sponsoring the advertisement." What, then, is Miss Lane worrying about? Is she perhaps alarmed by the fact that the Woman's Home Companion publishes as pure some of the same misleading advertisements that appear in the Ladies' Home Journal, already referred to, and that would be embarrassed by the advertising provision of the Copeland bill? It is a great industry: women editors, publication statisticians, ad men, vitamin men, medicine men, cosmeticians, all in the same boat and rowing for dear life against a rising tide of public opinion which demands that this grotesque, collusive parody of manufacturing, distributing, and publishing services be compelled to make some sort of sense and decency no matter how much deflation of vested interests is required.

Hitler and the French Press

By EMIL LENGYEL

SOME of the greatest admirers of the leader of the Third German Reich are the patriots of the Third French Republic. "In the Temps," writes Léon Daudet in his own royalist Action Française, "the Brown Shirts have suddenly acquired a prestige which it took Il Duce much longer to achieve." While to certain organs of the French press Adolf Hitler is still the arch-Boche, whose rule justifies the worst anticipations of Versailles, to others his Third Reich, with its Brown Shirts and terror, is a much more desirable neighbor than was the Weimar republic, with its Socialists and democracy.

There was a time when one looked in vain in the most influential papers of Paris for a word of appreciation for Matthias Erzberger, a friend of peace who was assassinated by German reactionaries because of his so-called anti-patriotism. Nor could one find in the Parisian press much understanding for the work of Walter Rathenau, Foreign Minister of the Reich and another victim of German reactionary fury. Adolf Hitler is treated differently by some of the most powerful newspapers of France.

Were the powers behind the French press afraid of a friendly German regime that would have dispelled the fear of war and thus reduced the profits of French armament makers? Or were they afraid of the success of socialism in Germany, which would have stimulated the work of the Second International in France? Was their fear of international radicalism stronger than their fear of the Rache of German reaction?

Adolf Hitler cannot be accused of pacifism or socialism; he has apparently put out of business the German branches of the Second and Third International. The Socialist and Communist leaders of the Reich are dead, in jail, in concentration camps, or in exile. Has Hitler not saved civilization by cutting off the heads of the Marxist hydra? Has he not deserved well of the French patriots by stamping out pacifism in Germany and making France safe for a new war?

"Public opinion in France is manipulated through the press," Joseph Caillaux, erstwhile French Premier, wrote in one of his books. The iron masters and coal barons are pulling the wires of some of the most influential journals. René Millienne showed the other day in a French Socialist organ how the leading French newspaper, the Temps, of which he has been the editor, had been bought by the Comité des Forges and the Comité des Houillères, organizations of the heavy industries and coal mines, for 25,000,000 francs, some of which was paid in cash to the president of the newspaper. "The banks and heavy industries have put their hands on the entire press," writes M. Lenglois in his Iroquois. The war-makers are not the Hitlers, he says, but the Krupps and Thyssens of Germany and the Schneiders and de Wendels of France. The Hitler mark is rolling in France, writes Emile Buré in L'Ordre, on the authority of a member of the government. The Rempart, a nationalist organ, hints at mysterious negotiations by Hitler's agents to acquire control of a leading Parisian daily for 2,000,000 marks. Commenting on the disclosures of the Petit Parisien about German propaganda in foreign lands, Maurice Prax writes: "It is a sad thing to say that we have often felt the effect of this nebulous and all-pervading propaganda."

The Comité des Forges and its armament makers love war, which is profitable, and therefore it is logical to assume that they love Hitler, who is preparing for war. They hate radicalism in all its manifestations, which is one more reason why they should admire the Führer. François de Wendel, president of the Comité des Forges, senator, and regent of the Bank of France, has important interests in German industries and mines. While as a French patriot he ought to abhor Hitler, who is leading the Reich's protest against Versailles, as a German capitalist he must hail the Leader as the savior of the fatherland. "The pens of journalists," said the late Aristide Briand about French newspaper writers, "are made of the same steel as the cannons."

Toward the middle of December, the Temps, of which the de Wendels and other French industrial magnates are the supreme bosses, published an article from the pen of a special correspondent in Berlin which created a sensation. "There is no reason to doubt Hitler's sincerity," the article said, "because sincerity is apparently one of his main qualities, perhaps the one that has contributed most to his success. We believe he was sincere in writing his diatribes against France in 'Mein Kampf' ten years ago, and that he is sincere today in offering us his hand. . . . The Chancellor is not a man of the Bismarck or Stresemann type; he is not a schemer, but a man of instincts and sentiments." Two days later the Jour, a Paris newspaper, printed a Berlin dispatch of the Agence Fournier disclosing that Jacques Chastenet, the representative of the French coal barons in the directorate of the Temps, had been a guest the day before at the luncheon party given by the French Ambassador in Berlin in honor of Dr. Joseph Goebbels, the Reich Minister of Propaganda. The dispatch added that the Minister and the director had a long conversation, but it did not add that the French Ambassador, M. François-Poncet, had at one time been closely connected with the Comité des Forges. Not one word of the dispatch was printed in the Temps, although it might have been assumed that its readers would have been interested in knowing what the director of their newspaper was doing in Berlin. Two Socialist papers, the Populaire and the Peuple, took up the question and challenged the Temps to say something about the matter, which, however, it did not do. The Socialist papers also called attention to the comparison of Hitler, the man of war, with Stresemann, the man of peace, to the disadvantage of the latter.

A few days later the Temps published an anonymous article, designated by three stars, in which it was suggested that unless France was prepared to reap all the consequences of a diplomatic conflict with Germany she should accept Hitler's invitation to a tete-a-tete talk. This was contrary to the French official view that such a talk must take place at Geneva, with the rest of the interested countries parties to it, and that by accepting Hitler's invitation the Quai d'Orsay would give him a premium for leaving the League of Nations and disrupting the Disarmament Conference. Meanwhile, the Temps keeps on printing critical editorials about Germany, probably on the assumption that the excellent qualities of Hitler are not sufficient to purge his nation of blame.

The Journal des Débats, controlled by François de Wendel, president of the Comité des Forges, does not as yet believe in Hitler's sincerity. "We were fooled by Stresemann and we shall be fooled by Hitler," wrote this paper, which despite its 146 years is still serving French reaction with vigor. The Journée Industrielle is also under the influence of the Comité des Forges, and the Socialist paper Populaire has caught it a few times flirting with Hitlerism.

While the dignified Temps was thus deserting the Quai d'Orsay in favor of the Wilhelmstrasse, the less dignified Ami du Peuple, popular organ of François Coty, perfumery manufacturer and anti-radical head-hunter, went over to the enemy bag and baggage, protesting that it was doing so under duress. M. Coty's journal began to publish a series of articles under the collective title "La Grande Croisade," in which it preached an offensive alliance of Germans and French against the Russian Bolsheviks. "The honor of France would be tarnished if she refused to collaborate with Germany, even if she was our enemy, in the great anti-Bolshevist drive of our menaced civilization." One of the star writers of the paper declared himself in full accord with Chancellor Hitler in carrying on an implacable war against communism, "the worst enemy of the workingman and the worst pest of humanity." The campaign was named the Crusade of the Fatherlands.

Although François Coty and Léon Daudet hate each other, they are brothers in hating democracy and loving reaction. Yet M. Daudet's royalist heart is divided between two loyalties. He loves war for the sake of war, and Germany is the most convenient enemy because of her contiguous frontier, but he also loves a strong man like Hitler. How does a man of Léon Daudet's type love? He does so by employing the least vituperative words of his remarkably vigorous vocabulary. Riding on his hobby horse to battle against the republic, the Communists, the Pope, and the bad Jews—the Jewish adherents of his own Action Française are not thought so bad—he finds for Hitler only words of mild reprobation which in his mouth sound like a eulogy.

The Matin, which also loves to hate, has dispatched several parties of exploration to the distant Reich, and they have brought back strange tales of a land which is as quiet as a cemetery, and withal a country pleasant to look at because its Marxism is dead. It was in this great paper of the boulevards that Fernand de Brinon, political editor of L'Information and presumable friend of Hitler, published his famous interview with the German Chancellor, in which the Führer declared that between France and Germany there were no more unsolved problems except that of the Saar, and that the Reich had renounced all claims to Alsace-Lorraine.

Victor Hervé, the former Socialist, cannot bear even the thought of impugning Hitler's good faith. When the Petit Parisien, which is not supported by the Comité des Forges, published the alleged confidential instruction of the German Minister of Propaganda to his agents abroad, M. Hervé suggested in his ultra-nationalistic Victoire that the documents might have been fabricated by the Bolsheviks.

In Je Suis Partout, which not long ago was strongly anti-Nazi, Claude Jeantet specializes in seeing the good side of everything the German terrorists do. To him the villain of the piece is the Jewish émigré and his coreligionists in France, who trouble the good relations between the two countries. This view is shared by L'Action Nouvelle, which describes itself as the official organ of the Mouvement National Populaire, a French fascist group. "In the war which will result from this detestable alliance of unholy forces [between the French and German Jews] the interests of France will be entirely ignored, and she will be forced to crush German reaction on the one hand and to reestablish the German Jew in the Reich on the other."

In the Libre Parole we find the best Hitlerese translated into Nazi French. The following are familiar words and their native habitat is across the Rhine: "French citizens can only be persons of French blood, irrespective of religion. We demand the introduction of the numerus clausus into our universities. We want the support of all those who know that the French people cannot continue to live in the disorder of a democratic regime and under the yoke of French capitalism." This newspaper stands for "Francism," the motto of which is "Nationalism, anti-Semitism, and Corporativism." Hitler's great crime in the eyes of the world is that he dared to lay his hands on Israel. "That is why the press, which has sold out to the armament makers, is inciting the world against the Reich." The reference to the armament makers, is, of course, an original contribution to French fascism.

Some of the newspapers are not content with eulogizing Hitler; they also want to imitate him. François Coty has tried to build up a fascist organization, La Solidarité Française, in order to promote the sale of his perfumes and of his world-saving ideas, as expressed in L'Ami du Peuple. The young men of his organization have been seen several times parading up and down the boulevards, wearing blue shirts, weather permitting, and Basque berets, shouting themselves hoarse until the arrival of the police. The young royalists of Léon Daudet, the Camelots du Roi, also do some rioting of their own, which sometimes assumes embarrassing proportions.

What do the Nazis think of their French admirers? The Völkische Beobachter, the leading Brown House organ, sometimes reprints approvingly the pro-Hitler comments of the French press. Some of the other German papers are less satisfied with the warmth with which the French have received the revival of super-nationalism in its most vicious form. "Aunt Voss," the venerable Vossische Zeitung, formerly a celebrated champion of democracy, has been so thoroughly coordinated by the Nazis that it cannot help shedding bitter tears over the lack of comprehension of some French people toward Germany's national renaissance. "The only people who have learned from the great events in the Reich," wrote the Voss, "are the young people, who see with unconcealed gratification how youth has become a power in the Reich."

The French left press observes with amazement the spread of Hitler sentiment in that part of the press which is being supported by the Comité des Forges. What are the "munitionnaires" up to? Can anything good come out of this infatuation for the strong man of the Reich? Is this a new phase of the movement whose slogan is "Reactionaries of all countries, unite"?

An Answer to Mr. Strachey

By P. T. ELLSWORTH

VIGOROUS and stimulating as were the three recent articles in The Nation by John Strachey, none the less they represent a curious compound of truth and error. His brilliance of style and forceful marshaling of favorable evidence make his essays particularly persuasive. Exposure of the doctrines to the cold light of economic principles reveals them, however, to be an admixture, in varying degrees, of incontestable verities and misleading fallacies.

Mr. Strachey's position, summarized, is this: There are three chief characteristics of capitalism which inevitably produce crisis and depression; the measures of recovery so far adopted by the Roosevelt Administration tend to exaggerate these characteristics rather than to modify or offset them. Consequently the ground is being laid, not for permanent recovery and a rehabilitation of capitalism, but for another and worse collapse.

Of the inherent tendencies in the existing order which are regarded as provocative of catastrophes such as the present one, the leading position is given by Mr. Strachey to what he calls an "over-expansion of credit," or a "tendency to inflation." Business men borrow freely from the banks to create new productive equipment quite without regard to any tangible market for the goods they will later produce. For a time, while this equipment is being created, all goes well. But when new consumers' goods begin to pour forth from the newly made factories and machines, trouble develops. Not even the hitherto existing market for such goods confronts them, but one seriously diminished, for the wages of workers in the construction and machinery trades no longer exist, having stopped with the cessation of their employment. Crisis and collapse results.

This view of Mr. Strachey's has much to commend it. It is essentially a simplification of John Maynard Keynes's over-investment theory of the business cycle, a theory which has of late received much attention. Without undertaking an estimate of its merits, it seems appropriate to remark that its sponsor, Mr. Keynes, believes that however inevitable the chain of developments may be, these developments can be effectively counteracted by appropriate credit policies. Further, the theory calls for just those anti-depression measures of the Roosevelt Administration which Mr. Strachey so severely castigates—namely, large public expenditures and efforts to get business men to increase their expenditures. A period of depression is the opposite of a boom; it is characterized by a deficiency rather than an excess of investment. If the spiral of deflation is to be checked, Mr. Keynes holds, this deficit must be made up in some manner, and the only effective agency for doing so is the government. One who accepts this analysis as applied to boom conditions, as does Mr. Strachey, would seem logically bound also to accept the conclusions it implies for combating depression, or to suggest a more suitable alternative.

It is not to be denied that an anti-depression policy of large public expenditures has dangers. To these Mr. Strachey's strictures serve to call our attention. Certainly if the PWA and the AAA fail to stimulate a revival of private enterprise, then, as he contends, their only effect will be to bring about a temporary rise of prices and redistribution of wealth, followed by another period of business stagnation. But if these agencies are successful in revivifying business, it will be possible for their expenditures on employment to be reduced pari passu with the absorption of workers in regular industrial employment. Political pressure to continue relief works, which Mr. Strachey regards as inevitable, will evaporate as relief becomes less and less necessary.

The second characteristic of capitalism which Mr. Strachey regards as productive of industrial crises is "its tendency to form monopolies." Now while this tendency may be observed in certain industries where economic conditions are appropriate, it is absolutely not true that it is present in "all fields of production," as Mr. Strachey insists. It is sufficient to cite as evidence farming of practically every variety, cotton textiles, machine tools, clothing manufacture, boots and shoes, and ceramics. Almost any reader could probably cite dozens of similar illustrations. Generalizations such as this of Strachey's are the merest Marxian dogmatism.

This tendency toward monopoly carries with it as an inevitable consequence, says Mr. Strachey, the destruction of the middle-class market. "The hundreds and indeed thousands of small capitalists and their better-paid retainers who used to conduct the industries of the country were all consumers, and very substantial consumers. . . . Their defeat and bankruptcy by the great trusts destroys this vitally important section of the market." This is sheer nonsense. Granting that large-scale industry, and even monopoly, has made great strides at the cost of the small producer, it is false to contend that the market made up by these producers and their retainers is destroyed. For both the small capitalist and his assistants more often than not become not members of the proletariat but retainers of the new combination, or recipients of its dividends. As independent producers they cease to exist, but as consumers they may be even more effective, their efforts under large-scale methods being more productive. True though it be that "even Mr. Ford," as Strachey says, "when he has killed off a thousand firms, can still only sleep in one bed and eat at one table"—yet he cannot run his gigantic enterprise without well-paid technical help, and lots of it. And these helpers are "all consumers, and very substantial consumers."

That the provisions of the NRA increase whatever tendency to monopoly exists is doubtless true, but the chief danger thereof is not the mythical destruction of a middle-class market. Rather it resides in the possible oppression of consumers at large, and in the creation of a politically powerful group of vested interests.

The third and last fatal trait of capitalism is found in the mechanization of industry, with its accompaniment, technological unemployment. There is no need to deny the existence of this tendency or to underestimate the seriousness of the problems it raises. It is not, however, primarily a cause of cyclical fluctuations, as Mr. Strachey seems to think, but is a long-run factor whose presence is felt during both boom and depression, seriously aggravating the latter. The problem is essentially one of relative rates of industrial change—of the rate of technological advance as compared with the rate of absorption of the unemployed—a problem for which appropriate remedies have yet to be devised.

To a limited extent, the effects of increasing mechanization are offset by the widening of demand for products produced more economically and hence at a lower price, by an increased demand for workers in the machine trades, and by the lowering of (money) wages which unemployment tends to bring about. There is, however, a very large residue of unabsorbed idle workers. And certainly it is unwise to aggravate existing cyclical unemployment by stimulating additional mechanization in a period of depression. That this is the effect of the wages and hours provisions of the NRA Mr. Strachey makes abundantly clear. One of the surest ways of reducing unemployment brought about by the increased use of labor-saving machinery or by falling prices would be to permit or even to facilitate a reduction of wages, thereby making the reemployment of idle workers more attractive to employers. To raise wages and shorten hours arbitrarily, thereby increasing costs, is one of the surest ways of causing employers to look about for further labor-saving devices which may enable them to counteract these higher costs. Certainly this aspect of the NRA is anti-recuperative in nature. With this conclusion of Mr. Strachey's probably most economists would agree.

One final and subordinate phase of Mr. Strachey's analysis remains to be considered. He feels that our home market is being contracted to such an extent, owing to the effects of monopolization and mechanization, that we are being forced, willy-nilly, into a policy of "imperialism." Aside from the fact that "imperialism" is a question-begging term which in this instance means merely intensified international competition, it seems germane to point out that in opposition to the shrinkage of the market by reason of increasing unemployment (but not as a result of any "tendency to monopoly") this same market is also being expanded by large government expenditures. If the net result of these opposing forces is a growing market—and pay rolls have increased—intensified competition between nations need not arise. It is true that the depreciation of the dollar on the foreign exchanges acts as a bounty on American exports, and is thus "imperialistic" in effect; but is it not straining at the facts to regard this exchange depreciation as a consequence of a restricted home market? Even if we were to agree with Mr. Strachey on this matter, surely the exchange situation is not serious enough to justify an alarmist attitude. And if the inflation which Mr. Strachey himself foresees becomes actual, be it dangerous or healthily controlled, the rise in prices thereby engendered would progressively cancel the exchange bounty on our exports.

No one would deny that the present industrial system is far from satisfactory in its working, nor that it is characterized by certain features which seem inevitably to breed periodic collapse. The very complexity of this system would, however, seem to call for scientific care and exactitude in the analysis of the causes of its recurrent breakdowns. Such care does not appear to have been exercised by Mr. Strachey, for his analysis will not stand examination.

So They Found the Body

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, February 10

THE favoritism, graft, and corruption of the Hoover Administration are, it seems, beginning to attract public interest, and I venture to say that before the Congressional investigations are concluded the name of the Harding Administration will be a symbol of purity to the American people. To a great many of us this is no surprise. In fact, most of the disclosures pertaining to air-mail contracts, made during the last two weeks by the Black committee, were published three years ago in the Hearst newspapers, the principal, if not the sole, result being that the reporter who dug up the facts was threatened with the loss of his job. The difference was one of technique, not of motive. The Ohio Gang consisted simply of an odd lot of pluguglies accustomed to collecting their "take" from bootleggers and bawdy houses. They were crude operators, and many of them were caught. The Hoover outfit, on the other hand, was a slick aggregation of big-time swindlers who had mulcted whole communities and even nations. The United States was their oyster, and they treated it as such. Roosevelt has struck at the air-mail graft as one would strike at a snake—that is, with the purpose of killing it at one blow. There is no more reason why the Post Office Department should not carry its air mail than there is why it should not operate its rural-delivery routes. There is, on the other hand, every reason why the government should have a large number of fast planes and skilled pilots—one being national defense. To a few bankers and brokers American aviation was a racket, in which they gambled a very few of their own dollars and a great many brave men's lives. They are hurt now, and they are howling their heads off, but they have only themselves to blame.

* * * * *

THEY will howl even louder—and to the same effect—over the Fletcher-Rayburn bill, providing for strict regulation of stock exchanges. Although the measure bears the names of a Florida Senator and a Texas Representative, it was written by men who know the speculative game from start to finish, and it would plug up all the rat holes. Drastic powers of regulation would be vested in the Federal Trade Commission—and the commission is not what it was in "the good old days." Even "Brutal Bill" Humphrey is gone. The measure would close the mails to all exchanges not registered with the commission. It would fix a flat minimum of 60 per cent for all marginal transactions, and empower the commission to raise this percentage in its discretion. It would prohibit wash sales, matched orders, pools, price-pegging, corners, underwriting, and the lending of securities. It really is a sockdolager, and after it is passed—as it seems likely that it will be—a lot of former all-American halfbacks may have to go to work. It is even possible that some lawyers will be constrained to learn honest trades. This latter would be a pity in view of the high standard of intelligence and social conscience which the legal profession has established only this week. On the same day that Clarence E. Martin, former president of the American Bar Association, was attacking the proposed child-labor amendment in Washington as a movement for the “nationalization” (God save the mark!) of American childhood, William P. MacCracken, former secretary of the association, was dodging the Senate sergeant-at-arms, who had an order for his arrest. How fortunate, in these dark days, that we know where to look for leadership!

* * * *

SINCE last I wrote in this place, young Senator Nye has suspended his valiant crusade in behalf of the employer who wishes to pay less than $12 for a fifty-four-hour week, and has concentrated his activities upon uncovering graft in the War Department. This decision strikes me as both prudent and judicious. For one thing, his campaign to protect the little chiseler evoked small sympathy, and for another, I feel sure there has been graft in the War Department—some of it under the present Administration. Criticism of the NRA will continue to be in order, but only by those who know how to do it intelligently. I am amazed that my old friend, John T. Flynn, allowed himself to be inveigled into a debate with Donald Richberg before the Economic Club of New York this week. No man in this country writes more brilliantly or with more information on banking and finance than does Flynn. His exposures of the Detroit and Cleveland scandals were masterpieces of exposition and invective. But he knows almost nothing about the NRA. Richberg was bound to make a monkey of him, and did. Incidentally, it would appear that I have inadvertently committed an injustice, which I hasten to correct. It has seemed to me that Richberg was guilty of imprudence in unnecessarily alienating the confidence of organized labor by appearing to be on too friendly terms with the steel magnates, of whose code authority he is a member. Judging from my correspondence, many readers of The Nation construed this as an intimation of disloyalty on his part. Nothing could be farther from the truth. I need only say (and I hope he will forgive me for it) that he is staying on the job at a financial sacrifice of not less than $25,000 a year, and rejecting offers that would dazzle the eyes of John W. Davis.

* * * *

THERE has been some price-fixing under the NRA which had monopolistic tendencies, owing to unwarranted assumptions of power by certain code authorities. The instances were not serious, and are being corrected. They arose largely from the fact that prior to the adoption of codes many merchants were unloading their stocks at whatever prices they would bring in a desperate effort to stave off bankruptcy. Two very real dangers confront the Recovery Administration. The first is its tendency to become a huge bureaucracy. No one is more acutely aware of this than General Johnson; no one is doing more to avert it. The second danger is that when the upswing comes, business will begin to ask: “What is the necessity of all this government supervision? Why should we put up with these regulations on hours and wages?” That is when the real fight will start—and that is when some self-styled liberals will devour vast morsels of crow. That term, I might remark in passing, is beginning to infect me with faint but definite symptoms of nausea. True, I never sought to be classified as anything but a straightforward, if somewhat inarticulate, reporter, but to be designated as “liberal” somehow pleased me. Henceforth I shall view it with a jaundiced and suspicious eye. This attitude is immensely strengthened by a press release which I have just received from the American Civil Liberties Union. Here is an organization which has fought many a good fight against hopeless odds, for which I honor it. Yet the release I mention contains a scurrilous and utterly mendacious attack upon Edward F. McGrady, Assistant Secretary of Labor. The facts in the matter are simple and easily ascertainable. One Ben Gold, official of a Communist furriers’ union in New York, participated in the so-called Communist “hunger march” on Washington a year ago—which, incidentally, was one of the phoniest and most synthetic demonstrations ever staged. Passing through Wilmington, he was arrested on a charge of rioting. Knowing nothing of the facts and knowing a great deal of the cops, I have my doubts concerning the authenticity of the offense. At any rate, he was convicted. Execution of the judgment was suspended for many months on Gold’s plea that he was “indispensable in the administration of the furriers’ code.” This was a plain untruth. Finally the Attorney-General of the State sent a letter to Johnson asking for the facts, and Johnson referred it to McGrady for a reply. Because he replied truthfully the American Civil Liberties Union now denounces him as a meddler and a reactionary. Year in and year out on Capitol Hill I have seen Ed McGrady fight the battles of the poor and oppressed; I have seen him struggle for the rights of organized labor when Joe Grundy was in the saddle, and I have never known a more fearless and incorruptible man. I have even seen him stand up and tell the A. F. of L. bosses to their teeth that unless they abandoned their obsolete trade-union racket for a system of vertical unionization (obviously, the next logical step toward the socialization of industry), Congress would disband them—with his hearty approval. “Liberals!” They make me sick. I prefer men.

Warm Winter Night

By ISIDOR SCHNEIDER

I am in darkness and should be at peace.
I should not let this flourish of a skirmish Spring lure me from work. The pursuing Norse wind, sure will catch me first and leave my warmth a fever.
I'll stay indoors.

I put on light;

too harsh

too sudden light; the bulbs explode it in my eyes,
The room is loud and littled by the glare;
I seem to wrestle with inleaning walls and with no labor to become all spent.
I cannot stay; I must go out, and walk until weariness has shortened me enough once more to the measure of a house.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter has lately become a little confused about Soviet Russia. He has held as firmly as anyone that the Russian proletarian government was an enterprise which for courage, energy, and disinterestedness could not be matched by any other government on earth. He has applauded the triumphs of the first Piatiletka and has refused, like any good partisan, to admit its failures. And through all the years of the Soviet struggle with a population to whom the word government had for centuries meant simply brutal tyranny, he has pictured the Russian people as engaged in establishing a civilization which would be free from the domination of the machine which fixed itself upon mankind a century and a half ago. In the rest of the world machines owned men; in Russia men should own and control the machines.

.

IT is with profound disquiet, therefore, that he reads of the building of the Moscow subway, which is to engage all possible able-bodied men and even boys, so that the first train can make its triumphant run on November 7 next. For to him the subway is a symbol of all that is most furious and competitive in our modern cities. He is told that the Moscow traffic is frightful, and the subway provides the most sensible and the quickest method of getting from one part of the city to the other. And he is reminded of the famous question asked by the Japanese who was told that the subway would save five minutes of time: "And what shall we do with them?" The Russians are breathlessly occupied with building a new world, a world of skyscrapers and motor cars and great electric plants and subways to save time. Every man, woman, and child is engaged in this activity, every sinew is stretched, every nerve is tense: more houses, more roads, more bridges, more factories, more production. To build a new world, to make the good life. But when a nation of 160,000,000 has become attuned to the tempo of high-speed relentless activity, will it recognize the good life when at last it is built? Will it ever take time to examine it, to enjoy it, to live it? When the second and third and fourth five-year plans are over, what kind of Moscow shall we see? Will it be a great city like, for example, New York? Will automobiles rush about the streets, will buildings reach halfway to the clouds, will the new subways, built to expedite traffic, be crowded to the car doors with pushing, unseeing passengers, intent on nothing but to get somewhere in a hurry?

.

NOTHING is more necessary in a government as well-intentioned and intelligent as the Soviet government is than to take thought about these matters. The Drifter is convinced that the complete absence of the profit system in this great metropolitan Moscow will not make up for the rush of urban life, for the crowding of thousands in space which is too small for them, for the necessity of caring for the living and transportation needs of fresh thousands, urged to the city by its multifarious attractions, who in turn will add to the overcrowding and the need for haste. It may well be that one whole five-year plan in Soviet Russia might be devoted to the redistribution of population, and that it should be forbidden for any city to hold more than 50,000 persons. For if one must live in an apartment house with fifty other families and ride back and forth to work in a conveyance jammed to the doors with jostling humanity, the Drifter thinks the choice between Moscow and New York is much narrower than the champions of the Russian millennium would have us believe.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Mr. Florinsky to Mr. Fischer

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

I have read with much interest the review of my book "World Revolution and the U. S. S. R." by Louis Fischer which appeared in The Nation of January 17. There are two criticisms in his review to which I would ask your permission to make a reply.

Mr. Fischer accuses me of misquoting Lenin and then ridiculing him on the basis of the misquotation. My "misquotation" consists in using the term "dialectician" for "theorist" (which I prefer to Mr. Fischer's "theoretician") in the following sentence from Lenin's so-called "testament":

Bukharin is not only the most valuable and most important theorist [I said dialectician] of the party but also is deservedly looked upon as the favorite of the entire party; nevertheless, his theoretical views can hardly be accepted as truly Marxian because there is something scholastic about him. He was never trained in dialectics and, I think, never fully understood them.

Commenting on this statement, I added:

How a man who was never trained in the dialectic method and never fully understood it could in spite of this be the party's "most valuable and important dialectician" is perhaps as difficult to comprehend as the application of the dialectic method itself.

Lenin's "testament," as far as I know, was never officially published by the Soviet government. We have therefore to seek its contents from secondary sources. I took my text from the 1930 edition of Gaisinsky's book published in the Soviet Union. Unfortunately, I am unable to obtain it in New York. In my note taken in Berlin in 1932 the term "dialectician" is used. I am, however, perfectly willing to admit that I am guilty of a lapsus calami, especially since the quotation in question appears in the form given by Mr. Fischer in the 1931 enlarged and revised edition of Gaisinsky's which I was able to consult. But what I completely fail to see is how this slip in quoting Lenin, which I regret, may be construed as affecting my conclusions. Surely Mr. Fischer is the last person to suggest that training in dialectics and their understanding is not essential to "the most important theorist of the party." What is a Marxian theorist if he is not a dialectician? I leave it to you to decide whether Mr. Fischer's description of my remark as a "wet little squib fired by a Columbia teacher at N. Lenin" really helps the cause Mr. Fischer champions.

There is one other of Mr. Fischer's criticisms to which I would like to make an answer. He remarks that the six lines I devote to the Stalin-Trotsky controversy over the Chinese revolution "are completely wrong." "Florinsky says that Stalin wanted a Chinese Soviet republic and that Trotsky attacked him for that." Had I made the statement ascribed to me I should certainly have deserved Mr. Fischer's verdict that "this mistake on so fundamental a question is a heavy count against the author." The incriminating six lines are as follows: "Moscow under the guidance of Stalin and the Cominterns spared neither effort nor money to create a Chinese Soviet republic. It was a policy that was bitterly attacked by the Opposition and by Trotsky, who laid the failure of the Chinese revolution at the door of its advisers from Moscow." A brief statement of this kind is necessarily incomplete. What I meant to say—and I think this is reasonably clear from the general trend of my argument—was that the methods used by Stalin for bringing eventually into existence a Chinese Soviet republic were criticized by Trotsky and his friends. Surely Mr. Fischer has no intention of implying that it was Stalin's purpose to organize a lasting bourgeois regime in China? Was not the establishment of a Chinese Soviet republic Stalin's ultimate aim? Why, then, is the author to be blamed if Mr. Fischer chooses to put in two brief sentences an interpretation which is incompatible with the general argument of the book and which, as he himself rightly says, is not logical? Unless, of course, one assumes that I have completely overlooked the Stalin-Trotsky Chinese controversy. But if this assumption were true, Mr. Fischer would hardly be justified in saying that I know the Russian Communist sources well and that in my book "the changing Bolshevik ideas are presented in orderly, academic, faithful fashion," as he very generously does.

New York, January 15

MICHAEL T. FLORINSKY

Unemployment in Italy

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

John Strachey's review, An Elaborate Imposture, in your issue of October 18, has just come to my notice. No doubt when Signor Pitigliani, whose book is taken to task by Mr. Strachey, returns from his journey to Egypt, he will be able to contest many of the amazing assertions contained in the article, but pending his return I trust you will allow me to point out two outstanding inaccuracies—to use no stronger term. Mr. Strachey quotes Signor Pitigliani's figures to prove that wages in Italy went down between 1928 and 1932, but he forgets to mention that the prices of essential commodities likewise declined. The average level of the cost of living during that period declined from 491.36 (the figure for 1913 being taken as equal to 100) to 309.91. Or to put it in another way, the purchasing power of the lira during that period rose from 20.35 to 32.27.

Secondly, Mr. Strachey states that out of 3,486,881 industrial workers 1,000,000 are unemployed. He omits to explain that the million referred to is the total figure of unemployed, including not only industrial workers but also agricultural workers, who are the most numerous class in the country, besides commercial employees and other salaried workers. The percentage of unemployed to the total population is thus considerably smaller in Italy than in Great Britain, Germany, the United States, and other countries.

London, December 6

LUIGI VILLARI

[Mr. Strachey writes: "Yes, of course, the price level has gone down in Italy during the slump as it has gone down in every other capitalist country. This only sustains my point that fascism makes no difference whatever to the nature of capitalism. As to the million unemployed including industrial and agricultural workers, what does Mr. Villari mean by 'agricultural workers'? If he means wage workers on some of the big estates, I dare say he is right. But in that case, they are certainly not 'the most numerous class in the country.' The most numerous class in the country are, of course, peasants, and how could a peasant be unemployed? A peasant is never unemployed. The effect of the economic crisis on the peasant is the opposite of its effect upon the worker. It deprives the worker of all work and therefore of the means of subsistence, while it makes the peasant work twice as hard in order to get enough from his produce to sustain himself and his family. The recent hunger riots of the peasants in Italy have amply revealed that fascism has not warded off the crisis from the Italian peasants. Incidentally, it is noticeable that Mr. Villari does not even attempt to challenge the main contention of my review, which was that the corporative state has remained entirely on paper."—EDITORS THE NATION.]

A Correction from Mr. Creel

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

I have just been handed the article in your issue of December 20, 1933, by Miriam Allen deFord, in which she makes this statement:

The pickers went on strike for a dollar a hundred; the compromise on which settlement was made was seventy-five cents. The difference, the growers were given to understand, would be made up by a grant of a million dollars from the Federal Land Bank at Berkeley, but when the growers had grudgingly accepted the higher rate, they were calmly informed by George Creel, the NRA regional director, who, with Timothy Reardon of the State Industrial Board, had been chiefly instrumental in bringing about the compromise, that he did not mean they would get any more money—he meant that they had already received a federal loan of a million dollars in the past.

This statement is absolutely false. At no time were the growers told that the Federal Land Bank would give them a grant of one million dollars. The article that appeared in the local press to this effect was based upon an incredible misunderstanding with Governor Rolph. At a conference I told him that the government had a million-dollar lien on the San Joaquin cotton crop, and when he met the newspapermen he informed them that I had stated that the growers would be given one million dollars.

The assumption that the Federal Land Bank, or any other government agency, would give one million dollars to any set of employers in order to supplement wages is a stupidity on its face.

San Francisco, January 15

GEORGE CREEL,

Chairman, San Francisco Regional Labor Board

Streamlined Cars

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION

The exigencies of space seem to have eliminated a small part of my article on streamlined cars that contained what I consider necessary qualifying material. The gist was that there are other fully streamlined models in the offing besides the one mentioned, the "Dymaxion"; that it is possible that some of them are better, although their designers have so far kept their results in their own back yards and thus earned no public gratitude; that there are necessarily "bugs" in any new mechanical product which only general use can take out; that low mass-production prices are proved possible rather than actually achieved to date. This does not change the force of the figures showing that real streamlining will effect immense economies and improvements over the neither-flesh-nor-fowl offerings in the general market to-day.

New York, February 10

DOUGLAS HASKELL

A Nation Dinner

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

The sixth annual dinner of the Nation Club of San Francisco will be held at the Western Women's Club on Friday evening, February 23, in honor of Oswald Garrison Villard, who will be the chief speaker. Alexander Meiklejohn is to be chairman. Reservations at $1.25 each may be had by writing to the undersigned at 775 Guerrero Street.

San Francisco, February 7

SOPHIE GREENBERG

German Students Abroad

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

According to the German idea of university freedom, it is customary for students to go from one university to another within the country, and credit is even allowed for a few semesters spent at foreign universities. At present students who wish to get credit for matriculation at a foreign university must show before they leave Germany that are able to do propaganda. Men who are unable because of physical incapacity to do Wehrpflicht (military training consisting of one night march a week, two day marches, and military drill with arms) can serve the fatherland by doing two semesters of propaganda at some foreign university.

A few capable students who do not sympathize with the present regime tell me how futile it would be for them to apply for scholarships for study abroad, as they are not given to those who do not belong to some sort of National Socialist organization. This may be something for the international student exchange to consider. Not only is every German student a potential propagandist, but attempts are made to use every sort of German student organization in foreign countries for such purposes.

Basel, Switzerland, January 10

A. B.

Help for Hitler Victims

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

January 30 marked the first anniversary of the Hitler regime. Since coming into power, Hitler has succeeded in strengthening his hold upon those who oppose him. Jews and Christians, intellectuals and trade unionists, pacifists, liberals, Socialists, and Communists—all are alike made to suffer.

The International Relief Association, through its American Committee, appeals in behalf of all those who need help, regardless of race, creed, or politics, to Nation readers to give material and moral support to those fellow men and women who are being so sorely tried. Not only does the International Relief Association extend help to German refugees but it distributes relief as widely as possible within Germany, through underground channels. By its financial assistance to the families of those imprisoned, the International Relief Association, operating on the strictest non-partisan, non-sectarian basis, gives to the victims of Hitlerism the strength to endure.

Contributions should be made payable to Freda Kirchwey, Treasurer, American Committee of the International Relief Association, and mailed to Room 401, 20 Vesey Street, New York.

New York, January 30 STERLING D. SPERO, Secretary

2nd Printing!

SEX HABITS

A VITAL FACTOR IN WELL-BEING

By A. Buschke, M.D. and F. Jacobsohn, M.D.

Specializing Physician to the Great Continental Rudolf-Virchow Hospital

Foreword by Gerard L. Moench, M.D.

Associate Professor of Gynecology, New York Post-graduate Hospital, Columbia University

SUBJECTS EMBRACED

THE SEX ORGANS (Male, Female)
SEX INTERCOURSE (Analysis, Nature, Methods, Frequency)
SEX DIFFICULTIES (Adjustment, Technique)
MARRIAGE (Sex Aspects, Instruction)
VALUE OF REGULAR SEX INTERCOURSE
SEX HYGIENE (Precautions, Directions)
THE SEX IMPULSE (Contrasted: in Men, in Women)
SEX VARIATION (Physical, Psychological)
VARYING SEX PRACTICES
SEXUAL SHORTCOMINGS (Impotence, Frigidity, Sterility, etc.)
SEX DANGERS (Coitus Interruptus, reservatus; etc.)
SEX ABNORMALITIES (Perversion, Sadism, Masochism, Fetishism, Exhibitionism, Homosexuality, Hermaphroditism, etc.)
REPRODUCTION, FERTILIZATION, HEREDITY, EUGENICS

THIRTY ILLUSTRATIONS

THE SEX ORGANS OF MEN (4 plates,* 15 illustrations)
THE SEX ORGANS OF WOMEN (3 plates,* 6 illustrations)
THE PROCESS OF REPRODUCTION (1 plate,* 1 illustration)
FERTILIZATION AND DEVELOPMENT (1 plate,* 2 illustrations)
DEVELOPMENT BEFORE BIRTH (2 plates,* 4 illustrations)

* Full-page.

"I believe it is not exaggerating to say that disturbances of the sexual apparatus cause more mental anguish and emotional upsets, aside from physical suffering, than any other lesions."

—Gerard L. Moench, M.D.

Eleven full pages
of photographs.

PRESS COMMENTS*

"... the sanest and most practical views of sexology and sexual hygiene that can be found. A clear conception of the male and female reproductive organs can be obtained. The description is accompanied by a set of beautiful photographs of the various organs. A finer set could not be found in any anatomy book..."

—Glasgow University Publication

"... gives these facts essential to a correct understanding of sex... a very accurate and scientific account... and has the added advantage of being illustrated."

—Medical Times (London)

"Drs. Buschke and Jacobsohn have collaborated on a work which is frank, fearless and sensible. The whole problem of the sex instinct is surveyed concisely and sagaciously."

—Montreal Star

"The structure and function of the reproductive organs are clearly set out... Facts... are faced and reasons are given."

—The Lancet (London)

* Reviews of the English edition before American publication.

Price $2.50 (postage 15c extra)

EMERSON BOOKS, INC., 333 SIXTH AVE., N. Y. C.

Books, Films, Drama

Lenin the Man

Lenin. By Ralph Fox. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

RALPH FOX has performed a very great service by giving the world a biography of Lenin which is both attractive and accurate. To say that his book is the best biography of Lenin so far issued in English would be to damn it with faint praise. For the English biographies—with the exception of a monograph by Mirsky, which is an account of Leninism rather than of Lenin—have been beneath contempt. They have combined an inconceivable political illiteracy with gross inaccuracies of fact and the worst type of sensationalism in presentation. It was urgently necessary that these books should be swept into the dustbin by a plain straightforward account of Lenin's life by a man who knew the facts and had read the relevant documents in Russian, and who understood the theory and practice of communism. But Ralph Fox has done more than write such a workaday biography. Fox is a novelist, and he has brought his sensitive perception of human beings and of human character to his task of portraying Lenin as a man.

If we all had Lenin's intellect, and if our emotions were all wholly controlled by our intellects, it would, indeed, be unnecessary to write a biography of Lenin the man. We could all go straight to the study of Leninism as a part of dialectical materialism. But we are not like this. On the contrary we are creatures governed more by emotion than by what intellect we have, and it is imperatively necessary that the case for Lenin and Leninism should be first presented to us in a way which arouses our imagination, our interest, and our sympathy. It is this job which Ralph Fox has done so well. This is an ideal book to put in the hands of the man who is wholly innocent of either the theory or the history of the working-class movement, but who "wants to know about Lenin."

Here is Fox's picture of Lenin as a boy: "This boy of sixteen was not good-looking like his elder brother Sasha, but he was much more talkative and lively, in a sharp, sarcastic way"; and here is a curious account of Lenin's capacity to throw himself passionately into the interest of the moment:

When something captured his imagination Volodya [Lenin] gave himself to it fantastically, whole-heartedly. Skating thus fascinated him as a boy, and he spent day after day on the ice, half drunk with the dry frozen air of those middle-Volga steppes, till by a great effort of will he tore himself away from the ice altogether, completely gave up skating, which threatened to absorb his whole attention. A little later he did the same with chess.

The book is divided into four parts: The First Steps; The Forging of the Party; On the Eve; Revolution. The foregoing quotations are from the first part, which has been strongly criticized by certain reviewers for its "personal" and, indeed, intimate note. The criticism appears to rest on an active misconception of the task which Fox had set himself. His object was to write a popular biography—not an introduction to Leninism. That an introduction to Leninism—to supplement Stalin's work—is needed no one will dispute. Indeed, one trusts that Fox's critics are hard at work producing it. But to deduce from this that there was no need for a popular biography seems to me to show an alarming lack of realism on the part of some of our writers. They appear to have given way, a little, to a certain childish desire to appear learned; to appear to scorn the simple task of introducing the whole subject of Lenin to people to whom he is no more than a name; to regard the discussion of advanced theory as alone of value. One can imagine what Lenin would have said of such an attitude. He who loved simplicity and directness this side of idolatry might well have been very sharp on this subject.

Indeed, the three earlier parts of Fox's book are, to anyone who has taken the trouble to understand the purpose for which it was written, the most satisfactory. The real criticism which can be made is that the concluding chapters of the fourth part, which deal with Lenin's life from October, 1917, to his death in 1924, are totally inadequate. But this is in fact to criticize Fox for attempting the impossible. Either he should have written at least another 50,000 words, or he should have given the story of the first year of the revolution—with which Lenin's life had become indissolubly bound—in some detail, or, and this would perhaps have been the best policy of all, he should have finished his story with the Bolshevik accession to power, reserving the account of Lenin in power for a second volume. All sorts of other criticism of the book could be made: it would not be untrue, for example, to say that it is unworthy of its subject. It does not quite convey the size of Lenin. But Fox has a complete answer to any such criticisms. He has only to tell us to go and write a better book on the same subject. And until someone has done that he is secure in the knowledge that he, at any rate, has had the courage to tackle this tremendous subject, while his critics have attempted nothing.

And when all is said and done, what a valuable contribution Fox has made to the presentation of the truth about Lenin and the party of Lenin! The book is full of passages which make one think of analogies with the present situation in America. The account of Lenin's meeting with Father Gapon, the leader of the workers' procession on Bloody Sunday in 1905, is extremely interesting. Fox quotes a description by Krupskaya—Lenin's wife—of the difference between Gapon and the Bolsheviks:

To live illegally, to go hungry, and remain totally anonymous, was quite different to speaking at crowded meetings without any risk at all. The organizing of gun-running could only be done by people of quite a different revolutionary stamp from Gapon, people prepared to make any unadvertised sacrifices.

Today another priest is carrying on quasi-revolutionary agitation in America. One wonders if the analogy with Gapon will work itself out any farther.

Fox also quotes Lenin's great dictum on the gold standard. Lenin had no illusions about the necessity for capitalism of an objective money commodity such as gold. But he wrote:

When we conquer on a world scale we shall, I think, use gold for making public lavatories in the streets of the great cities of the world. That would be the most "just" and graphically edifying use of gold for the generations which have not forgotten that for gold ten million people were massacred and thirty million crippled in the "great liberation" war of 1914-18.

Best of all is Lenin's contrasting of the closing sessions of the bourgeois Constituent Assembly with the opening sessions of the Congress of the Soviets, which were both taking place in what is now Leningrad in the very first days of the Bolshevik power.

There [wrote Lenin] in the old world of bourgeois parliamentarianism the leaders of hostile classes and hostile groups of the bourgeoisie have been fencing. Here in the new world of the proletarian-peasant state, the oppressed classes are crudely, clumsily making. . .

In 1917 the contrast applied to two worlds within Russia. Today it has a wider meaning. In Russia the oppressed classes are still crude, are still clumsy, but they are still making. They have made a whole new civilization. And in the rest of the world the hostile groups of the bourgeoisie are still fencing. Finally there is Fox's attempt at an estimate of Lenin.

The world today is full of dictators and would-be dictators. A moment's glance at any one of them is sufficient to convince one that Lenin was not such a "dictator." He was a man made in the mold of Lincoln or Cromwell, very simple, very rugged, very great, fully conscious of his own importance in the history of the world, but who never gazed at himself in the mirror of history, never in his life made a false gesture, played at heroics, or spoke hysterically. . . . If in the world's history there have been few men his equal, it is only because the great tragedy of that history has been that the talents of men have been wasted, mocked, suppressed, and vilely extinguished by the ferocity of human society.

No one with any practical knowledge of politics can possibly doubt that Fox has performed a great service to the British and American working class by writing this book.

JOHN STRACHEY

When Wars End

The Unforgotten Prisoner. By R. C. Hutchinson. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.75.

THIS book, equally important by reason of faults which have a special significance today and virtues which this reviewer, at any rate, feels to be indisputable, is the faintly bizarre and romantically concluded story of Klaus, the illegitimate son of an Englishman, Charles Saggard, and a German woman, Hedwig von Schlingen, who, at the apex of a young love affair, have been firmly disunited by those stock figures of twenty-five years of fiction—Victorian parents. The father of Charles is a canon of the English church, the mother of Hedwig is a distinctly hard-boiled baroness, and the German-English child is heir to both warring traditions and the tragedy of his parentage.

It seems a pity that the author chose unnecessarily to complicate the presentation of his theme by giving whole slices of narrative in the form of first-person reminiscences by John Saggard, elder brother of Charles, interspersing these with third-person recordings of events as witnessed sometimes by Klaus, sometimes by subsidiary characters, who emerge for us during a few pages, then disappear. It is a clumsy device and may tend to deflect appreciation from writing that, when most successful, has a compelling power and a massive and illuminating accuracy. John Saggard is urged to recount his relationship with his bastard nephew because of an odd coincidence of the war which affected his own emotions and his life. A German spy whom he detects, reports, imprisons, and, as commanding officer of the moment, orders shot, turns out to be the husband Hedwig von Schlingen took as a stepfather for her baby. The spy is executed; he is the "unforgotten prisoner." When the war is over, John makes a pilgrimage to Germany to discover and, if possible, assist the widow and her child, who, unknown to other members of the Saggard family, is of course the child of his own brother.

It is a lurid tale which follows, but easily corroborated facts about that era when Germany paid most heavily of all nations for the war debauch are lurid, too. Hedwig and the pathological but touching Klaus undergo no merely fabulous trials. Klaus, as a symbol for pacifist propaganda, speaks with a more harrowing pathos than do those adult victims of warfare made familiar in such plays as "Journey's End" and such books as "All Quiet on the Western Front."

The Gothic horror which accumulates in him begins to affect the reader sympathetically when the boy runs away from "the Abbey," a Roman Catholic institution to which his mother, in her desperation, has sent him to make certain that he will be safe and fed. The food is poor enough and the discipline severe, and when a jealous classmate who has heard Klaus read English fluently taunts him as an "Englishman," a crisis is precipitated which impels the child to escape his mentors and return again to his mother. But when he finds her, grief and privation have reduced her to insane apathy; Klaus, at thirteen or fourteen, is instantly burdened with responsibilities which would be too much for a grown man. After her death, when he is left in the stricken town of Birnewald, without a human attachment, he and an adolescent girl waif, Berta, join other starving malcontents who have intrenched themselves in an abandoned piano factory from which not even the military can dislodge them until machine-guns are turned on the place. Klaus and Berta escape. Klaus, as a stowaway, reaches England.

The flight from the Abbey and the siege of the factory hold the magnificent nightmare flavors that are in portions of "Wuthering Heights," though the inspiration, as we know, is quite literal and all too modern. If Mr. Hutchinson, addressing us perhaps through the compassionate and gently facetious John Saggard and that subtle clown, Lanair, had been able to face ultimate conclusions from often superbly assembled data, we should have had a great English novel. Even the chuckles induced by the cricket match described in one of the early sections would reveal a writer of kindly satiric talents. The emotional range between this mood and moods tremendously oppressive is a considerable and unusual achievement.

But in its ultimate intention, which is a plea for the revival of a Christian spirit, the book is anti-climactic. With the inception of the "Paul and Virginia" motif of Berta and Klaus, something sentimentally evasive, ineffectually too amiable, creeps into a fine text, until, in the very last chapter, all dwindles to poetic platitude and stale parable.

There are doubting allusions to communism in the book, and this reviewer is in personal agreement with the author, who thinks many Communists "muddle" their philosophy. But if they disguise from themselves, with euphemistic moralizing, the final logic of their materialism, Mr. Hutchinson shies similarly before committing himself to the last pessimism of fact—a pessimism which ought to be the sincerest and soundest apologia for religion. That religious experience, solitary, and with so many nearly incommunicable ingredients, is, we can recognize only symptomatically, by its effect on deeds, and by intimations in the expression of the most profound poets. Mr. Hutchinson, toward the end of his novel, gives another horrid example of what any devil of propaganda can do in the way of destroying gods and muses. Yet we are still helplessly grateful for preceding passages.

EVELYN SCOTT

A Study in Extremes

Strindberg. By G. A. Campbell. Great Lives Series. The Macmillan Company. 75 cents.

THIS precise, well-tabulated little biography enables us to view synoptically one of the most remarkable careers of modern times and to see at a glance its persistent and decisive features. One never ceases to be amazed at Strindberg's versatility, his violent extremes, and his passion for confession. Not content with the production of fifty-six plays—historical, naturalistic, symbolic, mystical, religious, even fairy plays—Strindberg turned out many good novels, histories, lyrics, short stories, and fairy tales, and still found time to write on Chinese culture, economics, botany, and geology, and to devote years to chemical experiments. In the meantime his autobiography increased volume by volume and all his works were strewn with the most shocking self-betrayal. For what was the use of having secrets unless one could tell them—and repent?

No poet but Goethe can match the breadth and versatility of Strindberg's writings, his devotion to experimental science, or his proneness to honest confession. In these respects they join hands, so to speak, across a century, but Goethe did not show any of Strindberg's passion for extremes, and in this respect, indeed, they were opposites. While the Swedish writer on his long road "to Damascus" swung violently between the extremities of atheism and Christianity, aristocracy and socialism, naturalism and mysticism, woman-worship and woman-hatred, always destroying his old gods before moving on to the new, Goethe never rejected his old gods at all but only made additions and corrections, weaving the contrary principles into an inclusive and harmonious world-view. Such a reconciliation with the world was naturally impossible to the drastic Strindberg, whose passionate addiction to one ideal always put him at war with the opposite principle and its supporters, and also with those who held to a middle ground; for compromise, he felt, was mere weakness or hypocrisy, and hence intolerable. But Strindberg's one-sided ardor was bound to bring out dialectically the exaggeration or contradiction inherent in his position and he was continually forced to the opposite ground, into the arms of his enemy. Thesis and antithesis were there, but no synthesis. It was "all or nothing," as his master Kierkegaard had said, and the compromise of a Hegel or a Goethe was excluded. Thus while Strindberg moved from one position or work to another by the pressure of contradiction, Goethe advanced through a lack of contradiction, by a harmonious extension. The one type is always the rebel, too extreme for radicals and conservatives alike; while the other is the eternal liberal.

V. J. MCGILL

A Novel About the "Trouble"

Shake Hands with the Devil. By Rearden Conner. William Morrow and Company. $2.50.

NOVELISTS are both born and made. The natural storyteller can turn the most trivial incident into fiction, but the "made" novelist needs the accident of some striking first-hand experience to catapult him into print. The World War brought forth a crop of novelists of the second kind. A young man of little talent but moderate sensibility who could cast into printable form his four bad years in the trenches might skyrocket briefly into prominence, and then be heard no more. I suggest that Rearden Conner, author of "Shake Hands with the Devil," the Literary Guild choice for February, is a member of this second group. He is luckier than the novelists the war created, for his first-hand experience was of a more unusual and even more sensational variety.

He lived through the bloody Irish civil war of the years 1918 to 1922, and he has now written a book about the events which he witnessed. His material is more exciting than the war novelists' material, because he tells of guerrilla warfare, a form of combat essentially more stirring than organized, open slaughter, since it depends upon individual feats of skill and daring. The war between the Sinn Feiners and the Black and Tans was carried on almost entirely in ambush. It had no trenches, no lines of battle. It exploded only in street riots, kidnappings, incendiarism, night raids, and swift reprisals. The Irish Republican Army was a group of desperate outlaws, organized on principles very much like those of the American gang. It demanded absolute loyalty; death was the only escape from the I. R. A. It demanded, moreover, complete, cold, and logical ruthlessness of its men. So uncertain was their existence that, for fear of betrayal, they were forced to murder not only those whom they knew to be their enemies, but those who they half suspected might be dangerous. They could not stop short of shooting a friendly, talkative prostitute down in cold blood, nor could they afford to feel superstitious Catholic fear when they killed a priest in the sanctuary of the church. Only by such measures could they feel security, and security was vital to the life of their cause.

Unquestionably the story of this strange, romantic, and terrible war needed to be told, and much credit is due Mr. Conner for having been the first to set it forth at length. But Mr. Conner is to be praised only for presenting the facts, not for his method of presentation. Himself deeply shocked by the senseless cruelties of the "trouble," he has set about to convey that shock to the reader in a very amateurish fashion. Like many of his predecessors, the short-lived war novelists, he has an idea that events will seem more horrible if relayed to the reader by an extremely sensitive character. Unfortunately, this is not often true. Acute sensibility, especially in the awkward hands of a green novelist, very quickly becomes ridiculous; the reader tends to discount the character's statements, and the horrors are minimized. Certainly, this is the case with Kerry Sutton, Mr. Conner's hero and alter ego. Kerry is a harmless medical student, half English, who is drawn into the I. R. A. against his will as the result of a street riot. His creator evidently intended him to be regarded as a sane and admirable young man, trapped in a world where sanity had no place. But as a matter of fact, the character that emerges is a nincompoop who lounges about, falls in love three times, prattles about "the balanced mind," and moons over John Masefield and Rupert Brooke, while the bullets whiz round his ears. Throughout his experiences at the munitions headquarters of the I. R. A. he clings to a lukewarm conviction that both sides are in the right, which he carries even to his death at the hands of the Tans.

Mr. Conner has made his hero so synthetic a character that even the very real revolution seems a little stagy. With no humor and so weak a grasp of character, Mr. Conner should not have been seduced by his material into writing a novel, especially an Irish novel. A dispassionate, orderly statement of fact would have been a more effective, if less elegant, method of presenting the Irish civil war to the world.

MARY MCCARTHY

Upton Sinclair's Utopia

I, Governor of California, and How I Ended Poverty. A True Story of the Future. By Upton Sinclair. Farrar and Rinehart. $1.

UPTON SINCLAIR, at fifty-five, after professing and preaching socialism most of his life, has turned to the right. He has abandoned the hope of abolishing capitalism by substituting for it a cooperative commonwealth, and has embarked upon a scheme for reforming the industrial system of the State of California by working through the Democratic Party. He has entered the forthcoming primaries as a candidate for governor, and if he should win the nomination, will contest the election with the Republicans next November. Mr. Sinclair sets forth his program in a booklet bearing the title above. Using a novelist's prerogative, he chooses to regard his scheme as already accomplished and writes of it in the past tense, looking back from the end of his term in 1938. He takes as his campaign slogan a promise to "end poverty in California." This somewhat ambitious project the optimistic Mr. Sinclair expects to accomplish within two years, granted that the voters give him a legislature to back his plans. Mr. Sinclair proposes, first, to acquire farm lands and put men to work on them in supervised and—so far as is necessary—subsidized agriculture. Second, he would take over idle factories and put industrial workers to making goods in them. Payment at the outset would be largely in scrip. Capital would be obtained through a popular bond subscription in denominations as small as $10, some bonds running for as short a period as thirty days, others for longer periods. In so far as the program is not self-liquidating it would be paid for eventually by steep income and inheritance taxes intended to bear chiefly upon the well-to-do.

Mr. Sinclair is a skilful propagandist and may win many Democrats to his support. He may win some few Republicans also. He will not win many scientific Socialists. They will regard his vision as only one more reformist effort doomed to failure because of the intention to set it up within the capitalist system, with the certainty that the latter will sabotage, corrupt, and stifle it before it can fairly raise its head. Just the same, it would be a splendid eventuality if Mr. Sinclair might be nominated and elected. For he promises to fulfil his program in so short a space of time that it would afford a speedy demonstration, invaluable alike to those who hold it to be feasible and to those who view it as impossible sentimentalism.

ARTHUR WARNER

Palestine: A Summary

Modern Palestine. A Symposium. Edited by Jessie Sampter. New York: Hadassah. $2.50.

Beside Galilee. A Diary in Palestine. By Hector Bolitho. D. Appleton-Century Company. $2.50.

THE authoritative compilation "Modern Palestine" appears at an opportune moment. Zion is again in the news. Local bulletins and returning travelers tell of steady consolidation of the Jewish settlements in the ancient land, of a constant infiltration of capital and colonists, and, amid the crash of the Western world, of a surprising economic stability. German Jews, some thousands of them, are discovering a new meaning in the old phrase "a Jewish homeland." Meanwhile, the Arabs are parading in protest. They do not want stability at the price of more Jews. It is the right time to take stock of the Zionist enterprise. The present book, published by the Women's Zionist Organization of America, furnishes an excellent inventory for the purpose.

A score of experts have summarized the history of Zionism, with special and perhaps too much emphasis on the part played by American Jews; the growth of the rural and urban settlements in Palestine; and the present status of agriculture, industry, commerce, health, culture, administration, and Arab-Jewish and Jewish-British relations. While the writers are mainly concerned with presenting the accomplishments and purposes of the Jew, no effort is made to distort the lot and claims of the Arab or to gloss over the difficulties arising either from the ungrateful nature of the soil or from the complications of Arab and British politics.

Money has been lacking and immigration has never been free; yet the Jewish population has risen since the war from about 80,000 to 180,000—or to within one-fifth of the total population. The purchase of land has been hindered by legal and economic difficulties, and free land has never been available; yet Jewish ownership has mounted, in the same dozen or so years, from about 112,000 acres to 300,000 acres—or to one-tenth of the total cultivable area; while the Jewish rural population has climbed from 15,000 to about 40,000. High tariffs and, until recently, meager power resources have handicapped the growth of industry; but not enough to prevent an expansion from 1,200 enterprises with £1,000,000 capital, employing 2,000 workers in 1920, to about 3,000 enterprises with an invested capital of more than £5,000,000, employing 20,000 workers (Arab and Jewish included). The absolute figures may seem small, but only Soviet Russia can show a similarly rapid rate of growth—and one unchecked by the world crisis.

Both agriculture and industry teem with social and economic experiments. The description of the diverse types of organization used in the production, marketing, and consumption of goods—ranging from conventional capitalism to a communist sharing of neckties which Russia alone dreams of, when she gets the neckties—reads like a dictionary of social science.

The Arabs have proved and still prove the greatest obstacle to Jewish development, for British tepidity and resistance are nourished solely on Arab discontent. Yet if the analysis given by a Palestinian in the present volume is correct, the situation is not hopeless. The bulk of rural Palestine is owned by a few Effendi, most of them absentee landlords; and the Arab peasant suffers from extortionate rent, high taxes, and primitive equipment. Not the Jew but a medieval land system is his true enemy. If he can be persuaded to recognize this fact, if he can be made to realize the advantages that Jewish capital and enterprise have already brought to the Arab workers and peasants, and if he can be induced to join forces with Jewish organized labor in the field and shop, as he has already done on the railroads, a united population of Arab and Jew will assure the future of the country. But this means that the Arab must repudiate his Effendi-made nationalism and the Zionist must surrender his exclusiveness—on neither side an impossible feat. The slow pace of Jewish effort in this direction is the chief indictment one can draw against the Zionist enterprise.

In the description of Palestinian education, arts, science, and letters, especially of the astonishing revival of Hebrew, we can catch an understanding of the spirit which moves these stony mountains of Zion. It is a flaming single-track spirit, like any other form of nationalism and communism, a spirit which calls the purchase of farm acres "the redemption of the land," a spirit which must prove very trying to Arab and British nerves; but without it the Jew could have accomplished nothing. Now that the Jews have a secure foothold on the land, it remains to be seen whether this spirit can discipline itself to the point of freely cooperating with the Arab and winning his loyalty to a common united Palestine.

The extent to which it has proved trying to at least one set of British nerves may be judged from Hector Bolitho's diary of a few weeks' sojourn in Palestine. The author of "Beside Galilee" is not impartial, but—the next best thing to it—he is candid. All his life, he admits, he has disliked Jews. Crossing the Suez, he shivered with physical repulsion at the prospect of entering their land. Once there, Jewish energy naturally disconcerted him and tired him out. "I gravitated away from these earnest Zionists, toward the drowsy Moslems. It is my nature and pleasure to do so. I like these less efficient Arabs." Albert Cohen was apparently right when he said, in "Solal," that the world does not like people who are too much alive. It is Mr. Bolitho's privilege to prefer Arabs to Jews, but as a result his diary, mostly devoted to poetic musings on piping shepherds, Arab domes, and memories of New Zealand childhood, tells us little of Zion beyond the fact that Arabs are picturesque, that many of them hate the Jews, and that the British far from home are to be pitied—as they are in India—for having caught themselves between two fires. A little more, and the British too will begin to suffer from a persecution mania. And like all sentimentalists, Mr. Bolitho cannot forgive the Jews for trying to acquire a homeland by honorable purchase and open-handed peaceful economic development. "The hideous nightmare in Zionism comes with the recollection that they are buying their land instead of fighting for it." To win Mr. Bolitho's admiration they should, of course, subjugate the Arabs by slaughter, as his own New Zealand pioneers once subjugated the Maoris.

MARVIN LOWENTHAL

Shorter Notices

Twentieth Century Music: How It Developed, How to Listen to It. By Marion Bauer. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.

As a general orientation of the purposes and methods characterizing contemporary music this succinct yet compendious work is highly provocative. Those who seek the salient facts about a multiplicity of men and movements will find a great assortment of such information here, with a thorough index to increase its availability. Those who are interested in noting the connection between the emotional and technical aspects of music will find equally much of value. And as for those who might go to a work on music not for its specific bearing upon this art alone but for the glimpses they may get into cultural issues in general, they will find few books more "barometric" than this one by Miss Bauer. There is a great deal of material bearing upon that bewildering complex of post-Renaissance emphases, which are somehow felt to be integrally related for all their differences: "freedom," innovation, invention, "progress," romanticism, rationalism, nationalism, internationalism, neo-primitivism, individualism and individualistic mysticism, psychologism, subjectivism, realism, impressionism, expressionism, and then, with the rhythmical and tonal resources "freed" almost to the point of chaos, the search for some kind of neo-classical emphasis which will be a "return" without being a "reversion." Miss Bauer herself looks forward to a new romanticism; and indeed, when one considers the contemporary concern with atonality and polytonality, "polyharmony," "polyrhythm," dissonant counterpoint, quarter-tones, and jazz, one must at least admit that the cards seem strongly stacked against the ideals of repose and "renunciation" which characterized classicism as we have known it.

Lynching and the Law. By J. H. Chadbourn. The University of North Carolina Press. $2.

This is a carefully documented study, made under the general auspices of the Southern Commission for the Study of Lynching, of actual existing legislation with regard to lynching in the various States and of how it is enforced. In addition, Mr. Chadbourn makes proposals for legislation which may be more effective in preventing this particular crime. It may be said in brief that in the majority of States adequate legislation is now on the statute books to deal quickly and punitively with lynchers—and that in general such legislation is not adequately invoked. Mr. Chadbourn's investigations also make emphatic refutation of the charge that prompt justice in the courts would prevent lynchings. The percentage of lynchings that take place after protracted court action is extremely small. In most cases the lynching takes place either before the accused is ever brought to jail, while he is being held in jail awaiting the court sitting, or at the close of a court session that has found him guilty—or more rarely innocent—in short order, sometimes within twenty-four hours of apprehending him. Mr. Chadbourn's book is an invaluable compilation of facts without which no intelligent approach to the subject of lynching can be made.

Prolegomena. By Aaron Tani Rosen. Brooklyn: Domino Press.

A first book of poems by a very, very young poet still somewhat obsessed with sex and given to throwing words around. The influence of Hart Crane and Cummings is evident. Nevertheless, this young poet has a kind of originality and daring which may some day result in his writing good poetry. At present he is totally without the ability to criticize his own work. Amazing lines are struck off, some very fine, but there are almost no whole poems that are good.

Films

Nana: Hollywood Model

ONE departs from the luxurious spectacle into which Mr. Samuel Goldwyn has transformed the drab pages of Emile Zola's "Nana" with the uncomfortable feeling that one has assisted at an extremely delicate and rather ghastly surgical operation. The body has lain before us all the while; we cannot pretend not to have recognized certain well-remembered features of its outline; but although it has gone through many of the motions of life, we have known that the brain has been completely and absolutely removed. Having been successfully operated on, like one of those unfortunate dogs in a Pavlov experiment, it has continued to shudder, groan, and twist itself into all sorts of agonized postures. How successfully Mr. Goldwyn has performed his operation on the body of Zola's novel may be judged by the fact that it is possible to sit through the whole of the picture "Nana" without suspecting for a moment that it might have some possible meaning or significance to the mind. With considerably more skill than Dreiser's thesis was eradicated from the Von Sternberg version of "An American Tragedy" has Zola's similar thesis, falling under the Hollywood scalpel, been eradicated from the sentimental costume-drama at the Radio City Music Hall. For it is not true that Mr. Goldwyn's assistants have left out any of the indispensable elements in the narrative development of Zola's story. The opening scenes show us Nana at her mother's grave and a little later scrubbing the floor of a dingy tenement kitchen, thus giving us an impression of the extreme poverty into which she is born and which she must struggle against in her life. The successive stages in her career as music-hall star and courtesan are likewise traced out more or less faithfully according to the order in the novel. And, what is perhaps most remarkable of all, she is required, at least in the version shown in New York, to commit suicide at the end. Everything is unquestionably there, the solid terrain of sociological fact which Zola believed all good novelists should establish in their melancholy fables. Everything is there, if one can only arrange the documents according to some principle of logic that will give them meaning. For it is idle to pretend that they have not been so rearranged in the film that it is practically impossible to extract any kind of meaning from them without a previous acquaintance with the point of view expressed in Zola's book. It is all a question of emphasis, or shall we say of focus, and Mr. Goldwyn has preferred to focus on the less sordid, less disturbing aspects of Nana's career rather than on those aspects which might provide some explanation for her adoption of such a career. The scenes of early poverty, for example, are altogether too few in proportion to those showing the glamorous life of a "gilded fly" in the dressing-rooms of Parisian music-halls and in Fontainebleau villas. Nana's career is made to seem too much like an unblocked pathway of roses before that meaningless pistol shot at the end. As a result, the effect of the picture, if it will have any effect at all, is almost certain to be the exact opposite of the effect that Zola had in mind in writing his book.

What Mr. Goldwyn has preferred to focus on, of course, is the physical attributes of a young actress out of Soviet Russia by the name of Anna Sten. Unfortunately it is impossible to report very clearly on either the personal appearance or the acting ability of this handsome new graduate of the Hollywood make-up laboratories. Watching Miss Sten, whose every syllable, every gesture, every movement of her almost completely despoiled eyelashes have been obviously rehearsed many times, becomes a painful nervous strain. Perhaps Miss Sten has a personality, but it will not be possible to distinguish it until she is permitted a little more freedom of movement and expression. The Third Empire settings with which Miss Sten is surrounded are equally handsome and artificial. It is rather too bad that so little is made of the influence of Degas and Toulouse-Lautrec, which is suggested in several scenes depicting characteristic Parisian life in the seventies. But, then, it is too bad that more was not made of a number of other opportunities present in the Zola story, which still awaits a proper recreation on the screen.

Undoubtedly the chief attraction of "La Frochard et les Deux Orphelines," which has just opened at the Fifty-fifth Street Playhouse, is the presence of Yvette Guilbert in the cast. The film is better acted and produced than its old-fashioned material deserves; for the story is the same heavy admixture of historical melodrama and sentimental pathos that served the Gish sisters many years ago in a film called "Orphans of the Storm." Yvette Guilbert is superb in a minor role, and the direction of Maurice Tourneur is much above the usual level in French productions of this type.

WILLIAM TROY

Drama

Should a Woman Tell?

A PLAYWRIGHT ought not to write a play until after he has decided what it is going to be about. This rule—one of the few of which I feel perfectly sure—would seem to be more or less elementary, but even dramatists of some experience occasionally violate it with results well illustrated in "No Questions Asked," now current at the Masque Theater. The author of this piece, Miss Anne Morrison Chapin, has had a hand in previous plays, including one called "Pigs" which enjoyed some success. Moreover, she writes good dialogue, and she can present a scene in effective fashion when she has got hold of a scene to present, but it is perfectly evident that the only intention behind the present play was the intention to write a play. For a while it was called "Broken Doll," and at that time it was presumably thought of as something in the mood of a sentimental ballad; just before the opening the title was changed to the more "sophisticated" "No Questions Asked," but it might even more appropriately have been the good old standby "Should a Woman Tell?" for that would really indicate the theme from which the author makes persistent but unsuccessful efforts to escape.

It seems that the beautiful heroine had quarreled with her caddish lover just at the moment when she discovered that a child had been conceived. A gilded youth in a state of advanced intoxication interrupts her suicide and they are married—with admirable results so far as the character of the young man is concerned. Now passable plays have been written around this situation before now, and a passable play could doubtless be written again, but our author is determined not to face the cliché which is, after all, the only thing with which she has provided herself. Every time the confrontation seems imminent she introduces a new character or thinks up some more plot. As a result, the stage is so cluttered with secondary personages and the play so elaborately overplotted that by the time one finally reaches the scene which has been inevitable all along it seems even more banal than it needs to seem. Ross Alexander as the bibulous young man and Spring Byington as his wisely tolerant mother do the best they can, but it is not enough. "No Questions Asked" remains only a sort of crazy quilt put together out of innumerable and strangely ill-assorted fragments.

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

PLAYS

FILMS

THE THEATRE GUILD presents

EUGENE O'NEILL'S comedy

AH, WILDERNESS!

with GEORGE M. COHAN

GUILD THEATRE Fifty-second Street, West of Broadway
Eves. 8:20—Mats. Thurs. and Sat., 2:20

MAXWELL ANDERSON'S new play

MARY OF SCOTLAND

with

HELEN HAYES PHILIP MERIVALE HELEN MENKEN

ALVIN THEATRE — 52nd Street, West of Broadway —
Eves. 8:20—Mats. Thurs. & Sat., 2:20

EUGENE O'NEILL'S new play

Days Without End

HENRY MILLER's Theater 43 St. E. of B'way—Eves. 8:40
Matinees Thurs. & Sat. 2:40

THEATRE UNION'S Stirring Hit

PEACE ON EARTH

CIVIC REPERTORY THEATRE, 14th St. & 6th Ave.

Lowest HIT in New York 30c = $1.50 No Tax
Eves. 8:45. Mats. Wed. & Sat., 2:45

THE THEATRE UNION presents

"THE THEATRE in SOCIETY"

A SYMPOSIUM

Henry Hull—Mordecai Gorelik—John Howard Lawson—Albert Maltz—
Blanche Yurka—Kyle Crichton, ChairmanTHE THEATRE UNION DANCERS WITH ANNA SOKOLOV
SUNDAY EVE. FEB. 18 at THE CIVIC REPERTORY
THEATRE, 14th St. and 6th Ave.Admission 25c—50c—75c—Tickets at Box Office
"PEACE ON EARTH" is now playing its twelfth week! See it!

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH says

AH, WILDERNESS! Guild Theater. O'Neill's nostalgic comedy about a youth who discovers love and poetry together. Made doubly effective by the performance of George M. Cohan.

DAYS WITHOUT END. Henry Miller's Theater. O'Neill's latest and much discussed play which may or may not prove that he is ready for conversion to the Catholic Church. Splendidly produced and acted, but not likely to seem very significant to those not religiously inclined.

MARY OF SCOTLAND. Alvin Theater. Helen Hayes and Philip Merivale give fine performances in Maxwell Anderson's play. The biggest dramatic hit of the moment but one which left me a little cold.

MEN IN WHITE. Broadhurst Theater. Fine teamwork on the part of the members of the Group Theater helps to make this play about a young doctor one of the things which must not be missed.

PEACE ON EARTH. Civic Repertory Theater. Propaganda play about the next war, in which the workers strike and a young college professor gets framed for murder. Drawing special but enthusiastic audiences which evidently do not agree with me that the play is quite uninspired.

THE GREEN BAY TREE. Cort Theater. Absorbing psychological drama about a young man who cannot give up luxury for love. Shares with "Men in White" the first place on the list of dramas.

TOBACCO ROAD. 48th Street Theater. Superb performance by Henry Hull in a grotesquely humorous play about total depravity as exhibited by the poor whites of Georgia. Dramatized from a novel by Erskine Caldwell and not likely to be forgotten even by those who find it a little too strong for their stomachs.

It has, moreover, as many moods as it has incidents. Sometimes it is melodrama, sometimes smart comedy, and sometimes good old-fashioned problem play. How was it that Alice described the flavor of the magic medicine? As I remember, there was a suggestion of ginger-beer, of lollypops, and just a souppçon of buttered toast.

"After Such Pleasures" (Bijou Theater) is an odd sort of entertainment based upon Dorothy Parker's volume of the same name. The sketches have not been exactly dramatized but merely turned into dialogues less like plays than like the skits utilized by Ruth Draper or Cornelia Otis Skinner. I am not sure that they really gain very much in presentation, but they are clever enough in themselves, and when one has adjusted oneself to their tenuous texture they furnish an amusing evening. In most of them an unfortunate young man listens to a dramatic monologue uttered in exhibitionistic ecstasy by some loathsome woman, and the nature of Mrs. Parker's malice is too well known to require description. Her range is narrow and the sketches are hardly more than elaborated gags, but such thumb-nail portraits as that of the young lady trying to re-adjust herself to American conditions after a three weeks' stay in Paris or that of a night-club habituée being broad-minded about meeting a Negro singer are as vivid as they are slight. Meditating upon Mrs. Parker's view of human nature I was struck by the fact that the one thing she will never grant one of her creatures is intelligence. Now and then there are faint suggestions of good humor and decency but never a spark of understanding. Some of her women are fatuous and some are witty, but the wits are fundamentally as stupid as the fools. That, indeed, is what gives to her malice its individual flavor. She cannot suffer even bright fools gladly.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Contributors to This Issue

ROBERT DELL is the Geneva correspondent of the Manchester Guardian.

JAMES RORTY is writing a book on advertising, to be called "Advertising—Not to Praise," which will be published this spring.

EMIL LENGYEL, author of "Hitler" and "The Cauldron Boils," will publish at the end of this month a new book entitled "The New Deal in Europe."

P. T. ELLSWORTH is associate professor of economics at the University of Cincinnati.

PAUL Y. ANDERSON is a Washington correspondent of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

JOHN STRACHEY is the author of "The Coming Struggle for Power" and "The Menace of Fascism."

EVELYN SCOTT is the author of "Eva Gay."

V. J. MCGILL, assistant professor of philosophy at Hunter College, is the author of "August Strindberg, the Be-deviled Viking."

MARVIN LOWENTHAL is lecturing on European politics in the Extension Division of New York University.

NEXT WEEK

in THE NATION's Literary Section

Kenneth Burke will review Gertrude Stein's opera, "Four Saints in Three Acts."

Henry Hazlitt will review "Kemmerer on Money."

William Troy will review James Farrell's "The Young Manhood of Studs Lonigan."

CONGRESS

is in Session

Already this interesting assembly has attracted thousands of people to Washington. Many leaders of industry are meeting here daily to discuss their legislative, tax and other problems. Society, too, has taken on vivid color as guest lists read like a World's "Who's Who". You will enjoy Washington this winter.

Assure yourself of exclusive comfort in this delightful hotel. Convenient to financial, shopping and theatre districts. Write or wire for reservations.

Nathan Sinrod, Manager

The HAY-ADAMS HOUSE

LAFAYETTE PARK AT SIXTEENTH • WASHINGTON, D.C.

□ RESTAURANT □

New York's Newest and most Charming Russian Rendezvous—SAMOVAR
Lunch - Tea - Dinner - Supper
Dancing - Entertainment
Vodka—and other liquors & wines
142 West 49 St. BRYANT 9-0683
"Never a Cover Charge"

□ FOR RENT □

FURNISHED ROOMS

LARGE, cheerful Colonial room in home of middle-aged Jewish couple. Every convenience. Use of telephone. Two blocks from "L"; reasonable. Phone evenings Topping 2-8883.

OPPORTUNITY business woman—Large attractive room, 3 windows, private bath. Only guest. References. 233 W. 83rd St., Apt. 3 C.

□ PERSONAL □

WOMAN, 35, American, Jewish, seeks companionship cultured persons whose interests are the intellectual and artistic wealth of New York. Box 294, c/o The Nation.

WANTED

UNIVERSITY woman graduate, seeks and board with cultivated family. Greenwich Village section preferable. Box 297, c/o The Nation.

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

MAR 15

MAR 24

Vol. CXXXVIII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1934

No. 3582

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	231
EDITORIALS:
The Death of Austrian Democracy	234
Air-Mail Graft	235
A Navy for War	236
CARTOON: THE AUSTRIAN WORKER'S LAST STAND. By Gropper	237
ISSUES AND MEN. PROSPERITY AND PRIMING. By Oswald Garrison Villard	238
THE NEW YORK HOTEL STRIKE. By Herbert Solow	239
FASCISM ON THE WEST COAST. By Ella Winter	241
THE BEWILDERED LIBERAL. By Annie Nathan Meyer	243
A NEGRO LOOKS AT SOVIET RUSSIA. By Henry Lee Moon	244
MANCHUKUO AND THE OPIUM TRADE. By Ellen N. La Motte	246
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter	247
CORRESPONDENCE	248
FINANCE: WALL STREET GETS A SHOCK. By Peter Helmoop	249
Noyes	249
THE INTELLIGENT TRAVELER. By John Rothschild	250
BOOKS, MUSIC, DRAMA:
Bystander. By Lionel Wiggam	251
The Biography Rush. By M. R. Werner	251
Studs Lonigan's World. By William Troy	252
A Coonskin Classic. By Mark Van Doren	252
Kemmerer on Money. By Henry Hazlitt	253
Spengler Declines the West. By Lincoln Reis	253
Ugly Duckling. By Clara Gruening Stillman	254
Music: Two Brands of Piety. By Kenneth Burke	256
Drama: Very English and Very Good. By Joseph Wood Krutch	258
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE	258

BOARD OF EDITORS

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
MAURITZ A. HALLGREN MARGARET MARSHALL
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $5.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. British Agent, Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England.

IT IS UNUSUAL that the Russell Sage Foundation should issue a report which declares that the capitalist system has failed in a major industry. It is nothing less than extraordinary when such a report goes on to insist that nationalization of that industry alone would be no remedy and that the sole hope lies in collective ownership and operation of all natural resources as part of a planned economy. This is the conclusion of Mary van Kleeck and a staff of investigators after a fifteen-year study of the coal industry in this and other countries. For fifty years, the report sets forth, the coal industry of this country has been disgraced by unemployment, waste, and discrimination in price against the small consumer. "The most cautious investigator appears now to be justified in drawing the conclusion that these evils are inherent in the system of separate private ownerships—that is, in the capitalist system," is the verdict.

Yet it should be obvious [continues the report] that this problem cannot be solved or even envisaged for one industry alone. It is the problem of the total economic system. . . . The government, which is merely one function of the community, is not a supreme power able to hold the scales of justice in favor of greater efficiency or social righteousness, but must on the contrary be dominated by the strongest power among the conflicting interests which make up the community. . . . The history of failure of efforts to secure even a minimum of control by the federal government in the coal industry suggests that the economic power of the owners is stronger than the government.

THE REPORT of the Russell Sage Foundation goes on to say that the National Industrial Recovery Act does not attempt to lessen this power. It gives to the coal owners the nation's sanction to govern themselves, merely establishing "rules of the game," including minimum wages and maximum hours, while the minimum wage is not large enough for a proper standard of living and the maximum hours are not short enough to give work to all the miners. Most remote of all is any provision for stabilizing employment or eliminating further overdevelopment of the mines. But mere nationalization of the mines would not meet the problem, it is insisted. Mismanagement induced by political considerations would probably follow.

So long as private ownership continued in any important industries, they would dominate government and prevent planning even the governmentally owned industries for social uses. If this conclusion appears to be purely negative—that the United States cannot have a planned economy so long as capitalism continues—it is put forward nevertheless in the interest of the clear thinking which is of great importance in the present crucial period in the history of the United States. . . . A planned economy is an administrative structure predicated upon collective ownership of all branches of production and distribution which are to be planned and administered.

These are strong words. They are, to be sure, what scientific socialists have been saying for a long time, but that they are now said under the sponsorship of the Russell Sage Foundation is not only extraordinary but—we hope—a portent of a reorientation of economic thinking in a large group in this country.

THE RAILROADS have not chosen a propitious moment in which to propose a 15 per cent reduction in wages. Whether justified or not, they were bound to meet with opposition from the workers, the Roosevelt Administration, and the general public. The mere suggestion of a cut in wages, and therefore in purchasing power, runs counter to the philosophy of the New Deal. It also finds the railway workers more eager to defend their interests than they have been for some years. This group feels that it has made as many sacrifices in behalf of the prosperity of the railway lines as have the managers and owners. Some of the workers also believe that they have been slighted by not being included in any of the NRA codes. While Joseph B. Eastman, the Federal Transportation Coordinator, has upheld the right of the railway men to engage in collective bargaining through representatives of their own choosing, he has done nothing as yet to shorten the working week or to revise existing wage agreements. President Roosevelt came quickly to the defense of the workers. In a public letter he pointed out to the railway managers that the welfare of the country demanded that they postpone their wage decision another six months. He also hinted at the possibility of a nation-wide strike in case the railroads refused to alter their attitude. A strike of the employees of the Kansas City Southern lines, which are to put a "revised" wage schedule into effect on March 1, has openly been threatened. For their part, the railroads assert that even with an improvement in business they cannot expect to earn a fair return on their capital and continue to meet the present wage scales. Nor is there any valid reason to suppose that the railroads are not telling the truth. But the solution of the railroad problem does not lie in another cut in wages. It lies in a drastic financial and administrative reorganization of the entire railroad system of the country or, that failing, in government ownership and operation.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT has acted wisely in asking Congress to extend for one year—until July 1, 1935—the temporary provision in the bank-deposit insurance law which guarantees deposits in full only up to $2,500. This means that the provisions guaranteeing deposits in full up to $10,000, and to the extent of 75 per cent between $10,000 and $50,000 and 50 per cent above $50,000, will be suspended for a year. Possibly at the end of a year's consideration they will be abandoned entirely. The present temporary provisions insure in full 97 per cent of all bank depositors. This is sufficient to prevent runs and bank panics, and those who have deposits of more than $2,500 are presumably in a position to look into an individual bank's soundness. The so-called "permanent" provisions would probably not have achieved even temporarily the object they were designed to achieve. For if a depositor who had more than $50,000 in a bank came to feel that that bank was shaky, he would pull out whatever money he had in excess of $10,000 in spite of the guaranty, for he would be no more willing to lose part than all of it. The potential drain of this larger guaranty on the banking system, on the other hand, would have been very heavy; and some authorities had even contended that it threatened the solvency of the whole system. Even the present partial guaranty, to the extent that it does compel soundly managed banks to pay for the mistakes or corruption of bad banks, is more than questionable in principle, for it obviously approaches the banking problem from the wrong end. It is folly to undertake to make good the losses of banks whose policy one cannot control. The first step in the solution of the banking problem is the unified control of all the country's banks by the federal government.

THE FLOW of gold toward these shores has been proceeding at such a rate that it is expected to reach a total of $350,000,000 to $450,000,000 in February alone. Most of it is coming, either directly or indirectly, from France. The inflow has been widely attributed to the "repatriation" of American capital that was sent abroad in anticipation of or during our abandonment of the gold standard. It seems probable, however, that the role of the repatriation of American capital in the current gold movement has been exaggerated. There is no reason, indeed, for supposing that previously frightened American capitalists are now completely confident regarding the permanence of the new level of the dollar; the President has specifically announced that he reserves the right to change it downward by as much as 15 per cent at any time without prior notice. The chief cause for the gold inflow is rather the official undervaluation of the dollar—or, to put it another way, the fact that the United States, under present exchange conditions, is bidding a higher price for gold than any other country. The metal is now gravitating to the United States for the same reason that it gravitated to France in 1928 when the franc was also officially devaluated at an unnecessarily low level. So far the gold drain has not seriously affected the Bank of France, which still reports a gold-reserve ratio of 77¾ per cent, or more than twice as great as it is legally required to keep. Only if the flow of gold toward America reaches a point where it begins to undermine confidence in the franc in France itself, or where it threatens the currency of one of the smaller members of the gold bloc, will the franc be forced off gold. Meanwhile it seems strange that an Administration which has talked so much of "repudiating" gold has consistently followed a policy of reaching out for, seizing, and hoarding it—at whatever cost to the rest of the world—on a scale hitherto unheard of.

THE National Committee for the Protection of the Child has had a number of things to say lately about the child-labor amendment to the Constitution, now ratified by twenty States. This committee would protect children from the horrid officers who might seek to prevent them, under the proposed new law, from helping their mothers with the dishes or fetching in wood for the kitchen stove. This sort of nonsense might be ignored if it did not issue from the mouths of prominent persons, among them none other than A. Lawrence Lowell, president emeritus of Harvard University. Mr. Lowell declares that he, too, wants to prohibit the exploitation of children in "factories, mines, and industries." But he is unwilling to support an amendment to the Constitution which would do just that because the amendment might also prevent boys and girls from earning their way through college or might permit the invasion of the American home. The President of the United States takes a more realistic view of child labor. In a letter to Mrs. LaRue Brown of Boston he came out flatly and unequivocally for the amendment. "Of course I am in favor of it," he said. "It is my opinion that the matter hardly requires further academic discussion." Mr. Roosevelt evidently had not had the opportunity to listen to Mr. Lowell. But the news bureaus had, it would seem. For the President's letter, which might be thought to be news of the first order, was relegated, when it was carried at all, to an obscure position. The Associated Press did not think it worth sending out except to New England. Statements from Alfred E. Smith, Nicholas Murray Butler, Cardinal O'Connell, and others, agreeing in substance with the pious fears of Mr. Lowell for the sanctity of the home, did, however, reach readers all over the country. Evidently what the President says is news—except when he is in favor of a bill that, among other things, would prevent using small boys to peddle newspapers during all hours of the day or night.

WITHOUT TRYING to keep up with the changing status of the LaGuardia economy bill, a few general remarks are worth making. First, the Mayor of New York City has shown himself from the beginning ready to listen to honest objections to the bill and has been willing to make such amendments as were thought to be needed to safeguard the rights of the city workers affected. Second, the lobby that has formed in opposition to the bill, including in some measure the spokesmen for the school teachers, is obviously political in character and entirely selfish in aim. Third, the kind of aid Postmaster-General Farley is giving to the bill will not help it, nor is it designed to; everybody knows that Mr. Farley has only definitely to ask for support and he will get it. Finally, the measure itself is not perfect; it does contravene campaign promises that should never have been made; it does place the burden of economy for the present on certain groups of moderately paid employees. But it is an emergency measure, designed to bring the city out of an immediate crisis. Nobody can doubt that Mayor LaGuardia will in the course of the next few months propose other ways of raising money. New taxes must be levied, although whether additional taxes on real estate can be collected is another matter; the question of reducing the bond interest must be gone into thoroughly. Assemblyman Theodore of Manhattan, in a debate on the bill on February 14, said: "We don't care whether New York City goes bankrupt; we don't care whether the United States government goes bankrupt; this government is going to proceed on the basis on which it was founded." Mr. Theodore later tried to have his remarks expunged from the record. They are, however, all too characteristic of most of the opposition to Mayor LaGuardia's proposal.

SHOULD the minds of prisoners be free even though their bodies are not? The question has long caused considerable controversy in American prisons when it comes to the reading matter which prisoners are allowed to receive. Practice varies in different prisons and according to wardens, and the issue was raised lately at Sing Sing by the imposition of a ban upon certain radical publications, notably the Communist New Masses, Labor Defender, and Daily Worker. The National Committee for the Defense of Political Prisoners responded by sending a delegation to Lewis E. Lawes, warden of the famous New York prison, to protest that no provision of law authorized withholding from a prisoner any literature legally transmittable through the mails. Mr. Lawes, who is recognized as a liberal and progressive prison official, eventually agreed, although without abandoning his claim to the right to censor prisoners' reading matter, that inmates of Sing Sing might receive any publications which they desired, provided the warden did not regard the cartoons as inflammatory. The delegation felt that practically if not technically it had won its case, but the issue there and elsewhere deserves further clarification. There is no justification for incarcerating the mind as well as the body of a prisoner. Even if it were theoretically desirable, no method has been discovered by which censorship can be carried out without the exercise of partisanship and, usually, stupidity.

ST. LOUIS and the large metropolitan area of which it is the center have been shocked by a series of tragic deaths resulting from illegal operations performed by a physically incapacitated seventy-one-year-old midwife. Seven women died within a brief period from abortions which she is said to have performed, and the grief-stricken husband of one of them ended his own life at his wife's grave. In one case it was explained that the operation was resorted to because the woman was the mother of a seven-months-old baby. Surely if word of this could be made to reach each member of Congress, the Pierce-Hastings bill to remove the Comstock-imposed restrictions against using the mails and common carriers for distributing birth-control information and supplies would be speedily reported out of committee and passed. That there is a definite relationship between abortions, with the deaths which so frequently result from them, and lack of easy access to contraceptive information cannot be doubted. Every obstetrician and every social worker knows that abortions are most common where law and custom make it difficult for women to learn how to limit the size of their families. The question of legalizing such operations need not enter into the discussion. The point is that the ban on birth control sends hundreds of women every day to persons who are without medical skill or professional ethics. The woman who did the operating in the cases in and about St. Louis, it was discovered, did not have so much as a midwife's license. Other arguments for birth control relate for the most part to economic and social health; the St. Louis tragedies offer an argument involving that which is most precious of all—human life.

THE LATEST INCIDENT in the Rivera-Rockefeller controversy occurred when the panel containing the head of Lenin was "removed" in a cloud of plaster dust from the wall in Rockefeller Center in New York City, where it had stood under a concealing screen since last spring. In other words, the Rockefellers, well known as patrons of art, have destroyed, for purely commercial reasons, an important work by the world's most famous mural painter. But it is difficult to see what Rockefeller Center has gained, even commercially, from the petty squabble which it has pursued even to the point of destroying an original and irreplaceable creation of a fine artist. To be sure, Lenin's head is no longer on the wall to scare faint-hearted tenants. But what sightseer will not ask to see the place where it once was? And will Rockefeller Center ever be separated in the public mind from Lenin, Rivera, and communism? We doubt it. Moreover, the present agitation by artists and intellectuals—the darlings of Rockefeller foundations—to boycott the Center will not be the last, and even a renting agent must recognize such agitation as bad publicity. Altogether, the Rivera episode was one of the Rockefellers' less successful ventures in oil.

THE NATION announces with regret the resignation of Ernest Gruening from the board of editors. He has left to become editor of the New York Evening Post, which under the ownership of J. David Stern is undergoing a most impressive reorientation as an independent, progressive journal. In his new capacity Ernest Gruening will have an opportunity to exercise his great gifts as a crusader and as the proponent of a vigorous, liberal public policy. His militant and dynamic temper is exactly what is needed in the feeble ranks of daily journalism in New York. While the editors of The Nation regret the loss of so able a colleague, we cannot but congratulate ourselves as well as the Evening Post upon the injection of this spirit into the pages of a newspaper that once was a great force in American journalism and will, we feel sure, under the leadership of Mr. Stern and Mr. Gruening, soon achieve that position again.

The Death of Austrian Democracy

AUSTRIA'S workers, forced to retreat before the superior strength of an armed dictatorship, have now been utterly defeated. But in its defeat Austrian labor won its greatest triumph, for it served notice on the ruling classes that working men and women in the future will resist attempts to rob them of their rights and their organizations. The disappointment of a large portion of the working masses all over the world when, in 1914, the Socialist parties succumbed to militarist leaders, the despondency that lamed their efforts after the German labor parties permitted themselves to be swept away by the National Socialist flood in January, 1933, will give place to a new hope.

An interview by the Vienna correspondent of the New York Times with Otto Bauer, the most prominent of the leaders of the Austrian Social Democracy, shows to what lengths the party had gone since last March to come to an understanding with the Dollfuss regime. The little Napoleon at the head of Austria declined almost from the outset to negotiate with the Social Democrats, yet the latter tried again and again, through the mediation of Christian Social leaders, the Austrian President, the clergy, and finally the Cardinal of Vienna, to come to an understanding with the government. Indeed, in its desire to prevent at all costs the establishment of a National Socialist dictatorship the Social Democracy undoubtedly went a great deal farther in its toleration of the Dollfuss Government than the largest party in the country, particularly a labor party, had any right to do. It even offered to accept a law that would authorize Dollfuss to reign for two years by decrees, without convening the Reichsrat.

In his recent radio speech, broadcast in the United States, the chief of the Austrian government repeated the statement he had made on previous occasions—that the Social Democratic leaders had provoked the recent showdown, for which they had been preparing for years past, and had thus contravened the peaceable intentions of the government. This Otto Bauer emphatically refutes. When the aggressive measures of the government had made it clear that the showdown had to come, he says, the Socialist Party leadership made a last effort to hold back its followers and avoid an open break. Vice-Chancellor Fey had used the absence of the Chancellor in Budapest—surely as the result of an understanding with him—to perpetrate a series of provocative measures against organized labor. He placed Heimwehr troops in the building of the Vienna Arbeiterzeitung and the office of the party executive and stopped the publication of the Socialist organ. Yet the workers of Vienna made no attempt to resist. The Heimwehr thereupon turned its attention to the provinces. In Linz and Graz similar outrages were committed, but the Heimwehr found the workers less complacent in those cities. On February 11 a Socialist coming from Linz warned Otto Bauer that the comrades were preparing to defend themselves against further Heimwehr encroachments. He at once sent an urgent message to Linz to avoid an open conflict at all costs until Monday's conference with Dollfuss, the Heimwehr leaders, and the provincial governors should have brought a decision. But the next morning the Heimwehr raided the headquarters of the Linz Socialists, killing two and wounding several of the resisting workers.

The government used this critical moment to search the municipal apartment houses in Vienna for hidden arms. Provoked beyond endurance, the Social Democracy at last decided to act in defense of the last few pitiable rights it had. Parliament had been dissolved, the shop councils abolished, trade unions deprived of every possibility for action, the Socialist press outlawed, the party itself declared illegal and many of its leaders arrested. The violation of the homes of the workers was the last straw. Now the party had no alternative but utter degradation or open resistance. It chose the latter. The splendid men of the workers' defense corps fought with courage and self-sacrificing devotion. Their leaders remained at their posts until the last. Karl Seitz, the Mayor of Vienna, was arrested at his desk in the Rathaus. Otto Bauer modestly termed himself "political commissar in the Republican Defense Corps," while Dr. Deutsch, War Minister in the Social Democratic Government set up after the March revolution in 1919, led the Republikanische Schutzbund which he himself had organized.

What the immediate future will bring in Austria is not hard to foretell. Dollfuss, having delivered himself into the hands of the Heimwehr fascists, will dissolve the country's political parties and establish the "Fatherland Front." The abolition of Dollfuss's own party—the Christian Social Party—has already been announced. In accordance with an agreement made last summer with Mussolini in the Italian capital, an agreement that Rome no longer attempts to deny, Prince Starhemberg, Heimwehr leader, enters the Cabinet. Italian fascism has stolen a march on its German competitor. Premier Dollfuss announces the immediate reorganization of Austria on fascist lines. A new constitution drawn up by Dr. Ender, minister without portfolio in the Dollfuss Government, will give the "authoritative state" whatever "constitutionality" it may require. The removal of all municipal, provincial, and national officials elected by or with the help of the Social Democratic Party has already been decreed. Until the adoption of a new constitution, says a Cabinet order of February 19, all civil rights remain in force "unless suspended by special decrees." Military courts remain in power while "a state of emergency exists." The Austrian Jew is practically outlawed. In this matter, Prince Starhemberg, who declared the Jews to be the "most dangerous element in the population and the leaders of all treacherous activity against the state," will have his way. The arrest of a large number of Jewish lawyers and physicians is the first sign of a growing terrorism that is driving thousands of panic-stricken Jews across the Austrian border. After labor, they will be the chief victims of the new order.

But Austria's political problems are far from solved. The Nazis will continue to fight against the Dollfuss-Heimwehr regime until a number of National Socialists are taken into the Cabinet. This will happen the more speedily since Socialist voters in considerable numbers will be impelled by their hatred of the present regime to support the Nazi cause.

Dollfuss, having incurred the enmity of important elements in the Christian Social Party, will not be able to count on its support against a National Socialist opposition. He will have to abdicate or agree to a compromise with the National Socialists that will leave them, sooner rather than later, in complete possession of the field. The shortsightedness of the leaders of the Austrian government, who hope, now that they have suppressed the workers' organizations, to win a victory over the National Socialists, is characteristic. Dollfuss from the very beginning pivoted his strength on the support of foreign governments rather than on support within his own nation. Whenever Austria threatened to succumb to its own economic inadequacy he appealed to the Powers and received a few crumbs which barely sufficed to tide the nation over its most immediate and pressing needs. He traveled to Rome, to Budapest, to Paris, and to Prague for help against the German Nazis and against the Anschluss movement from Berlin, and must now content himself with a "statement" by Great Britain, France, and Italy supporting Austrian independence in such diplomatic terms that it does not even mention Germany. The German press comments on the statement by the three nations with wide-eyed approval. No one in Germany, it insists, has the slightest intention of violating Austrian independence. But directly thereafter Theodor Habicht, Nazi "Inspector-general of Austria," gave Dollfuss eight days to "cooperate" with the National Socialists or expect a fight to the finish. This challenge is momentous.

It is more than doubtful that Dollfuss will be appeased by the declaration of the three Powers, particularly since it was obviously issued to anticipate his appeal to the League of Nations. Such an appeal would have forced the Powers to take a stand and had to be prevented. France, though opposed to the union of Germany and Austria because it fears the consequent strengthening of German power, is equally disinclined to pull chestnuts out of the fire for Italy. Britain is similarly reluctant to take sides. There is one alternative to a union of Austria and the Reich—the movement of the Danube states toward an economic federation. But such a federation presents difficulties because of conflicting interests on the Continent. France desires a federation of states that will give it a commanding influence. Italy seeks to exert its influence in the same region for the development of its industries and its agriculture. In this case Great Britain is the laughing bystander, not at all averse to the spectacle of its two chief competitors at each other's throats.

The real struggle for supremacy in Central Europe, and by that token in all Europe, has only just begun. Democracy has been driven into a highly precarious position of defense. Hungary, under Gömbös, is merely waiting an auspicious moment to open its doors to Italian fascism. Negotiations for the conclusion of a trade agreement between Austria and Hungary—this news significantly enough reaches the world by way of Rome—have reached a stage which shows to what extent Italy has temporarily encircled Austria's political horizon.

This irreconcilable conflict of interests between the great nations of Europe effectively blocks any assault on the progress of fascism that the democratic nations of Europe might conceivably have made. In the struggle between nationalism and democratic ideals democracy is fighting a losing battle in every important country of Europe.

Air-Mail Graft

ON February 9 Postmaster-General Farley, with the knowledge and consent of the President, issued an order canceling all air-mail contracts, and announced that beginning February 19 and until further notice army pilots would fly the mail. The cries of the wounded air companies thereupon filled the ether; the New York Herald Tribune with fine sarcasm called the action "Government by Royal Decree" and wrung its hands over the attempt to stifle a flourishing infant industry, while Colonel Lindbergh advised the President by telegraph that he was making a big mistake. Transcontinental and Western Air, the airways company with which the Colonel is connected, attempted to get a temporary injunction restraining the government from cancellation of its contract. This attempt at legal restraint was refused in the United States District Court by Judge John C. Knox for want of jurisdiction.

The reply to the protests which have reached the White House over the high-handedness of the government's action may be made simply enough. The special Senate Committee on Investigation of Air-Mail and Ocean-Mail Contracts, under the chairmanship of Senator Black, has for more than a month been listening to a tale of wild stock promotion, huge profits, $500 investments growing to millions, all at the expense of the government of the United States. Mr. Farley declares that excess payments to air companies by the government have amounted to approximately $46,800,000. The chairman of the board of the United Aircraft and Transportation Company made profits of $12,000,000 from an original investment of less than half a million. The National City Company, in the merger which created the United Aircraft Company, made $5,895,000. Frederick B. Rentschler, vice-chairman of the same board, told the Senate committee that an investment of $275 had brought him $35,000,000. All this would be unfortunate enough, but there were other aspects of the air companies' conduct of their business that were more dangerously reprehensible. Two meetings were held, on May 19 and on June 4, 1930, at which according to Mr. Farley, representatives of the large airways companies, having squeezed out all small bidders, sat together and distributed among themselves the various portions of the government-subsidized air-mail service. The meetings were called by W. Irving Glover, Second Assistant Postmaster-General. Mr. Farley holds that the contracts were awarded without competitive bidding, in direct contravention of the law which declares that contracts so awarded are illegal. Former Postmaster-General Brown, although he admits the meetings were held, denies that collusion took place.

Meanwhile, the army carries the mail. Its fliers can learn in fairly short order to do the job that is required of them. It may be that at some later time the air mails will be turned back to private lines under a slightly different arrangement from that which has lately been ended. The air lines whose contracts have been canceled are prohibited for five years from bidding on any new contracts. One cannot help discerning a certain amount of poetic justice in this. And after all, gentlemen who made profits of millions on modest investments can perhaps afford to let somebody else take the profits for a while.

A Navy for War

BIG navies are never built for peaceful purposes. They are built for war, usually for a particular war which the admirals foresee or pretend to foresee. The admirals plan their construction with definite "problems" and "objectives" in mind; otherwise, even from their point of view, expenditures on new ships and guns would be a waste of money. What problem of war the Roosevelt navy is to solve is not at all clear. On this point there is the customary silence. It is being argued that the present program, or the larger part of it, may never leave the paper stage, but will be used instead for bargaining at the forthcoming naval conference. However, the speed with which the first projects on the program have been started seems to belie this contention. When the question is put to Navy and State Department officials, they meet it with knowing smiles and with the suggestion that, whatever happens at the conference, the United States will then, if the Vinson bill finally becomes law, already have under way a program providing for the construction of the largest and costliest navy in the world.

What do the admirals want and how much have they so far obtained? They want a minimum of 148 ships to be completed no later than the year 1942. Contracts have already been awarded and work has begun on twenty-one ships, including two aircraft carriers, one heavy cruiser, two light cruisers, fourteen destroyers, and two submarines. Sixteen of these are being financed by the Public Works Administration, the remaining five out of current Navy Department appropriations. The entire program, together with the year in which construction is to begin on each ship, appears below:

Type	No.	Unit tonnage	Fiscal year
			1934	1935	1936	1937	1938	1939	1940
Aircraft carriers	2	20,000	2	0
" "	1	15,200	1
Cruisers:
8-inch.....	1	10,000	..	1
6-inch.....	7	10,000	4	2	1	0
Destroyers.....	9	1,850	4	2	2	1	0	0	..
" "	76	1,500	16	12	12	12	12	12	..
Submarines....	39	1,130	4	6	6	6	6	6	5
Gunboats(sloops)	13	2,000	2	2	3	3	3
Total.....	32	25	22	19	21	21	8

The Vinson bill, which was approved by the House without a record vote and sent to the Senate, authorizes the President to undertake the construction of an aircraft carrier, 99,200 tons of destroyers, and 35,530 tons of submarines. In addition, the President is "authorized to replace, by vessels of modern design and construction, vessels in the navy in the categories limited by the treaties signed at Washington, February 6, 1922, and at London, April 22, 1930, when their replacement is permitted by the said treaties." Thus this measure, together with the PWA program and the authorization of five cruisers voted in 1929, gives the admirals substantially everything they have asked for.

The cost? This is difficult to reckon, but it will be enormous in any case. The ships being built with PWA money will cost a total of $238,000,000. Those contemplated under the Vinson bill will probably cost $475,000,000. Assistant Secretary of the Navy Roosevelt first estimated the latter sum at $380,329,250, but in appearing before the House Naval Affairs Committee he pointed out that this figure was based on costs worked out before the Recovery Act went into effect. The NRA, he said, has added at least 25 per cent to these costs, or approximately $95,000,000. For new ship construction alone, then, the huge sum of $713,000,000 is to be spent if the Vinson bill is not stopped; and this total does not include building work already started and being paid for out of current appropriations, and does not take into consideration the probability that armor-plate costs may rise still farther. Nor does it include expenditures for approximately 2,000 new airplanes to be built for the navy.

Other naval expenses will naturally rise in proportion. For example, the enlisted force of the navy is to be increased from 79,700 to 82,500 men, and that of the marine corps from 15,000 to 16,000 men. This will add $2,700,000 to the annual budget. The extra fuel needed will add another $1,000,000. In 1933 actual naval expenditures, including new building, totaled $349,561,924. For the current fiscal year such expenditures have been estimated at $337,178,400, of which $56,063,200 will come from emergency funds. But for the year 1935, when the building program is expected to be in full swing, the budgetary estimate jumps to $454,849,700, of which $144,669,400 is to come from emergency funds. Admiral William H. Standley, Chief of Naval Operations, testified before the House committee that it would cost about $425,000,000 a year "to build, maintain, and operate a modern fleet at treaty limits." The budgetary estimate for 1935 suggests that his guess was conservative rather than liberal. In the decade from 1923 to 1932 the annual cost of the navy averaged only $339,000,000, and in the period immediately before the World War the average annual cost ran only to $145,000,000. In contrast we shall be spending three times that much for new construction and operating expenses during each of the next seven years, the period covered by the present program, or more than three billion dollars in all at the very lowest.

Can the Roosevelt Administration really justify this enormous expenditure? Before acting on the Vinson bill, the Senate should demand a straightforward explanation from the White House and Navy Department. Before all else it should insist upon a sweeping investigation of the munitions industry as provided in a resolution introduced by Senator Nye. The admirals no doubt really believe that they are preparing for an emergency, but it may be possible, since it has happened before, that we shall find the munitions makers at work in the background. The very shipbuilding companies that will profit by the new program were once investigated and severely criticized by Congress. At another time they were exposed in a frank and ruthless manner by Secretary of the Navy Daniels, whose first assistant was Franklin D. Roosevelt. Nor has their connection with the Shearer case been forgotten. Lastly, there are the charges of Senator Trammell that the same companies entered into collusive bidding in order to have the construction contracts under the PWA allotment distributed equally among them. Despite the whitewash report which Admiral Standley handed the President, and which the latter accepted unquestioningly, these charges have never been disproved. Before it lifts a finger to aid the admirals in putting across their costly and menacing program, the Senate should determine for itself and for the public just what forces are behind the program.

The Austrian Worker's Last Stand

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

Issues and Men

Prosperity and Priming

St. Paul, February 16

IS it the government's priming of the industrial machine which has improved conditions or is there a real upturn? This is the question that I have just asked in Cincinnati, Cleveland, Buffalo, Chicago, Champaign, Milwaukee, St. Paul, and Minneapolis, and people have been just as eager to put it to me as I have been to receive an answer. It is the great mystery of the hour. But one thing is not in doubt, and that is that the automobile business is booming everywhere. In several cities, especially in Cincinnati, I learned that the local agents cannot fill their orders, and that some are saying that they cannot supply cars until April. The delay is due in part to the die-workers' strike in Detroit, but orders are still way ahead of last year.

Well, that seems to upset the theory that the improved conditions in some lines are wholly due to government money. Not in every case however. One agent wired in from a Dakota town that he wanted a thousand cars at once, and when asked to explain, said that the farmers had been getting government money from two sources and that he proposed to get it away from them! None the less, it will hardly be maintained that the CWA workers have made enough money to buy cars, nor has the PWA yet gone so far as to be an important cause of the increased motor sales. Undoubtedly there is some natural demand for new cars because so many people have held on to their old ones until they are beginning to fall to pieces; this is particularly true of persons whose cars are indispensable tools of their trade. Again, it is suggested that some people have been hoarding their dollars right along and are now beginning to fish them out, and that others who are in fear of inflation may be buying now in order to have a new car when inflation comes. Whatever the reasons, the fact is that the automobile trade is booming, as was shown by the record-breaking attendance at the St. Paul automobile show, which has just ended to the satisfaction of the dealers.

When one looks elsewhere one finds that operators in the great Gary-Hammond-East Chicago heavy-industry district are feeling greatly cheered up, but here too it is the automobile which is putting more and more blast furnaces into service. The operators admit freely that they are getting no orders except from motor companies. In Milwaukee I heard that two more ferries across the lake had been put into service, and there again it turned out that the chief cause was the increased number of car frames which are being sent that way to save a day's time to the East. One does find, however, the same pick-up in the chemical industry that is noticeable in the East, and textiles are doing well. Local trade is better and so is newspaper advertising, but in this the CWA is a factor, for the CWA workers are buying clothes as fast as possible.

Right here I ran into a phase of the CWA which is not a little worrisome to city officials with whom I have talked. They are frankly appalled by the President's statement that he will not continue the CWA beyond May 1. This is not because they do not wish again to have to give food and clothing to those workers who will come back on their hands. That is not what is frightening them. They are alarmed by the ugly spirit developed by those of the CWA men who for one reason or another have already been laid off. These men are fighting mad. They think that they have been discriminated against and they have tasted blood. That is, after having been out of work for three or more years, they want to go on working, and they say that if the government has the money to give them jobs now, it can continue to do so. The budget figures which they read in the newspapers help to make them feel that the government can go on paying them if it wants to, especially as in some cases they are being paid at a higher hourly rate than ever before in their lives. They are in the state of mind which makes them declare that if the government is not going to take care of them after May 1 they will know the reason why. One mayor spoke to me with real alarm of the prospect and said that for the first time he feared serious trouble.

Meanwhile some idea of the cultural losses already recorded or threatened can be had from the stereotyped reports of teachers out of work or underpaid and overburdened, of social services being curtailed or abandoned, and here in Minneapolis of an impending move to close the Public Library for a period of not less than three months. It is said that this threat is really a bluff to get the library workers to accept a cut in pay. But that such a thing should even be contemplated speaks for itself, and so does the fact that the libraries in many places have practically stopped buying books. At Winnipeg there has just been a discussion in the Manitoba legislature of the fact that seventy-three municipalities have succeeded in balancing their budgets, during which the opposition brought out the truth that this was almost entirely achieved by cutting the teachers' salaries to the bone.

Upon one thing all with whom I have talked are in agreement; that is the continuing and, if anything, growing popularity of the President. Some newspapermen and politicians here in the Twin Cities say that if the President were running for office this coming fall he would poll more than 90 per cent of the vote! This does not mean that the Democratic Party is profiting by Mr. Roosevelt's hold upon the people; in Minnesota, for example, the power of the Farmer-Labor Party is unshaken. And it is of course true that Demos will turn upon the President if he does anything to forfeit its confidence. As is always the case, a single misstep may offset many, many good deeds. But at present everybody feels that the President is trying his level best and working not for himself but for the public weal. After Herbert Hoover that seems a tremendous lot!

Donald Garrison Kiland

The New York Hotel Strike

By HERBERT SOLOW

AFTER the war the hotel industry expanded enormously on borrowed millions. Today every hotel is heavily burdened financially; many are under bank control. The bankers have said that the financial problem must be solved not by cutting interest, insurance, or depreciation charges—the last of which is sometimes written up to 9 per cent per annum—but by cutting the cost of food, supplies, and labor. The result has been an attack on labor's status throughout the industry.

The United States Department of Labor reports 25 per cent wage cuts ($5 off $20) during recent years, and hours increased from forty-eight to fifty-four weekly. A survey made by the Hotel and Restaurant Workers' Union shows that skilled cooks who averaged $40.88 when hired were getting $30.04 at the end of 1933. The number of employees was also cut and the assignment of each increased. Men were charged for laundry and uniforms; food was generally poor and had to be eaten under disgusting conditions; workers were often fired arbitrarily; seasonal lay-offs became widespread.

Cooks who had spent eighteen years learning the profession were deeply dissatisfied. Waiters who served delicacies to richly gowned diners found "philosophy" difficult when they contemplated their families' fate. Dishwashers and bus boys were abjectly miserable. The NRA? The bosses' code calls for a fifty-four-hour week (in practice sixty) and a minimum wage of twenty-eight cents an hour (reducible in certain cases to twenty cents); in general the code makes the steel barons' code read like a labor charter. As conditions grew worse, the mood of discontent sought an outlet.

Three unions were in the field. The Food Workers' Industrial Union, a tool of the Communist Party, was regarded by conservative workers as "too red," by militant unionists as a disruptive force. For the A. F. of L. nobody had any use, if only because its Local 16 is run by a scabbing, racketeering clique whose chief is under indictment. Workers turned to the semi-somnolent Hotel and Restaurant Workers' Union, a branch of the Amalgamated Food Workers' Union, which thereupon launched an organization drive. Its industrial structure, democratic constitution, low dues, and freedom from racketeers and high-priced bureaucrats were attractions. It grew by leaps and bounds. The bosses, through the Hotel Men's Association, raised a war fund and tried to force workers into the Federation of Hotel and Restaurant Guilds. When this federation advertised for scabs to break the A. F. of L.'s threatened New Year's Eve strike against the bosses' code, it became clear that it was a bosses' company union. When the strike threat turned out to be a bluff, the A. F. of L. lost all caste.

The bosses began firing Amalgamated men. The Waldorf fired Garde-manger Fournigault, who had successfully tickled elite palates since the hotel opened two and a half years ago. At 7 p.m. on January 23 all dining-room, kitchen, and room-service staffs walked out in protest. Hundreds of disappointed diners pleaded not to be starved. "We have starrved for yearrrs; trrry it forrr one meal," shouted a Gascon commis. The Sert Room Orchestra played on as when the Lusitania sank. And the Waldorf, regarded by bosses and men as the industry's flagship, went down. Six hundred skilled and unskilled men, minus a handful of waverers, abandoned a cursing Oscar and a tearful management.

Next day the Amalgamated members, without a dissenting voice, voted a general strike. The bosses were given forty-eight hours to rehire Fournigault, recognize the union, institute the forty-hour week and $20 minimum wage, and abolish split watches and all meal, uniform, and laundry charges. Receiving no answer, the union put the strike resolution into effect. In addition to the now approximately 5,000 union members, thousands of others, including unemployed men, took out strike cards. Scab crews could not provide normal cooking or service; each day more big hotels and restaurants were crippled.

Chairman Herrick of the Regional Labor Board stated she would not intervene because the strike was not important enough; later she said that she had not been officially notified of a strike. After the union formally told her what the whole city knew, and stated its readiness to negotiate, she failed to get the bosses to respond. When strikers waited on her, she scolded and treated contemptuously the union officials. Workers who had hoped the NRA would help them began to wonder whether it was not a branch of the Hotel Men's Association.

The commercial press kicked the strike around the lot. It featured bosses' statements—including misleading ads—and played down union statements. It persistently underestimated the effectiveness of the strike, falsely accused the strikers of violence, suppressed news of the bosses' use of thugs. It hinted or charged an anti-NRA attitude, graft, and red plots. It demanded that the government intervene lest the "public," unable to get a decent filet de sole aux crevettes, go hungry. The World-Telegram attacked the fight for union recognition and declared that the "public" wants "smooth continuance of the status quo." The Evening Post, recently freed from reactionary control and seeking to become the city's liberal voice, was the sole commercial paper to give the strikers a look-in.

Public bodies have been charged with strike-breaking. Certainly the State Employment Service, while keeping within the letter of the Wagner-Peyser bill, routed workers to scab jobs. A. F. of L. Local 16 not only provided scabs; it asked—and got—an injunction to restrain the Amalgamated from conspiracy to ruin its racket by calling out workers in shops in which it holds labor contracts! In response, other A. F. of L. locals ruled that any members scabbing would be expelled. Several liberal organizations refused to hold banquets scheduled for scab hotels, and individual liberals publicly backed the strike.

Despite all opposition the strike tide rose steadily for two weeks and the men picketed through the coldest weather in local history. Meanwhile, within the strike committee there developed disagreements between a right wing, backed largely by the older, skilled, better-paid workers, and a progressive group, backed largely by the younger, unskilled, most-exploited elements.

The right wing looked to the Labor Board to force the bosses to settle and concentrated on plans to win it over. It may not have felt that Roosevelt's photograph would guarantee victory, but it expressed fears that not to have a photograph would be to confess political radicalism and court disaster. The progressives preferred to omit icons, to put no trust in the Lord or the Labor Board, to draw no lines against radicals, and to demonstrate and build the strike's power by aggressive meetings, parades, and mass picket lines. Thus they hoped to force negotiations and a favorable settlement, perhaps through intervention even of an unwilling Labor Board. Again the old dispute: class collaboration against class struggle.

The progressives, few in number and without formal organization, included political radicals of several shades and conservative workers with militant strike experience. Its clearest voices were J. P. Cannon of the Communist League ("Trotzkyites") and the league organ, The Militant, which published a series of special strike numbers. Stimulating the wave of militancy which carried the workers out of the shops, the progressives had an initial advantage. Fawning before the Labor Board was discouraged, a close-knit organization was begun in order to draw all strikers into active work deciding and executing policy, attempts to raise a red scare were attacked, and impressive mass demonstrations were organized.

At first the Communist Party union, best-known in the industry as the "Eighteenth Street gang," tried to recruit strikers and set up a rival strike leadership. Failing, it ordered its men to "bore from within." Once inside the general strike organization, it sought to raise Eighteenth Street's prestige by denouncing the Amalgamated and the strike leaders. The Daily Worker supported it with a campaign of slander against the other groups.

These disruptive activities fortified the right wing. From denouncing disrupters, it went on to bait radicals. Soon somebody even asked that young Socialists doing volunteer office work take off their red ties! What the right hardly dared whisper at first, it now began to shout; militancy was denounced, the NRA was characterized as the strikers' main hope, and the Roosevelt photograph materialized. Caught between two fires, the progressive group did not find its situation eased when B. J. Field, union secretary, originally regarded as a progressive, began to borrow many right-wing views. For example, he challenged the right of the Eighteenth Streeters to hold offices on the strike committee. It was a "Trotzkyite" who, after vigorously condemning Eighteenth Street's disruptiveness, insisted that strike democracy be maintained and that no political distinctions be drawn against non-Amalgamated people or radicals of any stamp.

This time the progressives won a smashing victory. But there were many defeats, especially when it came to executing decisions. The right did not throw its force behind committee decisions of progressive origin designed to maintain and stimulate militancy. Agitation in all forms was neglected and impeded by the right. Consequently the strikers' morale sagged toward the end of the second week and a few days later some discouraged strikers began to return to work.

Suspecting the situation, the bosses advertised that they would deal individually with each striker and rehire the "meritorious," that is, all not suspected of devotion to unionism. No change in conditions, wages, or hours was offered. Then, answering an appeal of a group of prominent liberal intellectuals, Mayor La Guardia called the union into conference.

A conference with the Labor Board resulted, and on February 15 the strikers approved a compromise settlement, signed by Secretary Field and the Labor Board, which claimed to have authority also from the Hotel Men's Association. The agreement purported to guarantee rehiring of all strikers, the holding of hearings before the board on conditions of work, hours, and rates of pay, the setting up of committees of workers in the various hotels to oversee the rehiring of the strikers, and the provision that at the board's hearings "the organized workers' side shall be presented by the union," which last amounted to de facto recognition of the union.

But when the workers' committees went to the hotels, some owners refused to see them, while others stated that they knew nothing about the settlement which the Labor Board had signed. At this point the board sent a telegram to Field which pretty clearly indicates the sympathies of Mrs. Herrick and Mr. Golden of the board. The telegram read as follows:

The fact that you have twisted to further your own ends the interpretation of the offer for settlement by the hotel men and as accepted by your executive committee is further evidence that the strike was unwarranted and that you do not represent more than a minority of the workers. . . . Unless pickets are removed immediately, according to our agreement of yesterday, the Regional Labor Board shall feel compelled to release the Hotel Association from its offer. . . . Due to the fact that you have seen fit to construe the suggestion for committees to interview the hotel management as union recognition, the Regional Labor Board now recommends that this proposal be dispensed with. Upon your removal of the pickets, it now recommends that the workers apply [for work] direct.

This, briefly translated, means, "Heads we win, tails you lose." The hotel men are to be released from keeping their agreement because the strikers presumed to believe that the agreement meant what it said. About the excuses given by the Labor Board there is this to be said: The hotel owners did not themselves offer the continuance of picketing as the reason for not dealing with the committees. Moreover, the union had published no claims to having won recognition. This latest action of the Labor Board has served to convince the overwhelming mass of strikers that they can expect nothing from the NRA's "labor" representatives.

The result of the Labor Board's action was that the Eighteenth Street crowd yelled sell-out again. The right wing of the union sent a howl of protest to President Roosevelt. Gathering newly disillusioned elements to itself, the progressive group launched a campaign to revive and reorganize the strike. As a result, the men are still picketing, and scabs are still spilling potage in the best hotels. The eventual fate of the struggle hangs on the capacity of the progressive group to get the strike committee to adopt its militant class-struggle policy.

Whatever the outcome, this strike is important as a laboratory experiment. For the first time an independent trade-union leadership has gone to bat against a class-collaborationist leadership in the presence of Communist Party disrupters. Here the progressive group faced a problem vastly more complex than its predecessors faced in the days when the Communist Party itself was the core of such groups. Here the progressives had to fight Communist Party obstruc-tionist tactics without opening the door to reaction, and to fight class collaborationists while differentiating themselves from the disrupters. Experience gained in the fight between two fires is important because the hotel strike indicates the lines along which many American trade-union struggles must be fought in the next few years.

Fascism on the West Coast

By ELLA WINTER

FEW persons realize the astonishing rapidity with which the United States is following in the footsteps of Hitler's Germany, or the extent to which tyranny, violence, and summary injustice have replaced the constitutional rights of American citizens. As an example, we may cite the testimony of delegates to the first anti-lynching conference of the West, which was held at San José, California, and was attended by writers, liberals, intellectuals, students, and workers. The delegates represented 78,892 members of nine trade unions and ten other organizations from the States of Oregon, Washington, California, Utah, Nevada, Arizona, Wyoming, Colorado, and New Mexico. They came to report a summer's activities. For the first time many people in that hall had a glimpse of American history in 1933.

The organizer of the United Farmers' League from Yakima, Washington, is speaking, a curly-haired, blond young Dutchman:

"We had a berry strike there, and I and a number of comrades were jailed. They came to me in the middle of the night and told me to 'Get yer clothes on.' I said: 'I'm in the jail, I don't have to get out.' They had nothing on me. 'Get your belongings and get the hell out of here,' they said. I guessed they were going to lynch me. They took me outside where were two cars full of hoodlums with masks on and clubs in their hands. They put me in a car, tied my hands and feet, and drove out of the city. When they'd got some way out they tied a rope round my neck and said 'Don't talk.' I figgered it wasn't any use saying anything. They beat me up. Then they beat up some of my comrades, tarred and feathered them, and left them there. They saw I was still conscious. I heard them talking about me. I figgered they was going to throw me in the river. By that time other cars had driven up, there were about seventy vigilantes and a few farmers; I saw also deputies, State police, national guardsmen, and American legionnaires in the bunch. I was pointed out as the ringleader. I was beaten up again. Then my coat was taken off, my shirt, my underwear. They said: 'If he's not an I. W. W. he must be a Bolshevik or something.' 'Yes, I'm a Bolshevik and proud of it,' I said. They cut my hair in a swastika, painted USSR in red on my back and my head. Then they took me somewhere else in a car and I was beaten up again till I was nearer to death than to life. Deputies, State police, were all there. They asked me to talk then. Later on I was taken back to the highway and left to die. I found my way to Seattle. We formed a committee to go and tell the press but they would have nothing to do with it. Later they had to put something in but what they put in was all lies."

Photographs of young Casey Boskaljom are in my possession, showing the swastika on his scalp and the welts on his arms, back, and chest. They could just as well be the photographs of a man beaten up by a Nazi storm trooper in Hitler's Germany.

Next is a speaker from Salt Lake City; he tells about the mine strike in Carbon County, New Mexico. "In the mining camps everything costs thirty to fifty cents more than in the shops outside. There was a strike led by the National Miners' Union against starvation wages. When the N. M. U. came to Carbon County they had to take the criminal-syndicalism law off the shelf and scrape off the dust with a shovel. It was so ancient. They arrested our leaders and beat them up. One man was taken ninety miles out into the desert and left to die. When he was brought into the nearest town he had to have a bodyguard around him all the time. The cops had tear gas, machine-guns, billy clubs, and butts of rifles, and they used them on women as well as men. Martial law was declared. We couldn't hold a dance to collect relief for our starving comrades. Our leaders were thrown into jail. They beat us up daily. They put the national organizer of the Unemployed Councils in jail." In spite of the ferocity shown toward them, the strikers were partially successful.

A mere boy, a second-year high-school student from San Francisco, takes the rostrum. He was in Jefferson Park listening in at a meeting. "The cops told us to move on, and nobody did. I wasn't speaking, I was just standing listening. They arrested thirteen of us and took us to jail, looked up their law books, and charged us with refusal to move on. That night all the grown-ups were released. They kept me in jail. Next day the judge asked me if I didn't think I ought to obey the police officials. I said: 'It depends on what they ask me to do.' He said: 'If a police official asks you to move on another time, will you do it?' 'It depends on how he asks me. If he asks the way he did last time, I won't.'"

The boy was kept in a detention home four days. "That shows how the capitalist system works," says the boy. "They have a law on which they can't even hold a grown-up one night, and they keep a kid of fourteen four days. If that isn't a corrupt system, I'd like to know what is."

There was a cigar strike in San Francisco. Cigar-makers were organized in the A. F. of L. The officials of the A. F. of L. refused help to the strikers, and the men called on the Trade Union Unity League for leadership. Eighty-eight men were arrested. In that strike the cigar-makers, to show they were peaceably picketing, took their women and children with them to the factory. Nevertheless, the patrol wagon was soon in evidence, as were police with billies and firearms. Police and strikers testified at the trial that the strikers were at all times unarmed. A striker was arrested—no reason given at the trial. An organizer protested, "There's no legality in this arrest." They arrested him. Another organizer came up to protest this; he was arrested. "But first they hit me over the head so that eight stitches had to be taken." "I came up," said yet another, "and they hit me in the stomach with a billy." All the eighty-eight men were charged with rioting. The total bail against them was almost $100,000. All cases were dismissed.

At the hearing George Andersen, attorney for the defense, read a letter he had received from the State NRA Compliance Board of California. "If the cigar-makers," it said, "will accept the proposal for arbitration and intervention of the Compliance Board, go back to work under the proposed code at thirty cents an hour, and submit other disputes to arbitration . . . the Petri Company will dismiss cases against the strikers arrested for picketing." (Emphasis mine.) This letter needs no comment.

"In Pixley," reports the representative of the Cannery and Agricultural Workers' Industrial Union, the union which has organized agricultural laborers for the first time in California and has won partial victories in strikes in the field of every kind of fruit and vegetable raised in the State, "we were standing before our strike headquarters when farmers shot into our bunch and killed two men. At Arvin they killed another and blew off the arm of a nineteen-year-old boy." Some of these ranchers are now on trial, but the death penalty has not been asked for them. At a hearing of the fact-finding committee appointed by Governor Rolph during the cotton strike—which involved 15,000 Mexican, white, and Negro cotton pickers who had never been organized in a union before—the lawyers for the growers asked in shocked astonishment of the strikers' committee, which had demanded prosecution to the full: "Do you realize that what you are asking for would mean death?" "Weren't our workers shot and killed?" fired back Caroline Decker, the twenty-one-year-old strike leader. The eight ranchers accused of murder have all been acquitted.

Filipino workers picking brussels sprouts and spinach at Pescadero, a hamlet in the Santa Clara Valley, are getting twenty cents an hour on the contractor system, by which they have to pay a large part of their earnings to a middleman for board and lodging and the privilege of being allowed to pick brussels sprouts ten hours a day in the broiling sun. Under this system they are usually kept in debt from one season to another. Now they have organized almost 100 per cent and there are no scabs. The police of San Mateo County came and said: "You will leave here immediately." "They tried to drive us from Pescadero," says the firm, triumphant little Filipino, addressing, in his turn, the Anti-Lynching Conference. "But I said, 'You don't know your law, we have to have thirty days' notice. This is January 16. We will be out of here February 16. Not before.'" Roars of applause from the gathering. "We'll all fight together for a better living," cries the Filipino, and leaves the rostrum. In a month the crop will be over. At this moment, however, Japanese strike-breakers are being imported.

A representative from Stockton tells of young workers getting 160 days in jail for vagrancy, of organizers "floated out of town" as were the Mexicans in the Oxnard beettoppers' strike in August. They are threatened with instant arrest if they come back, even though their wives and families live in town. Another says: "They threaten to yank speakers off boxes, the legioners do, they pull jackknives out of their pockets, cut off the pockets of strikers, and arrest them and hold them on $500 bail."

The last report is from Imperial Valley, the latest strike center. Seven thousand Mexican, white, and Filipino lettuce pickers, receiving from ten to twenty cents an hour and living in tents and burlap shacks, went on strike for a wage of twenty to thirty cents an hour. Four hundred were arrested; two hundred are in jail. Strike leaders were beaten up and arrested on vagrancy charges; the International Labor Defense attorney was arrested on a vagrancy charge; Mexican workers were threatened with instant deportation, clubs, tear gas, guns; the American Legion broke up the Workers' Center and smashed typewriters; the Los Angeles Times reported that those whom the sheriffs had not arrested and beaten up, members of the Chamber of Commerce had "turned into star-gazers." One baby has died from the effects of tear gas thrown by police among women and children.

The Farmers' and Fruit Growers' Association of California passed a resolution on farm labor at its sixty-sixth annual meeting at Modesto, December 13 and 14, 1933. This association consists of some hundreds of farmers' organizations. The resolution began:

WHEREAS, During the year California has experienced serious agricultural labor disturbances which cost the lives of several people and in addition resulted in serious financial losses to growers, workers, and business men, and

WHEREAS, Much of the trouble was not due to dissatisfaction with the wage scale, but rather was through a carefully planned destructive activity . . .

This might be amusing if it were not calculated to lead to further hatred and violence. The only people who shot and killed in California strikes this summer were ranchers. Not only were there no serious losses in agriculture last year, but the California State Department of Agriculture reported on January 1 that for every California crop the money income increased 25 per cent, while for cotton the increase was 120 per cent, or $7,000,000. The wages of the 15,000 pickers after their four-week strike were increased an average of $2 a week—from $5 to $7; the total addition to the wage bill was $500,000. Children from five years up picked cotton till the last boll was harvested. (This was after President Roosevelt's first speech stating that child labor had been abolished in the United States.)

The Farm Bureau Federation has appealed through Representative Stubbs of California to the Department of Justice to deport all spirited foreign-born workers who might become organizers and leaders in an effort to prevent the agricultural workers of California from becoming peons. "We believe in California that the great majority of laborers are satisfied with the progress that is being made toward recovery," says the letter from Representative Stubbs.

The conference in San José showed that tyranny and violence in strikes are not isolated cases of oppression here or a miscarriage of justice there. It showed through the mouths of spokesmen for 728,000 people that there is no quarter for the worker in America—even if he and his children are starving—if he demands higher wages and means it.

The Bewildered Liberal

By ANNIE NATHAN MEYER

IN the face of the forced resignation, because of their racial inheritance or liberal sympathies, of hundreds of distinguished members of the faculties of the German universities; in the face of the official burning of hundreds of books by brilliant authors, and the expulsion from Germany of the leading lights of both the stage and the world of music, the reaction of the American liberal has been first to rub his eyes in amazement, and second to announce in no uncertain manner his horror, his distress, and his disapproval.

But in the very process of formulating his protest, the liberal has been obliged to pause. His swift and generous gesture of disapprobation is stopped half way. Voices, confused, vague, yet all more or less charged with the same intent, begin to reach him. "It is not so simple as it seems." "The evidence must be carefully sifted." "It has all been grossly exaggerated." "The situation can be understood only by those on the spot." (This has a particularly familiar ring!) And finally, "This is a highly dangerous situation which calls for diplomacy rather than vituperation." To speak above a whisper is to awaken the loudest of reverberations.

These voices come to him from a variety of sources—from the over-cautious ones, both Jew and Gentile, who have much to lose financially in a quarrel with Germany, from the Jew who desires to live as inconspicuously as possible in an always potentially inimical world, from the faint-hearted in all ranks of society, and from those who yield gleefully to the delights of prejudice. They are contradictory, these voices, and it is difficult to sum them up or characterize them with any certainty. Nevertheless, it is agreed by the Jews of the upper social strata that the protest of a single Gentile is worth more than the protests of hundreds of Jews. The type of Jew, alas, who is most inclined to be articulate is the type that the more cultured Jew would like to see kept in the background. It is possible to sympathize both with the well-bred Jew who shrinks from the accusation of vulgarity and general unpleasantness, and with the inflamed radical who resents the caution of the comfortably established.

Some of the voices have not been without the note of threat. Let us be fair to our liberals; I think the threats meant less than nothing when aimed at themselves. But when it came to threats against the victims of intolerance there was much to give them pause. Slowly, reluctantly, yet inevitably it has begun to sink into the consciousness of those who would take up arms for the persecuted that many of the victims want none of it. For instance, there is the German refugee who cherishes his fatherland with so sentimental an attachment that it renders him far more a German than a Jew, far more a supporter of even Hitler's Reich than of an intangible land of free speech and liberal opinion. This type of patriot, moreover, usually bears his own suffering with such fortitude and dignity, with such an unbelievable lack of bitterness, that to his plea not to bring further hurt upon his beloved country it is difficult to turn a deaf ear. Then there is the voice—one which specially interests me—which whispers that all criticism only stiffens the purpose of the criticized. As a prominent woman educator said to me—one whose liberal sympathies cannot be questioned: "The psychology of this argument appeals to me. For I know how the backs of the Southerners in our own country are stiffened by the protests of the North. I realize how the passions that were unloosed during the Sacco-Vanzetti trial were inflamed rather than calmed by the protests of indignant Europe."

This argument is gaining ground. It has become so familiar that it may be well to examine it a little more closely. We may safely refuse to accept the conclusion that Sacco and Vanzetti were victims of interfering persons from beyond the seas. It is nearer the truth to conclude that but for the protests which poured in upon America from all parts of the world, those two martyrs to fear and intolerance would have been put to death years before they actually were. Let us not be too ready to believe that the Scottsboro boys would have been set free if it had not been for the ill-advised interference of a tricky lawyer from the North. I think it is possible to come nearer the truth by reflecting upon the treatment that has been meted out to Judge Horton, who conducted the second trial with such superb fairness, and the acclaim which has greeted the judge who presided over the last trial.

In short, I am convinced that much of the indignation against this "outside criticism" is nothing but consciousness of guilt. The wrongdoer always resents interference, whether he is merely a naughty child, a wife-beater, or a grafting politician. It was not so long ago that Tammany braves were shedding crocodile tears over those critics who defamed the fair name of the metropolis. All the magnificent indignation of the organization was aimed, not at those who were responsible for making New York a disgrace among cities, but at the courageous judge who was unveiling the conditions they had hoped to keep hidden. Finally, let us not forget that it is the company that deals least fairly with its employees which bewails most loudly the necessity of turning its beloved workers over to the tender mercies of "outside" unions.

Therefore, although I confess sympathy for our bewildered liberal, and although I cannot hope to have enumerated all the inhibitory voices (the appositeness of my title lying in the fact that it is difficult to unravel all the confused and tangled skeins and knit them together again into a distinct pattern), nevertheless, I think he may be assured that much good will follow upon protestation. Even were some harm to come of it, even were the arguments against protest sincere, some thought surely should be given to the stultifying effect of suppressing the most generous impulses that can arise in the human breast. Whether the victims of persecution are helped or not by public protest to the extent that we might desire, it is of vital concern to the whole world that its horror at tyranny, its distress at injustice, its abhorrence of coercion should be given voice. Far from feeling that they should withhold criticism, outsiders should reflect that their silence implies a lack of support, of encouragement, for the liberal who has spoken out in his own environment. For let us make no mistake—there are liberals in the South, and there are law-abiding citizens in California, as there are rebels in Germany. Do these not deserve some thought? Twice before I have written in the pages of the Nation a plea for visitors to the South to support the growing number of liberals. There has grown up in Southern society a convenient slogan that it is bad form to mention the Negro question. This frequently inhibits where threats would fail.

Finally, added to the disinclination to reprove a part of our country or of the world which is not our own, there is another inhibition which is distinctly to the advantage of the Bourbon. Only recently the head of a large university who has been accustomed to speak publicly upon each and every problem of the day privately defended his surprising silence concerning the outrages in Germany by declaring that we in the United States are in no position to criticize other nations. "We lay ourselves open," said he, "to the retort, 'Look at yourself! Look at your own injustice to the Indian! Look at your own treatment of the Negro!'" Can there be any doubt that any true internationalist, any true liberal, would answer: "Very well. By all means let us look at ourselves! Let us welcome any just accusation of intolerance and hypocrisy!"

I am saddened that my country lies so peculiarly vulnerable to the winds of criticism, but I welcome them from whatever quarter they may blow. It is highly regrettable that we have not in the United States liberals in sufficient number to do away with all prejudice and injustice, but since obviously we have not, let us be thankful that our ranks may be swelled from across the seas, from the farthest-flung outposts, if need be, of civilization. He who looks eye to eye with me on these crucial matters, he is my brother. Whether his nose be Grecian or aquiline is of no importance, nor whether his skin be black or white or yellow. All that matters is that in his keeping lie the progress, the honor, and the hope of humanity.

Thus, is it too much to hope that our liberal, after giving due heed to the many and divergent inhibitory voices, if he is quite certain that his stand will not be ascribed to mere self-pity, will speak out with what indignation he can find in his heart and with what eloquence is his to command? The present moment is no time for the balancing of counsels until the opposition has perfected its weapons. It is better to blunder on the side of the angels than to shine on the side of the Evil One. It is better to stumble on the golden stairs than to walk firmly on a path that leads to impotence and nothingness.

A Negro Looks at Soviet Russia

By HENRY LEE MOON

PERHAPS it is because the American Negro is so completely alienated from the main stream of life in his native land that he is so readily adaptable to the life of foreign countries. Perhaps it is because he cannot, until he has left these shores, free himself of the restraints and inhibitions which frustrate his fuller enjoyment of life here. Whatever the reason may be, certainly no other native American exceeds the Negro in adaptability to the European environment. Paris has its full share of Negro expatriates, thoroughly Gallicized, harboring bitter memories, vowing never to return to America. And I cannot forget the convincing ardor with which a young Louisiana musician in Berlin expressed his devotion to the German capital. Both France and Germany have been hospitable to the Negro, but it is the Soviet Union which extends to him the most explicitly cordial welcome.

Although he is a far less familiar figure in Moscow than in Paris or Berlin, the Negro is not new to Russia. Long before the revolution he enjoyed wide popularity among the people. The great bronze statue of the curly-haired Alexander Pushkin in a Moscow square is a constant reminder of the African descent of one of the country's foremost men of letters. Ira Aldridge, American Negro tragedian, was clamorously received when during the middle of the nineteenth century he played Othello and other Shakespearean roles in St. Petersburg. Today the oldest American resident of Moscow is a Negro woman, a former singer, once highly favored by the aristocracy of the old regime.

It has remained for the Communists to dramatize the Negro as the symbol of capitalistic oppression. His plight in the United States has been extensively pictured throughout the Soviet Union, and his cause has been made dear to the hearts of millions of Soviet citizens who have never seen a Negro. Through active party propaganda Communists are kept well informed on the gloomier aspects of Negro life in America. Their questions on certain phases of race relations in this country frequently prove embarrassing to the American tourist. Interest in the final outcome of the Scottsboro case is far keener in the Soviet Union than in America. Despite the wide publicity given the case, no group in this country has ever been able to assemble 40,000 people in a single meeting to protest against the legal lynching of these nine Alabama youths. Yet I saw such a crowd in an unforgettable demonstration one evening in the vast open-air amphitheater in Moscow's Park of Rest and Culture. Row after row of eager faces of men, women, and children listening attentively as Negro and white, Russian and American, told the story of the nine Scottsboro boys. There was a Union Square ring in the speeches of the Americans. There were the usual cherished denunciations of the capitalist courts and the bourgeois press, and a tirade, sounding rather irrelevant at that distance from the scene, against the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. A dramatic picturization in fireworks of the fall of Kilby Prison before the onslaught of an aroused working class concluded the demonstration.

Communist propaganda has thoroughly popularized the cause of the Negro as a fellow-worker caught in the net of American capitalism. The picture of the plight of this race which these teachings have created is often warped and sometimes false. There seems to be no racial bias involved for the misery of the working class of all races everywhere under capitalism is similarly dramatized for the Russian proletariat. As a result, the average Russian is apt to believe that Negroes are lynched weekly in Times Square and three times a week in Chicago's Loop, that the entire race is politically disfranchised throughout the country, that no universities in America admit Negroes, and that all social intercourse between the races is strictly forbidden, a taboo which only class-conscious workers dare defy. It is difficult to explain that there are degrees of race prejudice against Negroes in this country—all the more difficult in view of the fact that the basic concept of the Negro as a pariah in his native land is true.

Quite aside from interest in the Negro created by propaganda, and in addition to the natural curiosity about a race conceived of as exotic, there is certainly something deep in the Russian character which immediately responds to a similar element in the Negro. There is between these peoples a fundamental kinship which surmounts separation in residence and differences in culture. In its more apparent forms it expresses itself in the similarity between the plaintive folk-music of the Russians and that of the Negroes. A soft minor mood, expressive of an ever-living hope, characterizes both. Again, both the Russian and the Negro are endowed with a certain flair for the dramatic, a gift of mimicry—qualities which quite as much as its revolutionary orientation make the Russian theater the most distinctive creation in contemporary drama. There is, however, less spontaneous laughter among the Russians than among Negroes. Perhaps the strain of the revolution and the high tension under which they now live have drained them of mirth. Perhaps, too, there may come a day when Negroes will laugh less often and less heartily.

I have never felt more at home among a people than among the Russians, and I think that this is the common experience of Negroes who have visited the Soviet Union. One reason for this feeling is doubtless to be found in the ready attachment which the Russian shows for the Negro. Incidentally, the Russians view the Negro as a being quite different from the white American, a view which arises inevitably out of their own experience. To them the Negroes of the American South are a national minority, comparable to the minorities of the Soviet Union. In line with this view the Russians generally expect the dark-skinned American to speak a language of African origin and to have customs distinct from those of the rest of the American people. They express surprise upon learning that the folk-songs of the race originated in the English language. And I have the impression that many among them, fed upon stories of race conflict in this country, not only fail to understand, but in some measure resent any expression of friendship between Negroes and American whites, especially if the latter are not identified with the revolutionary movement in this country.

While all Europe, save such centers as have succumbed to the rampant nationalism of the post-war period, welcomes the Negro as an entertainer, a student, or a traveler, Russians see him as a fellow-worker and freely offer employment opportunities. To be sure, the Soviet Union is today the only country in which such opportunities are generally available to any workers; but even in the pre-depression days there were practically no openings for Negroes in the countries of Western Europe.

The number of Negroes now employed in Russia is still quite small, but efforts have been made to increase this number. There are a few skilled mechanics at work in the automobile factories of Moscow and in the tractor factory at Stalingrad; a teacher in the Anglo-American school in Moscow and at least three women in clerical positions in Moscow offices; a young engineer on irrigation projects in central Asia. Last year a trained group of cotton experts, most of them products of Southern agricultural schools, was in Russia instructing the Uzbeks of Central Asia in modern methods of cotton culture. This field of agriculture is of increased importance to the Soviets because the second Five-Year Plan provides for greater development of the textile industry.

Unquestionably, large sections of the Negro working class in America are measurably better off in material things than the bulk of Soviet workers. They are better housed, better clothed, and better fed, and they have more of the materials for comfortable living than the Russian workers. Yet there are things for which one would willingly exchange comparative comfort. Chief among these for the Negro worker is freedom from persecution. Add to this: security of employment, equal opportunities for his children's education and for their employment upon completion of their training, recreational opportunities unaffected by race, insurance against hazards of sickness and old age, and the zest that comes of taking part in the construction of a new society purged of the bitterness of race prejudice.

Writing in the Survey Graphic for November, 1932, Walter Duranty expressed the opinion that "it is merely a question of time for this country [the U. S. S. R.] to see a flow of immigration, not only from the United States but from Europe, which will catch and surpass the peak figures of foreign influx to America." Would the participation of Negroes in large numbers in such a movement change the present attitude of Russia toward this race?

There is a considerable school of Negro thought which holds that the Negro's problems are peculiar to himself and that he carries them with him wherever he may go in large numbers. The few may be accepted cordially, but not the masses. Those who take this position base their contention on the widely accepted axiom that "white folks are white folks" whether they live in Scottsboro or Moscow, whether they profess to follow the teachings of Jefferson and Wilson or those of Marx and Lenin. Pleading for a continued adherence to American principles, Kelly Miller, dean of Howard University, in an article syndicated through the Negro press, expressed this point of view: "Ten million Negroes or Chinese in Russia," he said, "would in all probability arouse the same race antagonism we now see exhibited in Georgia. What guaranty is there that communism would control the rancor of race in the midst of rival and competitive racial numbers?"

What Soviet Russia's answer would be I can conclude only by analogy. There are already ten million yellow- and brown-skinned Orientals in the Union. As yet their presence has created no major internal problem. Certainly there is no evidence of racial conflict or of the subjugation of one racial group by another. Indeed, the development of national cultures along proletarian lines is an established policy of the country. Even the Jews, who under the czarist regime were more mercilessly and tragically persecuted than are the Negroes of the deep South, enjoy a new freedom. They are no longer limited in their choice of vocations, forbidden access to any institutions, or denied the privilege of residence in any section of the country. It is not here contended that all traces of anti-Semitism have been eliminated; it is patent, however, that its grosser manifestations have been entirely suppressed. It is possible, even likely, that its expression in more subtle forms may linger for a generation or longer. Certainly it is being aggressively fought by the Communist Party. Moreover, the Marxists would probably point out that in the Soviet Union no races are competitive or rival. All are engaged in the gigantic task of building socialism, which in itself would mean the destruction of the roots of race prejudice. Marxism maintains that these roots are essentially economic. Race prejudice cannot flourish when its roots are destroyed.

Manchukuo and the Opium Trade

By ELLEN N. LA MOTTE

THE international drug ring is still up to its old tricks at Geneva. However, it has reckoned without Stuart Fuller of the State Department. Mr. Fuller represents the United States at the meetings of the Opium Committee of the League of Nations, by virtue of our having ratified the Hague Convention of 1912. The New Deal has given us a pleasant change of representatives—a fighter. Under the previous Administration many of the American delegates could not kowtow low enough to European influences—they made doormats of themselves. The Opium Committee behaved in the usual way, altering the minutes, changing and tampering with the records, and generally pulling the wool over our eyes. But now a change has come. The drug ring is still up to its tricks, but Mr. Fuller takes pleasure in exposing them and protesting against them.

The latest opium story is worth telling. The Japanese are going in heavily for opium cultivation in Manchukuo. Production is being stepped up, and the opium revenues are pledged as security against a loan—which means that nothing will be allowed to diminish the value of the security. Already the opium revenue has nearly doubled—from 5,000,000 yen in 1933 to an estimate of nearly 10,000,000 yen for 1934. All this opium is raised in Manchuria and Jehol. As a result the other Powers wanted to get in on this fine fat market. The Japanese were quite able to supply the demand, but the drug ring wanted to get in, too—to overload the country and make Manchukuo a great and convenient base for the illicit trade. To effect this it must bring in imports from outside.

Rich Persian opium was selected as the ideal kind to import—perfect for smokers, and still more perfect to manufacture into morphine and heroin for smuggling into America and elsewhere. Persia was chosen also as the producing country least hampered by entangling alliances in the way of opium treaties. European dealers backing the scheme saw large profits for themselves, not only profits from sales but perquisites and incidentals, such as transport by European ships, insurance by European firms, all sorts of things. There were also rumors that a certain European drug firm thought it possible to send in a few tons of drugs; the new state of Manchukuo seemed ripe for thorough exploitation.

After the outbreak of the China-Japan difficulties the League of Nations had set up a committee called the Sino-Japanese Advisory Committee to follow affairs in the Far East. Japan's policy was thoroughly reprehensible, and the new state of Manchukuo must on no account be recognized. Then, out of the clear blue came the possibility of sending opium into Manchukuo. The committee was in a quandary. Japan had an extensive opium market in this new territory; it seemed too bad for other countries not to get a share of it.

The Sino-Japanese Committee called upon the secretariat of the League's Opium Committee for advice. They did not lay their predicament before the Opium Committee as a whole, but before the secretariat, or paid secretarial staff—which seems odd, considering that the entire Opium Committee was in session at the time, practically in the adjoining room. The Opium Committee adjourned its session on May 31, 1933, unaware till several months later that its secretariat had offered some helpful suggestions to the Sino-Japanese Committee on May 24. One wonders why this secrecy. One wonders what big financial interests were hanging round Geneva at this time, suggesting that the Manchukuo opium market was a gold mine.

Whatever the pressure, the Sino-Japanese Committee hurdled the obstacles which prevented sending opium into Manchukuo. It issued a statement some weeks later saying that under the Geneva Convention of 1925 opium could be exported to Manchukuo if accompanied by an export certificate. At the same time it advised against sending a duplicate certificate to the Manchukuo government itself as this might be construed as recognition.

Certificates are export or import licenses which accompany shipments of drugs or opium. One accompanies the shipping itself, and the duplicate goes to the importing government, as a check upon traders. The Sino-Japanese Committee, acting on the advice of the secretariat of the Opium Committee, got everything nicely arranged for a lively opium trade with Manchukuo.

At this point Mr. Fuller comes into the picture. Like all disinterested members of the Opium Committee, he was extremely surprised—surprised that the Opium Committee as a whole had not been consulted, had been given no slightest inkling of what was going on in the next room, where the Sino-Japanese Committee had devised its plan to boom the opium trade; surprised that the secretariat alone had been consulted; and extremely surprised at the naive solution that had been offered. In November, 1933, there was another meeting of the Opium Committee, with Mr. Fuller back again in Geneva. He then issued a long, forceful statement which the committee actually agreed to publish in the minutes in its original condition, not edited or tampered with in any way. All who closely follow events in Geneva are well aware that the secretariat is constantly "editing"—with remarkable results.

Mr. Fuller strongly objected to sending Persian opium into Manchukuo. He said it would be in violation of the Hague Convention, the underlying, basic opium treaty which the United States has ratified. In this older treaty, he pointed out, there are certain articles which definitely prohibit shipping opium into countries which prohibit its import. Manchukuo is not yet recognized as a sovereign state, is still considered part of China, and China prohibits the importation of opium. Mr. Fuller concluded with a request that the Opium Committee recommend to the Council of the League of Nations that the proposals of the Sino-Japanese Committee be considered null and void.

Now in the past many American delegates have been weak or terrified. Or, as one of them said, he "didn't like to make himself unpopular." Unpopular, of course, with the big drug ring and its spokesmen. But Mr. Fuller did not care about his personal popularity. In spite of his energetic protests, however, the Opium Committee sent only a very mild recommendation in its report to the Council:

For the moment at any rate, it would be desirable that the attention of the chief producing and manufacturing countries should be drawn to the necessity of supervising most strictly any application for the introduction of narcotics into the territory [Manchukuo].

It has to be added that the question was raised whether the recommendation in regard to the export to this territory of opium and other dangerous drugs which was made by the Advisory Committee [Sino-Japanese] appointed by the Assembly to follow the situation in the Far East involved any evasion of the provisions of the Hague Convention. The Opium Advisory Committee is confident that this was not the intention of the recommendation.

But somehow—in spite of this weak report to the Council—a great light seems to have dawned. The New York Times of January 21 contains this significant paragraph:

The Council's report further states: "It is understood that in accordance with Articles III, VIII, and XV of the Hague Convention, the export of opium, raw and prepared, to the territory in question cannot be authorized." The Council instructed the Secretary-General so to advise all governments.

This is what happens when the New Deal sends a man like Mr. Fuller to Geneva.

In the Driftway

HERE and there, in a world which seems to be hurrying toward damnation, a light burns which has all the warmth of hope. Perhaps everything is not yet lost. Such a hopeful gleam is the United States Indian Bureau as now administered by John Collier. One of the Drifter's colleagues was taken to task not long ago for attributing to Commissioner Collier credit for the abolition of the hated Indian boarding-schools. Dr. W. Carson Ryan, appointed director of Indian education in 1931, should, it was declared, share the credit, and the Drifter hereby makes the necessary amends vicariously for his associate. But to Mr. Collier alone belongs all honor for his recent order insisting on "the fullest constitutional liberty in all matters affecting religion, conscience, and culture" for all Indians. The Indian ceremonial dances are of native religious significance, they have the deepest and most sacred associations for the various tribes, they are solemn, orderly, and beautiful.

Yet for many years it has been the policy of that branch of the government which administers Indian affairs to attempt in every way to destroy these ancient ceremonies, along with every other aspect of Indian culture, including the Indian languages, with the aim of "civilizing" the Indian tribes.

* * * * *

CHIEF STANDING BEAR, of the tribe of the western Sioux called the Lakotas, tells in his admirable autobiography, "Land of the Spotted Eagle," just how this system of cultural repression worked. Like all other Indian boys, he was sent to a school conducted by whites. "When I came back to the reservation," he says, ". . . there came the battle of my life—the battle with agents to retain my individuality and my life as a Lakota."

All the while the agent or white rule became harder and stricter. . . . On the commissary door and in the trader's store there one day appeared a printed notice, by order of the agent, that no returned student would thereafter be permitted to attend any tribal dance. . . . In a short while there came another order which allowed the old people to hold but one dance a week and no more. Soon another rule followed, stating that whenever a horse or present was given away, it must be done silently. [The Lakotas made a ceremony of presenting gifts.] Though there was nothing to disturb but the endless ether, there must be no glad announcing and no shouts of joy. The singing of praise songs by old men and the calling of gift-givers on some poor person were not to the liking of the white rulers. Cursing and yelling at football and baseball games were all to their liking and most certainly in order. But ceremonial gift-making was not to the order of their doing.

If there is bitterness in the last sentences of this, we, who have a different feeling about the preservation of an ancient and beautiful rite, may understand it easily enough. And we may reflect on the ironical fact that the northern American colonies were founded to establish freedom of worship—and that suppression of the Indian religion was only one aspect of all the religious suppressions that flowed outward from those Puritan days when religious freedom meant simply freedom to be a member of a particular church.

* * * * *

STUDENTS of Indian life know most fully but any American citizen may mournfully suspect what treasures of art and folk religion are forever lost to us through the suppression of Indian culture. For although we may be grateful for Commissioner Collier's order, in large measure it comes too late. The Indians themselves have forgotten much that the white man forbade them to remember. The old men and women who could perform the time-honored ceremonies are dead; their children, educated in the white man's culture, which is so alien to them, only dimly recollect the rites of their early childhood. The Indian languages are in some cases quite gone. In time this might inevitably have taken place. But we hastened the process by a stupid and shortsighted hatred of the Indians as "savages" who must be turned into white citizens as rapidly as possible. For the new policy of the Indian Bureau which will at least attempt to preserve what remains of Indian rites, arts, and crafts, we may therefore be profoundly grateful.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

The Theater Exhibit

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Your art critic, Miss Brenner, seems to be far more confused than the general public is by the exhibition of theater designs at the Museum of Modern Art. The exhibition has been open four weeks. To date 32,000 people have visited it, an average of 8,000 people a week. People do not turn out in such numbers to see any show in order to be bewildered or bored.

It is of course very gracious of Miss Brenner to edit my catalogue introduction to the point of suggesting that I described stage design as "impure art" when I really meant that drawings for the theater were "unfinished" art. Had I wanted to characterize scenic designs as "unfinished" I would have said so.

None of these designs, even when they are what we call sketches, are "unfinished." They are exactly as finished as any number of the drawings or paintings which we are in the habit of calling "works of art"; that is, they completely express the artist's intention. Many of them are excessively "finished" in the sense of being packed with detail. Almost all the drawings shown are complete and "finished" in that they show the completed (finished) theatrical spectacle as the artist wants it to appear when built, painted, lighted, and shown in the theater. And it is that evocation of a stage picture that the public gets as directly and almost as easily as the effect of the stage settings they are accustomed to see at the rise of the curtain.

If Miss Brenner's ignorance of the technical side of scene designing were not so complete, she could not assure your readers that these drawings are "technical preparations for a theatrical spectacle." The technical preparations for the making of scenery are architectural drawings to scale, which have been omitted from the exhibit. Miss Brenner can find them in the Renaissance textbooks of Serlio or Sabbatini and in the filing cabinets of any New York designer.

Theatrical designs, whether of the seventeenth or the twentieth century, are "impure" in the same sense that the bulk of pictorial art of the past was "impure," namely, they are not self-sufficient. They exist to illuminate something more than the methods of representation employed. Like much historic painting they are illustrations of a popular subject, a recognized theme, or an accepted text. Their aesthetic effect is not wholly a matter of the particular "organization" of line and color employed, but partly a result of their ability to give a fresh sense of the meaning, the importance, and the emotional implications of their dramatic subject matter by dramatizing it again in pictorial terms. The emotions they arouse are not those purely aesthetic ones that it has been the fashion for connoisseurs and critics to cultivate of recent years.

My point, ironically put, was that art is often all the better for being impure to this extent. The contrast I underlined in my foreword was the contrast between this kind of "impure art," which can be widely appreciated, and our recent cult of "pure art," which can be appreciated only by specialists who are interested in such pure aesthetic values as the way a guitar is properly "organized" in relation to a nearby table and a cigar box, or how a nude model is brought into perfect rapport with a stretch of wallpaper.

I hesitate to disillusion Miss Brenner about the motives of such best-sellers among the Parisian "art artists" as Picasso and Derain. Like most of the leading French painters they are hard-boiled business men. Their unwillingness to look for their scenic sketches or to lend them was primarily due to the fact that they have no ready market and command no prices comparable to "finished" paintings. That is why the Picassos, the Derain, the Legers, and the Braque in this exhibition had to be borrowed from some of the few private collections of theater art that exist abroad.

Miss Brenner seems to have got so confused as to become downright peevish. To say that certain American designs were "tucked away" in a small room on the fourth floor is unwarranted in view of the fact that the museum has only one large exhibition gallery. These designs, like those of some of the leading artists of Vienna, Prague, Paris, and Stockholm, were distributed on the third floor in four rooms which are almost exactly the same size. To class Jo Mielziner as a "revolutionary propagandist" is the height of the ridiculous. His distinction as a stage designer is due to the sensitiveness and subtlety with which he has used the traditional devices of nineteenth-century stage realism. Gorelik's and Carson's designs, although for supposedly propagandist and revolutionary plays, are far less revolutionary from the point of view of theatrical picture making than those of Heythum and Hofman, also "tucked away" in one of the rooms on the same floor. Gorelik's settings for "Processional" are the wittiest of variations on the most traditional way of making stage settings, established in the eighteenth century—the painted border, cut-out, and backdrop.

New York, February 12

LEE SIMONSON

The Workers' Protest Meeting

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

On last Friday afternoon the Socialist Party and certain large trade unions of New York City called the workers of New York to "down tools" and march to a huge meeting of protest against the slaughter of Austrian Socialists. Immediately upon the issuance of this call the Communist Party and the Communist trade unions ordered their members to attend the meeting in the name of "unity." Those who marched on Madison Square Garden at the Communist call came with a special edition of the Daily Worker in their hands, carrying instructions which would inevitably lead to the breaking up of the meeting.

From three o'clock on organized groups of Communists entered the Garden and began shouting under direction. When the meeting opened at 4 p.m. none of the speakers could be heard. The turmoil grew. The announcer for the Columbia broadcasting chain took the microphone. "Folks, this is the greatest battle the Garden has ever seen." The Communist-led groups were carrying out their instructions.

There was never a time when the unity of the workers was more necessary, when the policy of deliberately setting workers against other workers was more indefensible. We have been among those who have worked for the united front on certain issues, but a united front cannot be effected as long as the Communist Party leaders follow a policy of "unity" through disruption of organized workers' groups.

We maintain that there is no justification for these tactics. The world might have been given the story of a mighty protest against fascism voiced by 30,000 workers. The responsibility for the attack on a workers' demonstration should be placed squarely on the Communist leaders, who thus set back indefinitely the prospect of a united front that can have any meaning for the working class.

MARY FOX, DEVERE ALLEN, REINHOLD NIEBUHR,
SAMUEL H. FRIEDMAN, JOHN HURLING, MARY
W. HILLYER, JOSEPH P. LASH, DAVID LASSER

New York, February 19

Finance

Wall Street Gets a Shock

AFTER many months of hide-and-seek between the specter of impending doom and its own belief in the immortality of easy money, Wall Street at last has been confronted with the proposed Fletcher-Rayburn bill. The shock has brought forth cries of anguish, for the bill embodies most of the forebodings which have haunted the Street since the inauguration of the New Deal.

Surprise was mingled with dismay at the comprehensive and stringent character of the proposed act. Although Wall Street's most disheartening experience with the Roosevelt Administration has been its consistent failure to obtain the advance official information to which it had grown accustomed under Republican rule, it had become confident recently that painfully restrictive legislation was improbable at the present session of Congress. Its optimism was borne out temporarily by the moderate recommendations for regulation from the Dickinson committee. When word at last broke through of the impending draft of legislation by Messrs. Pecora and Landis, its mood shifted abruptly from hopefulness to chilling fear.

Under these conditions Wall Street lost its head and could find voice only for the impulsive complaint that the bill would seriously reduce the volume of business on the New York Stock Exchange and other markets. With its second wind, it recovered enough equilibrium to indulge in considerable embroidering of this theme. It is now painting a picture of enforced curtailment of employment if the bill is enacted in its original form: offices will be closed; real-estate values in the financial districts will decline; federal and State revenues from stock-transfer taxes will suffer. The Street sees a frozen, inactive market, imperiling the liquidity of investors' holdings, and foretells drastic deflation of security prices caused by wholesale dumping of stock collateral to meet the new margin requirements.

It is difficult to become panic-stricken by these laments. If, as Wall Street has now tacitly admitted, widespread speculation on thin margin is the backbone of much of the business on security exchanges, then any measure which curbs speculation will inevitably reduce the total volume of transactions. If pools, options, puts and calls, and the other paraphernalia of the Wall Street game are essential to maintain the present plant built around the security markets, then any legislation effectively seeking an honest market will entail retrenchment in that plant. Since the direct means of reducing speculation is to curtail the credit available for speculation, then the necessary stiffening of margin requirements will naturally compel a readjustment of loan accounts which are below these requirements.

Wall Street is, naturally, exaggerating the importance of the act's repercussions on the national economy. It flaunts the figure of about seven billion dollars of existing security loans as evidence of the amount of liquidation which would be unleashed by the act. But it overlooks the fact that the act specifically exempts from its margin requirements bank loans secured by collateral owned outright for more than thirty days, that many loans are secured by high-grade bonds which would be

The Next Session of
THE NATION's
Radiotorial Board
over Station WEVD

will take place

Wednesday, Feb. 28, at 8 P.M.

Members of the Board are

Elmer Davis

Morris L. Ernst

Arthur Garfield Hays

Rabbi Israel Goldstein

Harry W. Laidler

Algernon Lee

Bishop Francis J. McConnell

Norman Thomas

Walter White

and the Editors of THE NATION

THE Soviet Union

Facts which have special significance for the Foresighted
Investor

ECONOMIC STABILITY

Throughout the sixteen years of its existence, the Soviet Union has met all of its obligations without resort to moratoriums, "stand-still agreements" or reductions of any kind.

It has displaced leading powers of the world in point of industrial production and now stands second only to the United States. The First Five Year Plan involved an expenditure of $26 billion at par for the national economy.

While other nations have been staggering under the impact of the depression the Soviet Union has reduced its total of foreign obligations by 67%. For the year 1933, exports exceeded imports by $75 million. The budget of the U. S. S. R. is balanced with a surplus.

With a gold production in 1933 of more than $50 million and a gold reserve in the issue department of the State Bank of the U.S.S.R. of $416 million, the total bonded gold debt of the Soviet Union is less than $15 million—less than that of the average small American City. Its commercial indebtedness, about $250 million, is less than even the funded debt of any one of several American cities.

These achievements are due directly to the State Planning System—in control of every factor affecting Soviet national economy.

FOR THE FORESIGHTED INVESTOR

THE foregoing facts serve to emphasize the desirability of Soviet Government 7% Gold Bonds. Here is a bond whose principal and interest payments are based upon a fixed quantity of gold, payable in American currency at the prevailing rate of exchange. Interest is paid quarterly at The Chase National Bank of New York.

The bonds, issued in denominations of 100 gold roubles, are priced at par and accrued interest. (A gold rouble contains 0.774234 grams of pure gold). Their cost in American currency is based on the daily quotation of the dollar in terms of gold. Naturally, any further depreciation in the dollar would enhance the value of these Gold Bonds.

In order to insure long-term marketability, the State Bank of the U.S.S.R. has agreed to repurchase these bonds on demand of the holder at par and accrued interest at any time after one year from date of purchase.

Circular — fully describing these bonds will be sent upon request.

Soviet American Securities Corp.
30 Broad Street New York City

permitted higher margins based on 80 per cent of their lowest price within the past three years, and that in no event would collateral now considered ample need to undergo 100 per cent liquidation in order to meet the new requirements. Nor would a thinner market deprive investors of reasonable facilities for buying and selling securities. The New York Stock Exchange's own bond market is evidence of this fact, since it has maintained adequate liquidity without many of the devices used to stimulate the Exchange's stock dealings.

The anguish which Wall Street is suffering is heightened by the wholesome respect it has for the talents of Mr. Landis and his associates in drafting lawyer-proof legislation. Bitter experience with the Securities Act has driven home the fact that the enemy knows the tricks of the game and can anticipate them in a manner which so far has baffled the Street's most astute and expensive legal talent. Nevertheless, Wall Street has by no means given up the ghost. It places great weight on the fact that President Roosevelt refrained from personal indorsement of the Pecora-Landis bill. It has seized upon the relatively moderate tone of the Dickinson committee's report and the backsliding statements of several of the Democratic leaders in Congress as indicating that the President's counsel will not be unanimous in supporting stringent regulation. It has welcomed its arch enemy, Samuel Untermyer, as an unexpected ally in the cause of weakening the proposed bill. The Street is now fighting for immediate profits, rendered all the more alluring by the rising trend of business indexes and by inflationary legislation, rather than, as in its agitation against the Securities Act, for future profits contingent upon a revival of the capital market. In the forthcoming hearings on the bill it will seek to remove the administration of the act from the Federal Trade Commission and thus from the clutches of Mr. Landis, to establish discretionary control over security markets in which its own representatives would have a voice, and to place actual regulation principally in the hands of the exchanges themselves.

In its campaign Wall Street will have the whole-hearted cooperation of the heads of the allied interests of corporation management and control. These gentlemen will fight to the last ditch against a law which would compel them to keep the public currently informed on the condition of their business, which would expose their salaries and bonuses, and which would eliminate their speculative profits on inside information. The union of these forces presents a formidable obstacle to effective legislation. Passage of the bill in recognizable form in the face of this opposition will score an authentic victory for the liberal factions at Washington. PETER HELMOOP NOYES

The Intelligent Traveler

"THE Twentieth Century in the Wake of Alexander the Great" is the sonorous title of a tour through the Near East which Dr. Hans Kohn will conduct this spring. The party will set out from Alexandria on March 29, traveling through Egypt, Syria, Palestine, and Turkey. Dr. Kohn has lived in the Near East for over eight years and is the author of two books on its perplexed problems. He will introduce the group to the social, economic, and cultural changes that result from the impact of Western civilization on the East. The tour is first class throughout and costs $550 for the thirty days from Alexandria to Beirut. Dr. Hans Kohn may be addressed at 129 Joralemon Street, Brooklyn, New York.

Community enterprises—fairs, music festivals, pageants, and the like—are not usually announced in detail by the committees that sponsor them until the last moment. Especially in England the early months of summer bring interesting pageants and festivals of which little is known here now beyond their dates. A few of these are noted; others will be announced later.

A Music Festival at Torquay, a popular beach resort on the Devon coast, has been announced for May 1 to 5. Its auspices are good; nothing is yet known of its program.

On April 16 the Shakespeare Drama Festival opens at Stratford-on-Avon, to continue until September 15. W. Bridges Adams will again direct the Stratford company, which remains nearly unchanged. Plays to be done this year include "The Tempest," "Henry V," "Cymbeline," "Much Ado About Nothing," "A Winter's Tale," "Twelfth Night," "Julius Caesar," "The Merry Wives of Windsor," "Macbeth," "Romeo and Juliet," "Richard III," and "Othello."

The Canterbury Festival of Music and Drama will take place the second week in June at Canterbury Cathedral, with John Masefield and Sybil Thorndyke participating.

The Seminar in Cuba, announced in this column recently, has been canceled by the Committee for Cultural Relations with Latin America. Cuban political and cultural leaders are absorbed in attempting to solve the problems of the country and cannot give the necessary time to seminar sessions. The committee preferred to abandon the project rather than negate its worth by accepting unimportant people for the Cuban faculty.

About two hundred Americans are expected to go to the Soviet Union for the celebration of May Day on Red Square. The parties will include a group of professional people and a delegation of fifty American workers, elected by unions and factories, who will go under the auspices of the Friends of the Soviet Union. A Music Festival in Leningrad celebrating the birth of the composer Borodine will be held the last ten days in May. Jascha Heifetz and Efrem Zimbalist will appear with the Leningrad Symphonic Orchestra, and Russian and European musicians of equal distinction are expected to take part. Two operas, a ballet, and solo concerts will be given besides the orchestra performances.

Those for whom the theater is the principal reason for spending the winter in New York would do well to transplant themselves to Moscow for a winter season. The unquenchable vitality of the Moscow theater is attested by the odd fact that through the wildest days of the revolution and all that followed the theaters continued night after night. According to Lee Simonson, Oliver Sayler, and many other competent judges, the Moscow stage today offers an abundance, variety, and excitement found nowhere else in the world. The playgoer who would cover the ground in a few weeks must sample several shows a night.

Early visitors to the Soviet Union will catch the theater season in full swing, and this year it is an unusually lively one, as all visitors—from Alfred Lunt and Lynn Fontanne to Harpo Marx—agree. The Ballet School of the Bolshoi Theater in Moscow is celebrating the 125th anniversary of its founding in April, with special presentations which include "representatives of the different generations of the ballet art." The Moscow Art Theater is playing Gorki's reminiscent "Yegor Bulichev," now being done in New York by the semi-amateur Arteff Theater. "Fear" by A. Afinogenov, which is said to be one of the most impressive modern Russian plays, is running in Moscow and will shortly be produced in this country. The Music Theater will present "La Traviata" with a new libretto this spring. The Kamerny Theater has planned a potpourri in which Shakespeare's "Antony and Cleopatra," Bernard Shaw's "Caesar and Cleopatra," and Pushkin's "Egyptian Nights," will be combined and presented in one night. The Theater of the Revolution is producing "Romeo and Juliet" in March. These are only scattered examples of the choices. JOHN ROTHSCHILD

Books, Music, Drama

Bystander

By LIONEL WIGGAM

What trees have risen slim and green,
What stars have stopped in shattered flight,
What things my eyes have never seen,
I am not troubled by tonight.

I stroll indifferent in rain
Or unconcerned I lie in grass,
Watching the moon appear and wane,
Feeling the seasons come and pass.

In other towns are men who brood
On creatures nondescript and dead:
If there is chaos in my mood,
It is for living things instead.

Hearing the wind among the leaves,
The vast, intolerable sound of thunder—
Mine is a heart that never grieves
Though multitudinous moons go under.

The Biography Rush

EMIL LUDWIG told reporters not long ago that he was abandoning biography, that it had become an industry. Mr. Ludwig should know, for it was he as much as any other one individual who helped to turn biography for a short moment of eternity into an industry. Napoleon, Christ, Abraham Lincoln, Bismarck, and the Kaiser were his staples; Lenin, Woodrow Wilson, Mussolini, Leonardo da Vinci, Frederick the Great, Cecil Rhodes, Rembrandt, and Shakespeare were his by-products, which he produced in tabloid form for the essay market.

But whatever Mr. Ludwig's plans for the future may be, biography will remain of interest to mankind. Indeed, it would be a good thing for biography as a fine art if the recent extravagant interest in the lives of great men should die down, for that interest stimulated too many writers not fitted for the work to write hastily about characters concerning whom they did not have sufficient material. It was Lytton Strachey who suggested that "it is perhaps as difficult to write a good life as to live one." And it was he too who wrote: "Human beings are too important to be treated as mere symptoms of the past. They have a value which is independent of any temporal processes—which is eternal, and must be felt for its own sake."

Lytton Strachey's own superb success with biography as a fine art stimulated others to apply the formulas which they extracted from his individual method. Innumerable writers who had never before been interested in biography turned their hands to the trade. They put in research machines, added a dash of witty varnish, which they thought to be of the same quality as Strachey's distilled irony, and the publishers sent forth the finished product with attendant publicity. The result was that the public's interest in a great many good subjects was catered to hurriedly and inadequately. It was all part of the Stock Market Age, and at that time it was not unusual for three or four lives of the same person to be published almost simultaneously. It looked for a time as if the publishers would be forced to send out sandwich men with the slogan: "Wait for Maurois; any parrot can be taught to say just as good." Had the boom proceeded much farther, it probably would have become necessary to add a biography schedule to the protective tariff and to warn visiting foreigners that they might lecture, but that any attempt on their parts to write the life of Abraham Lincoln or Carl Laemmle would result in deportation. It might even have become advisable to hire a native gunman, who would have approached a non-member of National Biographers, Inc., with: "Oh, so you're going to do Martha Washington, eh! Well, one peep out of you in the Atlantic Monthly and—" The stock-market crash happily obviated all such trade necessities, and the interest in biography is once more settling to its natural level.

Another phase of the biography business which has flourished for many years is the rich man's biography trade. Millionaires have had their biographical research workers, who in social position came somewhere between the caddy and the master of the yacht, and their biographers, who received the respect their prices commanded. At one period any writer who had written a couple of successful biographies could have hung up a shingle in Wall Street reading: "Lives written; walk up two flights and save $20,000."

One American biographer once told me that he had made $100,000 writing the lives of rich men, and that was ten years ago. "It is easy," he remarked, "it only takes six months, and you can do your other work at the same time." "Suppose," I asked, "you discover that the subject was a—er, er, er?" "Oh," the biographer answered with hurried embarrassment, "I write them just as I do all my other books." A lady once wrote me to ask if I would not write the life of her father, who had been a Cabinet minister in the Cabinet of some obscure President of the United States, and she inclosed a two-cent stamp for a reply. Offers varying from the naive to the corrupt used to arrive in the mail intermittently. One woman who asked me to write the life of her notorious father with her collaboration remarked: "We could include my husband's and my experiences; we have had a very interesting life; we have traveled, we've been to Honolulu." One man offered to open to me for grazing ground the files of a large corporation if I would lend myself to the whitewashing of his father, who was the forceful executive of that corporation. But, he warned me, there were some things which could not yet be told. "They would hurt too many people," he remarked.

As for the debunkers, we all know by now that George Washington had false teeth, that Abraham Lincoln liked dirty stories, and that Woodrow Wilson knew a beautiful lady when he saw one. Portraiture is once more coming into its own, as it always does after a wave of pretty or ugly moralities. The late Gamaliel Bradford, who spent a sensitive lifetime at precise portraiture, has been hailed after his death as one of the few modern biographers of any importance. Biography has survived its boom.

M. R. WERNER

Studs Lonigan's World

The Young Manhood of Studs Lonigan. By James T. Farrell. Vanguard Press. $2.50.

IN his new novel Mr. Farrell is more directly occupied with the theme of Catholicism in the modern world than in either of the other two books that he has published in the last three years. Young Lonigan, whose unbeautiful adolescence in the streets of Chicago's South Side formed the subject of the first volume of the trilogy which Mr. Farrell is devoting to this character, is shown grown to young manhood, and unquestionably the greatest of his problems is the attempt to reconcile the moral and religious teachings inculcated in him at St. Patrick's parochial school with the standards of conduct admired and put into action by the gang at the corner poolroom. The great difference between Studs Lonigan and most other hard guys in recent fiction lies in his possession of a still very active moral and religious sensibility. None of the characters in this book is as completely dehumanized, for example, as the characters of William Faulkner and Erskine Caldwell. They are not so tough that they cannot indulge in occasional moments of remorse and self-disgust. They do not retire to the neighborhood brothel before listening to a thoroughgoing exhortation of modern youth by the visiting retreat orator, whose sermon, reproduced in full, is one of the many tours de force in the book. Studs Lonigan and his friends are not without the sense of sin, and that perhaps is what gives the special quality of horror to the picture of them that Mr. Farrell draws for us. A concentration of this horror is managed in the next to last chapter, in which they are all brought together at a New Year's party, and which has much the same effect as the famous Walpurgis Night episode in "Ulysses" and that last gruesome reunion in the final volume of Proust. It is a terrible chapter, one of the most terrible that has ever been written, and one that no other novelist of Mr. Farrell's generation could possibly have written. By means of a device that makes also for the greatest economy of presentation—the fragmenting of the narrative into thirty-two numbered episodes—Mr. Farrell emphasizes the almost insane disintegration of values that has occurred in the particular corner of the modern world on which he has chosen to concentrate.

Also it may be said that in this brilliantly managed chapter Mr. Farrell avoids most of the defects that have so far stood in the way of his being the most mature, as he is already the most compelling, of the several young American writers who have emerged in the last few years. His faults, from the beginning, have been the consequences of an excessive enthusiasm, of an insufficient discipline. This is most easily to be seen in his habit of using the extraordinarily violent and picturesque language of abuse current among his South Side "punks" and "goofs" almost for its own sake. Also, in his Celtic fondness for the racier forms of expression, he frequently fails to distinguish properly between the vocabulary of his characters and the vocabulary of his own style: "It was Saturday night. Husk Lonigan had the dough from the first pay he had earned since starting to work for the old man." The effect of this confusion is particularly disturbing in the more subjective passages. It might also be objected that a good deal of the narrative, although interesting enough in itself, is too loosely connected with the theme; the novel is certainly too long. But so successfully has he brought together the many characters and disparate elements of the story in his amazing penultimate chapter that one is left with an impression of extraordinary unity. "Some day," Danny O'Neill tells himself, in one of the obviously autobiographical passages of the book, "he would drive this neighborhood and all his memories of it out of his consciousness with a book." This is that book, and Mr. Farrell has succeeded so well in driving his South Side neighborhood out of his mind that we are not likely to forget it for a long time to come.

WILLIAM TROY

A Coonskin Classic

Davy Crockett. By Constance Rourke. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

MISS ROURKE is said to have written this book for "young readers," whoever they are. If they are boys who habitually read for narrative excitement they will get plenty of it in the story of Crockett's life which Miss Rourke has so skilfully put together out of many documents. If they are accustomed to the excitements of language they will have high times with a vernacular which Miss Rourke has salvaged out of our obscure past, their ears will glow in the presence of crackling epithets such as have not been heard since the country settled into the depths of civilization, their cheeks will flush with pleasure at many an indigenous tall tale. But are there any such boys? It can be doubted. It can be maintained, and hereby is, that Miss Rourke has written an exceedingly sophisticated book. And why not, since she is the author of "American Humor," and since she is perhaps the person best equipped in the whole United States to produce yet more works than these two in the field of literary archaeology? She will undoubtedly produce them and they will not be for boys—any more than "Davy Crockett" is, though it is that in small part.

"Davy Crockett" is essentially a study of that ringtailed, roaring American language which seems to have been at the peak of its richness a little more than a century ago. It was heard in the Western clearings and up back trails, but more particularly it was heard along the great rivers, the Ohio and the Mississippi, which were the thoroughfares of a swarming, many-colored culture. Mike Fink spoke it there, and a year ago his prowess was celebrated in a book by Walter Blair and Franklin J. Meine. David Crockett, bear-hunter, river-wader, coon-grinner, and Congressman, spoke it in Tennessee, whence his fame spread not only because he was death on animals but because he was death on the rhetorical conventions. He named his hounds Whirlwind, Old Rattler, Soundwell, Tiger, Growler, Holdfast, Grim, Deathmaul, and Thunderbolt. It was said of him whom neither summer nor winter rivers stopped that he could "swim faster, dive deeper, stay down longer, and come up drier than any man in all creation." And he was widely acknowledged to be a man who, when condescendingly spoken to by some Easterner in a tall hat, could back the Easterner clear into the Atlantic Ocean with tall tales that made his hat look like a pimple on a porcupine.

Miss Rourke has been quite as much interested in the legend of Crockett as in the man himself, or at any rate she has permitted herself to quote and paraphrase liberally from the almanacs and chapbooks which continued for twenty years after his death to fabricate things he might have said. The things he might have said and done are so little different from the things he did say and do, and the whole body of lingo is so interesting and typical in itself, that Miss Rourke rightly enough represents it all. There are those, indeed, who would have forbidden her to make use even of Crockett's own autobiographies, long considered spurious. But she has been at some pains to prove that the earliest of these, known as the "Narrative," was written by him with the help of one Thomas Chilton; she is willing to accept portions of the "Tour" as authentic; and she does not hesitate to take incidents from the posthumous "Exploits" in order to round out her tale of the hero who died at San Antonio. No reader should quarrel with such a method when it is employed by so able and intelligent a writer as Miss Rourke, who among other things knows how to quote supremely well—so well, indeed, that we are spared the suspicion, unless we suddenly come to and begin to think for ourselves, that much of the tall talk she praises must have been unbearably dull, and that Crockett himself must have had his tiresome hours. Neither, surely, was he quite the fellow whom Miss Rourke makes him out to be. He was probably a little less important, a little less noble, if one can judge by the "Narrative" which Miss Rourke herself authenticates; for in that book the buzz of his tongue grows sometimes very tedious, as no doubt it did in Washington, in Jackson's day. But the privilege of idealization is one again that no rational reader will deny so charming a writer as Miss Rourke. She has done something not easy to do. She has preserved ■ horsefly in amber.

MARK VAN DOREN

Kemmerer on Money

Kemmerer on Money. By Edwin Walter Kemmerer. The John C. Winston Company. $1.50.

THIS little volume of barely 200 pages, the amplification of a series of articles which the author contributed to the New York Sun, is much the best book on money for the general reader that has appeared during the present depression. There were good a priori reasons for believing that it would turn out to be just that. For Professor Kemmerer, who has acted as official financial adviser to the Philippine government, to Colombia, Chile, Ecuador, Bolivia, Peru, Poland, and China, has had more practical experience in setting currencies on their feet than any other man living; and he writes very simply and lucidly. Further, his book is no mere setting forth of general principles; it bears directly on the special issues raised by the monetary policies of President Roosevelt.

Necessarily the volume is controversial, but it is written without heat, and Dr. Kemmerer's arguments are all the more powerful because of the calmness, the tone almost of mere exposition, with which they are stated. His demonstration of the unworkability of a "commodity dollar" is thorough, and his exposure of the follies of our recent silver policy is even more so. In some respects the most significant chapters in the present book are those on the American inflation in the Civil War and post-Civil War periods and on the post-war German inflation, for they show how slow inflation is to get under way and how violent and uncontrollable the acceleration becomes when it does. The case of Germany is, of course, much the more striking. Germany's paper money increased from less than 3 billion marks at the beginning of the war to 29 billion at the end of November, 1918. The demand deposits of the Reichsbank increased in the same period from 858,000,000 marks to 10.7 billions. Here was a tenfold inflation of money and credit. Yet from the calendar year 1914 to 1918 the price of gold in terms of marks, as measured by the New York-Berlin exchange rates, rose only 41 per cent, while wholesale prices in Germany merely doubled. At this point the dam burst, and the mark began that appalling plunge which did not end until it had reached a trillionth of its former value, while the cost of living soared to a level 1,247 billion times as high as that in 1913. Let us fervently hope that those who are now "disappointed" by the rise of prices so far achieved under a 59-cent dollar, and are calling for more devaluation and the high-pressure pumping of currency and credit into our system, can be brought to see in time the disaster toward which such policies lead. The real danger is not that the price response to the 59-cent dollar will be insufficient, but that runaway markets may suddenly develop.

Some minor criticisms must be made of the present book. It is to be regretted that Professor Kemmerer did not include a chapter on the French inflation, which was much more nearly analogous to our own recent and prospective inflation than the fantastic German episode. On questions of practical judgment, Dr. Kemmerer's opinion that the 1926 level of prices was approximately that to which we would have returned even without devaluation is open to grave question. Finally, Professor Kemmerer is an adherent of the orthodox quantity theory of money, and that theory seems to me both theoretically and statistically untenable. Professor Kemmerer falls back upon the concept of "velocity of circulation" to account for statistical discrepancies, but the objections to this reasoning are numerous; it may be pointed out, for one thing, that the circulation of money and credit cannot increase without a corresponding increase in the circulation of goods (including speculative transactions), so that both sides of the famous quantity equation are raised.

But these theoretical points are relatively unimportant here. Professor Kemmerer's practical conclusions are nearly all implicitly based on the bullion theory anyway, and not the quantity theory, for he assumes that a given percentage of reduction in the gold content of the dollar will be eventually reflected in a rise of commodity prices in inverse ratio. And like nearly all our other leading monetary economists, Professor Kemmerer favors the termination of uncertainty by a full return to the gold standard, accompanied by a vigorous and unequivocal statement from the President declaring it to be the intention of the Administration to use all the resources of the government to stay on gold and to maintain permanently whatever new dollar parity is fixed.

HENRY HAZLITT

Spengler Declines the West

The Hour of Decision. By Oswald Spengler. Translated from the German by Charles Francis Atkinson. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

THE fame or rather the notoriety of its author should not deceive us: neither the message of "The Hour of Decision" nor the delivery of that message is unique. If we are to believe Spengler, who, like so many other historians, seems to confound his own person with that of the Deity, the book has a special profundity; for it is the wordless idea which the Prussian has in the blood by inheritance that gives permanence to the future, and it is this wordless idea which Spengler, as one who charts the future, would express. In the course of an argument composed of an admirable series of non sequiturs, Spengler finds occasion to dismiss the Age of Rationalism of which our present is a part, and with it those arrogant urbanites who insist upon the use of intelligence. As such an urbanite the reviewer confesses his inability to deal with Spengler as Spengler would be dealt with.

Though a heretic, and forbidden the German radio for his heresy (but not the bookstores), it is his opinion that the national movement has hardly begun, and he holds that even Jews may be Prussians, like the Japanese; the tone and the content of Spengler's "The Hour of Decision" are one with the dogma of Rosenberg and Hitler, of Von Papen and Göring. There is the leader, the hero, whom all others obey, and for whom, as for the hero's slaves, it is ignoble to die in bed. Human history is war history. It is a leader faithful to a destiny which is to consist in the omnipotent rule of Prussianism, the reign of blood and iron and of death. This ideal—unlike the Ideal which, as suitable only to the intellect of decay, is an object of contempt—is familiar; those who have amused themselves with

A NEW SERVICE

$170 EUROPE

ROUND TRIP

They said it couldn't be done!

$170 ROUND TRIP TO EUROPE! They said it couldn't be done . . . with 2-bed staterooms; hot and cold running water in every cabin; abundant and delicious food; the unrestricted use of the ship with its spacious decks, veranda cafe, and recreation rooms. But it can be done. We proved it last year to students, teachers, scientists, professional people and family parties. They were so delighted (and surprised) at the comforts and steadiness of our ships and the congenial friends they met aboard that they wrote hundreds of unsolicited letters to us. Those letters are a remarkable verdict on this new kind of service to Europe (New York—Havre—Antwerp). Would you like to read some of these letters? May we tell you all about it? See how much you get for $170 round trip (there are no ups!)

Your car can go in the ship's garage for $130 round trip!

Ramble over Europe in your own car. You will save more and pay less that way. The Bernstein Line has special equipment used by no other trans-Atlantic line. This enables us to take along your car to Europe without crating and without hoisting. The fare for your car is only $130 round trip. Let us tell you about roads and motoring abroad.

ARNOLD BERNSTEIN LINE
Dept. 821
17 Battery Place, New York, N. Y.

the Wagnerian controversies of the nineteenth century should have little difficulty in recognizing it. Only Spengler, taken with the insignificant notion of historical necessity, would add that it is for Germany to rule the new Roman imperium into which we discover ourselves fated to enter. The arguments used in defense of this thesis, as we have suggested, are not novel, and the dialectic is trifling. But the strong man is wordless, and the Faustian man who strives toward the infinite must speak only in negations.

What, in brief, is Spengler's special mode of argument? The concepts are two, destiny and race. The ideal of the right or Prussian race consists in obeying destiny as that destiny is interpreted by the historian, or Spengler. This quotation, chosen by Spengler from Wagner's "Siegfried," will leave us in no doubt as to what is intended by destiny:

On the world's loom
Weave the Norns doom,
Nor may they guide it nor change.

Doom is introduced in the character of Western rationalism in general, but it is most vividly personified in socialism and the colored—not yellow, since the Japanese are Prussians, too—peril, the peculiar fruit of its impotence. The colored peril is the external, socialism the internal menace. In reality they are one, for socialism and the advancement of labor are merely the colored peril within supported by the colored peril without—a diagnosis which with some alteration of nuance is concurred in by many Communists, but which, granted, does not, as Spengler thinks, necessarily imply the reduction of worker to slave. This reduction is necessary, however, because, unlike any other, the Prussian or aristocratic ideal expresses itself through property. The follower must belong to the leader. The Germanic race (property-owners), the warlike Prussian spirit, will recognize fate, the mask will be dropped, and history will come to be once more. If the awakening fails, it is history in an incorrect version which will unfold. That destiny, in danger of becoming dichotomous, will vanish is apparent, but this peculiar circumstance Spengler ignores.

Such is the invincible doctrine of Spengler, written with his blood, but to be received perhaps with the tears of the reader.

LINCOLN REIS

CONGRESS

is in Session

Already this interesting assembly has attracted thousands of people to Washington. Many leaders of industry are meeting here daily to discuss their legislative, tax and other problems. Society, too, has taken on vivid color as guest lists read like a World's "Who's Who". You will enjoy Washington this winter.

● Assure yourself of exclusive comfort in this delightful hotel. Convenient to financial, shopping and theatre districts. Write or wire for reservations.

Nathan Sinrod, Manager

The HAY-ADAMS HOUSE
LAFAYETTE PARK AT SIXTEENTH • WASHINGTON, D.C.

Ugly Duckling

The Life of Hans Christian Andersen. By Signe Toksvig. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

IN a childhood brimming with fairy tales—Grimm and Hoffmann and Andrew Lang and many others—Andersen was always a thing apart. Even a child felt the difference, the initiation into a quality of real emotion, a shy, wistful beauty that held a delicately distilled pain and a sly humor, a pathos that had a half-hidden insistent meaning. Even a child responded to the perfection of that artless manner that conveyed so much more than it said so simply. Even a child knew that the ugly duckling was not only a bird and that the fate of the fir tree was more than a plant's tragedy.

That was one half of the essence of Andersen. His tales had an emotional and artistic truth because they were all directly or inversely about himself. He was the duckling, the fir tree; he was also the swineherd who, unlike the one in the story, never succeeded in kissing the princess. All his life, as Miss Toksvig points out, his main theme was the one who is on the outside and gets inside, his tragedies were of those who for some reason or other could not get inside, or who were so completely outside that they never even thought of getting inside.

"My life is a lovely story, happy and full of incident . . .," he wrote in his autobiography. "My fate could not have been directed more happily, more prudently, or better. The story of my life will say to the world what it says to me—there is a loving God who directs all things for the best." And elsewhere he wrote, "For me the marvelous has always been truth." That was the other half of Andersen. Reality to him was one long fairy tale, with himself as the hero. Emotionally he remained all his life a child, gifted, sensitive, affectionate, obstinate, and exhibitionistic, with no power of self-criticism, dependent for his main values on the praise of others. When he did not get it, even in adult years, he wept.

His childhood had aspects that could easily become legendary. A shiningly immaculate poverty surrounded by forests and gardens in a village that retained many medieval beliefs and customs. A mad grandfather who brooded in the boy's mind as a perpetual fear that turned to shame and terror when the school children laughed at his fantastic tales of being a changeling—for he must be important—and said he was mad like his granddad. Free access to the asylum where his mild grandmother tended the garden and to the jail where he saw strange unforgettable sights. His dreamy father, a cobbler by an accident of fate, read plays to him, made him a puppet theater, took him to walk in the woods, and shocked his wife by saying that Jesus was only a very good man. He died young. The mother, loving and ignorant, poured all the local superstitions into her receptive child, who spent his time dreaming—sometimes so intently that he walked about with his eyes shut—reading, and making costumes for his puppets. Unable to get along well with other children, he made friends easily with grown people, who liked him and often went to remarkable lengths to help him. He had always friends far above him in station. He was only a boy when he began to write poems and plays and to read them aloud to the neighbors, a habit he simply could not conquer even when full grown. He read his productions to friends and strangers, singly or in groups. They were, on the whole, remarkably acquiescent, but in later years he was often ridiculed and his real friends begged him not to do it.

At fourteen he left the village and went to Copenhagen with some six dollars in his pocket. His mother said he must learn a trade, preferably that of tailor, and the neighbors agreed, but he said no, that would be a great sin for he was meant for something better. "First you suffer a great deal," he explained to his mother, "and then you become famous." And so it actually turned out.

In the end, after the most fantastic happenings, having written many incredibly bad plays, suffered terribly because of critics, poverty, and girls who would not marry him, besides the discouragements inherent in his own limitations, he found himself growing famous through the "trifles," the fairy tales, he had thrown off in the intervals of his real work. He had always had friends among the local aristocrats. But now he was acclaimed throughout Europe, sought by artists and writers, received and decorated by princes and kings. He was a great man. Because everyone praised him he knew it was so, for he was never sure otherwise. And yet, paradoxically, it was only his fervent, romantic belief in himself that had made it possible for him to triumph over poverty, ignorance, lack of ideas combined with ardent imagination, emotional dependence and disappointments, an entirely personal view of life. Miss Toksvig tells the story with insight, skill, and charm, and without sentimentality.

Where can one place Andersen? Was he a great man? Can an eternal child be that? He was an exquisite lyric poet whose poems are fairy tales that have an enduring appeal to the simple, fundamental emotions of old and young, and to the sense of beauty and pathos of sensitive adolescents.

CLARA GRUENING STILLMAN

By the author of
"The Road to Xanadu"

GEOFFREY CHAUCER

John Livingston Lowes

"Surely these enchanting lectures of Professor Lowes, whose great learning is so gaily infectious, make one of the very best books ever written on our first great poet and novelist. . . . Even though we may have been faithful amateurs of Chaucer, how much Professor Lowes tells us we did not know. . . . His book is packed with wisdom and hard-earned information, but considerate of the timid reader. It is a noble introduction to a man whose mind lives inside our own skulls even if the language looks a little different. Lowes helps him to 'make sense', a phrase Chaucer would have liked."—Christopher Morley.

$2.50

HOUGHTON · MIFFLIN · CO.

HUMAN RELATIONS IN ANY SOCIAL ORDER are dependent on the peculiar problems involved in the racial, religious, economic and social adjustment of individuals and groups.

SOCIAL WORK TRAINING can provide social workers with the background, the philosophy and the tools for dealing with these problems.

The Graduate School for Jewish Social Work offers this training in a professional curriculum leading to the Master's and Doctor's degrees.

For full information regarding qualifications for admission, scholarships and fellowships, write to

DR. M. J. KARPFF, Director

The Graduate School

For Jewish
Social Work

71 West 47th Street, New York City

PLAYS

DEBATES

THEATRE UNION'S *Stirring HitPEACE ON EARTHCIVIC REPERTORY THEATRE, 14th St. & 6th Ave.
Lowest HIT in New York 30c to $1.50 No Tax
Eves. 8:45. Mat. Wed. & Sat., 2:45

DEBATE

"Resolved that Capitalism is Doomed And Cannot Now Be Saved by A Redistribution of Wealth"U. S. Senator
Huey P.LONG

MECCA TEMPLE

131 W. 55th St., N. Y.

Tickets 25c, 50c, 75c, $1.00, $1.50, $2.00

BROOKLYN FORUM, 7 E. 15 ST., N. Y.

Famous Socialist Leader
NormanTHOMAS

FRIDAY EVE., MARCH 2nd

at 8:30

ALg. 4-2620

CAPITALISM IS DYING! WILL COMMUNISM SUPPLANT IT OR FASCISM PROP IT UP A WHILE?

Hear the

STIRRING DEBATE

COMMUNISM vs. FASCISM
MECCA TEMPLE, MARCH 4, at 3 P. M.
130 WEST 55th STREET, NEW YORK CITY between
CLARENCE A. HATHAWAY,
Member, Central Executive Committee, Communist Party,
U. S. A., and
LAWRENCE DENNIS,
Leader of Fascism in America.Tickets: $1.10, 83c and 55c. On sale at New Masses,
31 E. 27th St. (mail orders filled); Workers Bookshop,
50 E. 13th St., and other central points.

Auspices Press League and New Masses

An arresting pamphlet!THE DYING
PEACE

In which a group of expert students of international affairs speak with unusual knowledge of the diplomacy of recent years.

CONTENTS: I. British Policy in the Far East; The Disarmament Conference; the Rearming of Germany; The British Government and the Moscow Trial; Mr. MacDonald's Records; The South American Wars; The World Economic Conference; Our International Anarchists.

II. Reaction and Revolution; Internationalism and Isolationism; Who are the Realists? Great Britain's Part; The Individual, the State and the World; Patriotism; International Solidarity of the Workers; Hatred of War; Religion and War; The State Within the Law; A Peace Act; Universalizing the League; An Election Issue; The League in Party Politics.

III. A Peace Government; The Poverty Front and the Peace Front.

25 Cents

Published by NEW STATESMAN AND NATION
10 Great Queen Street, London, England

Also obtainable from

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, NEW YORK
INTERNATIONAL NEWS, 131 Varick Street, N. Y.Music*Two Brands of Piety

TWO new American operas: "Four Saints in Three Acts," words by Gertrude Stein and music by Virgil Thomson, recently performed at Hartford, Connecticut, and now at the Forty-fourth Street Theater in New York; and "Merry Mount," libretto by Richard L. Stokes and music by Howard Hanson, presented at the Metropolitan.

Superficially, the works are antipodes. The Stein-Thomson number had about it much of the alembication, the archness and mild effrontery, that has regularly gone with the Parisian cosmopolitanism of our cultural expatriates. Its seriousness was frequently overlaid with the apologetic smirks of fashion. The Stokes-Hanson work dismissed all such subterfuge: dealing with the rigors of our early Puritan morality, it was as stark and severe as it could be. Thomson's facile associationism often led him to give a comical emphasis to Miss Stein's cryptic passages, to delve into that bag of self-protective mannerisms which was the possession of Jules Laforgue in poetry and of such musicians as Satie, Milhaud, Casella, and Rieti. Hanson, as the composer of a "Nordic" and a Romantic symphony, could not abide by this indirect approach to his material: he was as sober as Wagner or Moussorgsky, and frequently sounded like them. In his earnestness he even permitted us to hear premonitory Indian war-whoops behind the curtain before disclosing the conflagration of the Puritan village, and I confess that the literalness of this "foreshadowing" seemed to dispel receptivity rather than awaken it. In merely waiting for the curtain to rise one was more malleable to the dramatist's wishes than after hearing these realistic yips. Frankly tuneful, Thomson treated Stein's fluid words like unrhymed jingles. He even gave us an aria constructed of vocal exercises; and in one place he managed a duet like the antiphonal announcements of a cuckoo clock and a grandfather's clock. Hanson aimed at firm, archaic melodies based upon ancient church modes.

In setting, the Stein-Thomson performance was superb in its devices for ocular ingratiating. No revue for the glorification of the American girl could discover surer methods of awakening our delight in color and choric maneuvers than did the blended scenery and costumes of Florine Stettheimer and the constantly alert choreography of Frederick Ashton. The Metropolitan presentation relied upon the strictly naturalistic style of stage setting and those flames and smoke which are the mechanic's triumph. In contrast with the lithe and comely nakedness of the Negro dancers in "Four Saints," we had in "Merry Mount" the unintentionally comical semi-nudity of the unfortunate Lady Marigold, the innocent victim of Wrestling Bradford's righteously distorted lustfulness.

But for all their superficial differences, there is a common element to be noted in these two works. Thomson has previously written frankly devotional music, as well as some entertaining music for another of Stein's pieces, "Capital Capitals." In "Four Saints" he seems to have combined these two aspects of himself quite well, giving us, beneath the picturesque and the grotesque, the kinds of sound that are authentically ecclesiastical in feeling. The effect was undoubtedly enhanced to a great extent by the cast of Negroes, who are equipped by a long tradition to season their congregational expressions with sportiveness. Thomson has shown that even a burlesque of the "sacred song" can draw effectively from precisely the same wells of response as the simple article might do—and there was a passage in the manner of Bach which flowered appealingly for the brief moment it lasted.

I should like to discourse easily and familiarly on the plot of Stein's piece, but must admit that I cannot. The words show evidence of a private planfulness which makes them much more difficult to fathom than if they were written under gas. Indeed, with our modern technique of interpretation, words spoken truly at random, in dreams or hallucination, would be much more revealing—but Miss Stein's extremely loquacious reticence shows evidence of a waking deliberation which too often makes her lines elusive rather than allusive. Is there, in a highly attenuated form, something of that ultimate confusion of birth, rebirth, marriage, love, and death which lies at the bottom of Wagnerian preoccupations, secularly in "Tristan" and ecclesiastically in "Parsifal"? One gets a "drift": that there is to be a play about saints; that Saint Therese has two selves; that one of them is quite Rotarian; that there is a dirge-like epithalamium—if epithalamium it was—a dark purple procession marching to rhymes in "ed" ("wed in dead in dead wed led in led wed dead in dead in dead in led in wed in said in," and so so) which seemed, by our lubricous way of thinking, to gravitate about the celestial omission of the word "bed"; and at the end everything seems happily settled.

The Stokes libretto, on the other hand, was unmistakable, at least if one happens to have read it, and not relied upon the muffled articulations that carried across the footlights. Wrestling Bradford is in great need of a woman, and his sleep is sorely troubled. In keeping with the ideology of his times, he attributes his discomfiture to the work of demons, who are thought to be struggling for the possession of America. Another group of settlers, having more joyous notions of the "good life," arrives—and the young minister Bradford falls in love with one of them, Lady Marigold, who asks him to marry her to a member of her own party. Bradford "rationalizes" his turbulent disappointment with the help of the fact that the newer settlers plan to erect so godless and pagan a thing as a Maypole. He instigates an attack against them as allies of evil, and Marigold's fiancé is killed. However, Marigold continues to repulse Bradford, who in a dream sells his soul to the powers of hell, thereby obtaining the lady in the dream-form of Astoreth. Upon awaking, he finds his village fired by Indians, and attributes this misfortune to his oath sworn in the dream. He confesses his unholy alliance, and seizing the swooning Marigold, he leaps with her into the flames, while the Puritans chant the Lord's Prayer in terror. Operatic opportunities: contrast of Puritan and Cavalier songs, the dance about the Maypole, the attack by the Puritans, the satanic revels in hell, Bradford's public confession of his contract with Satan.

As I had read the words of both works before seeing the performances, I had a great surprise in store for me. Stokes's text seemed to me an excellent vehicle for opera, and Stein's seemed almost negligible—yet I believe that the Stein-Thomson work is the more effective of the two theatrically—on a first hearing at least, though the fancier work might very conceivably wear thin more quickly on subsequent hearings. Stokes's text is highly respectable. But Stein's nonsense, as reinforced by Thomson, has established its great musicality. Even as nonsense it sings well: indeed, its very ambiguity may have prodded the composer to express its quality as utterance; if what was said was vague, en revanche it was said with extreme mobility of emphasis. Many modern composers, alienated by the triteness of texts, have set their scores to purely arbitrary syllables, but I believe that Thomson has profited by choosing instead the stimulus and guidance of living words, which give surer hints as to what tonal sequences—by obeying and emphasizing the natural rise and fall of spoken words—will best recommend themselves to listening.

Neither work ventures into the field of dissonance. Hanson's is largely modal. Thomson's broken fragments of tune, his continual popping forth of brief melodic figures, would prob-

James Joyce's ULYSSES

"Stands among the dozen greatest literary works of all time."—New Yorker. Five thousand readers a week are discovering this masterpiece anew. Unexpurgated. $3.50.
RANDOM HOUSE, 20 East 57 Street, N. Y.

□ JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH says □

AH, WILDERNESS! Guild Theater. O'Neill's nostalgic comedy about a youth who discovers love and poetry together. Made doubly effective by the performance of George M. Cohan.

AS THOUSANDS CHEER. Music Box. The best musical review of the year with Clifton Webb, Leslie Adams, Helen Broderick, and Marilyn Miller in a series of acid but amusing sketches.

BIG HEARTED HERBERT. Biltmore Theater. J. C. Nugent and Elisabeth Risdon in a broad but funny farce about the taming of a self-made man.

DAYS WITHOUT END. Henry Miller's Theater. O'Neill's latest and much discussed play which may or may not prove that he is ready for conversion to the Catholic Church. Splendidly produced and acted, but not likely to seem very significant to those not religiously inclined.

HER MASTER'S VOICE. Plymouth Theater. First-rate specimens of Clare Kummer's very special kind of wit with Roland Young and Laura Hope Crews.

MARY OF SCOTLAND. Alvin Theater. Helen Hayes and Philip Merivale give fine performances in Maxwell Anderson's play. The biggest dramatic hit of the moment but one which left me a little cold.

MEN IN WHITE. Broadhurst Theater. Fine teamwork on the part of the members of the Group Theater helps to make this play about a young doctor one of the things which must not be missed.

PEACE ON EARTH. Civic Repertory Theater. Propaganda play about the next war, in which the workers strike and a young college professor gets framed for murder. Drawing special but enthusiastic audiences which evidently do not agree with me that the play is quite uninspired.

SHE LOVES ME NOT. Morosco Theater. Mad doings at Princeton which involve the efforts of some high-minded students to rescue a not too innocent maiden in distress. Much the funniest farce of the year.

THE GREEN BAY TREE. Cort Theater. Absorbing psychological drama about a young man who cannot give up luxury for love. Shares with "Men in White" the first place on the list of dramas.

THE PURSUIT OF HAPPINESS. Avon Theater. Spicy and more or less historical comedy about a young Austrian who finds bundling one of the pleasantest of the new freedoms in Revolutionary New England.

THE SHINING HOUR. Booth Theater. Reviewed in this issue.

THEY SHALL NOT DIE. Royale Theater. To be reviewed in next week's issue.

TOBACCO ROAD. 48th Street Theater. Superb performance by Henry Hull in a grotesquely humorous play about total depravity as exhibited by the poor whites of Georgia. Dramatized from a novel by Erskine Caldwell and not likely to be forgotten even by those who find it a little too strong for their stomachs.

ably be found on analysis to have been built about the simplest and most fundamental of chords, like the intervals of a bugle call, or like so many of the spirituals, which seem hardly more than incidental weavings about a structure of do-mi-sol. I can easily imagine him being harnessed by Broadway or Hollywood for the purposes of commerce. The Hanson orchestration was much more highly developed, Thomson being content with the barest sufficiency of instrumental background.

Hanson's work at its best is manly and imposing. At every point it is frank in a way in which the Stein-Thomson product is not. Thomson's at its worst is effete, and content with mere tonal wisecracking. But as a piece of ingratiation—and all art in the end must ingratiate itself—I believe that "Four Saints" prevails. Perhaps it is one kind of light entertainment which all the world will some day care for, when a new day has imposed the privileges and problems of leisure upon all, and the wealthy patrons of this bounteous performance will have been generously admitted into the ranks of the spectacle-loving masses.

KENNETH BURKE

Drama

Very English and Very Good

THE SHINING HOUR" (Booth Theater) is an admirable play which is English to the core. Like most recent importations from London its manner is subdued to an extraordinary extent, but unlike a great many it remains, nevertheless, dramatic in a way that Americans can appreciate. Obviously the author, one Keith Winter, is working directly in the current British tradition. He has all its distrust of fluent emotionalism and all its distaste for characters not well bred enough to conceal their feelings. But to me at least it appears that he has succeeded where others have failed in actually achieving a dramatic effect by means of underemphasis, and that by so doing he has done much to justify a tendency which seemed to be making the current English drama unendurably tame.

The chief characters compose a family of gentlemen farmers inhabiting an Elizabethan house in Yorkshire. Two brothers and the wife of one have settled down to a pleasant, unexciting life in a household managed by an unmarried sister, and violent feeling of any kind has been ruled out of their existence. They are not prepared for any situation like that created when a third brother returns from the East with an attractive wife, and even after it has been precipitated they can hardly believe, much less confess, that it exists. It is not that they are stern moralists, for, indeed, they are as far from being that as they are from being the kind of people to whom dangerous passions are something with which it is exciting to play. But they are, on the contrary, typical English men and women to whom it has never occurred that good sense, good breeding, and decent reserve will not prove adequate to deal with any crisis which could possibly face them. They do not want to be dramatic and they do not believe it will ever be necessary to be so. Their problem now is to deal with catastrophes of a sort they had never expected to meet, and, above all perhaps, to find words in which to communicate feelings which the whole discipline of their lives has tended to teach them to repress or conceal.

The real significance of the play does not lie in its specific situation. It may even seem to some as it does to me that this specific situation—produced by the love which springs up between one married brother and the wife of the other—is slightly artificial as well as entirely conventional. But it does serve to introduce the real theme, which is simply the effect of such a situation upon a group of people to whom it appears primarily incredible and inappropriate.

Ultimately they are compelled to acknowledge its presence, even to act out their unwilling roles to a melodramatic conclusion, but the conflict is chiefly the conflict between the reserve of their temperaments and this new necessity for throwing off reserve. They struggle desperately to conduct their lives on the old casual and easy basis. The daily routine is maintained, the informal banter kept up. But the time finally comes when passions must burst through, when a scene must be made by persons to whom scenes have always seemed unthinkable, and the crisis of the play is really the moment when this occurs. The point is not that one character takes his brother's wife. The point is that British reserve has been broken down, that persons to whom the dramatic is anathema have been compelled to act their roles in a drama. "The first thing that struck me about the English," says the half-alien wife, "is the air of confidence they have. I can't help wondering what it is that they are so confident about." And that remark, made early in the play, may possibly be intended to announce its theme.

So much for what seems to me to be a reasonable interpretation of "The Shining Hour." More obvious is the fact that it is written with great delicacy and charm, that whatever one may think further of it, the easy naturalness of the dialogue and the likableness of the characters are beyond dispute. It happens also to be very suavely played by Adrienne Allen, Raymond Massey, and Gladys Cooper, but the virtues which they interpret are plainly inherent in the script. For one thing the characterization is crisply economical, for another Mr. Winter has the rare ability to write witty dialogue of the sort which retains a certain human informality instead of crystallizing into those glittering epigrams which may be eminently quotable but are not in the least convincing as actual speech. His is a civilized play which has nothing of the sensational in it but which ought to find an appreciative audience almost as easily here as in London.

One of my friends and half a dozen of my enemies have written in to point out with varying degrees of asperity that "The Passing of the Third Floor Back" was written by Jerome K. Jerome and not by Charles Rann Kennedy. Mr. Kennedy wrote "The Servant in the House" as I ought to have known. Inasmuch as I meant to be unflattering to both these authors as well as to "The Joyous Season," with which "The Passing of the Third Floor Back" was compared, the situation is rather complicated, but I am ready to apologize to everybody and to any extent short of saying that either of the two works last mentioned is good.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Contributors to This Issue

HERBERT SOLOW has returned to free-lance journalism after being reporter, foreign correspondent, and editor.

ELLA WINTER is the author of "Red Virtue: Human Relationships in the New Russia." She lives in California.

ANNIE NATHAN MEYER is known as the founder of Barnard College and as the author of many articles and stories.

HENRY LEE MOON went to Russia to appear in a motion picture, the making of which was later discontinued.

ELLEN LA MOTTE received a memorial medal from the Chinese National Government in 1930 for her work against opium.

M. R. WERNER is the author of "Barnum," "Brigham Young," and "Bryan."

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	259
EDITORIALS:
Mr. Roosevelt's First Year: A Primer for Critics	262
President and Press	263
Retreat from Stimson	264
ISSUES AND MEN. HITLER AND THE YOUTH OF GER-
MANY. By Oswald Garrison Villard	265
CARTOON: IN THE EUROPEAN JUNGLE. By Low	266
WHO'S BEHIND THE NEWSSTAND RACKET? By Jack Beall	267
EUROPE MOVES TOWARD WAR. I. THE BLOODY DANUBE
AND BEYOND. By Johannes Steel	269
THE NRA OIL TRUST. By Mauritz A. Hallgren	271
SOCIAL WORKERS IN THE DEPRESSION. By Eduard C.
Lindeman	274
AMENITIES FROM A HOSPITAL PALLET. By Paul Y. Anderson	275
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter	276
CORRESPONDENCE	277
BOOKS, DRAMA, FILMS:
Makers of Modern America. By Louis M. Hacker	279
Eros and Neuros. By Mark Van Doren	280
America in Yugoslavia. By Edna Kenton	280
Labor and Steel. By Mauritz A. Hallgren	282
A Fresh Talent. By Roberts Tapley	283
New Fiction	284
Drama: Newsreel. By Joseph Wood Krutch	284
Films: Miss Bergner's Catherine. By William Troy	285
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE	286

BOARD OF EDITORS

FREDA KIRCHWEY	JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
MAURITZ A. HALLGREN	MARGARET MARSHALL
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; $6.00 in Canada, $5.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. British Agent, Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England.

THE GREATEST DIFFICULTY in getting any State to pass a measure of social legislation such as unemployment insurance is its fear that in so doing it will put its manufacturers at a competitive disadvantage in comparison with the industries of other States which do not have such legislation. A statesman-like way of meeting this situation so as to promote the passage of unemployment insurance is contained in the bill recently introduced in Congress by Senator Wagner of New York and Representative David J. Lewis of Maryland. This bill provides for an excise tax of 5 per cent on the pay rolls of firms employing ten or more workers, which is to be returned to firms that are required to make contributions under State laws to unemployment-insurance funds. The measure, which was drafted in part by officials in the United States Department of Labor and was unanimously indorsed by the recent Federal Conference on Labor Legislation which Secretary Perkins called in Washington, should speed up unemployment-insurance legislation by the States. For a State which took such action after the passage of this bill would not increase the burden upon its employers, but would instead merely transfer the funds from federal to State use. It would, moreover, not subject its industries to interstate competition, since the laggards would be required to make an equal contribution to the federal Treasury. And yet each State would be left free to enact the type of unemployment insurance which it thought best, whether on the basis of the State-wide fund, according to the Ohio plan, or the system of plant reserves provided in the Wisconsin act. The Wagner-Lewis bill is federalism at its best. We hope that strong popular pressure will develop for the measure and that the President will urge its adoption.

SENATOR NYE of North Dakota, firmly convinced that the little business man is getting a raw deal under the NRA, has persuaded his colleagues to look into the big-business connections of the officials responsible for writing and enforcing many of the NRA codes. Senator Robinson of Arkansas, the majority leader, who did yeoman service for big business under the Hoover Administration, tried at first to bury the Nye resolution in committee, but this attempt was defeated despite the protests of Administration spokesmen. Unhappily, the Nye resolution does not go nearly far enough. It merely requests General Johnson to furnish the Senate with a report on the past and present business affiliations of his colleagues and subordinates in the NRA, and then only of those officials who are stationed in Washington. An investigation that would really determine whether the NRA codes are encouraging monopoly at the expense of the small manufacturers and small enterprises would of necessity have to be much broader. It would have to inquire into the extent to which prices are being fixed, markets apportioned, free competition restricted by credit manipulation, and other monopolistic practices resorted to. This is being done on a very small scale under the Senate resolution directing the Federal Trade Commission to look into the fixing of oil and steel prices as permitted by the NRA codes. The Nye resolution carries the inquiry another step in the same direction, but not far enough really to frighten the industrial and financial interests which have been gradually turning the NRA to their own purposes.

IT IS A CURIOUS FACT that Senator Nye does not stand alone in his belief that the NRA is chiefly benefiting big business. Precisely the same view is held by some of our outstanding business men and bankers. Henry Ford has publicly confessed that the NRA is doing him and "the country" a world of good. Although the Administration a few months ago seemed anxious to "crack down" on him, something it never actually got around to, it did not hesitate to express satisfaction over this indorsement. Charles G. Dawes, a tory if there ever was one, has discovered that the Roosevelt program put an end to the depression last October, for which he has uttered fervent thanks. Pierre S. du Pont, identified with some of the biggest monopoly interests in the country, said that when he went to Washington to head the Industrial Advisory Board of the NRA he was frankly skeptical regarding the recovery program. But after a few weeks, having had an opportunity to see the NRA machinery working, he announced that he was not only satisfied that it would not harm business but that he was enthusiastic over the way in which it was helping business. Eugene Grace, head of Bethlehem Steel, wrote in a magazine article a few weeks ago that "the NRA has given industry an opportunity to act in unison in the interest of public policy without being handicapped by competition of the chiseling type and without the shackling effect of the anti-trust laws." Of course it is conceivable that these men have spoken out of pure altruism; but it must not be forgotten that their dominant interest has always been the maintenance and further development of their own big businesses, and that they look upon as chisellers those small business men who are able to undersell them because of more efficient methods or are forced to do so by the pressure of big-business competition.

LOOKING many years ahead, quite beyond the probable limit of his own tenure of office, the President has decided to set up a planning commission which would map a program for systematic physical development of the country. The program, which would take from twenty-five to fifty years to complete, would put rivers-and-harbors work on a scientific engineering basis, would provide for a system of essential commercial waterways, for reforestation, land reclamation, and the prevention of soil erosion. The Tennessee Valley project would, for example, be made a part of the plan. The President's proposal must be warmly approved. At present the maintenance and development of our rivers and harbors is haphazard at best, being left almost entirely to the whims and political log-rolling of Congress. The current public-works program, too, though it has met with few political difficulties, has been casually put together. Both the unemployed workers and the country as a whole would have profited much more had the public-works needs of the country been studied and provided for in advance. Much has been said in the past about waterways, flood prevention, reforestation, and land reclamation, but little of concrete value has been done in any of these fields except the last. It is only when the proponents of this program begin to talk of decentralizing industry in connection with waterway developments and land-reclamation schemes that they are likely to run into trouble. In a political democracy based on a profit economy it will not be found quite so easy to shift industries from one site to another or to move whole sections of the population from one area to another. But, then, there is no certainty that either our democracy or our private-profit economy will last out these next twenty-five or fifty years.

WHILE DOLLFUSS is making every effort to consolidate his forces outside Vienna, negotiations with Germany are evidently going on behind the scenes in an effort to head off, for the moment at least, the consequences that would arise if the struggle between National Socialists and Dollfuss fascists were permitted to continue. The result of these conversations may be the calling of a general election in which all except the outlawed labor parties would be permitted to participate. The German Nazis have always demanded new elections and promised to abide by the dictum of the people. They may safely continue to follow this course, for the suppression of the Social Democracy will have added to the already large number of their voters those who will be impelled by their hatred of Dollfuss to vote against the Chancellor and his party even at the price of supporting the Nazi cause. These, together with a not inconsiderable Heimwehr and Christian Social element which will also vote against Dollfuss, should guarantee the National Socialists 40 per cent or more of the votes cast, so that the new government will contain a representative number of National Socialists in its Cabinet. Dollfuss, the mass-murderer, will not be the coming Chancellor. Fey, or perhaps even Prince Starhemberg, will take his place to set the stage for complete Nazi control along the lines that proved so effective in Germany, where the Hitler government began with a Hitler-Hugenberg coalition. Italy, probably much against its wish, will have to support an understanding with the Hitler party—since a war over Austria at the present time would be even less to its taste—in the hope that the question of Anschluss will somehow be adjusted. Hitler will be content with a National Socialist government in Austria that will work in harmony with the economic and political interests of the German government, while Mussolini will strive so to strengthen his hold on the Balkan states that territorial union of the two German nations a few years from now will have lost its menacing possibilities. Against a community of nations embracing Germany, Austria, Italy, and Hungary, France would play a losing game even if it had Great Britain on its side, a supposition that is more than unlikely. The fascist nations on the Continent are coming to an understanding, and all Europe will have to fall in line.

TWICE IN A WEEK the MacDonald Government in Great Britain has found itself facing hostile benches and has been forced to count a challengingly close vote. The first time the Prime Minister was severely criticized for the government's stand on allowances to the unemployed. Although the weekly dole for a dependent child has been two shillings a week, there has been a strong protest to have this niggardly sum raised a shilling. Many Conservative members joined the Liberals and Laborites who were urging an increase in this particular payment. The government, in opposing the increase, won its point by a majority of fifty-two, the lowest since it took office in November, 1931. On the following day Premier MacDonald found himself beset from the other side, when the Conservatives severely criticized the government's policy in Ceylon, and a hostile motion was defeated by only forty-five votes, cutting the majority seven more. On Sunday, February 25, hunger marchers from all over Great Britain assembled in Hyde Park in a great anti-government demonstration. It probably means that poor Mr. MacDonald's chickens are coming home to roost; after two years of trying to please everybody and making forgiving speeches, he is about to find that he is pleasing nobody and may as well move on. Here is the former leader of the Labor Party and champion of the working man refusing an addition of twenty-five cents to the miserable dole for a child. But the Prime Minister, in choosing to lead a National instead of a Labor Government, long since left the workingman and his child to their fate. It would be ironical but perhaps not wholly surprising if that abandonment should bring Mr. MacDonald face to face with his own Nemesis.

THE KILLING of General Augusto Sandino, his brother, Socrates, and two other aides in the capital of Nicaragua is an ugly blot on the regime of President Sacasa, although no evidence has come to light to implicate him in the crime. Sandino, who led a long resistance to the rule of his country by a puppet government supported by business interests of the United States and a detachment of the marine corps, agreed to cease fighting a year ago, after the government had been reorganized under President Sacasa, and the marines had been withdrawn. He laid down most of his arms at that time and agreed to give up the rest a year later. He and his companions had been conferring with President Sacasa in regard to that agreement at a dinner—said by participants to have been a most friendly meeting—and were returning to their quarters when they were seized and murdered by members of the National Guard, which Sandino had denounced as an unconstitutional force. During the height of Sandino's resistance to United States intervention, in the winter of 1927-28, The Nation sent Carleton Beals into the Nicaraguan jungle to interview the leader. After many difficulties Mr. Beals succeeded, and presented Sandino's side of the controversy in The Nation and a considerable number of daily newspapers. Sandino was called a "bandit" by the State Department and the United States marines for fighting for the independence of his country against foreign exploitation. Men who took a similar stand against Great Britain in 1776 have passed into American history as "patriots." Query: Have our views changed in 150 years, or do the latest dictionaries define "bandit" and "patriot" as synonymous?

THE AIR is full of conservative fuss and feathers over the new ways in which the Constitution is in danger of being violated. May we point out that it continues to be violated in the old ways? At this writing Negroes are being refused service in public restaurants run for and controlled by Senators and Representatives whose function presumably is to uphold the Constitution. A few weeks ago the Negro secretary of Oscar de Priest, a colored but duly accredited member of the House of Representatives, was denied service in the House restaurant. Even a Southern gentleman could see that this was a bit thick, and by a tacit and presumably gentleman's agreement Representative De Priest and his guests are now allowed to eat in the same room with Representative Warren of North Carolina, who has said in so many words that as long as he has anything to do with the restaurant it will not serve "colored employees or visitors." But the gentleman's agreement did not extend to Miss Mabel Byrd, a Ph.D. from the University of Chicago, who was escorted not too gently from the Senate restaurant, which she dared to enter, ironically enough, just after she had attended a hearing on the anti-lynching bill designed to protect her race from the more brutal manifestations of Representative Warren's attitude. It is a situation worthy of one of those body blows which President Roosevelt knows so well how to place. Meanwhile the prize for self-satisfaction goes to Senator Copeland of New York, who after the Byrd incident ordered a table exclusively for Negroes installed in the Senate restaurant, "because," he said, "I am opposed to Jim Crowism."

THAT THE PRICE of justice is often so high as to be prohibitive is illustrated again in connection with arrests made several weeks ago at the picketing of the Kirschner foundry in New Haven, Connecticut, by striking employees. A number of students in Yale University joined the pickets as sympathetic participants, and, as noted in our issue of January 10, Lawrence Hill was clubbed by police and fined on charges of resisting an officer, breach of the peace, and obstructing the sidewalk. For merely taking a policeman's number William Gordon was arrested and fined. When the cases were appealed, that against Gordon was dropped by the prosecution as too flimsy. Hill was acquitted of the only serious charge, that of resisting an officer, but his fine of $60 was reduced by only $10. Two of the Kirschner workers were fined $25 and $10, respectively. As the cost of another appeal was estimated at possibly as much as $2,000, the fines were ordered to be paid and the case was dropped by the defense committee, although a legal point of some importance was involved, that is, the judge's ruling that only employees of the Kirschner plant had the right to picket. This dictum is contrary to decisions in New York State and in some other courts, although there have been rulings in its support. In any event, the assertion is poppycock and deserves to be vigorously opposed.

FOR THIRTY YEARS Gertrude Stein has beguiled her commentators into the trap of imitation or mere smart remarks. Both, of course, are always designed to make Miss Stein look silly; and in thirty years the commentators have not discovered that after the type has cooled it is almost invariably not Miss Stein who looks ridiculous. Miss Stein has always been funnier than any of her imitators and a good deal less self-conscious. We shudder to think how many bad imitations will roll over our heads before "Four Saints in Three Acts" finishes its run—and the specimen submitted by Lawrence Gilman in the New York Herald Tribune on the morning after the first night was not at all encouraging. His remark that a Ph.D. thesis or a wine list would have made as good a libretto for Virgil Thomson's music as Miss Stein's nonsense affords a perfect illustration of what Miss Stein's nonsense does not consist of. Even a grammarian in the last stages of annoyance would have to admit that the Stein libretto was fresh and surprising. Mr. Gilman's remark was neither. F. P. A. had practically the same idea. "But Lord!" he wrote in his Pepys' diary, "anybody could take any words at all and set them to musique. I could take anything from a newspaper and do it." With all respect to F. P. A., we doubt it. Three days after the opera opened, a psychologist discovered that Miss Stein had a mental disease called Echolalia. It is an excellent name for a very common disease but—again—it is not Miss Stein who has it.

THERE are those who say that literary criticism has ceased for the most part to be either literary or critical. In refutation we submit the advertisement of a recent novel which appeared in a New York Sunday newspaper. The advertisement quoted seven reviewers, each of whom found that the writer under consideration had something in common with a different important novelist. According to these seven enthusiastic critics, this promising young author is comparable with George Eliot, Charlotte Brontë, Arnold Bennett, Theodore Dreiser, John Galsworthy, Charles Dickens, and the "classic Greeks." We have not the time to inquire into what sort of style it would be that combined all these masters. We merely wish to complete the record. For some reason the remark of The Nation's critic, who compared the author with still another great novelist, was not included. This reviewer pointed out that the promising young author "allows herself to inherit the worst of Hardy."

Mr. Roosevelt's First Year

A Primer for Critics

MR. ROOSEVELT'S show has been on for a year now. It has had a good run and on the whole ■ good press. The major characters are ■ little better than adequate and Mr. Roosevelt is ■ hit in the lead. He is generally acknowledged to be the best actor anywhere on the American stage. All this being true, it is odd that so few people seem to know what the show is really about. We do know. And because we do we thought we ought to contribute to General Johnson's symposium. We not only understand the plan and purpose of the thing but we have two or three changes that we think would improve it.

First, however, let us clear up some of the obvious confusions of our fellow-commentators. That well-known critic Mark Sullivan, for example, believes that "The New Deal" is a red show. Mr. Roosevelt, he thinks, plays the role of Stalin with a cast of assorted Bolsheviks mostly named Tugwell to support him in his effort to expropriate private industry and economically execute leading bankers and other pillars of the temple. Nobody in the play is being told what is going on. They are just going to wake up in the last act and find themselves collectivized. Even then Mr. Sullivan is afraid they may not be told. He doesn't like mystery shows. They give him the creeps.

Then there is Dramatic Critic Mike Gold. Mr. Gold is a very dramatic critic and believes that "The New Deal" is ■ fascist play. Mr. Roosevelt, a mixture of Mussolini and Hitler and the late Czar, is planning to liquidate Mike Gold and the working class and the small business man and the consumer. (Mr. Gold doesn't mind the last half of this program.) The President is surrounded by a bunch of Nazis named Johnson or Morgenthau, and he is secretly establishing a totalitarian state.

There are friendly critics, but they are naturally less amusing. Some of them admire capitalism as Mr. Sullivan does; but they interpret "The New Deal" to mean that the old system is being given ■ rather rough but bracing sort of pick-me-up and a slight purgative; whereupon it will presently feel like a new system and step out briskly all ready for another hearty binge. And some of the friendly critics dislike capitalism, not quite as much as Mr. Gold but enough so that they think of "The New Deal" as a parable in which Moses (Mr. Roosevelt) leads his people (the better sort of trade unionists and the humbler sort of business men) out of the wilderness (the depression) into which they stumbled in their flight from Pharaoh (the money changers), who had basely misused them.

All these observers are, we suspect, betrayed by their hopes or goaded by their fears. Since our own opinion of the American show differs from the rest we feel sure that it must be correct. We take the bold position at the outset that Mr. Roosevelt is trying to do what he said he was going to do. He said he was going to put men back to work so that they could buy goods so that factories could run. To do this he had to have a fairly free hand. This Congress gave him. Does the President's free hand constitute fascism? We do not think so. Next he had to induce industry to abolish child labor and decrease hours of work and pay a minimum wage and stop cutthroat competitive tactics. This required a system of rules which were drawn up and are being administered by the NRA. Do these codes constitute Communist control of industry? We do not think they do. He also had to try to prevent farmers from going out of business entirely, so he established another set of rules intended to limit production and raise prices. Does this mean the nationalization of agriculture? Not yet.

In other words, the President was eager enough to have capitalism survive, but he believed that it could not survive unless it were so regulated that most people could buy the things that the factories would produce in impressive quantities the minute most people could buy them. And since Mr. Sullivan's system wasn't bright enough to regulate itself, Mr. Roosevelt decided to do it instead. That is all. It seems simple and it also seems odd that so many people should misinterpret these clear and obvious intentions.

Now to do what Mr. Roosevelt set out to do required a few very fundamental alterations in the economic relationships of the country. First, it is clear, wealth could never again be allowed to flow in the same proportions into the pockets of capitalists and of working people. If capitalists got the same old proportion they would almost certainly use it in the same old way—namely, after eating all they could and living in as many houses and countries and sailing in as many yachts as possible, they would use it to build up a still larger and more productive industrial plant. And they would do this despite their experience of the painful consequences that follow the mass production of goods that cannot be bought. Knowing this, Mr. Roosevelt decided that hereafter a better balance must be maintained. More wealth must go into wages; less into dividends and thus back into industry. The consequences that logically follow upon this decision are so numerous and so complex that they can hardly be touched upon here, but they represent a major change in the structure of capitalism. If they actually took place they undoubtedly would alter the old thing so that its best friends—like Mr. Sullivan—would have to be pardoned for not recognizing it; or even for mistaking it for communism. But it would not be communism. It would be planned capitalism, and if it worked it would be the only thing that could possibly save Mr. Sullivan's favorite system.

So far it has not worked. The fundamental alterations in the economic relationships of the country have not successfully been made. And so, in spite of some improvement in business and ■ very few million men back at work, the chance of the serious, thoroughgoing revival of activity which is necessary to bring about a state of health in the economic system still seems remote. The reason is not far to seek. The capitalist system is not going to be saved if it can possibly help it. It seems determined, with a sort of idiot cunning, to prevent Mr. Roosevelt from forcing it to do what is necessary for its survival. This statement is sweeping and therefore unjust to some individual intelligent business men. But it is not unjust to many of the largest, most powerful businesses in the country. Among which we may name the oil industry, the steel industry, the coal industry, the power industry, the packing industry, and the publishing business; and there are plenty of others.

Without going into a bill of particulars we can summarize very simply what these businesses want and what they hope to avoid. They still want to pay wages as low as possible; they still want to charge the consumer as high prices as possible, and to this end most of them are writing price-fixing agreements into their codes; they want to work labor at least forty hours a week; they want to be free to hire and fire as they see fit, and so they oppose bitterly the collective-bargaining provision of the NRA and attempt to evade it by every possible sort of trickery and violence. They also want to manipulate the financial processes of the country to the end of piling up profits rather than stabilizing industry, and the result is bitter, almost unanimous opposition to such measures as the Securities Act and the Fletcher-Rayburn bill to regulate the stock exchanges.

The result of this almost concerted effort to thwart the President's intention has been dramatic. Perhaps 3,000,000 people have gone back to work in industry, with about 4,000,000 employed in relief or other government jobs; and more than 10,000,000 are still unemployed. In only 15 out of 234 codes are hours of work set at less than forty a week. Minimum wages established in codes range as low as fourteen cents an hour, or $5.60 for a forty-hour week. Living costs have gone up while average wages have stood still. In short, Mr. Roosevelt—who is, we repeat, neither a fascist nor a Communist nor a Moses but a man with a simple desire to put industry back in working order and prevent it from coming a cropper through the same sort of mismanagement that has tripped it up in the past—Mr. Roosevelt has, in a year, not got very far toward achieving his end.

Does not this failure suggest some doubts in his mind about his basic plan? To us it suggests the possibility that capitalism is a congenital recidivist, that it is not capable of reform. Our own modest suggestion to Mr. Roosevelt is that he begin to eliminate the obstructions that prevent him from carrying out his plain and praiseworthy desires; that he take over the basic industries of the country, beginning in a small way with the banks and the railways, but proceeding as fast as may be to include steel and coal and oil and communications and power. Not until the areas dominated by the struggle for private profit are reduced to insignificant proportions can even the beginning of a balanced economy be achieved. And a balanced economy is the only kind of a system that can fulfil Mr. Roosevelt's first requirement of keeping men at work.

There are, we admit, certain measures of coercion that the President might try before deciding that capital punishment is the only way out. First, let him dismiss from the various government boards and agencies—except the Industrial Advisory Board—all representatives of businesses which come under the jurisdiction of the recovery administration; second, let him see to it that representatives of labor and consumer organizations are included in all the code authorities; third, let him support a measure amending Section 7a of the Recovery Act in such a way as to outlaw company-controlled unions and force employers to deal with independent labor organizations. Nor should any hindrance be permitted to labor's right to strike or to enter into closed-shop agreements. Only by measures at least as drastic as these is there any chance that wage levels can be raised and prices kept down to a point that will make possible increased buying on the part of most of the people of the country.

President and Press

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S executive order in promulgating the NRA code for daily newspapers is as delightful a document as has breezed out of Washington in many moons. It is perhaps the first state paper in which a President has deliberately and delicately "spoofed" or "kidded" his adversaries—to their complete discomfiture. The newspapers have been made a laughing-stock not only for the general public but especially for their own editorial employees, to whom the business-men owners denied the advantages in regard to hours and pay which it has been the general purpose of the codes to extend to wage workers.

The code itself is among the least satisfactory to be approved, and it is so because of the power of newspaper owners and their insistence upon protecting their profits at the expense of their employees. Business-office employees may benefit somewhat, but mechanical workers will profit only to the extent of advantages already won by their unions. Editorial workers are dishonestly exempted from the provisions of the code on the ground that they are "professional persons," while boys under sixteen years of age may be used for selling or delivering newspapers subject only to some restrictions in regard to schooling and night work. President Roosevelt, it is true, has given notice that he proposes to review the provisions in regard to newsboys and editorial employees, and has suggested—as a voluntary measure—a five-day, forty-hour week for the latter in cities of 750,000 persons. But for the moment victory in regard to code provisions rests with the newspaper proprietors.

The fly in the newspaper owners' ointment is President Roosevelt's executive order in which he has dextrously peeled off considerable patches of hide from the pundits in control of the press, leaving them badly lacerated in prestige and personal vanity. The crux of the controversy lies in the wish of newspaper owners to be exempted from the license provisions of the National Industrial Recovery Act—in other words, from the teeth of the law—on the ground that to apply that part of the legislation would violate the constitutional guaranty of a free press. Mr. Roosevelt and General Johnson hold, what would seem to be self-evident, that no code could, in fact, impair a constitutional guaranty, but they finally admitted an article intended to meet the objections of the publishers, whose real purpose, obviously enough, was to wriggle out of any code control at all. But the President, in his executive order, robbed the publishers of any joy they might have taken in their victory by characterizing the article as "pure surplusage"—a phrase that deserves to become as popular as some of those coined by the other Roosevelt—and remarked that the free-press clause in the code had no more place there "than would the recitation of the whole Constitution or of the Ten Commandments." "Of course a man does not consent to what he does not consent to," said

Mr. Roosevelt jocularly. Then, baring rather more of his teeth than appear in the usual press-photograph smile, he added unpleasantly: "But if the President should find it necessary to modify this code the circumstance that the modification was not consented to would not affect whatever obligations the non-consentor would have under Section 3d of the National Industrial Recovery Act."

Such language! The cries of pain that have issued from various newspapers attest to its effectiveness. The New York Herald Tribune called it a "gross insult" and demanded an apology, but the public has obtained a new glimpse of an institution which is usually able to prevent the circulation of anything but its own high opinion of itself. American newspapers prate of a "free press" at a moment when, in fact, they have surrendered most of any valid claim to such a conception. Unquestionably they have built up the fullest and probably the fairest news service in the world, but in doing so they have incurred such enormous expenses that they have become a part of big business. Even this might not be fatal if their product were sold to the public on bona fide terms. But it is largely given away—a kind of free lunch intended to decoy the partaker into paying real money for the fare so glitteringly offered in the advertising columns. Even the fairest modern news service cannot but reflect and be controlled by the attitude of the buying-and-selling civilization of which it is a part. It is perhaps not too much to say that American journalism has become merely the publicity department of business. And the fact that its news service is sold at less than cost practically prevents the establishment of journals free from advertising, priced on the basis of actual overhead expense. President Roosevelt, by refusing to take seriously the patter of a group of smug business men about a "free press," may have done something to shatter a naive tradition. If so, he has done well. Anyhow he has given the country a good laugh.

Retreat from Stimson

WASHINGTON dispatches indicate that President Roosevelt is thinking of modifying the Stimson Doctrine. Such modification would inevitably result in American recognition of the Japanese state of Manchukuo. These reports have met with no denial either from the White House or from the State Department. Nevertheless, we find it hard to believe that the President is seriously contemplating a retreat from the Stimson Doctrine, or if he is, that he has really weighed the consequences of such action.

When Japan by its conquest of Manchuria set the civilized world at defiance and brazenly violated its obligations under the League Covenant, the Kellogg Pact, and the Nine-Power Treaty, the United States could have followed any one of several courses. It could have attempted to enforce the treaties to which it is a party by the employment of force in the form of a blockade or by direct intervention, either independently or in concert with the other parties to these treaties. Or it could, jointly with the other Powers, have applied economic sanctions, thus depriving Japan of the materials it needed to carry on its campaign of aggression. On the other hand, it could have sat back and done nothing, allowing the Japanese to go their way without restraint.

Instead of any of these the United States chose a middle course. It elected to rely upon moral suasion as a means of obtaining enforcement of and respect for the peace treaties. Under the Stimson Doctrine it refused to recognize any territorial gains or other changes resulting from military aggression or from violation of international agreements. This doctrine was immediately adopted by the entire membership of the League of Nations except Japan and Siam. As an integral part of the doctrine it was agreed that recognition should be withheld from Manchukuo. Thus the moral weight of the whole world was thrown against Japan and its conquest of Manchuria.

That this policy was having the desired effect may be seen from the extraordinary efforts the Japanese have been making to break through the solid diplomatic blockade of Manchukuo. They have not even been above attempting to trick the Western Powers into recognizing Manchukuo. They have labored hard and long to build up the pretense of an independent state in Manchuria, going so far as to lift the pitiable Manchu prince, Pu-yi, out of obscurity to set him upon a new "imperial" throne. They have endeavored to win French recognition by promising French capital a share in the economic exploitation of Manchuria, and German recognition by dangling attractive trade opportunities before the hard-pressed Hitler regime. While these efforts are mainly significant because they betray the anxiety the Japanese have felt in consequence of the world's moral condemnation of their aggression, it now appears that the Japanese maneuvers may soon succeed in breaking through the united front of the Powers. French capitalists are reported ready to extend long-term credits to the South Manchuria Railway, while the German government is said to be on the verge of recognizing Manchukuo.

If one country abandons the Stimson Doctrine in the hope of gaining commercial or other economic advantage, every other Power will be sure to follow. This will mean a reversal of the League's policy, though the reversal may not be formally proclaimed; and it has been indicated in Washington that if the League changes its stand, the United States will do likewise. Even from a purely selfish point of view such action on the part of the Powers would be foolish, for Japanese government and private-monopoly interests have already grabbed virtually everything of consequence in Manchuria. Moreover, if reports from Moscow are true—and these reports can readily be confirmed by the American military intelligence service in the Far East—the Japanese are developing Manchuria largely with a view to using it as a military base for an invasion of Siberia. American recognition of Manchukuo would then be equivalent to giving American support to preparations for another Japanese war of aggression. In brief, we should be endangering the purposes of our recent rapprochement with the Soviet Union. But recognition of Manchukuo would be more than foolish, and in its implications it would go far beyond any bearing it might have on our relations with Moscow. It would mean the abandonment of a moral principle for the sake of political or commercial gain. It would place a heavy premium on treaty violations. It would, in fact, place the United States in the role of treaty breaker, at least in spirit, since recognition of the booty state of Manchukuo would constitute open and unashamed approval of the Japanese rape of Manchuria in defiance of all Japan's international obligations.

Issues and Men

Hitler and the Youth of Germany

PROPAGANDA from Germany in behalf of its present government continues to clutter up my desk.

Much of it is as inept and as stupid as was the German propaganda at the outbreak of the war. For example, I am appealed to on behalf of the Deutsche Auslandsinstitut in Stuttgart with the request that I join them in explaining to the American public what a magnificent thing the Hitler government is, and how wonderful is the new union of all elements in Germany in one great nationalistic undertaking. This is sent to the publisher and contributing editor of the first American periodical to be excluded from Germany by Adolf Hitler! Nobody but a German could do a thing like that.

Now all through this propaganda material runs one note worth touching upon. It is that Hitler has revived German youth, pulled it out of the Slough of Despond, fired it with enthusiasm, set it to work, and given it a great nationalistic ideal. Instead of youth being hopeless and helpless in the face of unemployment, yielding to vice or dissipation, or starving in the streets, it marches with complete solidarity and great joy, clad in brown uniforms, singing "Deutschland über Alles," and fired as never before with the vision of death on the battlefield as the highest aim for a young German, and of a Germany not merely equal to all other nations but imposing its will upon all other countries in the name of a pure Germanic culture and morality. Undoubtedly this is an engaging picture. I have met a number of Americans who, not looking below the surface, have fallen for it completely. Most of them know little German and have merely seen brown-shirted youths marching through the streets singing the Horst Wessel song. What an amazing transformation, they say—a despairing youth made overnight into a virile, happy, enthusiastic, determined generation looking to the future with complete confidence that Germany is herself again!

Well, this is a remarkable achievement. It would be idle to deny it, and I should be the last to do so. If this new-found solidarity, these ideals, and this inspiration with which the young people of Germany are being supplied were of the right kind, it would be something for which all the world would give thanks. Unfortunately, the youth of a country can be fired to follow false gods. It can be given ideals and objectives that are not only unsocial and unholy, but positively inimical to the welfare of the nation in the long run and of the whole world. And that is precisely what has happened in Germany. Its young men and women have been poisoned—poisoned with hate for certain classes in the community, taught to believe that they must smash and imprison and outlaw every individual whose views go counter to their own. They are bred in intolerance, nurtured in vindictiveness, breast-fed with hate. They are even being taught, many of them, that what Germany needs is the setting up of a pagan religion, the renewed worship of gods who typify at best only the crude idealism of men who lived in the days when everybody carried a weapon and was clad in the skin of a wild beast. If the teachings of Adolf Hitler are sound, however, the Christian religion ought truly to be scrapped, not only because Jesus was himself a Jew, but because all that he taught of brotherly love, tolerance, kindliness, good-will, and forgiveness of sins is entirely banned.

If German youth were capable of analyzing its present situation or the new teachings given to it, it would speedily see that what Hitler has thrown overboard is not what he pretends—merely the Semitic influence over Germany and the alleged misdeeds of the founders and conductors of the German Republic—but the very things that the German nation has cherished most and to which it has up to this time invariably accredited its greatness. Formerly it fostered the ideals of a free cultural life, respect for the intellect, the freedom of teachers and the taught, and set the intellectual and spiritual life on a higher pedestal than was the case in any other country. It wished to be known always as a nation of thinkers, of poets, artists, and scientists, and it never questioned whether the great men that it worshiped were Aryan or not. It was proud of Bismarck, who, it is repeatedly stated, had a Jewish grandmother, and therefore if he were living today would be classed as a Jew. If it was a question of a Virchow, a Helmholtz, a Gneist, or a Mommsen, it made no difference what their past was, and it goes without saying that these men would have been the first to protest against a regime which prevented any German-born citizen from developing his individuality and his intellect to the fullest possible degree.

Besides all the other things which have been destroyed in Germany, there has been eradicated the most vital principle of law—the right of the individual to his property and his security in his way of life, provided he does not contravene the criminal law. Innumerable persons in Germany have been deprived of their property, not only without due process of law, but without hope of justice. Perhaps 80,000 have been imprisoned, the great majority without a charge being brought against them, without hope of a day in court. People have said that the family is the keystone of human institutions; even more fundamental is the right of the individual to abstract justice. But in Germany there has been created the doctrine that the state may rob and despoil, plunder and pilfer, violate every contract, destroy the careers of countless individuals, drive them from their homes, from the only country they know, with a brand upon their foreheads. And then we are asked to believe that the inspiration and solidarity and enthusiasm that Hitler has given to German youth in some degree offset these blows at the most cherished rights of every individual who claims his soul as his own!

Donald Garrison Killam

Copyright by The Nation and Inter-Europa Press. Reproduction in the United States forbidden.

IN THE EUROPEAN JUNGLE.

Who's Behind the Newsstand Racket?

By JACK BEALL

IT would surprise almost any New York newspaper owner or editor to be told that his newspaper was largely responsible for the unwholesome conditions which have recently been unearthed by the newsstand-racket investigation. And he would put in an indignant denial if it were suggested to him that the newspapers of the city might be directly culpable if the grip of the racket were not broken. He would make the reply, with perfect truth, that the newspapers gave considerable space to the exposure of the racket, that some of them published editorial comment against it, and that newspaper representatives had met with Mayor LaGuardia and pledged that their papers would help his new broom in the Department of Licenses to sweep clean.

Editors can indulge in the warming thought that they are fighting graft and corruption wherever it is found, almost, and owners can walk abroad in the calm assurance that the welfare of a nation may safely rest in a free press with a conscience so responsive to wrong and right that it censors its own advertising. They would be thunderstruck to realize that they have for years contributed a major share to a system which quite literally takes pennies from blind men. The system, as it was exposed in the recent investigation conducted by a retiring Tammany Commissioner of Licenses who wanted above all else to show up his predecessor, a Tammany renegade, can be boiled down to about this:

There are nearly 4,000 licensed newsstands in New York. According to the law they are expected to be parceled out, for the payment of a nominal fee, to five classifications of applicants, first and second preference being given to disabled war veterans and to the blind. There are more than enough applicants in these two preferred classes to operate all the stands in the city, but actually the disabled and the blind hold only about one-tenth of the stands. The other nine-tenths are held by able-bodied business men and women who have purchased their stands, in direct contravention of law, for sums ranging from $1,000 to $18,000, depending on location. Sometimes an especially meritorious political hanger-on can get a stand without paying money. His quid pro quo is the rendering of services to a district leader, who, consulting the License Commissioner as a matter of form, either gives him a stand of his own or muscles him in on some other person's stand.

For the past decade only the most ingenuous of disabled veterans or blind men have tried to get what was legally theirs for the asking. The wise ones went to the accredited go-betweens, paid their money, and got their stands. During the past four years the accredited go-betweens have been two half-world characters named Jake Sbar and Louis Breines. Louis and Jake conducted a newsstand curb exchange in an ice-cream parlor in Harlem. They had the "right connections" and brought together prospective purchasers and those who "owned" newsstands already and wished to get rid of them. It made no difference, of course, that stands were supposed to revert to the city for reallocation when the licensees quit running them. Such an uneconomic policy never occurred to Louis and Jake or even to the disabled veterans or the blind men who had lived in New York long enough to know that you can't get anything for nothing. They paid their money like the rest and received no discount, though it was proclaimed in the ordinances that they were the wards of the city.

The convention of newsstand buying and selling required that someone at the license bureau must be "seen." A procession of witnesses at the inquiry identified that someone as Joseph W. O'Connor, nominally an inspector in the department but more cogently described by his confreres as "Geraghty's financial secretary." James F. Geraghty was the commissioner at the time, a fine, upstanding Bronx district leader who apparently set his official approval on whatever O'Connor did. Louis and Jake, after consummating a sale, would send the purchaser down to O'Connor, who, in the course of fifteen minutes with no questions being asked, would transfer the license to him.

The upshot of the investigation in terms of action was the indictment of Sbar, Breines, and O'Connor on charges of extortion and coercion. Although there was testimony that on two occasions disgruntled purchasers had loudly and publicly demanded their money back from no less a person than Commissioner Geraghty himself, that former servant of the city was not called to testify at the hearing nor was he questioned by the grand jury.

And now, how do the newspapers come into the picture as countenancing and even preserving this system? In the first place, a distinction should be made between the proprietary-editorial and the business-circulation side of newspapers. The editorial department, as a sort of repository of the public conscience, may be filled with righteous fervor and crusading zeal to discover and to right the wrongs of the outside world. But it seems to have a blind spot for what goes on in the circulation department. There is a curious, half-brotherly relation here, a dualism of business personality, which can be observed at its worst in Chicago.

The beginning of modern racketeering and gang warfare is directly traceable to the circulation wars engaged in by the circulation departments of Chicago papers. All the piety and wit of the editorial departments in arousing the public against the menace of the gangs cannot wash out one word of the charge that the newspapers themselves started it. True, it was the circulation departments which set bands of armed thugs to turning over and burning the stands of rival newspapers and to throwing bundles of papers into the Chicago River, but a circulation department is a component part of a newspaper. It is the hand that distributes the paper, even as the editorial is the hand that writes it.

The circulation departments play a direct part in the newsstand racket in New York through the fact that they decide arbitrarily what dealers are to be supplied with papers. Thus they have the power of life and death over the individual dealer. Further, they have the veto power over any move of the Commissioner of Licenses. For what good does it do a dealer to have a stand on a good corner and a license to operate it, if he can get no papers to sell? The power to withhold papers is the power to destroy. This right to withhold or to sell to whomever they like is zealously defended by circulation managers and newspaper owners. It was upheld recently in the Supreme Court of New York. Decently used, this right cannot be complained of, but when it is corruptly used, it directly implements the newsstand racketeer.

Jake Sbar confessed once in an unguarded moment how the money paid over for the purchase of a newsstand was "cut up." Half of it went, he said, to the former owner of the stand, part of the remaining half went to himself and Louis Breines as their commission, part of it went to the Department of Licenses—whence a goodly percentage was siphoned upward to the Tammany coffers, presumably—and part of it went to the circulation departments of the newspapers. Approximately the same division was made of an $8,000 "defense fund" which was raised last November at a secret meeting of the New York Newsdealers' Protective and Benevolent Association, of which Sbar was a director. That "cut-up" differed from the usual one, according to Sbar, only in being divided three ways instead of five. Sbar and Breines got no part of it, but a young law clerk named Herman B. Sarno, who happened to be the son-in-law of the former law partner of the Commissioner of Licenses, got $2,000 as a retainer. The Commissioner himself admitted that the idea was to "get to" him through the young law clerk. The other two shares, according to Sbar, went to certain persons in the Department of Licenses and certain persons in the circulation departments of newspapers.

What possible services could these circulation departments perform for Jake and Louis and the Benevolent and Protective Association that they came in for a regular share in the money that was collected? Simply that Jake and Louis, to be able to get any sort of price for a newsstand, had to offer some guaranty of permanent or semi-permanent tenure to their prospective purchasers. They could not get it from the License Department because politics might intervene or a scandal break at any time, as did happen last December, and purchasers might be thrown off their stands. But Jake and Louis saw that if purchasers who were thrown off their stands still got their papers, and if their successors at the stand did not get any papers, the newsstand-selling business would be stabilized. That is where the circulation men came in. That is why it was worth while to divide with them on sales and "defense funds." Naturally, if this operated to perpetuate the illegal buyer of a newsstand in his tenure, it also operated to perpetuate Jake and Louis in their positions as go-betweens and, in fact, to perpetuate the whole illegal system.

How high in the circulation departments the money collected in these ways went is an extremely difficult question to answer. On only one newspaper is it known to have gone as high as the head of the department.

Corroboration of what Sbar admitted can be obtained from at least one incident. A newsdealer named Tom Higgins built up a stand in the Bronx until it was a paying proposition. He had previously sold other stands through Jake and Louis, and it was not long before the two go-betweens came around to urge him to sell this stand. For some season Higgins refused. Jake and Louis intimated that it would be better if he changed his mind. A few days later delivery of all Higgins's papers, both morning and afternoon, was stopped. And he couldn't get them started again—he met with silence or unkept promises whenever he registered a complaint. Then he saw a great light and notified Jake and Louis he was ready to sell. The papers started flowing in again as suddenly as they had stopped. He sold his stand.

Even more direct evidence is to be had from a statement made by James Hasenack, circulation director of the Sun, to Herman M. Immeln, director of social welfare of the New York Association for the Blind, that an agreement existed among circulation managers to the effect that if any newsdealer lost his license, his successor would not be served with papers by the route men.

But it may be objected that the situation has changed now that Mayor LaGuardia and his new License Commissioner have gone into office, that Jake and Louis and O'Connor are under indictment, and that a separate investigation by Irving Ben Cooper, chief ferret of the Seabury investigation, has been under way for more than a month. How can the circulation departments still be chargeable with countenancing, continuing, and supporting the racket? The new Commissioner is getting ready to root out the able-bodied, illegal purchasers of at least the more lucrative stands, and to turn them over to the veterans and blind men who were supposed to have received them in the first place. It is perfectly possible that the purposes and acts of the new Commissioner will be vetoed by the circulation departments in spite of assurances of cooperation which have been given. Certain straws which have blown by are indications of this.

At a meeting of circulation managers called by Mayor LaGuardia about a week before he took office, to discuss what could be done about the situation, the managers refused the main thing that LaGuardia requested of them. He asked them to replace John C. Mansfield, circulation commissioner of morning newspapers, with another man. Mansfield was named in the investigation later as the "circulation czar" and was accused by one newsdealer of demanding $2,000 from him for the restoration of delivery service. The only consolation the Mayor got was that the New York Times withdrew soon after from the association which employed Mansfield. Although the circulation men freely discussed at this meeting cases of buying and selling newsstands and did not make denial when the Mayor-elect accused them of knowing that the practice had been going on for more than a decade and of permitting it to go on in spite of having the power to stop it, seven of these same circulation managers swore on the witness stand two weeks later that they knew nothing personally about the buying and selling of stands. In two instances they said they had never heard of it until they read the reports of the newsstand hearing.

It is commonly known that a large number of the route men who deliver the papers on trucks have stands of their own under assumed names or under cover of relatives' names, but only one instance has come to light of the newspapers making any attempt to clean up the situation. Jack Katz, a route man for the New York Herald Tribune was publicly named as owning a stand. When Katz refused to obey a subpoena to testify in the matter, he was fired by his paper.

Perhaps the newspapers hesitate to start on this particular job of housecleaning because they do not wish to precipitate trouble with the Newspaper and Mail Deliverers' Union, which is composed mostly of route men. Incidentally, Harry Feldman, circulation manager of the Evening Journal and president of this union, was quoted recently as reassuring the holder of a license at Broadway and Forty-second Street, who was facing a possible revocation for having bought his stand, that he need not worry about having his license taken away as he would be protected on his papers. Feldman is under fire from within the union, it being alleged that he caused no regular financial report to be made during his incumbency. Annual dues come to over $126,000 a year.

It may not be unfair at this point to recall the background of another circulation manager, perhaps the greatest of them all. Certainly his paper, the Daily News, leads all the rest in circulation with its 2,200,000 copies daily. Max Annenberg was Hearst circulation manager in Chicago at the time of the circulation war there which ushered in the gangster epoch. He had been hired from the Chicago Tribune after having acquired an enviable reputation as a getter of circulation. An admonitory expression which he is supposed to have used to his underlings and dealers has since become a classic: "If you can't sell 'em, eat 'em!" Annenberg not only bore Chicago lead in his person for a time but was also indicted some years ago for shooting one Alexander Belford in the chest. Although Belford lived to make the identification positive, the jury cleared Annenberg. There can be little hope that he will turn out to be a reformer or do much to disturb the status quo ante.

In cleaning up the purulent mess which is the newsstand situation in New York, the LaGuardia administration is going to need the help of the newspapers, particularly of the circulation departments. Whether it will be forthcoming is problematical, in spite of assurances. Meanwhile, public confidence in the idealism of the press would be increased if the press would show that its idealism begins at home. Its editorial right hand might at least inform its circulatory left hand that it knows what is going on.

Europe Moves Toward War

I. The Bloody Danube and Beyond

By JOHANNES STEEL

I

THE Socialist revolt which broke out in Austria on the evening of February 12 was not premeditated. It was the spontaneous action of men who chose to face certain death rather than forsake the principles for which they stood. It is an event of which international socialism can justly be proud and which will undoubtedly assume historical importance. The deep impression it has made upon Socialists and organized labor in England and Spain, in Czecho-Slovakia and the other Central European countries will in time produce long-hoped-for repercussions. But while we duly recognize this, it is more important now to consider the far-reaching political, economic, and social effects which the Austrian situation will have almost immediately upon the whole of Europe. A short résumé of the situation immediately before the massacre will be sufficient to connect the future with the events of the recent past.

The development of the conflict was to be expected. For some months it had been apparent that Dollfuss was moving to the right, and this was not because he was in sympathy with the Heimwehr but because, as events have shown, he needed support and overestimated the military strength of this organization. For about six months the Heimwehr, which never represented more than 15 per cent of Austria's voters, had been waiting for an opportune moment to take a hand, always threatening to ally itself with the Austrian Nazis if Dollfuss refused to take its leaders into the government. When it became evident that England and Italy were preventing Dollfuss from laying before the League the case of Austria against Germany, the Heimwehr knew its chance had come. Alone, Dollfuss could not fight both the Nazis and the Heimwehr. The price Dollfuss paid for the cooperation of the Heimwehr, which is financed in about equal proportions by Italy and Austrian industrial interests, was the heads of the Social Democrats.

The struggle itself was, of course, not ordinary party strife. Deep and fundamental issues were involved. For almost half a century Vienna had been the spiritual home of the European Socialist and labor movements. In fact, since the war it had been the guide and philosopher of all Socialist governments in Europe. The Socialist administrations of Vienna had won not only the loyal support of almost half of the Austrian electorate but also world-wide appreciation of their constructive achievements. After the advent of Nazism in Germany, Vienna became the last Socialist stronghold in Western Europe. The example of a well-administered Socialist Vienna was resented by Mussolini and Hitler as much as by the capitalist interests within Austria itself. Just as German capitalism generally, with generous foreign aid, and the German steel and dye trusts in particular have made Hitler and Nazism their willing tool, so Austrian capitalism and the Alpine Montan Gesellschaft and Motor Car Steyr have made Starhemberg and his Heimwehr their tool, with the primary purpose of smashing Austrian socialism.

The reaction has won this battle, and the way is now open for renewed exploitation of Austria by German and Austrian capitalism jointly. Austria will soon go Nazi. Dollfuss is exhausted. Mussolini has to reckon with Yugoslavia and France. The capitalist backers of the Heimwehr, although they would not mind the Italian brand of fascism, naturally prefer the German variety. But since Anschluss is necessary in order to give the German armament and aviation industries the benefit of reduced prices for the ore products of the Alpine Montan Gesellschaft, which, incidentally, is partly controlled by the German steel trust, it is certain that union with Germany will come in one way or another. England is not interested in preventing this development. For about two years now British foreign policy has been influenced decisively, particularly as far as Germany is concerned, by men like Montagu Norman, governor of the Bank of England and personal friend of Dr. Hjalmar Schacht, director of the Reichsbank; Sir Henri Deterding, the British oil magnate.

who has certain agreements (of which I shall give a detailed account in a later article) with Alfred Rosenberg, head of the Nazi Foreign Office; and Lord Rothermere, who is now openly advocating fascism for England. Thus Britain will do nothing at all as long as the organization of Austria on National Socialist lines proceeds ostensibly from within. A difference in method, however, will do nothing to alter the tremendous effects this inevitable event will have.

II

It seems not to be sufficiently realized that the cultural, social, and economic consequences of this development will soon affect the everyday life of many millions of people in Central Europe. I have the impression that the magnitude of this complex of problems, the violent manifestations of which will soon confront the civilized world, is generally underestimated in this country as well as in Europe.

The fact that Vienna is "cosmopolitan," owing to the racial mixture of its population as well as to the refined eclecticism of its baroque culture, does not interest the Nazis. They simply consider that there are in Austria 220,000 Jews by religion and 400,000 by race, and that if they apply the Nazi test of the maternal grandmother they will have out of a population of nine millions at least a million victims which they can sacrifice to their insane racial theories. By the time these lines go to press, another exodus will have started. Many of the Jews will go to Poland, where anti-Semitism has always been latent and where the Jewish population has already been increased considerably through the influx of refugees from Germany. Others will go to Czecho-Slovakia, Yugoslavia, or Rumania; but wherever they may go it is certain that they will be regarded as foreign competitors in already depressed and congested labor markets. It is safe to say that this migration will not lessen the political confusion in Central Europe but rather will add new impetus to the aggressive nationalism now everywhere prevalent. The coming to power of the Nazis in Austria will also mean exile or the concentration camp for tens of thousands of non-Jewish writers, physicians, philosophers, scientists, high-school teachers, artists, and persons who have been in any way connected with the Socialist or Marxist organizations in Austria. Where are these people to go? This is a major problem. Already there are in Paris about 90,000 German and 30,000 Italian émigrés.

What is left of the Austrian cultural, social, and economic machine will be thrown hopelessly out of gear. With no resources and no prospects Austria's future depends solely on her quarreling protectors, or, to be precise, on the most aggressive of them. The Austrian Nazis' fond belief that Anschluss, whether with nominal independence or not, would give Austria overwhelming economic advantages is a fallacy which even the late Monsignor Seipel recognized. Austria's economic interests follow the Danube downward, not upward. Nazi rule in Austria is the first realistic political threat against the Little Entente. Nazi propaganda in Czecho-Slovakia, with its three and a half million Germans, will naturally take advantage of the moral effect which Nazi success in Austria is bound to have upon this German minority, and will become even more articulate and aggressive than it has been during the past year. Thus, with a hostile semi-fascist Hungary on its eastern borders, Czecho-Slovakia will be completely encircled. It will also be faced with serious internal political disorders emanating from an unruly minority. Yugoslavia is watching anxiously every move made by Italy. The former is convinced that national security demands that for every Italian army corps placed on the Austrian border one and a half corps of the Yugoslav army must be sent there.

The coordination of Austria is for Germany not an end in itself but merely the first step toward the realization of the Nazis' pan-German dream of a Teutonic Third Reich which will extend from the Baltic to the Adriatic. It is conceivable that Mussolini, who has lost a great deal of prestige over Austria, might unite with the Nazis to push Yugoslavia into the Adriatic. France, as the godmother of the Little Entente, would have to act immediately and rally her satellites. Nazi Germany, whose effective propaganda is already penetrating deep into the Balkans, would then issue an appeal to the many German minorities scattered all over Southeastern and Central Europe.

There is much truth in France's assertion that the German effort to create this mystical pagan Third Reich, which is to be inhabited only by Teutonic half-gods of Wagnerian caliber, is a definite challenge not only to French dominance but also to the peace of Europe. France is keenly alive to this threat and views the Nazi assault on Austria in the light of it; hence the frantic efforts on the part of France to tighten its system of alliances and the increased economic and financial support it has given to the Little Entente. M. Herriot's trip through the Soviet Union, the visit of the French Air Minister to Russia, the signing of commercial treaties, and, for the first time since the war, the exchange of military attachés between Moscow and Paris must all be considered in relation to that threat. But the Nazis do not fear the French system of alliances and are sure that it cannot prevent Germany from building the Third Empire. The Nazis furthermore believe that this system of alliances will be completely offset by colonial rivalry between France and Italy.

Hitler has won the first round; Austria is his, whatever happens. The warning of Italy, France, and England was a maladroit piece of ineffective political hypocrisy which will not make Germany hesitate for a minute to go ahead with its plans. Nazi Germany knows that whatever course events may take, England will not act but will maintain a policy of "benevolent" neutrality. The Henri Deterdings, Montagu Normans, and Lord Rothermeres in England have offered a helping hand to their German brethren and will see to it, in their own interests, that this new adventure in economic imperialism is not interrupted by Great Britain or, if they can possibly prevent it, by anyone else.

The foregoing is the first of several articles on contemporary developments in Europe. Later articles will discuss the attitude of the various governments—and of important financial and industrial groups inside the various countries—toward the question of German disarmament and German expansion; the mechanics of Nazi propaganda in the light of Germany's ambitions; the role of the armament ring in relation to the foreign policy of the governments; and the crucial questions of the future of fascism and the forces making toward a new world war.—EDITORS THE NATION.

The NRA Oil Trust

By MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

Washington, February 20

INDUSTRIAL self-discipline, with all its usual monopolistic trappings, has been chosen as the method by which the Roosevelt Administration hopes to tame the petroleum industry. It was at first thought that this objective might be achieved by means of an elaborate price-fixing scheme to be administered by a public agency. Bad as this plan was, it at least had the merit of being subject to a mild but definite measure of social control. For various reasons, however, the proposal was abandoned, without the public hearings that had been promised by the Petroleum Administrator, and for it were substituted two voluntary agreements, in accordance with which the industry, or so it is contended, will discipline itself. The new arrangement has not only all the evils to be found in the original price-fixing scheme but several others for good measure. It provides for price-fixing by the industry itself, or rather by the dominant major companies, instead of by a public agency. It encourages centralization of control of the industry in the hands of relatively few companies. It slights the interest of the consuming public and affords no protection to small enterprises. Indeed, under this latest plan, which is now in operation, the major companies can in effect dictate the terms upon which independent gasoline distributors and others may do business. True, the arrangement pays lip service to the principle of social control, but this control is directed by a man who by his own admission knows very little of the technical details of the oil industry.

Petroleum has been probably the most chaotic of American industries in recent years. It has been torn by dissension and open warfare. The major American companies have not only been divided among themselves; they have had to fight foreign competition. Foreign companies invaded the American field and the domestic market for several reasons, not the least of which was their desire to conserve their own supplies of petroleum while helping the prodigal American producers to waste the domestic reserves. If a number of independent producers and distributors, caught between these giants, have nevertheless managed to survive, it is primarily because their smaller overhead charges and more efficient operation have enabled them as a rule to undersell the major companies.

The petroleum warfare has taken the form of ruthless exploitation of the producing fields. Petroleum has been pumped freely from new pools and old without regard to economic need or social cost. This has inevitably had a depressing effect on prices, but even panic prices have not sufficed to stop the wild flow of oil. When the East Texas field was recently brought in, the price of crude oil in that area dropped to eight cents a barrel. But the pumping of oil continued just the same. The larger companies, whose operations carried them all the way into the retail field, could make up the deficit somewhere along the line. Most of the others had either to pocket a heavy loss or virtually to abandon their wells.

There has also been reckless competition in the retail market. There it has taken the form of a filling-station war. The best filling-station sites in the country have been grabbed by one or the other of the major groups, American or foreign. High rentals have to be paid for these sites. Palatial structures have been erected to house a few gasoline pumps and oil drums. Uneconomic services have been offered to customers without charge. Obviously these practices have added enormously to the distribution costs of the major companies.

Since the price of oil and its products seemed to play such a prominent part in the petroleum war, some of the code-makers thought that price-fixing in some form should be provided for in the petroleum code. Secretary of the Interior Ickes, who was later to become the administrator of the code, favored price regulation in principle. General Hugh S. Johnson, the recovery administrator, was opposed to it, declaring that price control could only succeed when "both supply and demand were under control." He was supported by Alexander Sachs, then chief economist of the NRA, and J. E. Pogue, economic adviser on oil in the NRA. The industry itself was divided. One group, led by Wirt Franklin, president of the Independent Petroleum Association, was most emphatic in its advocacy of price regulation. This group, composed of officials of several of the major companies—though not those of first importance—including Standard Oil of California, Barnsdall, Consolidated, and the Independent Petroleum Association, and of a few marketing groups, such as the Illinois Petroleum Marketers' Association, finally captured control of the committee representing the American Petroleum Institute in the code negotiations. Among the companies that were opposed to price control as at first proposed were Standard of New Jersey, Standard of Indiana, Texas Company, Sun Oil, Skelly, Socony-Vacuum, and Royal Dutch Shell. Why these giants of the industry were disinclined to accept price-fixing is not altogether clear, though the suggestion has been made that they were not opposed to it in principle but objected to entering into any price-control arrangement over which the government had any direct authority, for fear of "slipping their heads into a government noose."

The outcome of the controversy was to place in the hands of the petroleum administrator sufficient authority to regulate prices at the refineries and filling stations for a trial period. Secretary Ickes was named administrator, which in retrospect appears to have been an unwise step, not because of any weakness in Mr. Ickes himself, for his integrity and willingness to work cannot be questioned, but because he was already loaded down with as much work as any man, however brilliant and devoted to duty, could possibly handle with any real degree of efficiency. And so complicated is the petroleum industry that any man who seeks to administer it should be thoroughly acquainted with all of its many aspects. A Planning and Coordination Committee was set up under the code to represent the industry. Actually, however, at least thirteen of the fifteen places on the committee went to members of the Wirt Franklin group. A Petroleum Administrative Board was also organized under the authority of the code. This body is headed by Nathan Margold, Solicitor of the Interior Department, and is composed of a group of lawyers, petroleum economists, and mineralogists.

Administrator Ickes moved first to check the free flow of oil in the producing fields. His second step was to issue an order fixing prices for a trial period. This order was to have gone into effect on December 1. It has been said in behalf of the Administrator that he really intended the order to be used merely as a basis for hearing and argument and not as a definitive arrangement. However, the precise and unequivocal language of the order, as well as the fact that no hearings were ever held, indicates that when he issued the order Mr. Ickes had every intention of putting it into effect. There can be little doubt that he was under great pressure to do so. The schedule of prices and differentials contained in the order was worked out by the Planning and Coordination Committee, which was completely in the hands of the price-fixing faction of the industry.

The December 1 order was based on the most insubstantial of facts. Indeed, it can truthfully be said that it was not based on facts at all, but only on what the price-fixing advocates thought the traffic would bear. Except for statistics that might be buried in the books of individual companies, there were no facts available upon which even the most judicious and impartial Administrator could possibly base an equitable price for gasoline or crude oil. The cost of distributing gasoline in the retail market had, for example, never been broken down by cost experts for the industry as a whole. Although government agencies had made such studies in other fields, they had kept their hands off the retail gasoline cost structure. The industry has consistently balked any move to investigate its distribution costs. The major companies, as the Department of Commerce confessed in 1930, have gone so far as to refuse to allow any data to be published with respect to the proportion of their retail sales to the total volume of gasoline sales on the domestic market. Without even these rudimentary facts, how was it possible for the Planning and Coordination Committee or the Petroleum Administrator to arrive at the conclusion that a certain grade of gasoline must be sold at retail at a margin of five and one-half cents over the wholesale price in order to allow for costs and profit? Or that six and one-half cents would cover the costs of selling another grade of motor fuel?

The price-fixing order promptly aroused a storm of protest from many quarters, but especially from the surviving independent distributors. They contended that it would increase the cost of gasoline to the automobile owner an average of three cents throughout the country. In this they were supported not only by the Standard Statistics Company, a private agency in New York City, but also by the Consumers' Advisory Board of the NRA. Mrs. Mary H. Rumsey, chairman of the Consumers' Board, declared in a letter to Administrator Ickes that whereas the code had increased labor costs in the industry by only $125,000,000 annually, "the consumers' bill for petroleum products has been increased at a rate of over $500,000,000 annually." The independents asserted that they could profitably operate filling stations by selling gasoline at retail at a margin of no more than two and a half to three cents over the wholesale price. The larger companies, the independents declared, were insisting upon a margin of five and a half to six and a half cents in order to cover the cost of operating palatial filling stations in high-rent districts. They pointed to "the incredible waste and the insane duplication of marketing outlets," and added that "it would seem the petroleum industry has simply decided that the consumer must pay for all of this madness." The bill to the consumer under the Ickes order, according to statisticians employed by the independents, would have run close to a billion dollars a year, most of it pure profit. Government statisticians privately agreed with this estimate.

The chief complaint of the independents, however, was that they could not hope to compete with the larger companies if they had to sell their goods at the same prices. The latter have a virtual monopoly on conveniently located filling-station sites, and whereas there are many motorists who are willing to drive a few extra blocks to the "tankside" stations owned and operated by independent companies in order to buy gasoline a cent or two cheaper, few would go to that extra effort if they could get their motor fuel at the same price from stations situated on or close to the main traffic arteries. Moreover, the larger companies, out of their more abundant financial resources, can provide their customers with extra service "free of charge."

Administrator Ickes subsequently postponed the effective date of the price-fixing order to January 1. That he took this step because of the protests of the independent companies and consumers' representatives is not borne out by the available facts. On the contrary, there is evidence to show that he was disturbed mainly by the reluctance of the giants of the industry to commit themselves publicly to the price-fixing scheme. Finally he issued an ultimatum, with true Johnsonian brusqueness, demanding that on a certain day and at a certain hour the industry place in his hands an agreement for a settlement of all its differences and problems. The major companies were by no means slow in responding to this plain-spoken invitation. Though they had carried on their warfare over a period of more than two generations, they managed miraculously to come to terms within a few days.

Their proposal, which the Administrator approved with a few unimportant modifications, consists of two agreements. The first provides for the organization of a pool, to be known as the National Petroleum Agency, which will "purchase, hold, and in an orderly way dispose of surplus gasoline which threatens the stability of the oil price structure, in an effort to bring the prices of gasoline into proper relationship with the present price of crude oil and to maintain and support such relationship." The second agreement provides for the establishment and maintenance of what is euphemistically called "marketing margins" for distributors, jobbers, and wholesalers of gasoline. The retail dealers' margins have been set at six cents a gallon for the better grades of gasoline and at three and three-fourths cents for gasoline below sixty-octane rating. Only the refiners are to be parties to this second agreement, and it is intended that they shall exercise a strict control over retail prices by means of standardized sales contracts. "The parties to this agreement shall use only such forms of contract in such transactions. Such contracts shall contain provisions controlling prices of products to ultimate consumers at retail."

It can hardly be argued that this is not bald and naked price-fixing. The industry is now in a position to pass on to the consuming public the entire cost of the palatial filling stations and all the other extravagant expenditures that have attended the development of unnecessary and uneconomic retail outlets. The independent distributor, whose costs are low, may no longer share the difference with the consumer, for when he buys his gasoline from the refiner he must agree to charge a certain retail price. Thus he is deprived of his only competitive advantage. Of course, a few refiners may refuse to sign the marketing agreement, but this is not likely to happen since the pooling agreement gives the major companies plenty of power to compel recalcitrant refiners to come into the fold.

The price-fixing features alone are enough to condemn the present arrangement, but other objections to it can also be made. The authority to fix prices rests not with a public agency but with the industry itself; indeed, in the final analysis it rests with the financially more powerful companies. Authority to interpret other provisions of the dual agreement also rests with the industry. For example, the agreement "contemplates that orders and allocations, touching crude-oil production, imports, withdrawals from and additions to storage, and gasoline manufacture shall be such as to balance supply with consumer demand for petroleum products and to prevent the accumulation of supplies of crude oil or petroleum products in excess of desirable economic working levels." Who is to determine when supply and demand are balanced or what constitutes "desirable economic working levels"? It would seem essential from the standpoint of the public interest that this vast power to make decisions affecting not only the entire petroleum industry but every consumer of petroleum products should be placed in the hands of an impartial authority. Instead, Administrator Ickes has permitted the power to be exercised by the National Petroleum Agency, and more particularly by this association's board of governors, which is made up of persons financially interested in the decisions to be arrived at. More than that, the governors are to exercise their control mainly through pool purchases of "surplus" gasoline. By means of these purchases they will in effect be able to control the gasoline market. When the governors are not in session, five of their number may administer the pool's purchases and sales. In addition, "by a majority vote of the entire board of governors or the vote of nine governors representing members of the association having in the aggregate more than 50 per cent in amount of participation in the association, purchases may be suspended entirely until they are again authorized by a majority vote of the entire board of governors and the vote of nine governors representing such majority interest in amount." In other words, nine of the financially strongest companies have the power of life and death over the pool which is to "maintain and support proper relationships of gasoline prices."

That the exercise of such a power makes for monopoly cannot well be denied. Practices of similar character are permitted or specifically provided for elsewhere in the dual agreement, though such practices have been condemned by the courts and the Federal Trade Commission as monopolistic in tendency and in fact. Government officials who have approved this self-regulating ordinance of the petroleum industry are inclined to minimize its monopolistic features on the ground that some orderly process for marketing the huge stores of "distress" gasoline, which, it is claimed, have been undermining the price structure, simply had to be found if the industry was to be saved. Even if it were true that "distress" gasoline was depressing prices, it is abundantly clear that the particular marketing method selected is perhaps the worst that could have been chosen from the social point of view. And as a matter of fact it is not true that stores of retail gasoline have been a depressing factor. In December, when the agreement was announced, the total stocks amounted to approximately 51,000,000 barrels, or less than two months' supply for the entire country. It seems safe to point out that this is a rather narrow margin for a country that uses as much gasoline as the United States. The aim of the pool agreement is to reduce this margin to 46,000,000 barrels by July 1. In the opinion of the independent distributors this "will make a highly sensitive market at that particular time in the year. The practical result of that aim would be to unduly increase the cost of motor fuel to the public because it will undoubtedly produce a tendency toward higher prices."

The pressure of crude-oil stocks rather than of "distress" gasoline has been the major unsettling factor in the petroleum market. As soon as the petroleum administrator set out to control crude-oil production, signs of stability appeared in the market, while the earnings of the major companies showed immediate improvement. A few weeks later the New York Times reported:

The statements of oil companies so far issued for the third quarter of the year are generally considered satisfactory, and show for the first time in several years that virtually the entire industry is operating on a reasonably profitable basis. As the improvement did not come until the last six weeks of the quarter, it reaffirmed the recent contention in some quarters that oil prices are at levels that mean fairly large profits for the most efficient units and even some profits for most of the high-cost operating units or those less fortunately situated.

With virtually the entire industry "operating on a reasonably profitable basis," it would seem that the aims of the Recovery Act had been achieved in petroleum. But this simple achievement did not satisfy the government officials concerned. They went on with their stabilization plans until they had laid the groundwork for monopolistic control of the industry. In his statement of January 20 approving the pool and marketing agreement, Administrator Ickes betrayed not the slightest interest in this aspect of the problem. Indeed, though he disapproved Section 4 of the marketing agreement, which would have given the financially dominant major companies extraordinary power to punish their smaller and weaker competitors for infractions of the rules, he did not do so on the ground that Section 4 would have strengthened the monopolistic control of the largest companies, but solely because there seemed to him "to be no reason to give directly to those in the petroleum industry a greater remedy for violations of contracts than those in any other industry possess." The administrator's statement contained all the customary assurances to the consumers and public—assurances which, significantly enough, are omitted from the pool and marketing agreement itself—and promised that if the present arrangement did not work, the administrator would be "receptive to suggestions as to the necessity for making further modifications." It is to be doubted that the monopolistic practices permitted under this plan can be corrected or eliminated simply by making "further modifications." These features of the agreement were pointed out to Administrator Ickes by Senator Borah and others before he approved it. Since he accepted the agreement in full knowledge of its obvious defects, there is little hope for any real modification of it with respect to price-fixing and other monopolistic practices.

Social Workers in the Depression

By EDUARD C. LINDEMAN

THE position of social work in the depression has been unique. While the members of other professions have been facing unemployment, the demand for social workers has increased. As the depression deepened and misery seeped into all social classes, social workers were provided with more and more clients. When it became obvious that millions of our citizens would need to be fed and sheltered by means of private surplus or public funds for a protracted period of time, it also became clear that this gigantic task called for a rapid increase in the number of trained social workers. Thus, while publicists expressed misgivings concerning the future possibilities of other professions, social workers found their status improved and their security enhanced.

In 1930 the federal census stated that there were approximately 48,000 social workers in the country, inclusive of public-health nurses; the total number at present is in the neighborhood of 60,000. It is to be noted that this increase, unlike that of the war period, represents social workers—that is, case workers—and not executives. In other words, there has been no creation of new agencies but rather an enlargement of services. As a matter of fact, there are probably fewer social agencies than formerly, some having gone out of existence during the depression. The increase in case workers amounted to approximately 37 per cent between the years 1929 and 1932. This new demand is also directly reflected in the training schools, where an increase of case workers in training has risen 88 per cent during the same period. Another index representative of the expansion of social work is to be found in the number of applicants for admission to membership in the American Association of Social Workers. In 1928 there were 595 applicants, and in 1933 up to November 1 there were 2,882, an increase of 260 per cent. (A considerable proportion of this increase is to be accounted for by the change in the association's membership requirements.)

Social workers, with the exception of a small number of executives, have never received high salaries. In 1929 the median salaries of 1,119 case workers ranged from $1,200 in cities of 25,000 population to $1,620 in cities of 500,000 and over. The corresponding range for 1932 for 1,536 case workers was $1,325 and $1,632. Yet while there has been a slight increase in the total range, there have been actual decreases in all types of cities with two exceptions. A marked and uniform increase in salaries is found to have occurred in only one classification, namely, district secretaries.

The preceding figures are taken from an analysis made by Ralph G. Hurlin, director of statistics of the Russell Sage Foundation. Another study conducted by the Association of Community Chests and Councils presents a somewhat different picture. Facts gathered from 112 community-chest cities indicate that 75 communities have made actual salary reductions and that 14 others have achieved the same end by means of voluntary contributions. The discrepancy between this study and the one quoted above is more apparent than real; closer examination of the data reveals that the latter study covers a much wider area of social work than the former, and that many if not most of the salary reductions have occurred in the fields of so-called character-building agencies and organizations promoting health. Combining the two studies leads to the conclusion that there have been slight salary reductions in social work in a large number of cities but that these are by no means comparable with similar reductions in salaries for other professions.

Still another indication of the influence of the business depression upon social work may be found in an analysis of the demand for workers as shown by the records of the Joint Vocational Service, a national employment agency for social workers. Although these records indicate demand for social workers only, they are nevertheless revealing with respect to the changing status of the profession. In January and August of 1928 public agencies asked for 20 workers and private agencies for 133; of this total of 153 openings, 30 were filled through the J.V.S. In January and August of 1933 public agencies called for 77 workers and private for 98; of this total of 175 openings, 58 were filled through the bureau. One significant trend is revealed by this analysis—namely, the marked increase in demand on the part of the public agencies as compared with the private. Two lesser trends, although not indicated in the figures given above, are also evident—namely, a larger demand for administrative workers, and an increase in the demand for men as distinguished from women workers. Both of these latter trends are due, no doubt, to the rapid expansion of public social work during the depression emergency. From a qualitative point of view it is also to be noted that there is a diminishing demand for so-called group workers, that is, directors for boys' and girls' clubs, recreation, and the like, which is perhaps an indication that services of this nature are regarded as luxuries.

When social institutions change rapidly, the consequence is usually a mixture of bad and good. Thus the prestige and security of social work have been enhanced during the depression; its place in the American cultural pattern seems to have been, in a sense, validated by the emergency. On the other hand there have been serious set-backs. While salaries have not been sharply reduced, social workers have been subjected to other strains and pressures: many case workers are now asked to carry two and three and even four times as many cases as heretofore; executives have become irritable and staff organizations have been disrupted; untrained persons have been placed in important positions and gross inefficiencies have resulted, especially in the administration of local relief. Social-work standards have been sacrificed.

A more subtle and, from my point of view, a more significant event than any enumerated above must be recorded as one of the consequences of the depression so far as social work is concerned. The depression has forced social workers to reconsider their role in society. Lively discussions are now in process among them centering upon questions which have hitherto haunted only the more sensitive members of the profession. There have always been critics who have insisted that social work was merely a manifestation of a diseased society. Although this is a superficial view, as socialized Russia appears to demonstrate, it points to at least one terrible truth. Social work may be necessary in any form of society, but is it also necessary that social work shall function in such manner as to perpetuate the very evils which furnish many of its "cases"? In other words, if social work is the profession which deals with the social problem, to what extent may it become an active agent in promoting fundamental social change? This is the central question which the depression has brought into the open. I do not mean to imply that all or most social workers are excited about this problem. There are persons in social work as in other occupations who approve of the present order of society, there are others who mildly disapprove but are prepared to make compromises with its defects, and there are others, a minority perhaps, who believe that our present economic crisis is traceable to fundamental deficiencies and wrongs in the ordering of society; these would be energized and made both personally and professionally happy if they might feel that their labors were counting on the side of social reorganization. Members of other professional groups are perplexed by the same general problem, but for the engineer, the doctor, or the lawyer there are simpler escapes. The social worker has never received his salary, or his fee, from the client on whose behalf he renders his services. His income has been derived from two sources—governmental taxes and the surplus wealth of those whose income and power and prestige are guaranteed by the existing economic order. Progressive social workers would prefer to function in a society which furnishes basic economic security to all workers; they would like to help in building such a society. The depression has sharpened their awareness of their professional dilemma; the way toward appropriate action is still to be found.

Amenities from a Hospital Pallet

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Baltimore, February 24

WELL, here I am in the Johns Hopkins hospital again, a living testament to the fact that no one with a nervous system like mine can long survive on a steady diet of hard work and moral indignation. That, at least, is my official story, and publicly I intend to stick to it. But speaking strictly among ourselves, I don't mind disclosing that the real causes of my latest flight from Washington were the following: In the first place, I was sick and tired of listening to the testimony of air-mail thieves, crooked bankers, and their political lackeys. My eardrums have been assaulted with more perjury in the last month than the average man is required to absorb in a lifetime. In the second place, I was sick and tired of having to read newspapers whose sole aim in life appears to be that of misleading the public. Third, and most important of all, I was determined to build some more stepladders, and to paint those I built last October. When these noble labors are completed I shall have done more in two months to elevate and uplift the inhabitants of the Maryland Free State than Hank Mencken and Frank Kent have done during thirty years of toiling in the journalistic vineyard. This is not to say that I am actuated largely by idealistic motives. Quite the contrary. For me, the transition has many advantages. The standard of ping-pong here has stiffened perceptibly since last I tested it. Drs. Meyer and Billings are no less solicitous and profound, and the nurses are, if possible, more beautiful and alluring than ever. I am not one of those strong, silent men who object to being pampered when feeling somewhat below par.

* * * * *

REVERTING to the activities of the air-mail thieves, one does not readily recall anything so contemptible as their willingness to make a target of Lindbergh in order to shield themselves. It probably discloses their real character more vividly than any evidence which has been given before the Black committee. Precisely as they were willing to plunder the national treasury for their own enrichment, they are now willing to sacrifice a national idol for their own protection. Having known about Lindbergh since the days when he was flying the mail out of St. Louis, I never contributed to the hero worship which engulfed him, but in this instance it is obvious that he has been betrayed by craftier men, motivated exclusively by a desire to save their own skins. Incidentally, my recent description of Senator Austin, of Vermont, as one of the choicest New England boobs ever seen in Washington has been questioned, so it seems incumbent on me to submit evidence. First, let it be understood that all Austin's efforts have been directed toward protecting the reputation of the Hoover Administration as affected by the air-mail investigation. I shall touch but lightly on the occasion when he inadvertently developed the fact that the contracts were awarded despite an opinion from Hoover's own Department of Justice that they were illegal. I shall dwell but an instant upon the time when he elicited testimony showing that some of the papers burned by retiring Republican officials were of such a character that the incoming Democratic Administration could use them to discredit their predecessors. I shall pass on to what I consider his premier performance. A post-office inspector had been telling about finding certain papers in the files of the Post Office Department. Chairman Black remarked sarcastically: "Of course, you didn't find any of those that had been burned." The inspector replied, naturally, that he had not, whereupon Vermont's intellectual colossus transfixed him with an accusing glare and demanded: "How do you know you didn't?" The State rests.

* * * * *

THE language used by the President in approving the newspaper code, with its bogus and unnecessary "freedom of the press" clause, was not unexpected. Indeed, I believe I predicted something of the sort on this very page several weeks ago. He called it "pure surplusage," and that is what it is—except that he might have omitted the word "pure." But it is something more. It was placed there originally for the deliberate purpose of raising a false issue which could be used to camouflage and obscure the publishers' opposition to civilized wage-and-hour schedules and to the abolition of child labor in their business. It didn't fool the President, and I doubt whether it fooled anyone else. The pretended indignation of the publishers over the President's rebuke is amusing, especially when they start babbling about their "honorable" tradition. How honorable was it to ask Jim Farley to "put the pressure on" General Johnson until he gave them what they wanted? How honorable was it to print stories saying they had "signed the newspaper code" months before it existed? Honorable, my eye! There is not an industry in the country which has exploited its employees more harshly, or resorted to more ruthless and unscrupulous methods to get what it wanted. Is there a reporter of any experience who doesn't recall one or more instances when fire and building restrictions were quietly waived to accommodate a newspaper plant? Is there one who hasn't seen a reporter bounced out on his ear without a minute's notice or a day's pay simply because the city editor had a hangover or the man had unwittingly stepped on the toes of one of the proprietor's country-club friends? I realize that among the publishers are such enlightened and humane men as Captain Patterson, David Stern, Roy Howard, Paul Patterson, and many others, but to assert that they represent the average would be to insult the intelligence of every journeyman newswriter in the United States. Please, gentlemen, don't make us laugh any harder.

* * * * *

THE "honorable tradition" of the publishing business was brilliantly upheld in two instances recently. One was when William Randolph Hearst published a signed, front-page editorial bitterly assailing the Black committee on the ground that it had intimated there was something improper about Lindbergh's acquisition of stock in the Pan-American Airways. The fact is that the subject had never been mentioned by the committee. The circumstances were made public in an exclusive news story obtained and circulated throughout the United States by the International News Service, owned by William Randolph Hearst! The second instance was supplied by the Washington Post, that gallant palladium through which Eugene Meyer hopes to make the country Republican again. Having failed to damage General Johnson by direct attack, the Post turned its guns on Miss Frances Robinson, his assistant. Most of the printed innuendoes concerning her were derived from the fact that she is receiving a salary of nearly $6,000 a year; that is, nearly as much as her chief. I dare say I know as much about her duties as anyone outside the organization, and I wouldn't have her job for $6,000 a year—nor for $60,000. Her average working day is about eighteen hours. Once, at two o'clock in the morning, she fainted at her desk from exhaustion. But the wisecracking Bayards of the Post are quite safe. The young woman weighs less than 105 pounds and has no near male relatives. Is it possible they assured themselves of this fact before opening fire?

* * * * *

THE truth is that the underpaying and overworking of government officials and employees under this Administration has been and still is disgraceful. The very idea of Johnson holding down a job more gigantic in scope and importance than any which exists in private industry at a salary of $6,000 a year is preposterous. At this moment the man is trying to sell his New York home so he will have funds to tide him through the task of reconstruction. Many men occupying posts of vital public importance are nearing the end of their savings, and some have already begun to borrow. Thriving businesses and lucrative law practices have been allowed to languish and sometimes disappear because their owners could not bring themselves to desert in the heat of the battle. There is another and vastly different class which is rapidly becoming a serious problem, especially for the NRA. It consists of men who came into the organization, remained long enough to familiarize themselves with its workings and to impress the private employers who came in contact with them, and then resigned to sell their services to the highest bidders. Once they have sold out they are safe. The slings of the Daily Worker and the arrows of the Herald Tribune are reserved for those who remain on the job. Because of their devotion, they must take it on the chin. If my language at times appears to grow slightly intemperate, attribute it to such causes as this. As between the Tories on one flank and the Communists on the other, it behooves the decent, sensible people of this country to pray fervently to God for the privilege of remaining in the majority.

* * * * *

BUT to hell with all this! They tell me the old tank of hot water is waiting, and I can either snooze there for an hour or smoke a choice Havana while a red-headed nurse holds my hand and reads me a detective story. For the present you will all have to shift for yourselves. Let 'em steal the Capitol if they can. It's nothing in my life.

In the Driftway

WHOOING cranes, white pelicans, wild turkeys, and all the other fancy American birds and beasts that Davy Crockett knew may strut once more in their former glory and abundance if the recommendations of the President's Committee on Wild Life are put into effect. In a report just issued the committee urges the immediate acquisition of five million acres of submarginal agricultural land in forty-four States and the gradual acquisition of from eight to ten million additional acres for the reproduction and conservation of our sorely depleted wild life, in the interest of sportsmen, students, and future generations of Americans—who, if depressions and hard winters continue, may find it handy to have the uplands restocked with edible game bearing detachable fur coats.

* * * * *

THE committee found that migratory waterfowl are threatened with virtual extinction by the destruction of breeding and nesting areas caused by drainage operations, the encroachment of unprofitable agriculture, and the "random efforts of our disordered progress toward an undefined goal." The last remnants of the long-billed curlews in New Mexico, Utah, and elsewhere are declining in number because of the grazing off of nesting cover on their breeding grounds. And the same forces have conspired to reduce alarmingly our once abundant resources of upland game birds and animals, as well as "song, insectivorous, and ornamental birds," as the report quaintly puts it. The report includes 401 tentative projects for the utilization of submarginal lands—at a tentative cost of some $50,000,000—and urges the appointment of a Restoration Commissioner under the direction of the Secretaries of the Interior, of Agriculture, and of Commerce, who shall coordinate the wild-life restoration work of all existing government services. It further recommends the appointment of a Federal Wild Life Director—a title which appeals no end to the Drifter's sporting nature.

* * * * *

ALTOGETHER the report of the Committee on Wild Life is the most appealing government document the Drifter has seen in years. For one thing it is illustrated with a cartoon by Ding, who was a member of the committee and whose picture of a bull moose bawling for help should wring the heart of any Congressman. For another, it abounds in such lovely words as snipe and plover, ruffed, pinnated, and sharptail grouse, mountain sheep, antelope, sage hens, and elk. In fact, the Drifter can think of only two possible objections to its unanimous adoption. Mark Sullivan will be furious, for the report bristles with phrases about national planning, and as he put it so freshly only the other day, "planned economy is the same thing as collectivism, and collectivism is what the radicals in the Administration are moving toward"—and God forbid that any American bird should submit to a plan even if it saves his life. The other objection is even less important. If the government's project to retire submarginal lands is successful, and farmers are allowed to work only rich productive land, we must expect also, no doubt, the retirement of a great proportion of those submarginal characters which have been of late the outstanding American contribution to fiction. But who will deny that one whooping crane is as rich in human values as any one of the characters in, say, "Tobacco Road"?

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

An Editor and the Tugwell Bill

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Here is an instance concerning the country press and the Tugwell bill. The Publishers' Auxiliary, a house organ of the Western Newspaper Union which assumes to represent the country newspapers as a trade journal, has been fomenting an attack on the bill. Each week the Auxiliary prints a series of letters of protest. I wrote a communication expressing, as editor of the Vineyard Gazette, my cordial support of the bill. I have not discovered my letter in print, and a request for information concerning it, which was accompanied by a stamped return envelope, has been ignored.

In a word, an attempt is being made to show unanimous opposition to the bill on the part of country newspapers. A little suppression just helps the cause along.

HENRY BEETLE HOUGH

Martha's Vineyard, Mass., January 31

A Reproach from a Neighbor

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

In the January 3 issue of The Nation your reviewer of reviews, K. S. Thompson, goes a long way to make a good point. Witness what she says about one review of "Anthony Adverse":

The New Republic put the judgment of most reviewers clearly when it declared: "Its monumental bulk alone raises it above the common mass of novels into a region appreciably nearer the stars." Here I take refuge in the words of Elmer Davis: "I am unable to agree with most of our readers that a large book is necessarily a good book."

But let's see what the New Republic reviewer, T. S. Matthews, actually wrote about "Anthony Adverse":

... no adventure story, however picaresque, of however solid a weave, should be spun out to such a length. It is hard not to judge such a book as "Anthony Adverse" too severely, for its monumental bulk alone raises it above the common mass of novels into a region appreciably nearer the stars."

In other words, Mr. Matthews and Miss Thompson were substantially in agreement—but Miss Thompson was bent on proving that Mr. Matthews was wrong, and in order to do so, pulled one of his remarks so far out of its context that it would take a first-class bonesetter to get it back again.

New York, January 19

MALCOLM COWLEY, Literary Editor, the New Republic

The Irish Treaty

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

You will permit me to disagree with the comments of "An Irish Observer" in The Nation for January 10.

Your commentator says that the treaty of 1921 was supposed to settle the Irish question permanently. Supporters of the Cosgrave and Griffith Cumann na nGaedheal Party, of whom I numbered myself one, were informed that the treaty had been accepted under threats of force, that partition and the Free State were only temporary arrangements, and that Ireland was on the road to a republic. I challenge your observer to show me anywhere in the writings of the Free State's President, Arthur Griffith, a statement declaring the treaty to be a permanent settlement.

There is no denying your observer's remark that Irish acceptance of the treaty in a plebiscite constitutes a hard fact. What else could the Irish people do? Murder and violence by Black and Tans and police happened frequently enough, and Lloyd George gave the Irish people the alternatives of a bigger and better campaign of terrorism or acceptance of the treaty. But need the Irish people continue to accept the treaty? Many of De Valera's opponents in the United Ireland Party ask themselves the same question. James Dillon of the United Ireland Party stated on December 30 that when declaration of a republic was feasible they would declare it without consulting Dominion Secretary Thomas.

Again, does repudiation of a treaty admittedly accepted under duress involve the honor of a nation? The statement that Arthur Griffith did not develop a political philosophy is adequately refuted in R. M. Henry's book "The Evolution of Sinn Fein." As to calling De Valera an idealist because he seeks to get rid of the economic concept that Ireland is an English farm—it is merely a poorly thought-out opinion.

Philadelphia, February 10

BRENDON O'DWYER

The Robber Barons

By the author of
JEAN JACQUES ROUSSEAU and ZOLA AND HIS TIME

Matthew Josephson

A composite biography of America's Big Capitalist with these heroes

JAY COOKE
J. P. MORGAN
J. D. ROCKEFELLER
ANDREW CARNEGIE
JIM FISKE, JR.
COMMODORE VANDERBILT
JAY GOULD
COLLIS HUNTINGTON
JIM HILL
EDWARD HARRIMAN
HENRY FRICK
LELAND STANFORD and others

*"What do I care about the law?
Haint I got the power?"*

— COMMODORE VANDERBILT

At the close of the Civil War a small group of men arose and suddenly swept into power. They organized and developed a young nation's resources on a gigantic scale. They held the strategic strongholds of the country's wealth and made themselves the dominating figures of an aggressive economic age. Rugged individualists, they did all this in the name of private profit. Sometimes they were lawless; but conspicuously lacking was a moral conscience in a social sense. How much did they foster progress? How much catastrophe?

"That does not matter. YOUR money is orthodox."

— A MINISTER (D. D.) TO
JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER

America has always been fascinated by them, the men who "built up the country" and their own great fortunes, whose lives were dramas of almost mediaeval splendor and ruthlessness. Here they are in one book, an immense picture of their careers moving side by side, merging or crossing as they worked together or against each other. Matthew Josephson is here the social historian, writing of them without anger, and telling the underlying history of an age that bred the present.

MARCH BOOK-OF-THE-MONTH SELECTION

474 pages, $3.00

HARCOURT, BRACE & COMPANY

383 Madison Avenue, New York

Books, Drama, Films

Makers of Modern America

The Robber Barons: The Great American Capitalists. 1861-1901. By Matthew Josephson. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

MATTHEW JOSEPHSON, whose previous writings include biographies of the Frenchmen Zola and Rousseau, has here essayed the role of American historian; and this book is an effort to tell the story of the development of American monopoly capitalism in its formative years, not in economic but in human and dramatic terms. "The Robber Barons," therefore, is not a history of the institutional growth of American railroads, steel, oil, finance, and the heavy industries generally, but of the railroad builders, the steelmasters, the oil refiners, and the bankers—of Vanderbilt, Gould, Huntington, Hill, Carnegie, Rockefeller, Frick, Morgan, and the rest of that exalted company which made modern America.

"The Robber Barons" is more than this, however. Realizing that history cannot be written purely in static terms—that in this instance it is not merely a gallery of industrialists—Mr. Josephson has sought to make his narrative dynamic. There must be presented (he has apparently told himself) a steady progression of events, a movement onward and upward in the lives of my chief actors; and this flow can be caught only by relating my heroes to a time sequence. The method, in short, is that of the great romantic novel: the personalities in the narrative cannot be analyzed, labeled, and filed away once and for all; rather, they must be brought forth as characters who develop their destinies side by side over a long generation and who are finally joined in the great climax which takes place with the integration of industrial capitalism and banking promotion under the aegis of the finance capitalist.

It must at once be apparent what a highly ambitious task this is; and while "The Robber Barons" contains many excellences it is only proper to evaluate it in terms of the author's intention rather than by his many incidental achievements. By this measure "The Robber Barons," I am afraid, cannot be regarded as particularly successful; in fine, because it does not turn out to be the history of American capitalism, we are still compelled to await such a work.

Mr. Josephson is entitled to much praise. His book is far and away superior to the average historical product coming out of our learned seminaries: it is imaginatively conceived, remarkably well written, and, what is even more important, it is dialectically sound. This last in itself is an accomplishment of the first order. Mr. Josephson, as preparation for his study, has read Marx, Sombart, Veblen, and Tawney; as a result he can see the successful creation of monopoly capitalism as a progressive task which had to be performed in America before the gains of the Second American Revolution—the struggle between the slavocracy of the South and the young industrial capitalism of the North—could be fully realized. Seen in such a light, the performances of the great American industrialists are of the utmost significance; true, they despoiled the country's natural resources, sweated human labor, and contrived only for individual gain, but what they built—a mechanized and rationalized industrial scheme—was as important to the achievement of the next human goal, a socialist state and a classless society, as the destruction of the decayed lower order which held back their forward march. Mr. Josephson's theoretical discussions, as well as those initial chapters which tell of the preparation of the industrialists for their revolutionary work, are illuminating and important additions to our understanding of America's recent past. From this point, however, the author's contributions are of less moment, and, indeed, in certain particulars his interpretations and methods are inadequate. In the limited confines of this review I can devote myself to but three specific criticisms.

First, "The Robber Barons" is written almost entirely from secondary sources; what primary works were available were not utilized. Mr. Josephson has read the many official and the only too few critical biographies and histories we have of American industries and their founders, and only such material as he has found readily at hand has he worked into the making of his book. Thus "The Robber Barons" is particularly and, in many instances, unnecessarily detailed in its narratives concerning the railroads, oil, and steel; but it gives scarcely more than a page to meat-packing, mentions the great agricultural-machinery industry only in passing, and has nothing at all to say about those other outstanding monopolies of the period—milling, local traction, tobacco, and the like. The stories of meat-packing and milling are necessary to an appreciation of the processes of American monopolist development, but these could have been narrated only as a result of considerable pains on the part of the author: he would have been compelled to read the voluminous reports of the Bureau of Corporations and the Federal Trade Commission, Congressional hearings, many obscure Ph.D. theses, and the files of our learned economic journals; the labors would have been herculean but only in this fashion could the job have been done at all.

Second, the development of American capitalism is an extraordinarily complex phenomenon, and a reading of "The Robber Barons" plainly shows that its story cannot be told alone in terms of the personalities who participated in its advance. The part played by agriculture, the role of international borrowings in starting off our infant industrial economy, the contributions to industrial expansion made on the one hand by undistributed corporate earnings and on the other by national savings, labor struggle and the reasons for its lack of a revolutionary character, governmental policy and encouragement of private enterprise, programs of dissent, the formulation of methods of public regulation—these are some of the essential elements of the history of capitalism without whose detailing a proper knowledge of our recent past is impossible.

Third, an elaborate concern with the capitalists themselves and not with the characteristics of capitalism's institutional growth has led Mr. Josephson into the commission of a significant error: he has tended to oversimplify, and therefore to distort, the nature of monopoly formation. The book's title, "The Robber Barons," is based on the creation of an intricate parallel between the medieval barons and the early capitalists: the former could exact their toll from their contemporaries because they were able to establish their castles at vital points in communication systems—rivers, mountain passes, and the like; the latter advanced to power and wealth because, by one bold exploit or another, they were able to gain control of similar "strategic narrows," in this case important industrial processes or stages "through which the stream of commodities must pass from the earth to the consumer."

It must, upon reflection, be apparent how erroneous an interpretation this is. For example, Carnegie's original power was built upon his early alliances with railroads and his location in western Pennsylvania near coal and ore deposits; but the monopoly in unfinished steel of the Carnegie Steel Company was a slow and involved process that took almost thirty years to consummate. It was not until the Carnegie Company had built up a great vertical trust which combined coal fields, coke ovens, limestone deposits, iron mines, Lake boats, and furnaces—incidentally, attained through the utilization of undistributed profits—that Carnegie was ready for any threat aimed at his domination. The same complex round is to be seen in Standard Oil's development.

In the case of meat-packing, monopoly was contrived after an even greater passage of time and the utilization of even more complicated methods. The meat-packers grew into monopolists, first, because they were located at the initial cash market, the Chicago stockyards; second, because they gained exclusive possession of their transportation facilities through a monopoly over refrigerator cars; third, because they employed their undistributed profits to perfect chemical controls over their industry so that waste parts of steers and hogs could be converted into useful and salable articles; and fourth, because they succeeded in setting up a perfectly functioning distribution system. A happy and chance location at some strategic economic "narrows," in the various instances related, had very little to do with the attainment of ultimate monopoly control. The conclusion is irresistible: only by a close study of the institutions themselves and the outer forces which helped shape them, and not by a preoccupation with their original organizers, can we worm out the secret of monopoly capitalism and record the history of its progress. The roles of the individuals participating are then reduced to their proper historical proportions.

We are in Mr. Josephson's debt on many counts: he has written an interesting and colorful narrative; he has distilled the essence of many other biographical works and furnished us with a convenient summary of the outstanding achievements of some of our great industrialists; and he has given the still untutored the correct approach to an understanding of our recent American past. To those who want more—who want, in short, an institutional history of American capitalism—he has proved that such a work must be a long and laborious task. It will not be easy of achievement, for much of the spade work still remains to be done. Perhaps there is in the audience some philanthropist who, with an eye toward his future protection, would like to endow an American Institute of Red Professors of History?

LOUIS M. HACKER

Eros and Neuros

Weymouth Sands. By John Cowper Powys. Simon and Schuster. $3.

THIS is the third large novel which Mr. Powys has written about the doings of two little gods. He does not invoke their names, but he so frequently employs their epithets—erotic and neurotic—that we know who they are all right, even though the better-known of them has been disguised. The cheeks of Eros are neither round nor red, he carries no quiver, and he does not move by wings. He is as pale-faced as his brother, as loathsomely deformed, and as much under the necessity, when he wants to proceed from one place to another in that portion of southern England which Mr. Powys has chosen for the scene, of slithering on his belly. The two of them together have Mr. Powys's human world completely under their power. Not a man or a woman in Weymouth, not a boy or a girl, not even a ghost but writhes in the grip of some irregular and distorted passion, or grows steadily more grotesque under the influence of an insane illusion.

The author of "A Philosophy of Solitude" and "In Defense of Sensuality" is at some pains to make it clear that the whole world either is or ought to be this way, and to suggest that he is so creating it here in protest against a scheme of things whereby science will soon have "killed God, tortured the last animal to death, suckled all babies with machines, eavesdropped on the privacy of all souls, and made life to its last drop an itch of the blood and a weariness of the will." Or it may be that he has set out to create a special world which will be a horrible example of what science, etc., can do to us. I doubt it, though. I think he has proposed to show us, in the face of the various belittling analyses we have made of human nature, how grand and terrible it is after all, and how it is possible that powerful personalities shall continue to exist. If his personalities are not actually powerful, and I find this to be the case, then the explanation may be that science already has triumphed, leaving only such gaunt simulacra of greatness as Sylvanus Cobbold and Dogberry Cattistock, to take only two of Mr. Powys's people who have failed, I take it, to be what he wanted them to be.

But of course another explanation would be that Mr. Powys is not a first-rate novelist. In spite of the fact that he writes with a richness which I like and is nowhere really uninteresting, I am afraid that this second explanation is the more plausible one. It seems to be the simplest way of accounting for the further fact that the several stories he has interwoven in Weymouth do not come off. They ought to come off, it would seem. The setting is always gorgeous, the people have vast potentialities, and Mr. Powys is continually promising us crises and disclosures of gigantic moment. But when the crises arrive we somehow miss in them the one telling stroke we had expected, and the disclosures have a strange way of limiting the world of Weymouth instead of enlarging it, so that we suddenly perceive it to be more like the little life we live than we had been led to suppose it was. We discover merely that Mr. Powys has been trying to read into life something which is not there. We might wish it were there, but we know that Mr. Powys is not the man to convince us that it is.

Curiously enough it is Mr. Powys's weakest and least pretentious person who remains the most believable. Perdita Wane, the timid girl whom a steamer from Guernsey delivers into this menagerie of monsters, can everywhere be felt with and understood, and indeed any reader is likely to be in constant suspense concerning her. But Adam Skald her lover, Sylvanus Cobbold the mystic, Jerry Cobbold the comedian, Lucinda Cobbold, Dogberry Cattistock, Magnus Muir, Larry Zed, Captain Poxwell, and Gipsy May—these and all the rest, in spite of Mr. Powys's very ably phrased vaunts as to their immenseness, are never anything but husks with artificial hair whose complicated stories move us neither to pity nor to terror. I heartily wish it were otherwise. Surely there was never a man who desired more deeply than Mr. Powys does to write a great novel, or who made more elaborate and admirable preparations. Few novelists have possessed so many of the required qualities without possessing the one quality—I cannot name it—which is essential. Mr. Powys is not without his fascinations, and he can be read with an absorption which one by no means experiences every day. But so far he does not seem to be a great novelist.

MARK VAN DOREN

America in Jugoslavia

The Native's Return. By Louis Adamic. Harper and Brothers. $2.75.

WHEN I picked up this book of Louis Adamic's I was reminded of something—not Hardy, that was "The Return of the Native," but Harvey, George Harvey, to whom Henry James had written a long letter in October, 1904, about his "Impression Papers" of America, which already, less than a month after his return to his native land—he had been absent twenty-one years—were gathering volume and force. James deeply regretted that Thomas Hardy had made it impossible for him to call his projected book "The Return of the Native," gave up as a substitute "The Return of the Novelist," and published "The American Scene." Louis Adamic is far enough away from Hardy by now to use for his book its perfect title, "The Native's Return."

We all know the genesis of the book—the genesis, that is, of a book to be written on the foundation of a Guggenheim Fellowship which Adamich received in the spring of 1932, "requiring me," he says quaintly enough in his first sentence, "to go to Europe for a year." Somehow the sense of privilege drops out there; it is almost as if the book to be written—"a new book dealing with America"—were a slight weight on his mind; as if the "American scene," to drop into clichés, were in sad disarray. The book he wrote—this book of his own native land—offers us an excellent example of how really good things come to be. He sailed to the east to discover, to objectify, America, his chosen subject; but he came upon another and better one—as Columbus, sailing west to discover old China, came upon a new continent. Yet without America, without Mr. Guggenheim, he could never have discovered Yugoslavia.

He went back with his wife to Yugoslavia on what was to be no more than a brief family visit after an absence of nineteen years. His charming story of how he found himself famous and carried Mr. "Gugnhaim" up the ladder with him is the story of one of life's constant surprises. His book-to-be was made for him on the spot by life itself; all its stuff handed to him on old native platters at never-ending feasts of welcome. The idea of "a new book dealing with America" seems to have dropped out of his mind at first sight of Dalmatia, at first sight of "Asia in Europe." The homecoming rites, the sweet courtesies, the wedding festa of Toné and Yulka, the dignified death of old Yanez, the simple, hard, honest life of his people, above all, the astonishing sense of being a central figure of myth-in-the-making, made America pre-Columbian, a fable itself. What could make it more fabulous to Adamich than the "legend" which sprang up overnight throughout Yugoslavia, of its own Loyzé Adamich one day receiving a letter "from a man named Gugnhaim . . . bigger even than the President of the United States, whom the people elect only for a few years, while Gugnhaim is Gugnhaim all the time," of Loyzé, "this boy from Blato," consenting to call on the great man, accepting a cigar, listening to his host's praises of the Slovenes, Croats, Serbs, who worked harder and longer in his mines than any others and helped more than others to make him rich? "My idea is this," said the Gugnhaim of the legend, "that you let me pay for your and your wife's trip there and back . . . Stay there a year, then come back and tell me all you have seen and heard—tell me, honestly, just as things are—and after that, if you like, write a book about your trip so that other people in America will learn about your country also. . . ." And then, so the messianic legend ran, "Gugnhaim" would probably come to Europe himself and save it—in ways undreamed of in America.

And so, instead of some possible "America as a Foreign-born Son Sees It," we have "The Native's Return," made, so to say, to his own country's gay order. We have first its impact on him, so strange yet so familiar in its customs, its folklore, its simple, ancient wisdom. Then we have—what? A travel book? a running history of the land? a war book? a book on present-day economics? Something of each, of the pleasantest sort to "take"; and perhaps it is not until we have laid the book down, or perhaps not till the day after, that we realize we have, too, here, "a new book dealing with America." The Guggenheim Fellowship "requiring" Mr. Adamich to go to Europe for a year is, in his case, remarkably acquitted of any baseness in its requirement. It has given an old country a new legend; it has given a new country—ours—an indirect view of itself seen by old eyes, the eyes of this bit of Asia in Europe. Thanks to Mr. Adamich, the vision was caught and ever so quietly painted in. America lies between the lines of every page in this book on Yugoslavia.

EDNA KENTON

2nd Printing!

SEX HABITS

A VITAL FACTOR IN WELL-BEING

By A. Buschke, M.D. and F. Jacobsohn, M.D.

Specializing Physicians to the Great Continental Rudolf-Virchow Hospital

Foreword by Gerard L. Moench, M.D.

Associate Professor of Gynecology, New York Post-graduate Hospital, Columbia University

SUBJECTS EMBRACED

THE SEX ORGANS (Male, Female)
SEX INTERCOURSE (Analysis, Nature, Methods, Frequency)
SEX DIFFICULTIES (Adjustment, Technique)
MARRIAGE (Sex Aspects, Instruction)
VALUE OF REGULAR SEX INTERCOURSE
SEX HYGIENE (Precautions, Directions)
THE SEX IMPULSE (Contrasted: In Men, In Women)
SEX VARIATION (Physical, Psychological)
VARYING SEX PRACTICES
SEXUAL SHORTCOMINGS (Impotence, Frigidity, Sterility, etc.)
SEX DANGERS (Coitus Interruptus, reservatus; etc.)
SEX ABNORMALITIES (Perversion, Sadism, Masochism, Fetishism, Exhibitionism, Homosexuality, Hermaphroditism, etc.)
REPRODUCTION, FERTILIZATION, HEREDITY, EUGENICS

THIRTY ILLUSTRATIONS

THE SEX ORGANS OF MEN (4 plates,* 13 illustrations)
THE SEX ORGANS OF WOMEN (3 plates,* 6 illustrations)
THE PROCESS OF REPRODUCTION (1 plate,* 11 illustrations)
FERTILIZATION AND DEVELOPMENT (1 plate,* 2 illustrations)
DEVELOPMENT BEFORE BIRTH (2 plates,* 4 illustrations)

* Full-page.

"I believe it is not exaggerating to say that disturbances of the sexual apparatus cause more mental anguish and emotional upsets, aside from physical suffering, than any other lesions."

—Gerard L. Moench, M.D.

Eleven full pages
of photographs.

PRESS COMMENTS*

" . . . the sanest and most practical views of sexology and sexual hygiene that can be found. A clear conception of the male and female reproductive organs can be obtained. The description is accompanied by a set of beautiful photographs of the various organs. A finer set could not be found in any anatomy book. . . ."

—Glasgow University Publication

" . . . gives those facts essential to a correct understanding of sex . . . a very accurate and scientific account . . . and has the added advantage of being illustrated."

—Medical Times (London)

"Drs. Buschke and Jacobsohn have collaborated on a work which is frank, fearless and sensible. The whole problem of the sex instinct is surveyed concisely and sagaciously."

—Montreal Star

"The structure and function of the reproductive organs are clearly set out . . . Facts . . . are faced and ~~presented~~ are given."

—The Lancet (London)

* Reviews of the English edition before American publication.

Price $2.50 (postage 15c extra)

EMERSON BOOKS, INC., 333 SIXTH AVE., N. Y. C.

"A modern masterpiece"

Jules Romains'

vast epic novel of Paris

PASSION'S PILGRIMS

"This book is denser in incident than a year's file of the Times, more exciting than a honeymoon, wittier than all the plays of Mr. Coward taken together, and in intellectual grasp and human sympathy the peer of any Continental work since The Magic Mountain."

—CLIFTON FADIMAN, in The New Yorker.

$2.50

Alfred · A · Knopf · 730 Fifth Avenue · N · Y ·

Labor and Steel

Labor and Steel. By Horace B. Davis. International Publishers. $2.

Private Police. By J. P. Shalloo. American Academy of Political and Social Science.

HORACE DAVIS chose an exceedingly difficult task for himself when he set out to study the steel industry and in particular the problems of the steel workers. In no other industry has labor had to face such bitter and determined opposition. No other industry has been so successful in crushing every effort of the workers to organize themselves. Steel has all the vices and none of the virtues of monopoly. Its great strength extends beyond its own mills and furnaces, reaching into other industries, into legislatures and even high government offices, into police departments and newspapers. Organized labor, especially as we have known it in the United States, had no chance against this power. Steel's anti-union policy has held fast for thirty years and more. Steel refuses even to divulge information concerning the status and condition of its workers.

Despite the handicaps confronting him, Mr. Davis has done a workman-like job. He has covered virtually everything in relation to the steel industry that could be of interest to the working class, to whom he primarily addresses himself. Much of his information comes from personal experience or personal observations, for he has himself worked in the mills. Other data have been supplied by such dependable investigators as Edward Ernst and Emil M. Hartl. For the rest the author has gone largely to government documents and the works of notable labor economists and other scholars. The picture Mr. Davis presents is anything but hopeful. He finds that there has been some improvement in the matter of reducing the number of accidents and eliminating occupational diseases, two of the worst enemies of the steel worker when he is on the job. But even this improvement has been achieved largely because the steel companies have found it profitable to adopt a few safety measures. The accident and disease toll among the steel workers is still frightfully large.

The industry exacts tribute from the workers in other ways as well. It pays pauper wages on the one hand and generous dividends on the other. The worker must submit to long hours, stretch-out systems, pension chisellers, and irregular employment. He is constantly hounded by straw bosses and spies. And now his job appears slowly to be vanishing, giving way before the steady encroachment of technological progress. But the excess profits and enormous cash surpluses of most of the steel companies continue to be piled up no matter what happens to the worker. A more emotional student might have lost his critical balance in presenting these facts. Mr. Davis, however, remains sober throughout, and for the most part manages to preserve his objectivity, dropping only once or twice into the role of the labor agitator. In two sections he is, regrettably, rather weak. His analysis of the structure and ramifications of the steel trust could well be improved upon, and in discussing the strike of 1919 he seems to have passed up an opportunity to emphasize the fact that the strike was lost because of the fundamental fallacy upon which organized labor rests in this country—the voluntarism of Gompers, which has kept the working class divided against itself since Gompers broke the Knights of Labor.

In any study of conditions among the steel or coal workers of Pennsylvania considerable attention must be given to the problem of the private police. Horace Davis mentions them only incidentally. Dr. Shalloo examines the problem in an impartial manner. He presents the point of view of the employer as well as that of the worker. On the whole, however,

A NEW SERVICE

$170 EUROPE

ROUND TRIP

They said it couldn't be done!

$170 ROUND TRIP TO EUROPE! They said it couldn't be done... with 2-bed staterooms; hot and cold running water in every cabin; abundant and delicious food; the unrestricted use of the ship with its spacious decks, veranda cafe, and recreation rooms. But it can be done. We proved it last year to students, teachers, scientists, professional people and family parties. They were so delighted (and surprised) at the comforts and steadiness of our ships and the congenial friends they met aboard that they wrote hundreds of unsolicited letters to us. Those letters are a remarkable verdict on this new kind of service to Europe (New York—Havre—Antwerp). Would you like to read some of these letters? May we tell you all about it? See how much you get for $170 round trip (there are no ups!)

Your car can go in the ship's garage for $120 round trip!

Ramble over Europe in your own car. You will see more and pay less that way. The Bernstein Line has special equipment used by no other trans-Atlantic line. This enables us to take along your car to Europe without crating and without holsting. The fare for your car is only $120 round trip. Let us tell you about roads and motoring abroad.

Ask your agent, or write ■
ARNOLD BERNSTEIN LINE
Dept. 831
17 Battery Place, New York, N. Y.

the evidence he has assembled constitutes a most damning indictment of the use of private police, detectives, and labor spies. Mr. Davis's audience would be well repaid if it would study "Private Police" along with "Labor and Steel." Dr. Shalloo's monograph is the first of a series on related subjects to be published by the American Academy of Political and Social Science.

MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

A Fresh Talent

Fireweed. By Mildred Walker. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

IN view of recent prognostications with regard to the public's mood and prevailing opinions, which in fiction have been thought to be favorable to romance, it is sobering to observe the regularity with which books like "Fireweed," by Mildred Walker, exemplifying a singularly unadorned and self-assured realism, continue to exercise their persuasion. It should not be difficult to name a succession of novels—from the "Bad Girl" of a few years ago down to "Little Man, What Now?" which was being read only last summer—in which young people of an almost unicellular simplicity have mated and propagated, ingratiatingly enough, without any of the usual aids to romantic illusion, in which practically all the emergencies have been either obstetrical or economic and have borne little or no relation to the "nice shades" and "finer feelings." The heroine in "Fireweed" is seventeen or so at the opening. She works in the general store in a sawmill town on Lake Superior. She is used to buying her dresses and high-heeled slippers with the aid of a mail-order catalogue, paying something like $2.95 an item and securing for her investment something like two dollars and ninety-five cents' worth of style and no durability. She marries Joe Linsen partly as a concession to morals and partly because she believes he will take her away to the city. But Joe doesn't much care for the city. So she bears him two children, nature having arranged things that way. The depression penetrates at length even to their sequestered corner, eliminating her last chance of going anywhere else. Joe ruins his Sunday pants putting out a fire at the lumber yard, now deserted.

"Gee, Joe, why didn't you let the whole place burn? I hoped it would."

Joe looked at her curiously. "Gosh, Cele, I don't know what to think of you! That's the best hardwood you can get any place. Anyway, don't you know I'm foreman down in the yard?"

"Not any more you aren't."

"Say, get this, Cele, I'm foreman till the last stick is sold out of there."

And when the last stick is sold Joe will still be able to shoot and set traps and cut his own firewood and catch his own fish. "They can't shut down the lake, anyway." And then, think of "those big-moneyed guys" that were "knocked for a loop" by the "flop in Wall Street" and are left in a "regular blind alley"!

It is difficult to convey the impression wrought by the simple fidelity of a book compounded of such ordinary materials. There are no surprises, but the words and the sentences fall in place with an ease and a naturalness and an inevitability that are better than any surprise:

Dust gathered alike on the heavy chairs and the thin glass goblets. No one thought to draw the shades, and the day's sun and the night's dark passed uninterrupted over the wallpaper forest. The colors faded a little more in the bright light, watching the bare branches beyond the window put forth new buds.

Passages like this make no pretense of being tone poems, but they show a sensitive ear and a richness of quiet feeling without

"A New Kind of Book."—

Henry Seidel Canby

"One of Those Books that had to be written."—

Dorothy Thompson
(Mrs. Sinclair Lewis)

LOUIS ADAMIC

Author of "DYNAMITE" and
"LAUGHING IN THE JUNGLE"

has written a new narrative that has been acclaimed enthusiastically by every critic

THE NATIVE'S RETURN

Louis Adamic, immigrant, has spent nineteen years in America—nineteen years full of accomplishment. His indictment of American Industry, "Dynamite," proclaimed him one of the clearest thinkers of the New Group. This and his later book "Laughing in the Jungle," won for him a Guggenheim Fellowship. Now he tells the story of what he found on his return to his native country, Yugoslavia—a book brimming with keen, human observation.

42 illustrations 370 pages

HARPER & BROTHERS

"A book no one can afford to be without."—

John Chamberlain

"An elegant book."—

William Soskin

"One of the most memorable stories I have ever read."—

Lewis Gannett

$2.75 at Bookstores

"Scrapes the Whitewash off the Whited Sepulchre of American Political Corruption"

—Rupert Hughes

JOHN McCONAUGHY'S WHO RULES AMERICA?

HEYWOOD BROWN says: "I wish to endorse it to the hilt . . . case histories and plenty of powerful evidence." (Recommended by the Book-of-the-Month Club).

RUPERT HUGHES says: "It exposes many of the sacrosanct forefathers of our republic and later eminent scoundrels who committed gigantic crimes, escaped punishment and perpetuated their power. John McConaughy has thrown a fierce white light on the pious lies and hypocrisies of our smug history."

At All Bookstores $3.00

LONGMANS, GREEN & COMPANY

New York

the support of which such a story as "Fireweed" might easily have relapsed to a level of inconsequence.

One has come to expect that the author of a promising first novel will bite off more than he can chew. That, perhaps, is what makes him promising. But what can one say about a beginner like Mildred Walker whose competence is shown, in her very first novel, to be so far in advance of her ambition, except that fulfillment, however modest, is better than promise? Certainly a writer who is able to infuse such a steady glow of life into commonplace characters living in commonplace surroundings has a talent and a technique already very refined.

ROBERTS TAPLEY

New Fiction

Glass. By Howard Stephenson. Claude Kendall. $2.50.

"Glass" is one of those novels of American life which serve to remind the reader how many Americas there are, and how remote from New York are most of them. It is the account of the establishing of a glass factory in a farming area, of the springing up of a mushroom township to house and cater for the Belgian glass-blowers, and of the effect upon the American farming community of this alien invasion. To George Rood, who loves the soil, the factory and its people are anathema. His wife dies in childbirth on the day the roar of the first gas well drilled to feed the factory is heard, and he believes that the unexpected glare and noise killed her. He brings up his son in his own passionate loyalty to the land and repudiation of the new life at his gates. But the young George has been fascinated from childhood by the skill of the glass-blowers, by the processes of the factory, and the day comes when he breaks away from the farm for good and goes to work in a town at some distance, where he becomes an experimenter in the making of glass. That portion of the book, apparently a first novel, which describes the conflict between the farmer and the intruders, and contrasts the life of the two differing elements of the population is interesting and convincing. But the sureness and strength which Mr. Stephenson displays here desert him when he turns to the personal story he has woven about his central theme. A needlessly elaborate and melodramatic plot betrays the inexperienced writer and lessens the force of the whole work. Against this not unnatural unevenness of quality, however, must be set the freshness and real beauty of many poetic passages dealing both with the land and with the glass factory.

The Innocent Wife. By Colette. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.

This is very early Colette; the last of the four in the Claudine series written in collaboration with Willy, and called in the original "Claudine s'en va." With her wavering passions well in hand Claudine fades off into the background and gives first place to Annie, whose innocent trust and love center for years around a husband never unmasked until he takes a trip and leaves his wife at the mercy of the truthful tongues of kind friends. To do her justice Claudine requires a great translator, for her merits in their way are as elusive as Proust's, and while the present translation succeeds in imposing a contemporary idiom on a pre-war book, the quality of the original is diluted. Not that this book is as fine as "L'Envers du music-hall," nor that it contains any such figure as Lea in "La fin du chéri," but early as it is, it has adequate indications of what with time have become Colette's chief talents: wit and wisdom and with them an unfailing and always fresh source of a surprising humaneness; a great gift for character in miniature; and greatest of all, a genius for considering and displaying the emotions.

Drama Newsreel

JOHN WEXLEY is already well known for his harrowing drama of the death house entitled "The Last Mile." Now the Theater Guild has produced at the Royale Theater his latest play, summoning all its artistic resources to the support of another drama of social protest. For his subject Mr. Wexley has chosen the Scottsboro case, and he has chosen, moreover, to follow actual events about as closely as it is possible to do without using the names of persons concerned. He calls his play "They Shall Not Die," and by the downrightness of that title he suggests what his whole treatment reaffirms—namely, that his purpose is to make the most direct assault possible upon the feelings of his audience and the most direct appeal for the active participation of its members in the public protest against the execution of four Negroes convicted of rape in an obviously prejudiced court.

Now there is much to be said for the good old rule that a writer should be judged, in the first instance at least, only by the extent to which he succeeds in doing what he set out to do. Nor can there be much doubt that if this rule is applied, Mr. Wexley's play will have to be set down as the best thing of its sort seen here in many a year. To begin with, events themselves favored his enterprise, since they shaped themselves more simply and unequivocally than events commonly do. The case is as plain as a case could be, and hence fact seems to support him when he states an issue in the clear black and white of the partisan unwilling to admit that a case may be seen from more than one angle. But this is not all, for Mr. Wexley, unlike many authors of similar plays, is as sure of his methods as he is of his conviction, and he has stuck with admirable persistence to a direct presentation of events accompanied by only a very small minimum of argument or interpretation. He does, to be sure, make very clear his intellectual attitude upon one issue. The defense is right in insisting that the case shall not be tried merely on the basis of the abstract justice due to four individuals; it must be seized upon as a concrete illustration of that struggle between classes which only occasionally reveals itself in so dramatic a form. Perhaps, indeed, Mr. Wexley begs the question as he does not often do when he makes the representative of a society for the improvement of colored people so obviously a hypocrite and a tool. But by far the greater part of his play is given over to scenes, often painfully vivid, of direct and brutal narration. There is no psychological subtlety, almost no character drawing except, rather unsuccessfully, in the case of the girl who retracts her testimony. Neither is there any attempt to present a novel interpretation or even to see any deeper into a situation than others have seen before. But Mr. Wexley's conviction seems to be that nothing of the sort is necessary and that the facts of the newspaper, merely somewhat condensed and somewhat pointed up, are all that is required. Some "social plays" are debates and some are orations. Some even take refuge in the symbols of "expressionism" in an effort to get beyond mere fact. But "They Shall Not Die" is none of these things. It does not wish to get beyond fact. It is essentially a newsreel and effective in the newsreel's fashion.

Truth is stranger than fiction. This proves not only what it is commonly taken to prove but also that truth is often not sufficient for a work of art whose business it is to be more convincing and less strange than fact. If Mr. Wexley's play were frank invention, we should not believe it entirely and we should probably argue that his division of mankind into heroes and villains was far too simple. He may reply that the facts will bear him out, as, in general, I suspect that they will—which brings us back to the main point of his success in doing what he has tried to do. On this I can only repeat that this success is outstanding. I do not know to what extent he can, or need, change the opinion of those who have followed the newspaper accounts. Neither do I know how likely it is that many of those who refused to read such accounts will now be moved to go to the Royale. I do think, however, that I can promise all who go a sufficiently harrowing evening.

In addition it must be added that the play could hardly be better presented from the standpoint of direction, setting, or acting. Claude Rains is superb as the defense attorney, Ben Smith is almost as good as the eminently hissable prosecutor, and Ruth Gordon is appealing in the somewhat less convincing role of the girl who recants.

In conclusion it is hardly worth while for me to return to the doubts which I have expressed upon previous occasions concerning the claims of such plays to a consideration from the critic of art as distinguished from the advocate of social reforms. Certainly the terms which one must select for the praise of this one are not those which one would usually find most applicable to most great plays. One must content oneself with saying that it treats an important event, that it vividly recounts certain incidents in the news, that it certainly provides a thoroughly uncomfortable three hours. One then concludes with the hope that it will do good. If a play of which only those things can be said is a great play, then "They Shall Not Die" is great.

The press agent of "Queer People" (National Theater) hints darkly that the play was badly received by the press because Hollywood demanded that it be discouraged. I cannot, of course, speak for my colleagues in more influential positions, but I can assure the suspicious gentleman that no movie magnate has thought it worth while to approach me and that I arrived unaided at the opinion that the piece is a clumsy and highly unsuccessful effort to achieve a frenetic satiric farce of the "Twentieth Century"—"She Loves Me Not" variety.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Films

Miss Bergner's Catherine

NOTHING in Alexander Korda's new picture deserves as much attention as the acting, in the title role, of Elizabeth Bergner, the young German actress who is now enjoying such a great success on the London stage. "Catherine the Great" (Astor) is another of those attempts on the part of Mr. Korda to bring a certain novelty and freshness to the treatment of historical material on the screen. As in his "Henry the Eighth," he has tried to remove much of the stuffiness and artificiality which have always made the costume type of screen drama so tedious to the mind and eye. To a large extent he has succeeded, but the qualities that he has substituted in their place are not so easy to identify or describe. It is not possible, for example, to say that Mr. Korda has managed to introduce into the films the kind of "debunking" attitude so popular with historians and biographers of the last few decades. Although there is much so-called humanization of the royal personages in his last two pictures, in the way of excessive belching and below-stairs lovemaking and the rest, the final attitude toward them is far from being unpleasantly critical. Henry VIII was really a lovable old scoundrel, and "Little Catherine" put the welfare of her people above every other

☐ PLAYS

☐ DEBATES

☐

THEATRE UNION'S Stirring Hit

PEACE ON EARTH

CIVIC REPERTORY THEATRE, 14th St. & 6th Ave.

Lowest Priced HIT in New York 30c to $1.50 No Evs. 8:45. Mats. Tax/Wed. & Sat., 2:45

DEBATE

"Resolved that Capitalism is Doomed And Cannot Now Be Saved by A Redistribution of Wealth"

SENATOR HUEY P. LONG NORMAN THOMAS

MECCA TEMPLE FRIDAY EVE., MARCH 2nd

131 W. 55th St., N. Y. at 8:30

Tickets 25c, 50c, 75c, $1.00, $1.50, $2.00—on sale at Box Office

BROOKLYN FORUM, 7 E. 15 ST., N. Y. ALg. 4-2620

CAPITALISM IS DYING! WILL COMMUNISM SUPPLANT IT OR FASCISM PROP IT UP A WHILE?

Hear the STIRRING DEBATE

COMMUNISM vs. FASCISM

MECCA TEMPLE, MARCH 4, at 3 P. M.

130 WEST 55th STREET, NEW YORK CITY

CLARENCE A. HATHAWAY, Member, Central Executive Committee, Communist Party, U. S. A., and LAWRENCE DENNIS, Leader of Fascism in America.

Tickets: $1.10, 83c and 55c. On sale at New Masses, 31 E. 27th St. (mail orders filled); Workers Bookshop, 50 E. 13th St., and other central points.

Auspices Press League and New Masses

☐ JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH says

☐

- AH, WILDERNESS! Guild Theater. O'Neill's nostalgic comedy about a youth who discovers love and poetry together. Made doubly effective by the performance of George M. Cohan.
- BIG HEARTED HERBERT. Biltmore Theater. J. C. Nugent and Elisabeth Risdon in a broad but funny farce about the taming of a self-made man.
- MARY OF SCOTLAND. Alvin Theater. Helen Hayes and Philip Merivale give fine performances in Maxwell Anderson's play. The biggest dramatic hit of the moment but one which left me a little cold.
- MEN IN WHITE. Broadhurst Theater. Fine teamwork on the part of the members of the Group Theater helps to make this play about a young doctor one of the things which must not be missed.
- PEACE ON EARTH. Civic Repertory Theater. Propaganda play about the next war, in which the workers strike and a young college professor gets framed for murder. Drawing special but enthusiastic audiences which evidently do not agree with me that the play is quite uninspired.
- SHE LOVES ME NOT. Morosco Theater. Mad doings at Princeton which involve the efforts of some high-minded students to rescue a not too innocent maiden in distress. Much the funniest farce of the year.
- THE GREEN BAY TREE. Cort Theater. Absorbing psychological drama about a young man who cannot give up luxury for love. Shares with "Men in White" the first place on the list of dramas.
- THE PURSUIT OF HAPPINESS. Avon Theater. Spicy and more or less historical comedy about a young Austrian who finds bundling one of the pleasantest of the new freedoms in Revolutionary New England.
- THE SHINING HOUR. Booth Theater. What happens to a quiet English family when love puts in an unexpected appearance. Delightful comedy and the best of the recent offerings.
- THEY SHALL NOT DIE. Royale Theater. Reviewed in this issue.

consideration. (How much historical fact is ignored or circumvented to achieve these portraits is of course another and hardly less important matter.) Upon closer scrutiny, none of the recent films dealing with royalty reflects anything but the most traditional acceptance of the "divine right of kings." The most that can be said of Alexander Korda's historical films is that they show an occasional awareness of the existence of a "debunking" tradition in modern biography. This awareness is never given full expression, of course, and the result is that the principal characteristic of his direction is a curiously disturbing ambiguity of style. Very often it is hard to determine whether a particular scene is intended to be humorous or pathetic, heroic or mock-heroic. Similarly, his settings are halfway between some kind of facetious stylization and pure Hollywood. Such ambiguity of intention would be altogether fatal in a less fortunate director than Mr. Korda, who has somehow always managed to secure the most effective assistance from his actors.

Much has been written about Elizabeth Bergner, both here and abroad, and with the unanimous opinion that she is a truly distinguished young actress there can be no disagreement. Certainly she saves Mr. Korda's picture at every step; her slightest movement is of more interest than anything else that may be found in it. Yet it must be recognized that Miss Bergner's acting technique, at least as it is revealed in the present picture, is of a kind that is distinctly more appropriate to the stage than to the screen. For most spectators, tired of watching screen players innocent of any kind of technique, this will not, of course, make a great deal of difference. But there are all the same certain rather serious dangers in the use on the screen of methods which have grown out of the spatial limitations of the old-fashioned theater. The greatest of these is the frequent effect of exaggeration resulting from the excessive use of such means of emphasis as physical gesture, facial expression, and movement of the eyes. To mention only the last of these, Miss Bergner, like any well-trained stage performer, has learned a great deal about the use of the eyes, and since she happens in addition to own a pair of unusually beautiful and expressive eyes she tends to make a great deal too much use of them. As a result her efforts to communicate such different emotions as naive wonderment and blank terror often result in nothing more than a uniformly wide-eyed stare. Here the camera should have supplied the emphasis, registered, as is its power, the finer shades and gradations of expression. In a sense, acting for the screen is a subtler business than acting for the stage, for the screen has no need to resort to the frequently rather crude methods enforced on the stage actor by the greater distance between himself and his audience. Compare, for example, in this matter of eyes, the admirable effects which such strictly screen players as Greta Garbo and Marlene Dietrich sometimes achieve by virtue of their customary restraint in the use of these organs. And for an example of an actress who will illustrate exactly the right balance between histrionic effort and subservience to the powers of the camera, and so the difference between acting for the stage and acting for the screen, one need only recall Miss Bergner's compatriot, Dorothea Wieck, as she was to be seen in "Mädchen in Uniform" and "Cradle Song."

Nothing less than hysteria seems to have attacked the Hollywood producers in their desire to retain their skins in the present state of national embarrassment. In their panic of dread lest they fail to please everybody, they have been reviving every type of situation known to the history of the drama, trying out some new ones, and occasionally attempting to get all in a single film. This last is certainly the case with "Carolina" (Radio City Music Hall) and "Moulin Rouge" (Rivoli), neither of which, however, will really succeed in pleasing everybody. The first is a lavendered version of Paul Green's "House of Connelly," with Lionel Barrymore as the embodiment of Southern frustration and Janet Gaynor as the plucky young Yankee who brings prosperity back to the crumbling mansion by raising tobacco on the old plantation. The emotional climax occurs when Miss Gaynor, dreaming on a swing, has a vision of the mansion as it was in the old days, with half the Confederate army parading into the hallway to the strains of "Dixie." It is perhaps not entirely contradictory that Miss Gaynor, who is the incumbent arch-priestess of the saccharine on the Hollywood screen, nearly always appears in films which bring out the most vulgar and depressing aspects of American idealism. "Carolina" is just possibly a Northern argument for Southern reconstruction. But it is a much stronger argument against the ideals which the North (or Hollywood) holds up for our admiration. In "Moulin Rouge" Constance Bennett is given a "double" role, which means that we are forced to suffer through just twice as much bad acting as would ordinarily be the case. New York has received just one amusing and excellently produced picture from Hollywood within the week. The picture is entitled "It Happened One Night," but discussion of it must wait until a later date.

At least a reference must be made to "The Simple Tailor," an old silent film with musical accompaniment which the Acme has recently seen fit to revive. Belonging to the pre-Eisenstein era in the Russian cinema, it offers little interest apart from its propagandist thesis, which is that revolutionists attached to a special racial group, like the Jews, should distinguish carefully between friends and enemies within their own fields. More rewarding on the Acme bill was a second impression of Dr. Watson's "Lot in Sodom," which remains the most absorbing technical experiment of the year.

WILLIAM TROY

Contributors to This Issue

JACK BEALL is a New York newspaperman.

JOHANNES STEEL is the pseudonym of a German refugee now in the United States who was for several years economic observer attached to the German Department of Commerce. He has contributed articles to various British periodicals, and is the author of "Hitler as Frankenstein," published in England. Mr. Steel visited Vienna on the eve of the recent uprising.

EDUARD C. LINDEMAN, a former social worker, is now on the staff of the New York School of Social Work.

PAUL Y. ANDERSON is a Washington correspondent of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

LOUIS M. HACKER is coauthor with Benjamin B. Kendrick of "The United States Since 1865."

EDNA KENTON is the author of "Book of Earths."

ROBERTS TAPLEY is the author of "Harm's Way."

WHEN YOU GROPE FOR A WORD

Roget's International THESAURUS "Words grouped by Ideas"

Complete list of synonyms, antonyms, phrases, slang, etc., in fact everything to help find the right word. The one indispensable book for all writers. A necessary complement of the dictionary.

The only large type edition.

Now $3 a copy.

from CROWELL'S List

THOMAS Y. CROWELL CO.
393 Fourth Avenue, New York

Box 10

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlington, Cal.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXVIII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 14, 1934

No. 3584

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	287
EDITORIALS:
Retreat from Economic Nationalism	290
The Labor Board's Future	291
Learning to Laugh	292
ISSUES AND MEN. THE PRESIDENT'S POPULARITY. By Os- wald Garrison Villard	293
CARTOON: A CONSIGNMENT OF CULTURE TO THE BAR- BARIANS. By Low	294
THE CONSUMER VS. THE NRA. I. JOHNSON'S FIVE-RING CIRCUS. By James Rorty	295
FRANCE WILL NOT GO FASCIST. By Robert Dell	297
ARMAMENT PROFITEERS: 1934. By Robert Wohlforth	299
STOCK-MARKET CONTROL. By J. Frederic Dewhurst and Mar- garet Grant Schneider	301
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter	303
CORRESPONDENCE	304
BOOKS, DRAMA, FILMS:
Hitler Means War. By Frank H. Simonds	305
The Great Cham. By Joseph Wood Krutch	306
Short and Salty Annals. By Carl Van Doren	306
Russia: Two Accounts. By Leon Dennen	308
The Poet as a Young Man. By Babette Deutsch	309
The Dance: The Music Hall: Revues: the Movies. By Lincoln Kirstein	310
Drama: "Dodsworth." By Joseph Wood Krutch	311
Films: Picaresque. By William Troy	314
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE	314

BOARD OF EDITORS

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
MAURITZ A. HALLGREN MARGARET MARSHALL
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD
CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $5.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. British Agent, Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England.

AN EIGHTEEN-CENT SALE in a little Italian grocery store in Rochester, New York, last spring, with a $5 fine in its wake, was the humble beginning of litigation which in a year went from the City Court to the County Court to the State Court of Appeals to the United States Supreme Court, and has just emerged as a decision which will become one of the pillars of the New Deal. The grocer sold two quarts of milk at nine cents a quart and then because, as he said, he was making a good profit, he threw in a loaf of bread. But the New York legislature had established a Milk Control Board, with power to fix prices, and the latter had made nine cents the minimum price for a quart of milk without any bread. The authority of the State thus to fix prices in the public interest has now been upheld by our highest court and this, along with the same court's acceptance of the Minnesota mortgage-moratorium law, makes it certain that President Roosevelt can carry through his policies without having to pack the Supreme Court with new justices in order to do it. The nub of the decision is in Justice Roberts's statement that the Constitution does not give anybody the right "to conduct his business in such fashion as to inflict injury upon the public at large." This is sound common sense, though it was not acceptable to Justices McReynolds, Van Devanter, Sutherland, and Butler, who wrote a dissenting opinion, just as they did in the Minnesota case. That the life of the New Deal should again be prolonged only by a five-to-four vote should persuade almost anybody of the absurdity of a governmental system in which a supreme issue of public policy is decided by one of nine lawyers in Washington.

ALL THAT PERSUASION and an appeal to patriotism, honesty, and fair dealing can do was done by the President in his address to the NRA code authorities on March 5 in Washington. Backed by the force of his enormous and nation-wide popularity, the President, in effect, asked the big, bad chisellers to behave themselves and play the game. "We must now consider immediate cooperation to secure increase in wages and shortening of hours. . . . The government cannot forever continue to absorb the whole burden of unemployment. The thing to do now is to get more people to work. . . . We must set up every safeguard against erasing the small operator from the economic scene. . . . The law itself has provided for free choice of their own representatives by employees. These two words 'free choice' mean just what they say." And so on. Time will show what the effect of these brave words will be. That they are sound and just cannot be denied. That under the provisions of the National Industrial Recovery Act they will be enforced remains to be seen. On the very morning that the President delivered his address, the Consumers' Advisory Board submitted a report, which General Johnson had first cavalierly dismissed as "opinion" not "fact" and then had accepted when he was threatened with the resignation of several of the board members, showing that under the codes purchasing power has not kept pace with rising prices. Data on fourteen codes were adduced to show over-large profits, unwarranted price increases, and monopolistic control of prices, all at the expense of the consumer and of the national recovery which the codes are attempting to bring about. This is but another example of the maladministration from which the NRA has suffered, and it will take a good deal of earnest thought and hard work to bring the codes up to the standard which Mr. Roosevelt has set for them.

ELSEWHERE in this issue appears a careful consideration of the Fletcher-Rayburn bill for the control of the security markets in the light of the recommendations of the Twentieth Century Fund on the subject. It would seem that at certain points the proposals of the Fund offer a more equitable and effective control of these markets than does the bill, and the latter, admirable as it is in intent, might well be strengthened and clarified. At the same time that the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency is attempting to educe the best means of controlling these operations in industrial finance, the exchanges themselves, under the leadership of Wall Street and with Richard Whitney as chief spokesman, are exerting every possible pressure to prevent what they regard as unwarranted interference with business. When the Fletcher-Rayburn bill first made its appearance, the Wall Street opposition immediately began marshaling its heavy artillery. Mr. Whitney called a meeting of representatives of thirty wire houses and indicated to them what seemed to him the worst features of the bill; each of these houses took pains to telegraph outside managers and partners all over the country; hundreds of pamphlets protesting against the bill were distributed by the New York Stock Exchange; Mr. Whitney sent strong letters of protest to eighty companies which have stocks listed on the Exchange; and so on. Apparently money is unlimited in this attempt to keep the markets free from control by the federal government. As a result of this initial bombardment, heads of stock exchanges, chambers of commerce, and great industries have rushed their protests to Washington and to the newspapers. Some American business particularly objects that under the provisions of the bill the public would at last know something about the forces which have made the security markets the greatest gamble of all time. And it is worth noting that so far no serious objection to federal control has been raised by any of the millions of small investors who have in large measure provided the wherewithal for their own plucking.

BURLINGTON
PUBLIC LIBRARY

EXTENDING BACK into the days of the Hoover Administration and forward into the present regime runs the record of scandalous irregularities in the purchase of materials—from toilet kits and mackintoshes to bombing planes and cruisers—for the national defense. Such scandals are perennial and will doubtless continue as long as patriotism is pitted against the craving for private profit. The question is being newly investigated by the House Committee on Military Affairs, and day by day dubious or downright dishonest transactions are brought to light. The sum of these revelations is included in an article on another page of this issue which should be read by every person interested in the technique of making money out of preparations for war, and even by persons interested merely in honest government. The author suggests that the only way out is the drastic one of eliminating profit not only from the manufacture and sale of war materials but also from the basic industries, such as steel and aluminum, on which the manufactures depend. With this conclusion we wholly agree. Meanwhile, however, we may expect that the usual procedure will be gone through with in Washington: irregularities will be discovered, blame will be fixed, certain contracts will be voided, certain officials will be censured or dismissed or even indicted, and the expenditures of army and navy funds will be subjected to a more rigid scrutiny—until the next scandal begins.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT could hardly have been expected to adhere to his original intention of abandoning the CWA program and similar relief projects. Political as well as financial factors underlay his announcement that the CWA would be suspended on May 1. In his budget message he warned the country to expect a seven-billion-dollar deficit by the end of the current fiscal year, but promised that emergency expenditures would be curtailed in another year or so with the result that the budget would be brought into balance in 1935 or 1936. At the same time he warned Congress that if it voted appropriations in excess of those he had scheduled, it would be quite impossible to balance the budget in the time allotted. In view of this warning he could not himself ask for additional appropriations for relief without setting a dangerous precedent for a Congress that has shown that it is only too eager to continue the spending process. Whether the President really believed that business would be so much better by May that it would then readily absorb most of the CWA workers or merely yielded to the pressure of the more conservative of his advisers is not known. In any case it is clear by now that the relief situation is no less grave today than it has been at any time in the past several years and that it is likely to continue so despite improvement in business.

ALTHOUGH in his statement announcing his new relief program the President insists that the CWA is to be demobilized, the new program preserves most of the essential features of that experiment. The statement suggests that the sum of $950,000,000 recently appropriated by Congress for relief will be used in financing the substitute program. Unfortunately, half of this sum has already been allotted to the CWA to wind up its projects; the remaining half is being applied to direct relief and is rapidly disappearing. It has been pointed out, however, that in his budget message the President asked for $3,166,000,000 as a maximum sum to cover all relief and recovery projects. A part of this could no doubt be diverted to the new program, but such diversion would necessitate the abandonment or curtailment of the activities of the RFC and other agencies or a request from the White House that Congress vote additional funds to keep these agencies alive. The latter course, which appears to be the one the President is most likely to take, would mean that the hope of balancing the budget in 1936 would probably have to be given up. The question before the Administration is whether it shall seek, in the interest of sound financing and government credit, to redeem its pledge of a balanced budget at the expense of the unemployed, or let the budget go hang in order that the jobless may continue to eat.

THE NEW LEGISLATION looking toward Philippine independence, drawn in conformity with Mr. Roosevelt's recent suggestion, removes a signal defect from the Hare-Hawes-Cutting act which the insular legislature rejected. The abandonment of the American intention to retain military bases in the islands after independence had been proclaimed is a step in the right direction, but we believe the plan needs further overhauling before it will meet with the wishes of the Filipinos or before it deserves to be indorsed in this country by those who for years have been working for independence on reasonable terms. The economic provisions of the scheme are hypocritically unjust, requiring, as they do, that during the ten-year preparatory period previous to independence American goods be admitted to the Philippines duty free, while exports from the islands may be taxed by us. This provision was inserted primarily to protect our beet-sugar growers, although their industry is notorious for its oppressive and degrading labor conditions. Advocates of independence for the Philippines on just terms ought especially to condemn the attempt to create an impression that if the Filipinos reject the proposed measure it will be notice that they "do not desire independence," as Senator Tydings stated recently. The apparent effort to make the Filipinos take the pending legislation as an alternative to none should be resented by Americans solicitous for their country's reputation for fair play.

THE MANCHU PRINCE, Pu-yi, has been lifted out of obscurity and placed upon the throne of his forefathers as an answer to the skeptics of the Western world who refuse to believe that Manchukuo is in fact an independent state. For how can anybody say that a country which has its own ruler, and an emperor at that, is being governed by another state? Pu-yi, now the Emperor Kang Teh, deposed himself in admirable fashion at the coronation—although the Associated Press was ungenerous enough to say that the ceremony “moved with the precision of the Japanese military machine.” In his first declaration from the throne he spoke to the Manchu people as one would expect a ruler to speak to his beloved and faithful subjects. No one could doubt, to read the speech, that his would be the real authority in Manchuria. But poor little Pu-yi almost gave the game away when, doubtless out of gratitude to those who had restored him to the imperial seat, he said that he would carry forward the task of reconstructing the Manchu country and endeavor to preserve its independence “in cooperation with our great neighbor, Japan.”

IT GOES almost without saying that the Hitler government has repudiated Ewald Banse and his alarming book, “Germany Prepares for War,” which is reviewed by Frank H. Simonds on another page of this issue. The German government has made a great show of suppressing Banse and his works; it has even gone so far as to deny that he was ever, as he claims, a professor of military science at the Brunswick Technical School. But Lovat Dickson, the English publisher of the book, has a letter from Banse of January 29 signed “Professor, Brunswick Technical School,” and the German Universities Year Book for 1933 lists him as “Lecturer, military science.” There is no reason for believing that the “suppression” of Banse’s book has any better basis in fact than the denial of his connection with the Brunswick Technical School. For one thing the Society for Military Politics and Military Science, organized by the Nazis in July, 1933, expressly to promote Banse’s ideas, is still carrying on its propaganda, and a second book by Banse, which is said to be even more sensational, is being freely circulated in Germany. The most conclusive evidence, however, that the book is an authentic if not authorized expression of Hitler’s Germany is the fidelity with which it follows, in the direct and awful terms of military strategy, the vague and hysterical ideals of National Socialism. And Mr. Simonds is right when he says that what seems most preposterous in this book is actually most realistic. The tragedy lies in the fact that even with these blueprints before us it is quite improbable that the world, torn as it is with nationalisms as bad in kind if not in degree, will be able to stop Hitler’s mad progress.

WE CANNOT BELIEVE that any society calling itself civilized would sanction the killing of human beings in the name of justice if such a punishment were suggested as a new, hitherto untried method of dealing with crime. In such circumstances capital punishment would be rejected with horror by every State in the Union. It is only because the death penalty is a survival from a more barbaric age, to which through generations we have become hardened, that we are able to tolerate and rationalize it in this day. But revolting as capital punishment is in ordinary circumstances, it becomes doubly so when public officials exhibit a sadistic determination to prevent a victim from “cheating the gallows,” as the saying goes. The Associated Press reports that a man condemned to die in Indiana broke his eyeglasses and with the broken parts cut both wrists on the day before that set for his execution. When found by prison guards he was apparently dying from loss of blood and he pleaded not to be revived. But doctors bandaged his wrists, found another prisoner who was willing to give a pint of blood, made a transfusion, and restored the man to life. “He’ll go to the chair if we have to take him there on a cot,” a prison official is quoted as saying. It seems to us that such an official would find fuller scope for his talents in charge of a Nazi concentration camp in Germany.

IN AN OBSCURE CORNER of the financial section of the New York Times the following interesting item recently appeared:

Alarm over the slowing up of the destruction of coffee in Brazil was allayed in local trade circles yesterday when the New York Coffee and Sugar Exchange received a cable dispatch from the National Coffee Department of Brazil stating that there has been no change of policy. The alarm was caused by the fact that in the first half of February only 46,000 bags were destroyed against a monthly average of 1,290,000 in the last six months of 1933. Destruction will be continued. . . . Destruction has been authorized and begun on 1,480,000 bags from Sao Paulo, 450,000 bags from Minas Geraes, and 173,000 bags from Paraná.

Who said the depression was over?

THE WEATHER MAN averted a revolution when he admitted on March 1 that February, at least on the Eastern seaboard, was one of the coldest months ever recorded by the Weather Bureau, which, incidentally, has been recording for 112 years. If he had dared, after the fashion of weather men and ship captains, to prove by the law of averages that the mean temperature of February wasn’t so mean after all, Long Island would have risen as one man and that large snowdrift formerly known as New England would have declared its temporary isolation permanent. But now that February is over we can see that it had some things to recommend it. It will make excellent copy for tall tales; they had in fact begun to circulate before the month was over. There were the 30,000 snow shovelers who got “lost” in New York City somewhere between the headquarters of the CWA and the snowdrifts they were supposed to remove. There was the woman in the suburbs who called the police to rescue a man who for some time had been vainly trying to get out of a snowdrift in front of her house—only to find that it was her husband. There was the train from Greenport, Long Island, to New York City, carrying nine passengers, which covered ninety-three miles in twenty-two and a half hours. There were the hundreds of suburban dwellings so thoroughly equipped with modern electrical conveniences that, once the current went off, the hazards of living in the Arctic were as nothing compared with the dangers of Bronxville, which lacks both igloos and whale blubber. The New York Stock Exchange must have thought it was a very cold month indeed, with cruel winds blowing in from every direction. Let it remember, however, that the coldest hour always comes just before the heat is turned on.

Retreat from Economic Nationalism

WHATEVER the specific objections may be to the President's proposal that Congress delegate to him the power to alter tariff rates for the purpose of negotiating reciprocal agreements, his message on the subject is an encouraging and significant document. After a year devoted to the effort to bring revival almost entirely by domestic measures, the President has been won over to the conclusion that "a full and permanent domestic recovery depends in part upon a revived and strengthened international trade."

The importance of this declaration becomes more apparent when we recall some of the earlier interpretations of the New Deal. It was the belief of Raymond Moley and others that the recovery program necessarily involved a movement in the direction of greater nationalism. The National Industrial Recovery Act itself provided that if an investigation by the Tariff Commission substantiated complaints that imports "endanger the maintenance of any code," the President could impose higher duties or even quota restrictions. And the general argument was put forward that the country could not expect to have a really "planned economy" while it permitted the disturbing element of foreign trade. This argument would have been harmless enough if it had merely asserted, what was true, that government regulation of foreign trade is consistent with "national planning"; but it was thoroughly unsound in its implication that a prohibition of foreign trade is in the national interest. What is important is that the President, after his initial waverings, is now convinced that economic revival can be hastened not by a further jacking up of tariff barriers but by a lowering of them.

Two main questions are raised by his present proposal: one is that of the country's future foreign-trade policy; the other that of the method of putting it into effect. Regarding the first, the President seems to have been influenced greatly by the thoughtful conclusions of Secretary Wallace. Mr. Wallace has pointed out strikingly what some of the results of a pure economic nationalism would be. We should have to be prepared to make permanent the retirement of from 40,000,000 to 100,000,000 acres of crop land. We should have to cut the cotton acreage of the South, for example, almost in half, and probably arrange to shift part of the Southern population. We should have to produce some things at an appalling expense. And we should have to submit to a regimentation and a direct compulsion in our economic life beyond anything imagined at present.

In his discussion of the results of a policy of internationalism Mr. Wallace is equally courageous, pointing out that "if we are going to increase foreign purchasing power enough to sell abroad our normal surpluses of cotton, wheat, and tobacco at a decent price, we shall have to accept nearly a billion dollars' worth more goods from abroad than we did in 1929. We shall have to get that much more in order to service the debts that are coming to us from abroad and have enough left over to pay us a fair price for what we send abroad." Mr. Wallace points out that this might seriously hurt certain industries and a few kinds of agricultural businesses, including those devoted to sugar beets, flax, and wool-growing. Because of the political and other obstacles to a full internationalism, he suggests a "planned middle course" involving, say, a sufficient lowering of tariffs to bring in only another half-billion dollars' worth of goods annually, while permanently retracting our good agricultural land by some 25,000,000 instead of 50,000,000 acres.

